One of the last official acts of former U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy was the granting of clemency to two notorious German war criminals, including Gen. Reinhardt, sentenced to 15 years in prison for war crimes against humanity. This piece-meal approach to the freeing of German war criminals which has been practiced by Mr. McCloy ever since he took office has had an unusual effect on the German mind. For example, the newspaper organ of the German militarists, the Deutsche Soldaten Zeitung, Aug. 28, 1952 remarked "if the official Allied authorities during the last few years have been constantly freeing prisoners or reducing the sentences against former German soldiers, it is but their clear admission that they regard the former sentences as untenable." In other words, after having successfully pressed the Allies to grant "one-at-a-time clemency" to the war criminals, the Germans now turn around and declare that the willingness of the Allies to accommodate them in this demand proves that the war crimes trials and the sentences related thereto were inadmissible in the first place.

Germany's Moral Right

Indeed, the Germans have gone further. They not only demand the freedom of the war criminals but insist that no power except the German people have the right to pass judgment on them. This is clearly expressed in the Soldaten Zeitung, Aug. 14, 1952, "only we Germans possess the highest moral right to argue these matters

"Marshal Kesselring made a speech in which he declared that 'if things had been left to the soldiers, we would have had a United Europe a long time ago.' In saying this, the Marshal simply confirmed what was known for a long time—namely, that the Bonn Government needed specialists in order to carry out the integration of Europe up to the Ural mountains. This is exactly what Hitler had in mind and tried once."

without contradiction from any side. . . ." Thus, whereas in the spring of 1952 the German were howling for clemency acts on behalf of the war criminals, by the summer the Germans were insisting that they were the only ones who had the right to judge these criminals.

In a sense, the Allies adjusted their policy to meet this new demand when they consented to permit the Germans to share in the review of the sentences of some 600 criminals still imprisoned. But this concession merely served as a spring-board for a new German propaganda barrage. No longer are the Germans inhibited by world public opinion or Allied surveillance. They are beginning to throw caution to the wind and have gone from the offense to the attack.

This was made clear in one of Germany's leading newspapers, the Frankfurter Algemeine Zeitung. On Aug. 16 this newspaper which speaks for the heavy industries of the Ruhr ran an editorial in which reference was made to an article written in the Japanese press by the former Japanese deputy foreign minister Ohashi. Ohashi, according to this editorial, branded Roosevelt "the true war criminal." In connection with Ohashi's attack against the late President, the editorial concludes "this shows, in line with recent reported British differences of opinion on the Nuremberg and Tokyo war crimes trials, that the discussion about the war criminals gains more and more momentum."

Americans, the Real "Criminals"

The subtle innuendos of the Frankfurter Algemeine Zeitung were discarded at a recent meeting of the cutthroats who belonged to Hitler's Waffen SS. One of the leading speakers at this confab was Gen. Ramcke who had been released from prison by the French where he had served a jail sentence for war crimes. To the repeated shouts from the crowd of "pig-dog Eisenhower" Ramcke stated, "Who are the war criminals? They are those who made the Versailles Treaty. They are those who destroy German towns. . . ."

He further declared that there were no more war criminals in Germany than in Allied countries and added that he was proud to have been on the "blacklist" of the Allies. He predicted that "one day the blacklist will become the lists of honor." The New York Times reported that the speech was received by "clamorous applause by the assembled veterans. . . ." Ramcke has found his echo in the United States in the person of a leading pro-German spokesman, A. J. App, who has earned a notorious reputation as an apologist for Nazi atrocities.

In a pamphlet entitled, Action on War Crimes, Mr. App accuses Pres. Truman of having committed war crimes at Potsdam. He further wrote, "May God grant that the American people will thus belatedly but grandly rise to their duty! If we will not hang our war criminals, let us at least undo as much of the frightful consequences of their crimes as possible."

This is the ultimate meaning of the German campaign to free war criminals. It is not merely a campaign to absolve Germany's war guilt. On the contrary, it not only denies Germany's war guilt but emphatically accuses the Allies of having committed the worst crimes in history.

Thus we have the spectacle of prominent leaders and newspapers, in a country which received billions of dollars for rehabilitation, brazenly and publicly asserting that the Allies are the real war criminals and must ultimately stand before the bar of judgment. Shall the western democracies remain silent in the face of these ominous signs? Will democracy be served by granting clemency to those whose lives have been devoted to its destruction? Is this the price that we must pay to obtain Germany's "cooperation"?

J. J. McCloy's Optimism

The campaign to glorify the German war criminals and to smear the Allied cause, demolishes the rosy picture painted by former U. S. High Commissioner McCloy who assured the Congress that the "people of Western Germany have shown their maturity and earned their right to the freedom which the new agreements provide."

Mr. McCloy made this statement to the Congress in defending the contractual agreement with Germany. The agreement covers every conceivable aspect of American-German relations. However, Mr. McCloy who played a leading role in the preparation of this document, did not bother to see to it that the agreement would contain guarantees that the German government would officially recognize the verdict and justice of the Nuremburg trials and that it would take positive measures to prevent the development of an anti-Allied campaign to free the war criminals.

The American people and their allies cannot depend on platitudes to safeguard their security. If the German government desires to prove in concrete terms that it adheres to the morality of the free nations, then it must recognize the verdicts and the justice of the Nuremburg trials and cease to encourage overtly or covertly the present scurrilous campaign on behalf of these convicted enemies of humanity.

"In trying to organize a German army, the Western powers are embarking upon a road marked with many danger signs. This army must be imbued with a fighting spirit but free from nationalistic sentiments; it must be a powerful war machine but not powerful enough to become a threat to the other members of NATO; it must be patriotic but willing to accept the limited sovereignty of a still occupied and divided Germany; peace-loving but not pacifist. To reconcile all these contradictions, the new German army would have to be something very, very special."

CENTURY-OLD TRADITIONS

During the New Year Season the mail is always heavy with advertisements and announcements of one sort or another. This year is no exception and we must confess that it is difficult to pay careful attention to all of the materials received. However, one elaborately decorated folder, in particular, struck our eyes. Upon opening it, we read the following:

Dear Sir:

We have pleasure in informing you, that today the General Meeting of the shareholders of the Deutsche Bank has decided upon the reunion of its branches in Southern Germany known since 1947 as

Bayerische Creditbank
Hessische Bank
Oberrheinische Bank
Rheinische Kreditbank
Sudwestbank
Wurttembergische Vereinsbank

into a new banking institution under the name of SUDDEUTSCHE BANK Aktiengesellschaft

The foremost aim of the new institution will be to continue the century-old banking tradition of the DEUTSCHE BANK and by personal advice and individual attention to all orders received to maintain and strengthen good relations with its clients.

MUNCHEN/FRANKFURT (Main),
September 25, 1952

Very truly yours,
SUDDEUTSCHE BANK Aktiengesellschaft

Of course this was no ordinary announcement so far as we were concerned, especially since attached to it were the names of some individuals who brought back unpleasant memories to us. Apparently they are no longer recalled by those in high places who were supposed to carry out a program that would bring democracy into German life and eliminate the German banking monopolies which did so much harm to the world.

The leading officials of the so-called Süddeutsche Bank are Dr. Otto Seeling, Dr. Robert Frowein and the ubiquitous Herman J. Abs. This triumvirate is highly respected in Germany although all three were characterized by the U. S. War Department in March 1945 as "individuals who, in an outstanding way, thrived under National Socialism, who welcomed it in the beginning, aided the Nazis to obtain power, supported them in office, shared the spoils of expropriation and conquest, or otherwise markedly benefited in their careers or fortunes under the Nazis."

According to the War Department, Herr Seeling served in an important governmental capacity to further the Nazi war effort. Frowein was a director of the Deutsche Bank during the Nazi period and is related to Abraham Frowein who actively cooperated with the Nazis and profited from the expropriation of non-Aryan business enterprises.

Our readers of course, should be familiar with Herr Abs, who as the leading figure in the Deutsche Bank was one of Hitler's chief paymasters. Abs, like many of his fellow vultures, grew fat on the loot which he gathered up as the Nazi armies swept through Europe. Several years ago, Herr Abs came quietly to the United States to renew old acquaintances but had to return home in a hurry when his criminal record was publicly exposed by Senator Gillette.

As one can see from the announcement reprinted above, and the re-emergence of the key figures of the "deconcentrated" Deutsche Bank, essentially very little has changed since the days when the German banking monopoly lorded over Europe under the protective wing of the German Wehrmacht. This, despite the promises and pledges made by Allied officials that never again, would the German banking octopus be permitted to function.

We can assure our readers that the resources of the Deutsche Bank in its new guise are pretty much intact. Unlike the average German, the enormous resources of the Deutsche Bank were not drastically affected by the currency reform. Moreover, the London Economist (November 15, 1952) points out that the greater part of the resources of the German banks "have been derived from profits made since then (the currency reform) as well as from the bringing in of hidden reserves. The banks were legally permitted to make use of such reserves and their employments were encouraged by the granting of tax-reliefs." Therefore, the Economist observes "the liquidity of the new banks is high" and there is "greater flexibility and wider opportunities."

We are now told that the Süddeutsche Bank will "continue the century-old banking tradition of the Deutsche Bank." These were some of the "traditions" of the Deutsche Bank, according to a U. S. government report:

"The information available, however, is sufficiently diversified and significant to show the leading part played by the Deutsche Bank in furthering the expansionist aims of the Nazi regime and its major industrial backers."

The Deutsche Bank was an "excessive concentration of economic power and a participant in the execution of the criminal policies of the Nazi regime . . ."

The Deutsche Bank "showed the way to all-German commercial banks with its contributions to the rearmament program. It provided the Reich with vast funds for rearmament purposes."

The Deutsche Bank acted as the "spearhead institution for the German government and the economic penetration of the annexed occupied and satellite countries of Europe."

"That the Deutsche Bank was given the most monopolistic position for handling the remittances to their home countries of the savings made by foreign workers in Germany is indicative of the close working relationship between the Deutsche Bank and the Nazi government."

"As Hitler's aggressive war engulfed more and more countries and ever increasing labor forces were imported, frequently by force, the Deutsche Bank's transfer business grew accordingly."

The U. S. Government report was not at all impressed by these "traditions" and so it recommended that:

"1. The Deutsche Bank be liquidated.

"2. The responsible officials of the Deutsche Bank be indicted and tried as war criminals.

"3. The leading officials of the Deutsche Bank be barred from positions of importance or responsibility in Germany's economic or political life."

The U. S. government report and recommendations were made in the year 1946, but as we now usher in 1953, the announcement of the rebirth of the German banking monopolies makes us rub our eyes and wonder: "Is it really 1953, or are we still in the year 1933"?

A FRENCH EXPERT'S VIEW

"The new political fact in Europe is that the Germans for the first time since the end of the war appear to have reassumed their old tendency to nationalist arrogance and will to power. They have begun again to show the face which so often in the past has made Europe tremble.

"This resurgence of German nationalism must, I believe, be attributed to two basic causes:

"The tempo of economic development in Western Germany is now more rapid than that of all other European countries. Germany has neither a military budget to support nor an Asiatic war (like Korea, Indo-China or Malaya) to pay for. It has been able to concentrate solely on its recovery.

"By the testimony of Germany's own press, the Republican victory in America has led a large number of Germans to believe that American policy will now be oriented to a support of Germany as America's principal ally in Europe."

"Sword and Swastika"

by
TELFORD TAYLOR

It is unfortunate that this issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III was about to go to press when "SWORD AND SWASTIKA: GENERALS AND NAZIS IN THE THIRD REICH" by General Telford Taylor was published. We should have desired to analyze this important book in more detail for our readers. Though this cannot be done in this issue, we certainly intend to take up this matter in a subsequent one. However, because of the importance of this book, we believe our readers will be interested in some of the comments made by New York Times' book reviewer, Mr. Orville Prescott.

Mr. Prescott tells us that Sword and Swastika is dramatic "because it is a story of intrigue and conspiracy, of secret rearmament in violation of the Versailles Treaty, financed and supported by the supposedly democratic Weimar Government, and of frenzied preparation for war under Hitler. It is dismal because it is the story of professionally able soldiers who lacked the intelligence, the vision and the courage to put the welfare of their country and of civilization itself ahead of their own advancement in rank and their longed-for opportunity to wage aggressive war."

General Taylor is an outstanding authority on this subject since he served as Chief American Prosecutor at the Nuremburg war criminals' trial from 1945 to 1949. Prior to this important assignment, General Taylor served as an Intelligence Officer in Europe from 1943 to 1945. His personal experiences, based on interrogation of many German war leaders, as well as captured documents, plus his talents as a lawyer, have qualified him as an expert on the subjects discussed in "Sword and Swastika."

In discussing the book, Mr. Prescott tells us that General Taylor showed how, despite specific differences between Hitler and the German General Staff, they were in basic agreement on fundamental principles with respect to the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship. General Taylor quotes General von Blomberg as stating "we soldiers had no reason to complain of Hitler. He fulfilled hopes which were dear to all of us." The connecting links between the German military and the Nazis as shown by General Taylor explodes the newly built-up myth that the German military had not participated in, nor were they responsible for the aggressive policies of the Nazis.

Mr. Prescott concludes his review of the book by observing: "throughout this book, Mr. Taylor implies that the German Generals should have resisted Hitler, but he believes that they were really incapable of it because their reactionary military minds were a century or so out of date. Scorning democracy and loving war for its own sake, they were the joyful accomplices of one of the greatest criminals in history."

There is no question that "Sword and Swastika" deserves to be read by every security-minded American.

Nationalist Fuse Sputters in Germany

by
ERNEST S. PISKO

Those who forecast stormy weather in Germany have been proved correct.

The center of the storm is formed by the hot air of nationalism billowing skyward and sucking into its vortex an ever-growing number of groups and individuals.

There are many striking parallels between what is happening in West Germany now and what happened in the Weimar Republic in the 1920's. Then, too, foreign developments and a scramble for power by various political parties fanned the fires of German nationalist feeling with results that are all too well known . . .

On Nov. 18, the German police arrested seven Nazis on the charge of conspiring to overthrow the government. Among them is Heinrich Vetter, formerly Hitler's Gauleiter in South Westphalia.

On No. 16, the Bonn Bundestag (Parliament) unanimously condemned the coming Saar elections of Nov. 30 as invalid and appealed to the Saarlanders to boycott the elections. Jakob Kaiser, Minister for All-German Affairs in Dr. Adenauer's Cabinet, called for the return of the Saar to West Germany, in keeping with the slogan accepted by all parties, 'Die Saar deutsch immerdar'—the Saar German for ever and ever.

On Nov. 15, a Munich court ruled that the killing of captured American bomber crews in World War II 'did not constitute murder . . .'

At a Communist meeting in East Berlin, Pastor Martin Niemoller declared that German participation in the European army must be prevented 'by all means.'

On Nov 5, another Munich court acquitted two former Nazi officers, Otto Thorbeck and Walter Huppenkothen, who had been charged with aiding in the murder of Admiral Hans Canaris and five other resistance fighters, in April, 1945.

On Nov. 4, a certain Dr. Gottfried Krummacher was cheered at a meeting in Kassel when he demanded that the Allies should pay Nazi party members $2 for each day they had been held in internment camps after the war. He also demanded that they should receive a back payment of 50 cents for each hour of work they had done by order of the camp commander.

War Guilt Denied

On Oct. 26 at a meeting of the former Waffen SS in Hanover, Hitler's tank Gen. Bernhard Ramcke demanded the immediate release of all German war criminals and declared that the Americans and British were the real war criminals.

Nothing signifies the change in the German atmosphere more clearly than the switch that took place during the past seven years in the popular attitude toward the Nazi crimes. In the beginning, practically every German said, 'I didn't know what was going on.' A year or two later, the stock excuse was, 'I could do nothing against it.' By 1949, one already could hear people say, 'The accusations are mostly propaganda.' And now, German crowds cheer wildly when they are told, 'We have nothing to apologize for. We did the right thing.'

But the fact that today some of the worst Nazis can openly boast of their misdeeds and are being elected to public office is not the most alarming feature. The Nazis never were a majority in Germany. They never could have seized power had it not been for the support they received from ultra-conservative groups within big industry, finance, and army.

It is in these fields that—today as 20 years ago—the danger lies. And it is in these fields that the Western Allies, particularly the United States and Britain, have to bear a major share of responsibility for the present state of affairs. For their lofty program of pacifying and democratizing the Germans hardly ever got beyond the printing of directives that first were ignored and eventually turned around.

As a result, Alfred Krupp has got his property back, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht can establish a banking firm, the I. G. Dye Trust directors, who admittedly financed the Third Reich, were acquitted by a United States war crimes court, the Foreign Office is largely staffed with employees of the Ribbentrop era, the contractural agreement between the western powers and the Bonn government is openly referred to as a "Schandvertrag' (treaty of disgrace), the majority of schoolteachers praise the 'glory' of the Nazi era, and the German generals while away their time until their expected reinstatement in the new army by writing books on how Germany 'almost won the war.

In short, as representative Jacob K. Javits, United States congressman, wrote a few months ago in the Reporter: 'The leaders of . . . democratic elements are forced to admit that theirs may not be the preponderant voice in West Germany today.'

Nationalists Agitate

The voice that can be heard is the voice of nationalism, which is as different from plain patriotism as passion is from love. It comes from the left—the Social Democrats—the center—the Free Democrats—and the right—the German Party and the BHE Refugee Party . . .

The nationalists protest against the West's amply demonstrated willingness to forget the Nazi era. They do not want these seven years wiped off the tables of German history, for in the triumphs as well as the bitterness of that period they discern the signposts to new ventures better prepared and more daringly executed.

The nationalists are a minority in Germany. But they are articulate, well-versed in politics and agitation, comfortably endowed with funds, and have influence in most key spots of public life. They were able 20 years ago to mobilize the silent masses, and they are doing their best to repeat that feat.

"Berlin-Baghdad" Again

In the early years of the 20th century, the world was treated with the gaudy spectacle of the German Emperor turning up in the countries of the Middle East where he posed as the great defender of the Moslem Faith. Behind the Kaiser's flowery speeches and the pomp and ceremony attached to his visits lurked the more practical aspects of German imperialistic aspirations in the Middle East. Big German industrialists interested in the supply of steel rails and war materials and a finance consortium under the leadership of the predatory Deutsche Bank were working assiduously to gain a predominant position in Turkey and in the Middle East in general. This grandiose project of German imperialism bore an innocent sounding title—the Berlin-Baghdad railway.

The Grand Mufti Again

The plan was never completed by the Germans under the Kaiser, but Adolph Hitler revived it. In this connection, Hitler was assisted by many influential Nazi sympathizers in the countries of the Middle East led by the notorious Grand Mufti of Jerusalem. The Fascist character of the Mufti's activities even before Hitler came to power qualified him as a trusted confidant of the Nazis. Among his specialties was his ability to plan and execute pogroms against Jews. Obviously the Nazis would not overlook his talents in this direction. Thus S.S. Hauptsturmfuhrer Dieter von Wisliczeny, who was a close collaborator of Adolph Eichmann, one of the chief executors of the Jewish extermination programs, declared in an affidavit, "In my opinion, the Grand Mufti who has been in Berlin since 1941 played a role in the decision of the German Government to exterminate Jews, the importance of which must not be disregarded. He has repeatedly suggested to the various authorities with whom he has been in contact, above all, before Hitler, Ribbentrop and Himmler the extermination of Europe's Jewry . . . He was one of Eichmann's best friends and has constantly incited him to accelerate the extermination measures." The notorious record of the Mufti prompted many outstanding Americans including Herbert Bayard Swope to call for his prosecution as a war criminal. Unfortunately this was not done. Today the Mufti is once more spreading his poison through the Middle East. His influence has grown by leaps and bounds. Col. Mehanna, who became a member of the Egyptian Regency after Gen. Naguib's coup, is a close friend of the Mufti and has given high civil posts to several old pals who spent the war years in Germany as guests of Hitler. With the re-emergence of the Mufti as a powerful figure in Middle Eastern affairs, the Germans are once more returning to this strategic area.

Germans in Egypt

According to Newsweek, August 25th, 1952, the influence of German military behind the present Egyptian Prime Minister Gen. Naguib is substantial. In connection with the overthrow of King Farouk by Naguib's forces, Newsweek reports:

"There is no evidence that the Germans initiated the coup. It is however known that the young officers who did the actual planning consulted the German advisers as to 'tactics.' The Cairo reports attribute the smoothness of the operation to German advice. Also, the young officers are reported to have chosen Gen. Naguib as their leader on German advice. Later, Naguib publicly praised the work of the German advisory group, thus giving it an official stamp." While we do not have detailed information concerning the backgrounds of the German officers, who appear to be the real power behind the Egyptian Army, some facts have come to light which are worthy of attention.

The leading advisor to Naguib is Lt. Gen. Wilhelm Fahrmbacher. Herr Fahrmbacher was a corps commander in the Nazi Army during World War II and for a while had been held by the French as a war criminal. Among his associates is Major Gen. Oscar Munzel who was a great favorite of the German officer caste. Another member of the German Military who plays an important role in the Egyptian Army is Gerhard Mertins. He was a veteran of the German air invasion of Crete and a battalion commander during the Nazi offensive in Western Europe in 1945. He now teaches specially selected Egyptian units the art of parachute jumping and attack.

The number of German military officers in Egypt is a closely guarded secret but it is known that the Egyptians had set up an office in Germany to recruit German specialists who served under Field Marshal Gen. Erwin Rommel in the North African campaign of World War II (United Press, January 11th, 1952). Apparently the recruiting has been satisfactory and the liaison between Bonn and the Egyptians seems to be operating successfully. Naguib's German military advisers possess valid West German passports and can travel freely between Egypt and Germany. Gen. Fahrmbacher, for instance, recently enjoyed a "well deserved" furlough in Bavaria. Perhaps this "well deserved" rest is due to Fahrmbacher's arduous efforts in helping Naguib to seize power. The United Nations World noted that Naguib's triumph "bore the earmarks of a Hitlerite putsch."

Infiltrating Syria

It is not known whether the Bonn Government was officially connected with this event, but the fact remains that these German military officers are granted every opportunity by Adenauer's government to earn their bread and butter in Egypt.

Though Egypt seems to be the main German target for the present, other Middle Eastern countries are not excluded. For example, Syria has also been infiltrated by the German Military. The Syrian Government called in a German Military group after it was defeated by the Israeli armies. Newsweek reports "the first to appear in Damascus was a former Gestapo Colonel named Rapp. He revamped Syrian Military Intelligence and is credited with a leading role in Syria's first military coup, when a group of army officers under Colonel Husni Zayim took over the Government." Following this initial success, the German military stepped up their infiltration. Today, the top ranking German officer in Syria appears to be Gen. Stutterheim, assisted by the very influential Colonel Kriebel. These men were high ranking Intelligence Officers in Hitler's army and they are now in control of the armed forces of Syria.

The Syrians, like the Egyptians, have been busily recruiting German Military officers and they seem to be in close touch with Gen. Gehlen "who now plays an important role in security matters in Germany."

According to Paris-Presse (September 20th, 1952) a former Marshal of Hitler's Wehrmacht, Schoerner, has taken over German operations in the Middle East. He was a former commander of the German forces in Bohemia. The ex-Marshal has at his disposal a group of men who were formerly members of Admiral Canaris' Secret Service. As head of the German Secret Service, Admiral Canaris had devised an elaborate and subtle plan for the peaceful conquest of the Middle East by Germany. Will Schoerner try to carry out the Canaris plan?

"Drang Nach Osten"

The march of the German Military to the Middle East has been followed by the steady influx of German industrialists, diplomats and technicians. The Associated Press (October 25, 1952) described this movement in these words: "German commercial travellers—samples and order books tucked neatly in their briefcases—are back in force in Turkey and the Middle East. Observers who travel the area say they see German salesmen everywhere—from Istanbul to Teheran and Cairo and points in between, like Baghdad, Damascus, Amman and Beirut . . . Bonn announced that all German diplomats to these countries would have to qualify as economic experts."

In the Spring of 1952, a leading German banker, Dr. Albert Buhler, arrived in Cairo to study the possibility of developing greater trade and financial relations between Egypt and Germany. Dr. Buhler stressed the urgency for the creation of an Egyptian-German Bank. He further stated that Egypt would find Germany as the best source for needed goods in view of the fact that the United States and other countries of Western Europe were devoting so much of their energies to rearmament.

Already the Germans have succeeded in placing some of their key agents in the highest levels of the Egyptian Government. Hans Voss, a former SS officer, is chief of the Egyptian Central Planning Board. He heads the German Mission of thirty individuals which deals with technical and production problems. S.S. Gen. Voss was at one time the chief of the Central Armament Office in the Reich Ministry for Armament and War production. He told a newspaper correspondent that it was mainly due to Arab distrust of "Western Imperialism" that Egypt had sought the services of German advisors, officers and economists. He denied that the Germans received any instructions from the "Fascist International" but in reply to a question as to what the duties of his organization in Egypt were, he blurted out, "the general industrial organization as we once did in Germany, working for the 4 year plan."

When Hitler seized Czechoslovakia, Voss, who was a favorite of the Nazis, was made director of the Skoda Works from 1939 to 1945. According to the United States War Department, Herr Voss was among those who benefited from the Nazi program of war and conquest and received high honors from the Hitler Government.

Another German who plays an important part in the economic set-up of Egypt is Albert Degener. Herr Degener is responsible for the operation of the German-Egyptian Chamber of Commerce in Cairo. He headed a similar organization in New York City up to the outbreak of war between Nazi Germany and the United States. As the executive secretary of the German-American Board, Dr. Degener boasted how this outfit under his direction had "corrected many an erroneous view concerning Germany (Nazi Germany) prevailing more particularly in American circles." He also wrote how the German Board of Trade in New York had received Germans of the "highest repute," including Fritz Thyssen (I paid Hitler), and Dr. Schacht (accused war criminal) to tell Americans what glorious things were being achieved under Hitler. As late as May 16th, 1940, Degener played a decisive role in organizing German war relief work among German-Americans in order to assist the Nazis in their fight against France and Great Britain. Whether he carried a Nazi Party card is irrelevant, for his heart, in any event, belonged to Hitler.

Among the German industrialists who are moving into Egypt is Dr. Walter Rohland. This German steel magnate is slated to direct the building of a steel plant in Egypt. He too, according to the War Department, especially profited from Hitler's war of aggression. When the Allies first occupied Western Germany Dr. Rohland was given the job of de-Nazifying the steel industry—this, in spite of the fact that Rohland had been a member of the Nazi Party. The results of his de-Nazification activities can be seen by the fact that most of the old Hitler supporters are once again in position and power in the German steel industry.

Another industrialist who is now very active in the commercial and cultural affairs of Egypt is von Richter. He is a director of the "Misr Europe Company" and has succeeded in cornering a number of business deals in Egypt. The well-known German oil specialists, Drs. Wahlter and Schidler, are also very active in Egypt today.

Even the Egyptian educational system is beginning to be infiltrated with German "educators." For example, Professors Schomberg and Ortner are active at the University of Cairo. Drs. Riddel and Pollier are applying their talents at the University of Alexandria. Indeed, there is now talk of making the teaching of German compulsory in Egyptian schools.

The "Eternal" Herr Schacht

The man who serves as the overall "co-ordinator" for German economic infiltration in the Middle East, is none other than Dr. Hjalmar Schacht. In this connection, Mr. Ernest Leiser, the well-known newspaper correspondent remarked, "Stalin's post-war propaganda slogan 'Hitlers come and Hitlers go but the great German people go on forever' has been adopted by the wags here-abouts 'Germans come and Germans go, but the Great Dr. Schacht goes on forever.' " Truly Schacht is the best example of the salesman "who did not die." It was Schacht who, while "fixing up" German finances to support Hitler's armament program, described the Fuhrer as "a man of sound principles on whom the German people should pin its entire faith." Herr Schacht managed to escape the hangman's noose at Nuremberg and after having wiggled his way out of several de-Nazification trials, emerged again as salesman par-excellence of German imperialism. He flits from one Middle Eastern country to another spreading his pearls of wisdom among the rulers of these states. He has been called in by the Iranians, the Egyptians and the Turks but after he runs out of answers, returns to Bonn and Madrid for further instructions.

According to the well-known political writer Hans Habe, writing in the German language newspaper Aufbau, October 24th, Schacht was particularly successful in winning over the Iranians. As a result, the Germans are able to exploit the split between the British and the Iranian Government over the oil question. Habe reported that 370 German technicians have proceeded to the Iranian oil center at Abadan. In addition to these technicians, Habe reveals that 65 German technicians from the Soviet Zone have also gone to Iran. Thus the Germans who like to pose as the bulwark against Russian expansion are quietly joining hands with the Soviets in this strategic area. Mr. Habe also points out that there appears to be a tie-up between Dr. Schacht and Dr. Grobba who was Hitler's Ambassador to Baghdad and is now operating as a "middle man" between the Moslem world and Moscow.

The progress made by these economic "ambassadors" of Germany in the Middle East, was described by Business Week, September 13th, 1952: "West Germans are establishing political bridge-heads in the Middle East that may lead to a major economic invasion of the area . . . A cadre of German officers and economists have been advising the Syrian Government. Iran's Mossadegh has called in trouble-shooter Herr Schacht to bolster his faltering economy, and Mossadegh's oil aides had been recruiting West Germany's technicians with an eye to re-opening Abadan. For U. S. and British businessmen, this promises stiffening German competition in the Middle East in capital as well as consumer goods. You can be sure that these advisors will try to steer their clients into closer economic relationships with Germany."

Diplomats at Work

German diplomats of the Ribbentrop School, presently employed by Chancellor Adenauer, are following the parade of German generals and industrialists to the Middle East. Recently the West Germans' Government announced the appointment of Hans Joachim von der Esch as Minister to Syria. According to reliable sources, Dr. Esch is not really a professional diplomat. He formerly represented some of the largest coal monopolies in Germany in the Middle East. He is said to have been a Nazi fellow-traveller and during the war, served in the Counter Espionage Department of Goering's Air Force in Athens.

The present German Ambassador to Turkey is Wilhelm Haas. Haas was originally Chief of the Office of Administrative and Personnel affairs in the Bonn Foreign Office and in this capacity, admitted that 14 out of the 31 senior members of his staff had been members of the Nazi Party. In 1937 Haas served as a political observer for I. G. Farben in China. In this position, he collaborated on the closest terms with E. W. Bohle and the State Secretary in charge of German propaganda and Germans abroad. It should be noted that the entire work was supervised and directed by the Nazi Party and Haas consequently took his orders from the Nazis. In view of Dr. Adenauer's defense of Nazi diplomats presently employed in the Bonn Foreign Office, one can expect that many more Ribbentrop proteges will be found in the countries of the Middle East.

Some Interesting Sidelights

There is an interesting sidelight to the present German drive in the Middle East which deserves brief mention. When the Germans agreed to give reparations to Israel on behalf of those who suffered under Nazi rule, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported that Dr. Nahum Goldman, head of the Conference of Jewish Material Claims and Moshe Sharett, Israel's Foreign Minister told Chancellor Adenauer that the reparations agreement might start bridging the "un-bridged depths" between Germany and the Jewish nation. However, this statement should be examined in the light of recent German moves to appease the Arabs.

The Reuters News Agency of October 3rd, 1952, reported that Bonn had taken steps to "better relations with the Arab World." It was announced that Adenauer's Government had decided to donate $25,000 ostensibly to help Arab Refugees. This move, Reuters noted, was seen as an attempt to mollify the Arabs because of the West German Government's agreements with Israel.

The New York Times of October 4th, reported that a movement was afoot in Germany to block the reparations agreement. The leader of this effort, is one Josef Frischler, who is a member of Adenauer's coalition Government and formerly represented German ethnic groups in Yugoslavia and Hungary when the Nazis occupied those countries. In addition, the Times reported that the Koelnische Rundshau, a newspaper which often serves as the mouthpiece for Adenauer himself, declared that it would be "unwise to shrug shoulders" at the Arab's protest over the agreement with Israel. This paper stressed the economic importance of the Arab Nations to Germany and pointed out that the Arabs had "warmly recommended return of Germany to the family of Nations whereas Israel rejected this proposal . . ."

Thus, we see on the one hand, Adenauer expressing his determination to make good on the agreement made with the Jews while, at the same time, his political colleagues and his own mouthpiece flirt with the Arabs and try in every way, to sabotage the agreement. The bridge that is supposed to be formed on the basis of the reparations agreement between West Germany and Israel, does not appear to be as solid as that which is being constructed between the Bonn Government and its Arab friends by Dr. Schacht and the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem.

In this connection, it is noteworthy that the Egyptian Prime Minister, Gen. Naguib recently played host to Dr. Frank Buchman, the head of the so-called Moral Re-armament Movement. Dr. Buchman praised Naguib and in turn was toasted by leading officials of the Egyptian Government. Dr. Buchman was a prominent Nazi sympathizer and his movement attracted some of Hitler's leading henchman, including Rudolph Hess. It was Dr. Buchman who declared "I thank Heaven for a man like Adolf Hitler."

Conclusion

This article has merely skimmed the surface of Neo-Nazi intrigue and infiltration in the Middle East but the evidence presented above, indicates that the dreams of the Kaiser and Hitler to dominate this strategic sector of the world, live on in the hearts of their successors in Bonn. The Western powers have been rightfully vigilant over any attempts on the part of the Soviets to seize this vital area, but why is it that they continue to tolerate the drive of the Germans which, as history has shown, was always directed against the security of the West?

GERMANY'S "REARMAMENT" CONTRIBUTION

From an A. P. Dispatch:

"Finance Minister Fritz Schaeffer announced a 1953 budget of 26,544,000,000 Deutsche marks (about $6,289,000,000) for West Germany. It is higher than this year, but allows less money for defense costs . . .

"Defense costs are put at 9,000,000,000 marks for the whole year. This averages 100,000,000 marks a month less than the 850,000,000 marks being paid monthly by West Germany in accord with the agreement made by the North Atlantic Council in Lisbon, Portugal, last February."

From another A. P. Dispatch:

". . . Chancellor Konrad Adenauer said the United States had promised billions of dollars to equip West German troops . . .

". . . Listeners understood the Chancellor to use the figure 40,000,000,000 marks—$9,520,000,000 — in referring to the cost of rearmament . . ."

THE VOICES OF GERMAN MILITARISTS

From the New York Times:

"One of Germany's war heroes returned to harangue a group of more than 100 former Wehrmacht and Elite Guard officers about the 'dangers' of the Allied-German treaty system and the 'treason' of those officers who had plotted against Hitler. He was Hans Ulrich Rudel . . .

"'Whoever conspired with the enemy during the war should not be employed in any leading positions in a new German army,' he asserted. In a further reference to those connected with the plot against Hitler, Herr Rudel said 'treason remains treason, those people cannot be trusted again.'

"Former Lieut. Gen. Adolf Wolf also vigorously attacked the treaty system.

"'Every man who goes along with the policy of establishing and joining a European army is bound to expose himself to the charge that he has turned traitor to his comrades and may be considered a dishonored human being,' Herr Wolf declared.

"The meeting was organized by Ernst von Reichenau, former German military adviser in China and a brother of Hitler's Field Marshal Walter von Reichenau."

VERY INTERESTING

From a dispatch to the Wall Street Journal:

"East Germany gets its own fleet of Russian-made submarines. Intelligence sources say Moscow next month will transfer ten submarines to former Nazi naval experts who run Soviet-dominated East Germany's 'sea police force.' The base: A special submarine harbor on the Baltic Sea island of Ruegen. Specialists report the German-manned subs will hold joint maneuvers with Russian craft in the Baltic next spring."

REPARATIONS IN REVERSE

From "Background Letter." Office of British High Commissioner:

"The United Kingdom and the United States High Commissioners have informed the Federal Chancellor that the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States have decided to return to German ownership 53 ex-German merchant marine vessels, formerly recommended for allocation to Allied Governments by the Tripartite Merchant Marine Commission (T. M. M. C.)."

CHINESE MARKETS

From a report to Business Week:

"Each September for several years, Leipzig, East Germany's 16th-century fair city, has been taken over by the commissars of Communist industry . . .

"East Germans were not the only ones vying for a share of the Chinese market. Some 12,000 West German traders were on hand to plead their cause. The Hamburg Society for East Trade, whose membership consists of 300 market-hungry concerns, set up a pavilion in the center of the city. But the Society's activities may well have been overshadowed by the bigger-shot West German industrialists who did their dealing in the back rooms."

WHAT NEXT?

From Gamma Publications Ltd.:

"The head of the restitution office in Hamburg 13 is a former SS major, Dr. Walter Brahtz, who was in the Third Reich Ministerialdirigent and head of the personnel department of the Ministry of Finance. This man has to deal with former Jewish property.

"Near Schwarzenborn, Hesse, 2,000 former Nazis who had been arrested or interned after 1945 made a demonstration of protest against the 'arbitrary actions' which happened after 1945 and asked for compensation.

"The former district leader of the NSDAP and Landrat of Rendsburg from 1933-1938, Wilhelm Hamkens, will get his whole pension."

DEMOCRACY'S CHAMPION IN GERMANY

From a special dispatch to the New York Times:

"Chancellor Konrad Adenauer defended today the presence of former Nazi party members in Germany's Foreign Ministry, who add up to 66 per cent of the senior officials, with the contention that the Foreign Ministry could not be built up without persons who knew something about the past.

"These members of the German Foreign Ministry who once were members of the Nazi party have 'advantages' that other officials do not have, Dr. Adenauer added.

"'They understand the principles of politics, they can speak foreign languages, they know the technique of diplomacy and they can get along with foreigners,' the Chancellor added."

WHERE THE MONEY GOES

From a report to ONA:

"After carefully inspecting Christian Dior's fashion collection, the lady bought a pretty little fur coat for five million francs ($12,500).

"Then she selected a delightful little fur coat to match for her lap dog Susie. Price: 250,000 francs ($625).

"And to what address were the coats to be delivered? The answer was: 'Frau Alfred Krupp, Villa Huegel, Essen, Germany.'"

DER SCHOENE ADOLF

By Jack Henry to Reuters:

"Adolf Hitler's picture, once common in Germany, is staging a comeback on German newsstands and advertising billboards.

"Pictures of Hitler, unshaven and haggard, clean-shaven and 'Heroic' now greet the man-in-the-street over West Germany and West Berlin.

"The Munich picture weekly, 'Revue,' with a circulation of 573,000, is running a series of articles on Hitler's life and character. Some West German weeklies have long specialized in revealing the 'secrets' of the pasts of the Nazi leaders and their families, but until 'Revue' gave Hitler his 'comeback,' the secrets seemed to have dried up months ago...

"A cartoon in 'Welt der Arbeit' (World of Work), weekly of the West German trade unions, depicted Hitler, with his arm raised in Fascist salute, standing on a pedestal bearing the inscription 'The Grateful Pictorials.' The cartoon had the caption: 'His Only Monument.'

"The same magazine also recently published photographs of former Field Marshal Erich von Mannstein, who is serving a 12-year war crimes sentence in a British-controlled prison at Werl. Mannstein, once commander of the German armies in Southern Russia, is on sick leave in a Kiel hospital for a 'complicated' eye operation."

BLACKMAIL PAYS OFF

From a U. P. dispatch

"A former German general who originally was sentenced to death for ordering the massacre of 300 Italians in Rome in 1944 has been released from prison.

"Gen. Eberhard von Mackensen, 63, was freed in what British officials described as an act of clemency....

"The freeing of Kesselring and von Mannstein was understood to be a move to satisfy West German parliamentary deputies who have demanded the release of the field marshals as a condition for the signing of the West German peace treaty."

> "A Munich court last week acquitted Otto Thorbeck, a former S. S. judge, and Walter Huppenkothen, an S. S. prosecutor, on charges of aiding and abetting the murder of Admiral Canaris, former head of the German Intelligence, and five other anti-Nazi resistance leaders in 1945. The Court's verdict (the reasons for which are to be announced later) implies that German resistance to Hitler is now to be regarded as treason."

"DAS REICH"

By Drew Middleton in the New York Times:

"The reconstitution of 'Das Reich,' the united German state, and of Prussia are among the final aims of the Free Democratic Party, Dr. Thomas Dehler, Minister of Justice, announced.

"Speaking in Bad Ems at the congress of the Free Democratic party, of which he is a leading member, Dr. Dehler denounced 'the centralized state' of Germany and told a cheering audience that 'there is another word that has a deep and soulful meaning for us'—here he lowered his voice to a solemn whisper—'Das Reich'. . ."

"'The time must come again when Prussia in a reconstituted German Reich once again fulfills its duty of maintaining Western culture in central Europe,' Dr. Dehler said. . . .

"Dr. Dehler thanked Dr. Franz Bluecher, Vice Chancellor and party chairman for 'sacrificing' himself as the German member of the International Ruhr Authority, 'the instrument of the conquerors.'"

A GERMAN YOUTH SPEAKS

From Der Freie Mensch:

"At a meeting held in Bonn, the leader of the German youth organization, Herbert Munchow, released a proclamation which contained the following statement: 'the German Youth Organization appeals to all German boys and girls to adhere to the concept of a Reich which should include as integral parts all provinces beyond the Oder-Neisse line such as East Prussia, Silesia, Pomerania and also those territories which were ceded to Germany's Western Allies after World War II.'"

THE VOICE OF THE FUEHRER

From a dispatch to the N. Y. World-Telegram and Sun:

"Two West German cabinet ministers have just scared the daylights out of West Europe by supporting German territorial demands reminiscent of Hitler's days.

"Just as the German, French and other legislatures are preparing to consider ratification of the German treaties, two cabinet colleagues of West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer have:

"1. Supported the Sudeten German demands for return to their former homeland—the Czech Sudeten borderland handed over to Hitler at Munich.

"2. Encouraged the Sudeten Germans, now refugees in West Germany, to believe that the Sudetenland can be 'rewon by peaceful means.'

"3. Approved creation of a strong central political body to represent all East German refugee groups and sponsor their right to their former territories.

"The Adenauer government ministers who did this were Dr. Hans Christoph Seebohm, Minister of Transport, and Dr. Hans Lukaschek, Minister of Refugees. The occasion was the third anniversary of the Bonn Republic."

HOW TO GAIN POPULARITY

From Drew Middleton in the New York Times:

"The German party, the most reactionary of the three parties forming the Government coalition, was accused of imitating the Nazi party, copying its methods and taking over its old organizations.

"This accusation was made by Dr. Max Becker, a Bundestag Deputy and a member of the Free Democratic party...

"Dr. Becker charged that the German party 'had used electioneering methods corresponding exactly to the methods of the Nazi party' in a local election in Hersfeld, Hesse, recently.

"Loud speakers brought the strains of the Badenweiler March, Hitler's favorite march, and the fanfares of Liszt, which were used in Nazi Germany to introduce announcements of military victories, to crowds at German party meetings, Dr. Becker added...

"Just before the party held its last congress, a writer signing himself 'Adolphus' suggested to the party that 'since the new ideas on which National Socialism was based have proved their astonishing creative power it is quite natural that after a short period of quiet these ideas are coming to the fore again.'"

A MATTER OF ROUTINE

From a U. P. dispatch:

"United States authorities announced the release of another German war criminal. He is Franz Alfred Six, 43, former dean of the foreign political faculty of Berlin University, who was sentenced for acts committed as a member of the Nazi S. S. (Elite Guard) organization. He was originally given twenty years by a United States Military Court in 1948."

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES IN IRAN

From a U. P. dispatch:

"Hussein Makki, chairman of the Iranian oil nationalization program, said 370 German technicians had applied for jobs in Iranian oil refineries closed since Iran nationalized the oil industry.

"Mr. Makki, Premier Mossadegh's right-hand man, told a press conference Iran needed about '300 to 400' foreign specialists to resume oil production and that 'if possible we shall employ experts from Germany.' Applications have been sent to Iran for checking, he said."

THE NATIONALIST CHORUS

From the New York Herald Tribune:

"Chancellor Konrad Adenauer said his West German government would not recognize the Saar vote as representing the will of the German-speaking Saarlanders...

"Minister for All-German Affairs Jakob Kaiser said, 'The Saar population should know that we will continue our exertions for their real freedom, because we know that they feel they belong to Germany.'

"Gerhard Schroeder, a leader in Dr. Adenauer's Christian Democratic party, said, 'The day will come when today's minority of invalid (pro-German) ballots will transform itself into an overwhelming majority.' Thomas Dehler, Justice Minister, said the election results 'do not prove the slightest thing' and that the question 'will solve itself in a national (pro-German) sense in a few years.'"

A NEW MAIL SERVICE

From a dispatch to the Reynolds News:

"German rocket experiments, controlled by the designers of the V1 and V2, are to be raised as a matter of extreme urgency when the House of Commons meets...

"Despite German claims that their rockets are designed to carry mails, it is a fact that research on rockets for carrying postal packets led directly to the horror weapons that battered Britain in 1944.

"'This news fills me with alarm,' said Mr. Elwyn Jones, M.P., who was assistant prosecutor at the Nuremberg War Crimes trials."

STAFF RECRUITING

From a J. T. A. dispatch:

"The Egyptian Government has sent a mission to Western Austria to recruit 500 former Wehrmacht officers for the Egyptian Army, the neo-Nazi newspaper, Der Unabhaenige, reports. The paper said that two former Nazi generals are already working for the Egyptians in Cairo."

OPTION EAST OR WEST

From Gamma Publications Ltd.:

"Dr. Georg Pfleiderer, FDP member of Bundestag, explained in a memorandum that the connections between the European Defense Organization and the Atlantic Pact Organization ought to be so loose that even the Soviet Union could not mind the creation of the European Defense Union. He strongly advised not to ratify the pact with the Allies because in that case the Federal Government would renounce to all elements of an Eastern policy of its own. The best model was Locarno because Germany got in this way her freedom of decision and option between West and East! He is also strongly opposed to the idea of giving the Allies the right to march through Germany...

"Self-interest inevitably influences the individual in the Saar, and in favour of a 'European solution.' Today the Saar sends over 30 per cent of its all-important coal to France and 24 per cent to Germany. Union with the Federal Republic could limit the French market—however well the Schuman Plan works. The Saar is fed by France, but Germany imports 40 per cent of her foodstuffs and has no sort of agricultural surplus for the one million Saarlanders. France has developed the Saar's consumer-goods industries and doubled employment in them up to a figure of 50,000.

"This was something that Hitler's Reich never tried to do. The Saarlanders, moreover, now have a fair idea of how the Nazi Government of 1938 regarded their economic situation. The report of the German 'Committee for Economic Studies,' which surveyed the Saar at that date, has been published after years on a dusty shelf. This report saw the Saar as an economic liability to Germany and as an area which would not attract badly needed capital."

(From the Manchester Guardian Weekly)

ON THE MODEST SIDE

From the Arbeiterzeitung, Basel:

"Communications Minister Dr. Seebohm made a speech recently at a meeting of Refugees held at Rudesheim in which he proclaimed the necessity of regaining the Sudetenland. The basis for his proclamation was that 'only where Germans live there is culture.'"

DESERVED REWARD?

From a U. P. dispatch:

Dr. Gottfried Krummacher was cheered at a meeting here when he demanded that the Allies pay Nazi party members $2 for each day spent in internment camps after the war and an additional 50 cents for each hour of work done by order of camp commanders."

A GERMAN SOLDIER DOES HIS DUTY

From a dispatch to Reuters:

"A former German soldier accused of 71 murders, three attempted murders and one rape, sat smiling in court as a witness shouted 'If the judges let you off, I shall kill you myself!'

"'I saw Schwindt take babies by the legs and hurl them with all his strength into trucks,' he testified.

"Schwindt, a short, stocky man who was arrested after a former ghetto inmate recognized him, fled to the West two years ago as a 'political refugee' from East Germany. He denied the charges and said:

"'I was a German soldier. I have remained honest as a soldier and as a man. I have no need to fear my conscience.'"

GERMANY IS JUDGING AMERICA

From a report to New York Times:

"A Munich criminal court ruled that the killing of captured United States bomber crews in Germany during World War II 'did not constitute murder.'

"Reducing the charge against a minor Nazi party official from complicity in murder to complicity in manslaughter, the lay court said that 'bomb attacks against the civil population violated the Hague convention and possibly were crimes against humanity.'"

MORE OF THE SAME

From a J. T. A. dispatch:

"During a budget debate in the provincial parliament of North Rhine-Westphalia, it was revealed that Erich Reeder, a former Nazi government official in the province and onetime high ranking Gestapo officer, has been awarded a settlement of 26,000 deutschemarks (approximately $6,500) as 'compensation' for loss of employment when he was ousted as an ex-Nazi. Reeder, who was once chief administrative officer of the German occupation forces in Belgium, also draws a pension of 1,000 marks a month."

THE SIXTH COLUMN

From a report to Gamma Publications Ltd.:

"Bruno Fricke, former follower of Strasser, then of Gereke, now connected with the 'National Party,' told Matthäi, leader of 'Reichsorden,' after a meeting in Düsseldorf: 'When the Bolsheviks will be coming, I shall run to meet them with a white flag.'"

"The 'International Military Correspondence' organized a meeting in Munich which was attended by 39 high officers. The speakers were Reichenau, brother of the late Col. General, Cptn. Rodewald (Führungsring ehemaliger Soldaten) and Fritz Brehm who is connected with the SRP. They emphasized the peaceful intentions and the military superiority of the Soviet Union, the high standard of the Soviet Zone and protested against the defense contribution. When the organizers were asked about the origin of the funds for this meeting, the answer was that industrialists who wanted peace spent the money. The group is trying to get followers among former members of the Waffen-SS, former internees and 'victims of denazification' (Hanover). Among others, the generals Bogatsch (Munich), Hans Döring (Nuremberg), Greiner, Gräser, Jähn, Kless, v. Massow (Starnberg), Reuss (Munich), Sander (Bamberg), Adolf Wolf (Bayreuth), Wössner, (Reutlinger), Emil Vogel (Munich) and Zimmer (Mittenwald) were present. 'Militärpolitisches Forum' will be published in short time."

SEVEN YEARS AFTER

From a New York Herald Tribune report:

"A 'dangerous trend' from political parties to 'mass organizations' in West Germany was reported by German editors and political and economic writers who arrived here from that country.

"Mr. Fischer and Marcel Schulte, chief editor of the 'Frankfurter Neue Presse,' acted as spokesmen for the group of thirteen German writers...

"'Our Foreign Office has more Nazis now than it did under Hitler,' Mr. Fischer said.

"They were in agreement that the United States' post-war policy in West Germany has had a lot to do with the resurgence of nationalistic feelings. This policy was described as 'first too hard, then too soft.' Mr. Fischer pointed out that, in his own field, a man once convicted as a Nazi captain is now running a newspaper in Nurenberg."

The Devil's Chemists:
24 Conspirators Who Manufacture Wars

by

JOSIAH E. DU BOIS, JR.

It is of course rather bad taste today to mention the fact that not so long ago a nation called Germany under a paranoiac named Hitler with merciless efficiency set out to crush the democratic world and to establish itself as the ruling nation. Today we woo Western Germany and we look the other way when somehow or other erstwhile Nazi stalwarts wangle their way to high positions of trust and decision. Twenty-four brilliant men once ran the industrial empire called "Interessen Gemeinschaft Farbenindustrie Aktiengesellschaft" (shortened to I. G. Farben for Western tongues) and today many of these same men are happily engaged in building another industrial kingdom.

Josiah E. DuBois, Jr., who prosecuted these 24 men in the 1947 Nuremburg trials seems to be the one man around who is concerned about the potential danger presented by these former Farben directors, chemists and financial geniuses. The indictment drawn up by DuBois and his staff charged them with planning and participating in an aggressive war and with such crimes against humanity as the use of slave labor in their buna rubber plants and the use of Auschwitz inmates as guinea pigs to determine the efficacy of highly experimental antidotes for typhus (the guinea pigs of course first had to be inoculated for typhus).

I. G. Farben was not "Big Business" in the sense that we understand the term. Even before Hitler became Chancellor the organization had contributed 400,000 marks to his campaign funds. Henceforth Hitler and Farben were contented partners and Prosecutor DuBois gives the impression that Farben was by no means a silent or junior partner. Baron von Schnitzler, head of Farben's powerful Dyestuffs Committee, admitted to DuBois that the Nazi foreign policy and the I. G. Farben foreign policy were inseparable.

"Farben," he admitted as an afterthought, "was largely responsible for Hitler's foreign policy."

Hitler did not give the order to march civilization into the most horrible of all wars until Farben was ready. Farben was ready on the morning of September 1, 1939, and on that infamous date German planes dropped their first bombs on the little Polish village of Puck and the terrible fire which would engulf a large part of the world was set ablaze. The incendiary bombs dropped on Puck were made by Farben; the planes which dropped the bombs had aluminum fuselages made by Farben and Farben wheels capped by Farben rubber; their engines were made of Farben nickel and lubricated by Farben oil and gasoline. The infantry followed the planes and the soldiers were warmed by Farben textiles, wore Farben plastic helmets, and as they advanced under the protecting barrage of their artillery, the shells that screamed over them were made by Farben. The magnesium metals and alloys, the nitrates, the methanol, and the diglycol (which made 50,000 tons of gunpowder each month) were all produced by I. G. Farben.

In this country the great industrial firms went into war production only when we were threatened; DuBois proves conclusively (to this reader at least) that I. G. Farben made Hitler's aggressive war possible. His book, The Devil's Chemists, was written in white hot anger but DuBois is always the lawyer as he builds a damning indictment against those he calls "the German Generals in gray business suits." He presented this evidence in 1947 to the four judges who comprised the American Military Tribunal at Nuremburg but although they must have been convinced of the guilt of the 24 defendants they came to the rather incredible conclusion that the proof against them was presumptive and not conclusive and that international law did not provide a standard defining criminality in the kind of actions perpetrated by the defendants.

The four judges refused to accept the masterly thesis previously propounded by Justice Robert Jackson justifying the trial of men who had committed crimes against humanity; they scorned the age-old common law dictum, "He who creates the threat of force, knowing it will be used, is responsible for the direct consequences." And when all the evidence was in they gave nine of the defendants light sentences for "plundering" and imposed what can only be called token sentences on five others for employing slave labor at Auschwitz. Bewildered, heartsick, disillusioned, DuBois could only bow to the decision of the Tribunal but his indignation was too great to be kept within himself and The Devil's Chemists is the result.

DuBois thinks that we will hear from these 24 brilliant and evil men again. If there is a World War III, he believes they will be found fighting for the Soviet Union; all have a strong affinity for the totalitarian world.

During the last war Noel Coward wrote a brilliant satirical song "Don't Let's Be Beastly to the Hun." We laughed at it in London but now it develops that Noel's little song wasn't satire at all—it was sheer prophecy.

Germany in Defeat

(An analysis of Germany's economic boom)

JEAN PAJUS

Decidedly, the lot of the victorious nations is not an enviable one. Twice in a generation these nations were bled white in a super-human effort to defend their lives and human dignity; they won the wars, but each time the aggressor emerged stronger than ever. Does victory pay? Ponder two recent reports dealing with the economic situation in Western Europe. On September 7, 1952 an A. P. despatch from Bonn titled: "Germany's Four Year Success Story" began as follows:

"Western Germany is riding the crest of the greatest boom in its peace-time history—and the outlook is for a big expansion of economic activity this year."

In October 1952, Anthony Eden summed up Britain's economic plight in one sentence: "We want the opportunity to earn the dollars that we need, to balance our external accounts."

In 1940 Prime Minister Churchill begged the U. S. for "tools to finish the job," of fighting Germany. In 1952, 7 years after V-E Day, Mr. Eden is begging for an opportunity to make a living.

Clearly, there is something incongruous in these two reports. One report tells us that London, as well as the other capitals of the free nations, are greatly concerned over the trade slump, the collapsing exports and the widening dollar gaps. These free nations tell us that their industries are strained to the limit under the twin burdens of export drives and rearmament. The A. P. report, in contrast, exudes confidence by assuring us that Germany has room for economic expansion because she has a large, unused industrial capacity and surplus labor for further spectacular economic gains.

Was not Germany supposed to be utterly destroyed in 1945, her factories gutted, her machines pulverized, her will to dominate Europe's economic life snuffed out? Some three years ago, when the U. S. Senate debated the pitifully small reparations program which the Allies had pledged to carry out in order to help the rehabilitation of Germany's neighbors, the German industrialists flooded the U. S., especially the offices of the U. S. Senate, with pathetic pleas to give Germany a chance to make a living. They told Congress that Europe was threatened with bankruptcy, that recovery would never take place unless Congress kill the ECA recommendation of April 13, 1949, to turn over to Germany's victims 159 plants as reparations. (Parenthetically, the Allies had originally agreed upon and recommended a program of reparations totalling 2,000 plants to be taken out of West Germany. Official reports stated that the British Zone alone had a total of over 50,000 plants.)

The voice of the victims was conspicuous by its absence, and Germany's ability to cry upon the U. S. shoulders produced excellent results. Not only was the reparations program abandoned, but, as the U. S. News and World Report of Sept. 14, 1951 put it: "The fact that the U. S. alone spends nearly $9,000,000,000 in West Germany is ignored or minimized."

Did the scuttling of the reparations program have something to do with Germany's greatest boom in her peace-time history? Common sense would suggest that this is so.

At any rate, the German economic comeback is truly remarkable. As for the boom mentioned in the A. P. despatch, part of it is, no doubt, due to the intensive reconstruction and to the development of Allied air fields and other military installations in Germany.

Germany's Economic Comeback

Germany's economic comeback can be gauged by casting a quick glance at her export figures in the last five years. To take the month of September as an example, the statistics show the following value of exports:

September 1948 206,000,444 D.M. ($49,028,000)

September 1950 697,000,000 D.M. ($165,886,000)

September 1951 1,368,000,000 D.M. ($325,584,000)

No figures for September 1952 are available as yet, but those for May 1952 show that German exports amounted to 1,407,000,000 D.M. ($334,000,000).

The German over-all industrial production indicates a similar trend. On the basis of 1936 as 100, industrial production in '48 was 63; it reached 126 in 1950, and it zoomed to 158 in October 1952. In this connection, it is worthy of mention that the index of 1936, the target aimed at and advocated by the American military officials a few years ago, was utterly unrealistic since it was a year of extensive military preparation for war.

The recent figures published by the European Payment Union tell the same story. In November 1950, a few months after the European clearing house was established, Germany's deficit position reached the alarming figure of $457,000,000. In July of 1952, Germany's cumulative credit balance climbed to $$368,000,000.

How did Germany's neighbors and fellow members of the E. P. U. fare during these two years? At the end of 1950, France and Britain combined had a cumulative credit position of over $700,000,000. By the end of 1951, in one single year, their cumulative debit position amounted to almost $700,000,000. In other words, in two years both these countries suffered a trade reverse of $1,400,000,000. This astounding reversal of their credit position is partly due to the increased expenditures incurred under the NATO program. The total increase for all members of NATO between 1950 and 1951 was two and one half billion dollars—and France and Britain combined accounted for two billion dollars. Where did the money come from? An analysis of their 1951 gold balance suggests that France and Britain financed their rearmament by selling gold. They also had to borrow from abroad.

Since their economy was not strong enough to sustain simultaneously the increased rearmament program and their export drive, the latter was bound to suffer. The figures published in the Manchester Guardian—August 21, 1952 are revealing. "In the second half of 1951, the average monthly gap was £109,200,000 and in the first half of 1951 it was £92,000,000."

As for France, the New York Times of August 24, 1952, reported that "exports of metropolitan France dropped in July to the lowest level in two years."

According to the International Monetary Fund, France's dollar deficit was 217 million dollars in 1950 and 1 billion dollars in 1951.

And while both France and Britain have been struggling for the past two years to bolster their defense and at the same time keep their economic head above water, the Germans have shown a remarkable ability to take advantage of their neighbors plight, as revealed in the following export statistics:

VALUE OF GERMAN EXPORTS

To Europe	$1,500,000,000	$2,357,000,000
Western Hemisphere	269,000,000	636,000,000
To Asia	108,000,000	254,000,000
Africa	68,000,000	152,000,000
Australasia	28,000,000	64,000,000
Total	$1,973,000,000	$3,463,000,000

The Case of Belgium

The tremendous increase in German exports in the two years cannot be attributed, however, entirely to the fact that both France and Britain were busily engaged with their defense program. Belgium, for example, became seriously alarmed over Germany's inroads in her own market as early as 1950. When the Belgians discovered that Germany was able to sell an instrument for 62 Belgian Francs, whereas the same item was sold in that country before the war for 200 francs, the Belgians began asking questions. (Parenthetically, the same instrument was offered by the Americans for 125 Belgian francs.) Can the German competition be characterized as fair? Can the German claims as the lowest cost-producers stand up under a rigid scrutiny? Is Germany resorting to dumping again?

An intensive study was thereupon undertaken by the Economic Council of Belgium. The Commission's findings were that the following Belgian industries were in greatest jeopardy: mine construction equipment, electrical equipment, naval diesel engines, dyes, ethylene products, ceramics, foundry equipment, jewelry, and colored glass. The Commission's most important finding, however, was that the main reason why Germany was able to undersell the Belgians in their own market was the fact that German wages were lower than those paid to Belgian workers. As an example, the Commission reported that the German wages in foundries and rolling mills were 45% lower than those prevailing in similar plants in Belgium.

"La Nation Belge," commenting on these findings on April 28, 1950, called upon the O. E. E. C. and the International Labor Office to remedy the situation by "suggesting" appropriate legislation to raise wages and improve social legislation in Germany.

Britain's Plight

In July 1950, the South African Railway's Tender Board placed an order for 100 locomotives with the Krupp firm in Germany. The losers were the North British Locomotive Co., one U. S. firm and over 20 firms of various nationalities. The German bid was $680,000 below the second lowest bid.

German competition against Britain in foreign markets was not limited to the capital goods industry. It applied even to toys. In 1950, the British United Toy Mfg. Co. Ltd. made drastic cuts in the price of toys to be sold to Cyprus. The company went the limit, but when the Germans offered plush teddy bears and white rabbits at 10% lower than the lowest British bid, the Germans obtained the order. The same competition was encountered in Canada and Africa, and the British company as early as 1950 thought of abandoning the Canadian and the African markets too.

Nor did the British fine mechanical and optical instruments industry fare any better. Just when they had regained the post-war markets in these products in Scandinavia, India and South Africa, the Germans began to undersell optical goods in these countries by 25%.

A similar tale of woe was told by the British Dye Stuff and Pharmaceutical industries. By 1950, German production in dyestuffs and pharmaceuticals was back to the 1936 levels, and a representative of the British pharmaceutical industries stated that "the field will be dominated by Germany within 4 to 6 years."

The British steel industry, too, complained very bitterly against German competition in Turkey. Whereas a German firm was able to sell round iron bars in Istanbul, Turkey for $68 per ton, the British and American prices for the same items were $110 a ton.

More recent cases tell the same story. A few months ago, Turkey was in the market for electrical equipment, transformers and broilers. British firms thought they had a good chance and submitted bids. So did the Germans, and their bids were accepted—they were lower by almost 50%. In another recent case, the Germans offered to sell Turkey 36,000 tons of rails at a price which was not only much lower than that offered by the British, but 33% lower than that offered by an American firm. Moreover, the Germans offered credits and payment conditions which neither the British nor the Americans could possibly match.

In connection with the German competition in the field of electronics, a prominent Belgian correspondent, Gerges Blun, reported a few months ago that "I am in a position to reveal the name of a very prominent German firm known the world over in the field of electronics which is offering to undersell all foreign competitors to the extent of 35%." Since the two largest firms in Germany are Siemens and AEG, the assumption is that Mr. Blun had one of these firms in mind.

Two years ago, it became painfully evident to the British that motor cars, motorcycles and bicycles stood high on the German's "Most Likely to Succeed" list. In an effort to compete with the Germans, the British car producers drastically slashed the prices for their products. Despite these slashes, the German-made 4 cylinder Taunus manufactured in the Ford plant in Cologne, was offered at 10% less than the same size cars manufactuered by the British Hillman and Austin companies.

That the apprehensions of the British auto manufacturers were fully justified, can be seen from the latest statistics. In 1948, Germany sold to Switzerland 2,000 automobiles. This year, Switzerland will buy 20,000 cars from Germany and only 6,000 cars from Britain.

Four years ago, Holland bought from Britain twice as many cars as from West Germany. The figures for the first six months of 1952 show that the position has been reversed.

One might think that the British would have better luck in their own commonwealth but even there it appears they cannot compete successfully against the Germans. Canada, for instance, imposes a special tariff of 15% on German-made cars. Notwithstanding this, the Germans are offering their Volkswagen in Canada for $1400 whereas the best the British can do is to ask $1800 for a similar car. Naturally, the Canadians are buying German cars.

An analysis of German competition made by British officials in 1950 showed that Germany was able to compete successfully against British foreign markets because of her lower wages. The analysis showed that West German workers put in about the same number of hours per week as did their counterparts in Britain, but German wages were about 25% under Britain's level. Another advantage the Germans enjoyed was the fact that German taxes on industrial firms were much lower than those imposed on British firms. In addition, the West German budget for 1950 provided for even lower taxes on business.

And just when the British were thinking about effective measures to counteract German competition, the West German government announced, in July 1950, a new export incentive scheme which allowed German exporters to retain 20% of the proceeds in dollars. Prior to the introduction of that scheme, the German exporters had to turn over all dollars earned to the German government.

Trade Agreements and Credits

Prior to 1950, German firms had to do business with Latin America mostly by mail order. In 1950, German salesmen began flocking to South America and new trade agreements were concluded with Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, Chile, Peru, Paraguay and Ecuador.

To be sure, the German salesmen complained bitterly about trade marks and representations lost during the war and after, but by the middle of 1950 and despite these German complaints, the British exporters discovered that they were already in danger of taking third, fourth and sometimes fifth place in the leading countries of Latin America.

From all accounts, the Latin Americans were glad to see these German salesmen, because they wanted to be less dependent on the U. S. and Britain for the supply of goods.

The Germans, on the other hand, showed their appreciation by pouring into Latin America a host of German artists, even circus troops.

The net result of this assault on Latin America was not slow in coming. Within 2 years of the first commercial transactions with the Latin American countries, the German trade with these countries reached a level of over 600 million dollars. The Germans granted these countries special favors and credits while the British were not in a position to offer similar terms.

The Germans started off their trade drive with the sale of many non-essential consumer goods, interspersed with orders for transport equipment, machinery and even coke ovens.

Conversely, German imports from Latin America increased fantastically in the last 2 years. They are running at the annual rate of 1,500,000 tons, while in 1938, pre-war Germany's imports from Latin America were only 1,300,000 tons.

So far, neither the Germans nor the Latin Americans have had cause to complain about their trade agreements. So long as Germany is willing to extend credit to Brazil for instance and not press for payment, the Brazilians are welcoming German goods. Similarly, so long as the Chileans and Peruvians are able to obtain higher prices for their non-ferrous metals from the Germans, the former are satisfied. Then too, the more raw materials they sell, the more their living standards tend to increase. Argentina is flattered that the big German trusts such as Deutz, Hanemag and Lanz are contributing to her industrial development by establishing branches to manufacture tractors and agricultural machines in her cities. Not to be outdone, Brazil invites Krupp to open a plant within her borders.

In Africa, the German drive is beginning to show excellent results. On June 17, 1952 the Christian Science Monitor reported that Germany has made prodigious inroads in the Belgian Congo market. Already Western Germany has succeeded in evicting the Union of South Africa from the place it held on the list of suppliers to the Congo. The despatch also reported that although the U. S. and Britain were still the top ranking suppliers to the Belgian colony, recent statistics show that Germany was fast becoming the foremost competitor there. Ironically enough, another pre-war competitor who had been absent for a number of years, Japan, also threatens to ease out both the Americans and the British from that market. According to the latest statistics, Germany and Japan together succeeded in obtaining orders amounting to over 500 million Belgian Francs in the Belgian Congo market.

"Mr. Hugh Dalton told his constituents at Witton Park, County Durham, that his worst fears were coming true.

"He said: 'One member after another of Dr. Adenauer's Government is making most provocative and disturbing speeches. They all demand the return to Germany of large areas of Poland and Czechoslovakia.'

" 'Only last Sunday, Dr. Seebohm, Adenauer's Minister of Transport, made a violent attack upon the Czechs and was greeted with cries from his audience of "Hang them." '

" 'This is the voice of Hitler speaking. . . . If Germans talk like this before they are rearmed, what will they say when we have placed some of the most modern weapons of war in their hands?'

"Lord Hinchingbrooke, Conservative MP for South Dorset, who has just returned from Germany, and who opposed in the House of Commons ratification of the German rearmament agreement, referred in an interview yesterday to the outburst of Dr. Seebohm.

" 'It seems,' said Lord Hinchingbrooke, 'that the fears I expressed in the House of Commons lest a rearmed Germany pursue a dangerous revisionist foreign policy, are being confirmed.' "

Infiltration In the Middle East and Asia

The Germans have also shown a remarkable comeback in their trade with the Near and Middle East. On May 27, 1952, the Germans entered into an agreement with Egypt, providing for the supply of machines, precision instruments, chemicals and pharmaceutical products, fertilizers, as well as equipment and technicians for the erection of a steel plant in Assouan. How important a place that country occupies in Germany's long-range plans can be seen from the fact that the Germans are planning to hold an exhibition of the German industry in Egypt, in February 1953.

In Turkey, Germany has regained the first place as an importer. In 1951, 21.6% of the total Turkish exports went to Germany. I. G. Farben plans call for the erection of a fertilizer plant at Kutaya. The Turkish press casually noted that the foremost French chemical companies such as St. Gobain and Kuhlmann were not interested in developing the Turkish industries, not having the necessary capital to invest in Turkey.

According to the commercial trade agreement of February 1952, Germany has undertaken to sell Turkey 10 million D.M. worth of automobiles, 12½ million D.M. of other vehicles, 24 million D.M. worth of tractors and other agricultural machines and 16 million D.M. worth of various electro-technical equipment, bicycles, watches, optical goods, etc.

In Iran, 5 years ago, Germany supplied 0.4% of that country's total imports. In September 1952, Germany's share rose to 10%. Among the Iranian imports from Germany we find textile equipment, nine woolen mills, a very large cement plant and the largest soap plant that country has ever erected.

Germany is making great inroads in the economy of Iraq. Thus, recently it was reported that two German firms have ousted the British from the Euphrates River.

German engineers are very busy in Indonesia, laying out plans for the entire road system of that country.

Although Pakistan is supposed to be a member of the British Commonwealth and friendly to Britain, the Germans have been able to displace the British from certain sectors of the Pakistan economy. The famous Siemens Company is now in charge of extending the telephone network at a cost of 9 million Pakistan rupees. Recently the Siemens Company concluded an agreement with Pakistan to erect a large plant to manufacture telephonic equipment at a total cost of £60 million, of which fifteen million sterling pounds will be provided by Siemens.

Under a new agreement made with Pakistan July 1, 1952, the Bonn Republic is slated to export to Pakistan various metallurgical products, machinery and equipment amounting to $64,000,000, the goods to be delivered by June 1953.

Although America has been making prodigious efforts to help the Japanese economy, the German Bayer & Siemens are back again, having concluded a technical aid agreement with the famous Japanese machine-tool firm Shikoku. Another prominent German firm, Demag, has undertaken to build 4 electric furnaces in Japan.

Space does not allow a detailed description and analysis of all the ramifications of German infiltration and competition. The above facts and figures will suffice, we believe, to show that Germany's neighbors are fully justified in crying "wolf."

French Complaints

A very recent example is quite to the point. On October 10, 1952, J. J. Caburol, the president of the French Chamber of Metallurgical Industry, addressed a memorandum to the French government in which he stated that the famous cutlery industry of Thiers is in great danger of being crushed by German competition. The memorandum revealed that the French have already lost their markets in Egypt, Iran, Syria, Lebanon and are about to lose completely the Turkish market. In the case of Turkey, whereas the French cutlery exports to that country declined from 150 million francs to 70 million francs in one year, the German exports increased from 500,000 D.M. to 1½ million D.M. during the same time.

Mr. Caburol also reported that the British Sheffield producers registered a similar export decline. Since the quality of the goods offered by these three national groups was equal, Mr. Caburol made a thorough investigation of the real reasons for the decline in French exports. His conclusion was that France will not be able to compete on equal terms with the Germans so long as the latter offer their cutlery 30% cheaper. Mr. Caburol also found out why the Germans are in a position to undersell the French:

Because (A) the base price for steel is higher in France than in Germany, and (B) because wages and social charges are also higher in France than in Germany.

The following figures presented by Mr. Caburol speak for themselves:

COST OF THIN PLATES, MARTIN PROCESS

In France: 47,000 Francs per ton
In Germany: 32,000 Francs per ton

LABOR COST

A skilled worker in the cutlery industry in France earns (social charges, etc., included) 189 francs per hour;

In Solingen, Germany, his counterpart earns 146 francs per hour.

British Charges of Dumping

Can we attribute the German manufacturers' success in the export field solely to the cost differential? The well-known British weekly, Reynolds News, does not think so. In October, 1952, this publication flatly stated that the German steel industry is determined to obtatin a larger share in the export field than it is entitled to under the Schuman Plan. In order to establish its domination in the export field, the German steel industry is again resorting to dumping, Reynolds News asserted.

Whether this is true cannot be ascertained at this time. Available data, however, clearly indicates that Bonn is resurrecting some old economic weapons from her pre-war armory of economic warfare. For instance, during the past year, Bonn made extensive purchases of raw materials in certain countries, the net effect of which was that these countries were forced to increase their purchases of manufactured items from Germany, at the expense of exports from other European countries. A case in point is Uruguay. Germany had incurred a very large debt for raw materials purchased. The Uruguayan government became alarmed in 1951 because of this and demanded that the Germans liquidate their huge indebtedness. The Germans willingly obliged by offering to sell goods of higher quality at lower prices. The Uruguayans were only too glad to accept the deal, and the net effect was that the Germans became the masters of the Uruguayan market.

The Germans claim that there was no dumping involved and that the deal was perfectly legitimate.

Another method used by the German exporters to defeat their British and other competitors in Latin America was the granting of extremely favorable credit terms, up to 5 to 10 years. Since the British were able to grant only 2 year terms, their bids were rejected.

The Germans, for instance, recently concluded a trade agreement with Turkey calling for the purchase of 60 million dollars worth of raw cotton and 11 million dollars worth of tobacco from Turkey. In return, Turkey agreed to buy a certain quantity of manufactured cotton goods from Germany. The agreement, however, stipulated that should Germany decide to increase her export quota of raw cotton and tobacco, Turkey will have to buy from Germany an additional quota of manufactured cotton goods. This scheme enables Germany to obtain a continuous supply of raw materials and at the same time assures her of a market for her manufactured goods, thus eliminating other suppliers. Here again the Germans say this is perfectly legitimate.

According to Plan

Either way we look at it, Germany's economic expansion is not a myth. Her fantastic success, however, is not an accident. It was encouraged and nurtured, in large measure, by American occupation authorities and carefully and skilfully executed by the German government with the help of expert advisers, technicians, export organizations, research, banks and business organizations. The work of the Welt-Wirtschaft Archiv of Hamburg and the Ges. Zur Foerderung Des Deutschen Handels and other organizations has been outstanding in this respect.

Last but not least, mention must be made of the activities of the Commission for Trade with the Iron Curtain countries which has been "advising" the German Ministry of Economics, with headquarters in Bonn and branches in Berlin, Hamburg and Munich.

Thus it is clear that Germany has long-range plans for economic over-expansion abroad. If further evidence were needed to prove it, recent statistics pertaining to her production of consumer goods would dispel any doubt. They show that during 1952, production of consumer goods continues to decline. This trend has been going on since 1950. Official statistics show that while the over-all index of production increased by 25% during the last 2 years, the production of consumer goods has declined by 10%. This would tend to show German determination to take advantage of her neighbor's plight to tighten her grip on world trade—even at the cost of reducing her domestic consumption of basic consumer goods.

Meanwhile, her neighbors are searching in vain for a solution to their dilemma: how to avoid being crushed by the twin burdens of re-armament and export drives. The situation is grim on both fronts. Both France and Britain, for instance, are forced to spend over 10% of their gross national product this year for defense; thus they have to use a large proportion of their national income, factory space and labor force to carry out their obligations incurred under the NATO agreement. This of necessity entails a great loss in export trade—the source of dollar income.

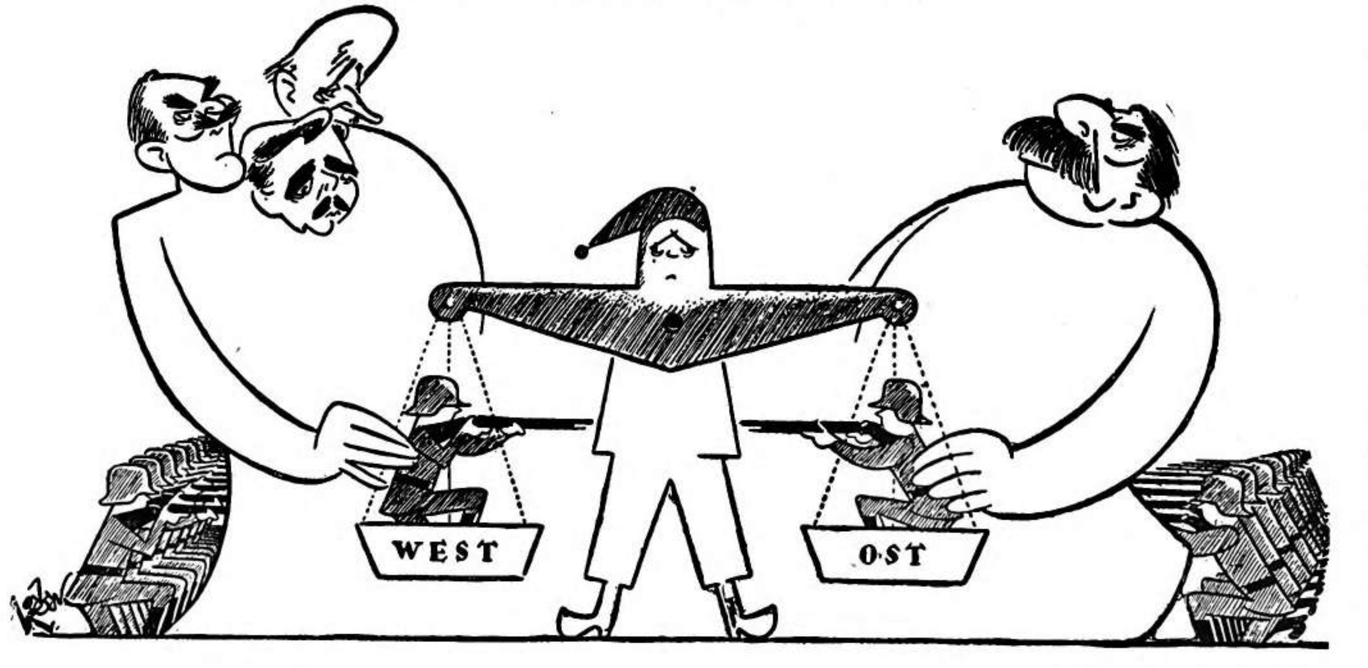
The total West European dollar gap in 1951 was 4½ billion dollars. Available evidence shows that the situation is getting worse. On the other hand, NATO is calling upon its members to increase their armament expenditures. Can they find the money to do it? Mr. Masoin, Economic Adviser to the Belgian Prime Minister and Financial Adviser to the O. E. E. C., is very pessimistic about their ability to do so. In a report he submitted in October 1952, to the NATO organization at Lisbon, he stated that the organization will need 225 billion dollars for the years 1950-1954, of which 75 billion dollars will have to come from Western Europe.

After analyzing the various contributions made and to be made by the NATO countries, and after analyzing American direct and indirect aid to those countries, Mr. Masoin concludes with the following sentence:

"There will remain a deficit of 15 billion dollars and that will mean a delay of 1½ years in the execution of the original defense program, unless the NATO members revise their program and accept the obligation to increase their financial effort towards their defense."

Neither France nor Britain are in a position to make up this deficit, nor can they afford to reduce further their gold reserves in order to obtain new credits. The Germans say they cannot increase their contribution to the European defense programs nor can we expect the smaller NATO members to increase their share of the already heavy burden.

"For the next fifty years—the proper balance."



(Ostdeutsche Zeitung, Hamburg)

All the NATO members say they want trade and not aid. Financial and economic experts have suggested that elimination of trade restrictions, resumption of convertibility of currencies and greater access to American markets will solve Europe's trade deficit. While all these measures are helpful and should be seriously considered, it is doubtful that their implementation will bridge the dollar gap.

America's Responsibility

So long as Germany continues to pay low wages and social charges and does not impose adequate taxes on business, she will be in a better position to undersell her neighbors in world markets. By the same token, so long as we continue to regard Germany as our principal ally in Europe—with all the advantages that would accrue to her—the suggested remedies will fall short of their aim. If the European economy is to become viable again, equity and fairness demand that all of Western Europe be given a chance to compete for world trade on equal terms.

This, certainly, is not too much to ask of the U. S. for, as mentioned above, the U. S. policy toward Germany for the past few years has encouraged and nurtured Germany's economic expansion. It is therefore only fair that we devise ways and means to help our wartime allies, too.

Recent despatches emanating from Europe that both the O. E. E. C. and the Advisory Board of the U. S. Mutual Security Administration are desperately trying to find a solution to Europe's economic dilemma. The O. E. E. C. report will not be ready, we are informed, before January 1953. The study of the M. S. A. Board is being conducted by former Under-secretary of the Treasury Daniel Bell. The Europeans are hopeful that Mr. Bell's study will recommend appropriate ways of harmonizing the U. S. import program with European export needs.

On the other hand, numerous complaints against Germany's trade practices have also reached Washington. The sum of these complaints is that the German government is pursuing the same policies that Dr. Schacht used; that German industry is being subsidized to the tune of 3 billion marks this year by the Bonn government; that Germany is again resorting to a well-organized dumping campaign in order to conquer more foreign markets and to undersell their British and French competitors, and that this applies to the continent of Europe as well as to the Middle East, Africa and Latin America.

These reports do not mention America's position in world markets. It has been assumed for a considerable time that we can take care of ourselves and that German competition can have no adverse effects on our economy. That these assumptions will have to be revised is clearly indicated in a paragraph from an article in the New York Times, Nov. 15, 1952, on the future of the American multibillion dollar machine tool industry. At a meeting of the industry held at White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, Nov. 14, 1952, "Burnham Finney, editor of the 'American Machinist,' a McGraw-Hill publication, told the association that the rapid recovery of the German machine tool industry, partly as a result of Economic Cooperation Administration financing, was the biggest threat to the American industry's attempts to regain world markets."

Mr. Bell will render our wartime allies, and our country a great service by looking into these charges before making his final recommendations to the President of the United States.

"When the German 'Peace Contract' is signed, it will be a great victory for the Acheson-McCloy policy of rearming Germany in the face of Russian rage, German sullenness, and West European bitterness. The Secretary of State has been most skillful and has turned in a pretty polished performance, using American military and economic aid as a persuader all around. . . .

"Look at what the new treaty is likely to mean. For the Germans it will mean the return of Big Cartel control (despite an Allied effort to forestall it), and the return of the Wehrmacht generals into positions of German power.

"For Western Europe it will mean the entrance of German power into the tent of West European unity, and its threat to crowd out the weaker democracies and dominate Europe once more.

"For America it will mean the increase of European neutralist feeling and therefore of anti-American feeling. . . .

"What if, once they are in being, they combine under a not impossible new German Fuehrer? Who and what will stop them, once we have shown the Germans that they can have their way? Certainly not the paper guarantee that Acheson is writing into the treaty to assure the French.

"And once these divisions are united, Germany will hold the balance of power in Europe."

(Max Lerner in the New York Post)

"The key to the immediate European problem the new U. S. President will have to study before he takes office is the difference between two kinds of balance of power. Obviously Western Europe must be brought into some sort of co-operative unity as part of the Western weight of a world balance of power. But such an alliance will be a strong and safe part of the Atlantic Community only if U. S. policy can foster a balance of power within Western Europe which will have the trust and support of the peoples themselves . . .

"When Auriol said that Germany benefits from 'every solicitous attention' and gets 'more attention,' he was referring to a continuum of U. S. errors. The worst of these is to have thought only of the world balance of power, hence to have given a green light to Germany's rise to power within Europe while protesting France's retention of strength on the world scene . . .

"If the U. S. votes against French nationalism in Africa, they want proof that the same policy applies against German nationalism in Europe. For there are signs that U. S. policy has unleashed the kind of German nationalism that may wreck true European internationalism and make the French a subject people."

(Percy Winner in the New Republic)

Inside Germany

NEUTRALISM ON THE RISE

"There is little or no enthusiasm in Germany for a big rearmament program now. Industrialists would rather produce for the domestic consumer market than for an arms program. The German trade drive is paying off in a steady increase of earnings in foreign currencies.

"You get the feeling of Germans from a private poll of opinion. Germans were asked, twice this year, whether they should get on good terms with the U. S. or with Soviet Russia or stay neutral. The results:

	Percenages of Total
	April	October
Favoring U. S.	41	39
Favoring U. S. S. R.	1	2
Favoring Neutrality	44	47
No opinion	14	12

DEMOCRACY'S PROGRESS IN GERMANY

THE VOICE OF OUR ALLY

"Four thousand former members of Hitler's dreaded SS (Elite Guard) cheered ex-Gen. Hermann Ramcke here yesterday as he accused Allied soldiers of war crimes and demanded the release of all 'so-called German war criminals' . . .

" 'All those Allied officers and soldiers who bombed German cities are also war criminals,' Ramcke said.

" 'If our soldiers are convicted as war criminals then it was also a war crime when the Allies bombed unprotected German cities and when the Allies now invent atom bombs,' Ramcke said.

"These remarks were almost drowned in cheering."

GERMAN-AMERICAN INTEGRATION?

"Major (Retd.) Adalbert Weinstein, who is in touch with professional military opinion, suggests in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung that, as the psychological basis for a European army is evidently lacking in France, a possible alternative to the EDC might well be the 'integration' of West German and American armies. These are straws in the wind. Many German military men believe that America will eventually find that it is cheaper and more efficient to rearm Germany direct than through an international bureaucracy . . .

PREPARING FOR THE FUTURE

GERMANS BIG BUSINESS IN POLITICS

"Big and middlesized business in Western Germany is getting into politics on a major scale for the first time since the end of the war.

"This was evident here this weekend at the annual convention of the Free Democratic Party. . . .

"The convention's decisions indicated clearly that the Ruhr element of the F. D. P., which represents heavy industry will dominate the party's future.

It is also appealing to ex-Nazis—and there are thousands waiting on the sidelines—by urging the end of all legal and political penalties against them and the freeing of all war criminals. . . .

"Ernst 'Putzi' Hanfstagel of Munich, Harvard-educated art dealer and Hitler's one-time piano player, is one of the new 'American' experts on the Foreign Policy Committee."

(Edwin Hartrich in the Wall Street Journal)

"The weightiest arguments indicate that America's policy toward Germany should be changed. Most important of those arguments is that the arms we thrust into German hands may be used against us at some future time.

"In the bargaining contest for the favors of the Reich, the Soviet Union can outbid us. The latter can command its Polish satellites to change the existing Oder-Neisse boundary for the benefit of the Reich, opening up large areas for millions of expellees now crowding Western Germany. . . .

"We are told that our German 'friends' will not be able to use their arms against us because we shall keep our eyes on them. The Inter-allied Military Commissions were supposed to see that the Reich limited its arms after World War I. Yet when World War II opened, Germany was the best armed country in the world. Moreover, sharp eyes of vigilance never foster friendships.

"By forcing arms into German hands, we defeat the peaceful elements in that country, and stimulate the resurgence of the most extreme form of militarism."

(Emil Lengyel in the Foreign Policy Bulletin)

RETURN ENGAGEMENT

"A surge toward the Right has swept several former Nazis into local offices in three West German state elections . . .

"But two things were clear:

"1. The vote for Right-wing parties increased—especially for extreme Rightist groups which may hold the key to next year's outcome.

"2. Nazis are beginning to make a political comeback in this country which only seven years ago was shattered by a losing Nazi war."

GERMANY IN DEFEAT

NAZI CONSPIRATORS AT WORK

"Seven former prominent Nazis have been arrested in the heavy industry area of the Ruhr and are being held on suspicion of 'plotting high treason,' German police said.

NEW TACTICS

"Western Germany's organized neo-Nazis are making industrious efforts today to find camouflage in a new label and a new political tactic.

"This does not, however, mean that the neo-Nazis have altogether suspended activity. STRAIGHT TALK

"Amount of anti-Americanism you run across in West Germany is astonishing....

"The faster the beer and wine flowed, the franker the men became. All were outspokenly anti-American. They're against the Defense Pact, against rearming Germany, against the Administration in Bonn. They think it's pro-American....

"How can you expect us—these German workers said—to fight alongside American soldiers after the way they treated us? . . .

"Nazi crimes, naturally, are completely forgotten by people in this mood.

"And the moral: When you dig under the surface, German public opinion is not at all what the U. S. assumes it to be. Or what Bonn assumes it to be, either."

(From the U. S. News & World Report)

THE KRUPPS COME BACK

"The Krupp family cartel armed and abetted Hitler's war machine on the grand scale. Now Allied High Commission authorities are restoring that infamous dynasty to menacing power in the Bonn republic.

"In Europe, survivors of Hitler's carnage and Krupp's slave labor gangs have reacted to the news with bafflement and horror. In Britain, France and Holland and in Germany itself, people and press have wondered why, if Occupation authorities know what they're doing, they keep right on doing it.

"Our professed aim is to put Krupp out of the dangerous munitions business. We have certainly gone about it the hard way. At Nuremberg, Alfred Krupp was sentenced to a 12-year term as a war criminal and the judges ordered the vast family holdings confiscated. The 12-year term turned out to be less than six. The confiscation order was then revoked—and handily, too, because, with incredibly cynical foresight, it turned out never to have been carried out in the first place.

"For every holding cut off—for now, that is—from family control, the Krupps will be bought off with cash. They stand to profit handsomely from holdings left in their hands. The transparent allied plan to reshuffle Krupp holdings will leave them the richest and most influential family in Germany.

"What do we say to the thousands of Nazi victims, still vainly seeking compensation through the courts and quietly gavelled into silence?"

(The New York Post)

WEREWOLVES UNCOVERED

"Anger and dismay have been aroused in Germany by the discovery that Americans have been training, arming and financing a German 'underground' for use in the event of war. When the Socialist Premier of Hesse, Herr Zinn, revealed the facts, he stated that there exists a black list of unreliable Germans to be assassinated if war came . . .

"What is particularly alarming is the apparently carefree manner in which American officials recruited irregular forces from the Yeague of German Youth. It must surely be well understood that the mind of youngster who was happiest in the Hitler Youth would not much mind whether he was employed against Russians, German democrats or the Americans themselves.

THE QUALITY OF MERCY

The release of von Mackensen . . . is an act of executive clemency and casts no doubt on the validity of his original sentence.
U. K. High Commission. 10-3-52

How mercy seasons justice. Mercy pleads,
And one by one,
With pardon for the guilty intercedes,
Their term not done.
Reich prisoners their freedom have gained . . .
The quality of mercy is not strain'd.

With attributes of majesty and awe
The Nurnberg Court
Passed sentence; but the penalty of law
Is now cut short.
The course of law no temporal power can stay . . .
But mercy is above this sceptered sway.

The monstrous crimes of which they stood accused
Law must condemn,
But mercy her prerogative has used
To pardon them—
Field-Marshals first, and after, all the rest . . .
The quality of mercy is twice blest.

Offenses no strict judges can condone
May be reprieved.
The greater guilt, the kinder mercy shown,
The guilt relieved.
Now mercy pardons chiefs of murder-squads . . .
And earthly power doth then show like God's.

But if the act of pardon may acquit
These, justly tried,
Should mercy's season not be infinite,
To all applied?
To all offenders mercy should be given . . .
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven.

Why only to the Reich war criminal Pardon restrict?
Should mercy not be rendered now to all
The Courts convict,
To mitigate the justice of their plea?
None should in prison lie, if these go free.

The Puzzle of Anglo-German Relations

PROFESSOR EDWARD HALLETT CARR

My theme is the perennial puzzle of Anglo-German relations. I call it a puzzle because it seems to me that we have not tried so hard about our relations with any country as we have with Germany, and that there is no country about which we have proved so consistently wrong. If you look back over British foreign policy for the last eighty years or so, you come across what strikes me as a very odd paradox. In times of peace our relations with Russia have almost always been bad. Russians—at any rate official Russians—have always baffled us: we have not understood them, and what we have understood we have not very much liked or trusted. Yet when it came to a show-down, we and the Russians, for good reasons of our own and somewhat to our mutual surprise, have found ourselves fighting on the same side. The Germans, on the other hand, we have almost universally liked and admired: we have imagined we understood them and that they were people very much like ourselves, more like ourselves than any other continental nation. But, as soon as the threat of war appeared on the horizon, it was the Germans who rattled their swords and went into battle against us.

'Shuttlecock of Violent Emotions'

One result of all this has been to make Anglo-German relations the shuttlecock of violent and opposite emotions. In the early years of this century, unstinting admiration for Germany and everything German was common form in this country; even as late as 1911 and 1912 desperate attempts were still being made, with very little encouragement from the other side, to keep up Anglo-German friendship. I remember well this pro-German tradition in which I grew up. Then came 1914, and for five years Germans were Huns, who raped women and tortured children, and if you had a German name or German ancestors you were likely to get your windows broken, and Germany was an orange to be squeezed till the pips squeaked. Then in the nineteen-twenties the Germans were once more solid, hard-working respectable people like ourselves, who had been very badly treated by the volatile and rapacious French, and Stresemann was a great European statesman, and the world was to be rebuilt on the solid foundation of a restored Germany and Anglo-German friendship. Then in the nineteen-thirties the horror began again, and a few years later Germany was once more the butcher-bird among nations, the eternal aggressor and enemy of civilization, and it was vigorously denied that there were any good Germans. And now, today, only seven years after that, we are once more busy admiring the Germans as solid, hard-working, vigorous people, so different from the quarrelsome French and Italians, and counting on them as the bulwark of our interests in Europe: we are back once more, incredible as it may seem to people with even the shortest historical memories, to the mood of "Come along, boys, let's get together with the Germans and save western civilization."

Now I was brought up to admire Germany and things German, I have generally liked Germans, and, except for a short time in the first world war, I have never at any time fallen a victim to the hysteria of believing that all Germans are wicked or that there is something specifically aggressive in the German national character. But this perhaps entitles me to take a tilt against the opposite—and for the moment more dangerous—hysteria of believing that the Germans have exactly the same political traditions and outlook, and above all the same political interests, as our own. Surely there is something radically wrong and unhealthy in this shuttlecocking of our emotions about Germany between these extremes. Even the abundance of our nicknames for Germans bears witness to this peculiarly intimate, yet ambivalent emotional attitude. Hun, Boche, Fritz, Jerry—we scarcely know whether they are terms of affection or opprobrium, whether they are tokens of love or hate. Is it not clear that we fall into one madness precisely because we are ashamed of ourselves for having so recently fallen into the other? Can we not find some half-way house between the folly of believing that the Germans are criminals and outcasts and the equal and opposite folly of believing that the Germans, considered as political animals, belong to the same species as ourselves?

History seldom repeats itself. We are not in the least obliged to believe that, because we have fought two world wars against Germany, we shall fight a third, or that, because in days of Wilhelm II and of Hitler, the house of Anglo-German friendship proved to be built on sand, we can find no more solid foundation for it in the future. But history does, or should, enable us to dig down into the roots of attitudes and policies that have proved particularly persistent, and by understanding the past to understand better the potentialities of the future, whether for good or for ill. It is not my business in this talk to plunge into current controversies or offer prescriptions for action: the most I can attempt is to make some small contribution to our understanding of the German dilemma, to draw attention to two aspects of German thinking and German policy which seems to me, in the light of history, fundamental and unlikely to change in the near future, and to suggest that we should be ill-advised to leave them out of account in our current calculations.

The first is the desire for German unity. For more than a hundred years this desire has dominated German political thought and action. Long after France, Britain and even Russia had achieved national unity, Germany remained divided and disunited: even today Germans have an uncomfortable feeling that they are not wholly one, that they are still Bavarians or Prussians, or Rhinelanders or Saxons, that they have never cohered as a nation as thoroughly and unreservedly as the other Great Powers. And it is this consciousness of having lagged behind, which has given the drive for unity its compelling force. In the eighteen-forties democracy and nationalism, the two legacies of the French revolution, went hand in hand; and all progressive young Germans were fervent nationalists and democrats. After the fiasco of 1848 democracy and nationalism parted company; and Germans threw democracy overboard and marched with Bismarck for national unity and the German Reich.

It was one of Hitler's boasts, and a not unimportant point in his propaganda, that he would wipe out the divisions between the German lands which had been tolerated or encouraged under Weimar. And now once more the Germans are faced not only with the provincial separation fostered by the Western Allies in the new constitution, but with the far graver rift between western and eastern Germany. We all know that the Germans today want to recover their unity. But when I am told that somebody wants something, I always want to know how much he really wants it; and the only way to measure this is to ask what other things he is prepared to sacrifice in order to get it. And when I ask how much Germans want national unity, or, in other words, what they are prepared to sacrifice for it, I think the plain answer is: "Everything."

The Lesson of History

That seems to me to be the lesson and the moral of German history for more than a hundred years past. A lot of Germans today, perhaps even most Germans, want democracy; a lot of Germans want to see applied in Germany that rather vague code of liberal doctrine which we call—a little priggishly, I fear—"western values." But how much do they want it? What are they prepared to sacrifice for it? In my view, the answer to this question is the answer of German history. Offer Germany the choice between national unity and democracy, and the answer will come pat: "Let democracy go." Offer Germany the choice between national unity and western values: they will not hesitate for a split second. I am not blaming them. If I were a German, I might make the same choice. I do not think the choice is either wicked or irrational. In a sense it is one of those choices about which one cannot argue. I plead only for understanding. German national unity is the overriding political ambition—political obsession, if you like—to which all, or almost all, else will be sacrificed in case of need. Let us realize this, or we shall once more be disappointed and then blame the Germans for our own blindness.

Let me pass on to the other fundamental element in Germany's political attitude to the world of which I wish to speak. I will put it in a deliberately provocative way. Germany is not, and never can be, a western power. It is equally true that Germany is not, and cannot be, an eastern power. Germany is an east-west power, a central power, occupying a key position in the European continent precisely for that reason. Germany cannot be a member of an Atlantic community in the way in which Britain and France are members of an Atlantic community. This is just as much of a truism as to say that Britain cannot be a continental power in the same sense as Germany and France; and it is just as important in its practical results. One does not need to pay an exaggerated tribute to geopolitics in order to recognize these simple facts of geography. It is just as silly to blame Germany for not behaving like a western power as it is to blame Britain for not behaving like a continental power.

Duality Motif

Take a map of Germany at any recent period of her history, and look at that long, wide open frontier, geographically undefined and ethnographically blurred, that constantly shifting eastern frontier. Or go back a little further into history. Perhaps we are rather tired of being reminded that the frontier of the Roman Empire ran slap across the middle of modern Germany. Perhaps we are rather tired of being reminded of the duality motif in German literature, "Two souls, alas, dwell in my breast." But, after all, there is something vital and significant in this traditional background. Let me for the moment put it rather more cautiously as a historian: "Germany never has been a western power."

The limitations of geography are, however, sometimes overcome, and historical traditions are sometimes modified or they decay. Need we despair today of the possibility—in modern jargon—of "integrating Germany into the western community of nations?" This was what was attempted in the age of Bismarck and again, even more persistently and with greater apparent hope of success, under Weimar. Both attempts broke down. We had better begin by asking why; and the enquiry will, I think, bring us to grips with our subject.

It was rather less than 100 years ago that German heavy industry set out on its spectacular career. It started later than its British competitor, and, while it formed the basis of Germany's growing military power, occupied for some time a secondary place in world markets. Then, towards the end of the century, German heavy industry found a new and fruitful outlet in the east in the industrial development of Russia, and long before 1914 had well outstripped Great Britain as a producer of iron and steel and of machinery and equipment. These prosperous days ended with the first world war. After 1919 Germany was in a desperate plight. She was not allowed to manufacture armaments, always a major branch of German heavy industry; exports to the western world were cut off by the discriminatory measures imposed at Versailles. There was only one way out—the way that led east. Stinnes, the trust-maker and king of German coal, iron and steel in the early nineteen-twenties, was one of the two strongest advocates of an eastern orientation in German policy; the other was Seeckt, the head of the Reichswehr.

The Rapallo Treaty of 1922 was the political expression of the re-entry of German heavy industry into the Russian market. It began innocently enough with the manufacture of agricultural machinery for Russia by Krupp, swords into ploughshares. It developed less innocently into quite a large program of secret rearmament for the mutual advantage of Germany and Russia, weapons forbidden by the Versailles Treaty, such as aircraft and tanks, being manufactured by German firms (Krupps and Junkers were the most important of them) on Russian soil. In the fifteen years between the German defeat and the coming of Hitler it was the Russian market that kept German industry alive; and it was for this reason if for no other that Germany could not be a western power and had to balance so carefully between east and west—the policy of Stresemann. Only when Hitler came to power and started a vast program of armament at home did the Russian market cease to be vital for German heavy industry.

Where do we stand today—or rather where does Germany stand—in relation to this problem? We have left behind us the craziness of the butcher-bird period when we proposed to pastoralize Germany and destroy German industry. Nowadays we look with approval and admiration, perhaps sometimes with envy, at German figures of production. But have we considered where these products of German heavy industry are to find their market? The allies have encouraged, almost compelled, Germany to scrap the elements of a planned economy which they had themselves set up at the beginning of the occupation, so that there is no chance of finding an outlet for these products at hand in a big public works program.

There remain three, and only three, alternatives. The first is to find markets in the western world in competition mainly with American and British exports; but this will not suit either the United States or Britain, who will find ways and means to exclude this competition if it becomes serious. The second, and at present the most promising, way out is a big German rearmament program financed by the United States. But can this, one wonders, go on indefinitely as a permanent basis for the German economy? And, if it does, will it not soon make Germany so powerful that she will be able to dictate her own terms in Europe, if not beyond? It is not surprising that this alternative is not altogether to the taste of a good many Europeans. The third alternative is to reopen to German industry the markets of the east, not only the markets of Russia, now perhaps less absorptive since the industrialization of Russia herself under the five-year plans, but the markets of China, now in much the same position as Russia was thirty years ago. Do you really believe that we can keep these markets of eastern Europe and Asia indefinitely closed to a German heavy industry crying out for markets? I doubt it. German industry is not going to sit and starve for lack of markets. These markets will certainly not stay closed if we are going to put power back into Germany's hands to follow her own course.

Only the other day I read in an article in The Times that the German industrialists were now advertising their products in the Communist press of western Germany. Plainly it is not among German Communists that they hope to find customers. Last April one of the oldest and most respectable of the German reviews carried an article on the thirtieth anniversary of the Rapallo Treaty. It was written by a member of Stresemann's party, who held minor office under the Weimar Republic, and it ended with a curiously nostalgic sigh: "Germany, dismembered and disarmed, can today enter into treaty relations with the Soviet Union only as a member of a group of powers. . . . Nothing could show more graphically to what a decline Germany has been brought by a criminal and incompetent politician." Germany in decline, yes. But what about a restored Germany? I do not for a moment doubt the sincerity of those Germans who assure us that they regard the Russians with detestation and horror and want to have nothing to do with them. Seven years ago we had exactly the same feelings about the Germans; and we were just as sincere; today we are courting their alliance. I am making no predictions: all sorts of things may happen in the next decade in Germany. But of one thing I feel confident: Germany belongs to eastern Europe just as much as to western Europe. Germany never has been, is not, and, at any rate so long as she retains her present economic structure, cannot be a western power.

That is my conclusion. For forty years we have been looking at Germany alternately through eyes of hatred and mistrust or through a sentimental haze of wishful thinking. It is about time we realized that neither hatred nor wishful thinking is a key to understanding. It is about time we realized on the one hand that the Germans are not monsters of iniquity, and on the other hand that they cannot be kept as obedient satellites of the west, who share our interests and outlook and will dance to our tune. The Germans are a vigorous and independent people with an outlook and interests that diverge widely and legitimately from ours. Let us begin by trying to understand them.

"Perhaps you were among the victims of the German bond deals which were palmed off on American investors during the 1920's . . . bonds which have been in default since 1929. Sen. Hiram Johnson investigated this business in 1932 and his committee branded it . . . 'The most shameful period in our financial history.'

"Are we going to go through it again? Have the investors of America forgotten so soon? . . .

"At the London Debt Conference this year, it was agreed that the present German government would start paying on the principal of these old bonds . . . start paying on them in 1958. . . .

". . . Our negotiator Mr. Warren Pearson, made a deal to cancel two billion dollars of the three billion we have loaned Germany since World War II. Mr. Pearson, simply wrote off two billion dollars of the taxpayers' money for the benefit of the German government . . . and this so-called settlement paved the way for the new German bonds to be peddled in America.

"The tip-off came in an editorial carried in the Hamburg Newspaper, Die Zeit, in its issue of October 2nd. The Germans were gloating over the manner in which they had outsmarted us."

A German Speaks

(We believe that our readers will be interested in reading the letter reprinted below written by Count von Wedel to the editor of the Wisconsin Progressive, December 1952.

Count von Wedel is a former officer in the Kaiser's army and a former high official of the Prussian administration. Under the Weimar Republic, Count von Wedel was a prominent member of the Central Committee for Human Rights. Naturaly, as soon as the Nazis came to power, they outlawed this organization.

Throughout the inter-war period, Count von Wedel was one of Germany's great fighters for pacifism and democracy. His integrity and moral courage under all circumstances are well-known throughout Europe.)

The October Progressive contained a letter questioning German rearmament written by a group of Americans familiar with German history and politics. On the basis of my own lifelong studies and intimate contacts with German political realities, I fully concur in the findings of the signers that the German militarists will seize the first opportunity to make an alliance with the Bolsheviks—as they did in the past.

It goes without saying that those of us who have been struggling against German militarism for decades could add a great many other arguments against the remilitarization of Germany. I wonder, however, whether the West fully realizes the real danger involved in setting up a new German army, for once militarism takes root in Germany again, it will ultimately destroy our human rights.

I can cite, for instance, the fact that today the Federal German Police is already imbued with a militaristic spirit that was never known in the Weimar regime. Living in Germany, we already unmistakably see here the resurgence of a mentality which is the real incarnation of the Fuhrer concept.

Having watched Germany for the past seven years, we fear that the battle for democracy is nearly lost. In 1945 my friends and I welcomed with open arms the Allies when they freed us from the Nazi tyranny. We fully understood that after the defeat of Germany, the Allies regarded all Germans as bad. But after a while we were entitled to believe and hope that the Allies would treat differently those who, under the most trying conditions, had fought for democracy.

To our great dismay, we often discovered that the worst Nazis were given preferential treatment; they were selected for various positions, and given permission to travel abroad, whereas we who had resisted Nazism were shunted aside, if not treated with contempt.

Despite all this, we made every effort to get in touch with the Allies and our Western friends. We have asked our foreign friends again and again to give us their moral support, but we never succeeded. Now, after seven years of disappointment we feel embittered and we live isolated exactly as we did under the Hitler regime, in a small circle, in a self-imposed quarantine, as we tried desperately to keep the Nazi poison away from our children.

It is odd, indeed, to say that even in those Hitler days we had succeeded somehow in preserving our faith and imparting it to our youth. It is obvious that the generation under 26 has a completely different mentality from the older generation. How can we explain to our youth the failure of Allied policy to democratize Germany, the sabotage of the restitution program to the victims of Nazism, the return of the huge property to Krupp and his reinstatement in power?

We look at all this with great sadness. But we are firmly resolved to remain faithful to our ideals. And because we still hope to see a true democracy in Germany, we welcome the support of our friends abroad in our undiminished fight for a demilitarized Germany.

Nazi Activities in Chile

by
SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

It is generally assumed that Argentina is the base for Nazi and pan-German activities in South America. While this is probably true, the Nazis have not overlooked the possibilities of expanding their activities in other countries of Latin America such as Chile. Thus a Nazi underground organization has recently been established in that country under the direction of former S.S. Baron George Mapusch.

Although the activities of the organization are limited, for the time being, to the city of Valparaiso, Mapusch intends to expand them throughout Chile. Baron Mapusch landed in Chile a few years ago with forged papers. Shortly thereafter he met a prominent woman, Dora Obt de Mackel, a Nazi, through whom he was able to obtain an introduction to the former under-secretary of the Interior, Hector Grez. Mr. Grez became interested in Baron Mapusch and helped him to legalize his status. Although Baron Mapusch was not very affluent when he landed in Chile, he succeeded in obtaining funds to start a big trucking business which nas netted him considerable profits.

Members of the Underground

Among the prominent German members of Baron Mapusch's underground we find the following:

1. Eichermann, former representative of the German shipping line "Kosmos."
2. Heinz von Oepen, a wealthy landowner who became a member of the Nazi Party July 1, 1936, Party Card No. 3726407.
3. Kurt Goldmann, owner of the steel firm, Goldmann-Janssen.
4. Oelzen, partner of Goldmann.
5. Kliep, director of the brokerage house of Otto Osterloh, the latter being the chairman of the German Association in Valparaiso. Mr. Osterloh has recently attacked, in the presence of the German Ambassador, Carl von Campe, the new flag of the West German Republic.
6. Johannes Moeller, head of the paper firm Luer und Paye, member of the Nazi Party since April 1, 1933, Card Membership No. 3281352.
7. Hermann Kuhlmann of the firm Perlina y Berolina.
8. Buessing, former representative of the German bank in Chile.
9. Hasseldieck, former captain of the shipping line "Kosmos."
10. Von Appen, formerly captain of a boat belonging to "Kosmos," at present with the firm Vorwerk y Cia, which is plying the waters of the west coast of America.
    The head of the new shipping company, Arturo Vorwerk, became a member of the Nazi Party July 1st, 1933, membership card No. 3281340.
    In 1943 Von Appen ran a radio station for the Nazis near Valparaiso. His activities were uncovered and he was deported that year to Texas. He was one of the most dangerous Nazis in Chile.
11. Slubert Matthec, owner of a large plumbing establishment.
12. Adolf Herrmann, owner of a dyestuff factory.

Baron Mapusch owns a house in Vina del Mar, near Valparaiso, where the members of his organization meet weekly. He seems to dispose of large sums of money which come directly from Buenos Aires. Baron Mapusch is in constant touch with the leaders of the prominent Nazi publication Der Weg. He also maintains a regular courier service with the Nazis in Argentina through the prominent Nazi, August Siebrecht, who is a member of Gen. Peron's staff.

Nazis in the German Embassy

Prominent Nazis are also active in the German Embassy. The director of the Economics Division of the German Embassy in Santiago, Herman G. Schuette, is closely connected with Count Welzceck's group. (Count Welzceck is a member of the firm, Welzceck and Schuchard & Co.) Count Welzceck is presently visiting Germany where he is discussing important affairs with the most prominent German industrialists in Cologne. Before going to Germany, Count Welzceck visited the famous S.S. Colonel, Otto Skorzeny in Madrid. In addition, Count Welzceck is known to have been in close touch with Dr. Schacht. It is worthy of mention that Baron Mapusch is also in close contact with Otto Skorzeny.

Herman Schuette was born in Paraguay and is therefore a so-called "Ausland German." Before the outbreak of World War II, he represented a Bremen firm in Buenos Aires. During World War II, he returned to Germany where he became a member of the Nazi Party. Naturally, today he claims that he is a "real democrat."

Another prominent Nazi, Egbrecht von Oldershausen, came to Chile some two years ago. He was formerly connected with the notorious Dresdener Bank and was arrested by the Allies after World War II. He was an officer in the German army and is 100 percent Nazi. He also lives at Vina del Mar and is an active member of Baron Mapusch's underground organization. He is working very closely with the Nazi spy, Von Appen.

The counselor of the German Embassy, Ostermann was a prominent S. S. man and distinguished himself for the services rendered to that organization.

How does it happen that the German Embassy in Chile is infested with Nazis? The answer to this question is obvious in view of the fact that the Bonn Foreign Office itself is dominated by the former diplomats who worked for Hitler. Thus it is not surprising that Ministerial Director Herbert Blankenhorn of the Bonn Foreign Office should be selecting Nazi personnel for Latin America inasmuch as he himself was a former member of the Nazi Party. Chancellor Adenauer has full confidence in Herr Blankenhorn and leaves the selection of personnel for foreign diplomatic posts entirely in his hands.

Pilgrimage to Germany

A "pilgrimage" to Germany is being planned to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the German's first arrival in Chile. Elaborate efforts are being made to obtain funds to subsidize the project and to obtain official invitations from the West German government. Most active in these efforts is the Singing Society of Santiago, Chile, a group completely dominated by Nazis. Present plans call for sending a troupe of about 70 dancers, singers and lecturers to Germany. The sponsors of the "pilgrimage" are: The German Chilean Bund and an assortment of German societies that have been very critical of the Bonn government by dubbing it the "Quisling regime." Among the leading organizers of this "pilgrimage" to Germany we find the following:

1. Guillermo Bornemann, director of the Banco Osorno y la Union of Santiago. An old Nazi since he became a member of the Party March 1, 1932 and his card number is 2839564.

2. Fernado Fonck. For 15 years, Chairman of the German-Chilean Bund, also completely in sympathy with the Nazis.
3. Father Joseph Mueller, an important leader in the German Catholic community who has been in Chile for about two years. In this connection, Father Mueller has written letters to Chancellor Adenauer in which he supported the activities of Herr Ostermann, the counselor of the German Embassy who was a former prominent member of the German S. S.
4. Pastor Dr. Helmut Schuenemann, a blatant Nazi.
5. Rudolf Soltmann, president of the land-owners of German origin, a member of the Nazi Party since April 1, 1932, card No. 954139.
6. Claus von Plate, director of "Condor," 100% Nazi, a Chilean of German origin.
7. Artur Junge, director and choir master of the "Singing Circle," one of the worst Nazis in Chile, member of the Nazi Party since October 1, 1935, card No. 2837898.
8. Bruno-Schmid-Palzer, a Sudetan German who recently visited Germany, active in the Nazi-dominated German School, a very objectionable character.
9. Edward Pfeiffer, a member of the Party since May 1, 1933, card No. 3272800.
10. Prof. Dr. Rudolf Wilcke, Chairman of the German-Chilean Bund, officially not a Nazi.

There is something strange indeed about these "pilgrims." Their forebears landed in Chile some hundred years ago and yet they still call themselves "Germans." Their ancestors left Germany in despair because of the failure of the democratic revolution of 1848. In Chile, they kept up their ideals and their allegiance to the Republican flag—black, red and gold. The descendants of these Germans later became strong supporters of Germany's imperialism under Kaiser Wilhelm II. They renounced the ideals of their forebears and the majority of them turned Nazis in 1933—they have not changed since then.

"The predominant motif of German history has been an excessive self-reliance. But the thought of co-operating with Russia was traditionally less alien to German political thinking than the idea of a French or British alliance. Frederick II was saved from a debacle in the Seven Years' War by an unexpected alliance with Czar Paul I. Jointly, Russia and Prussia turned on Napoleon after a great Prussian statesman, Freiherr von Stein, had won Russia's support. Bismarck made it a tenet of German foreign policy never to alienate Russia. The Weimar period saw a significant school of conservative generals and politicians, by no means sympathizing with the Communist system, advocate close ties with Russia."

(By Thomas Goldstein, historian, and writer on European politics in the New Republic)

"Recently at Bonn, a middle of the road member of Parliament made a speech in which he said: 'the Americans came to Germany to re-educate the Germans. As we take a close look at the results, we realize that it is the Germans who have re-educated the Americans—at least those who are still in Germany and who still harbor one thought only: "to make Germany the ally No. 1 of the U. S."

"A few days ago in Darmstadt, Heinemann former Minister of Interior and President of the Evangelical Church, said 'what the Americans want is to create a Washington-Bonn-Tokyo Axis.'

"When we hear that Germany is going to be integrated in Western Europe, it is sometimes difficult not to think that what the Americans really want to do is to integrate Europe into Germany."

(Libre Belgique, Brussels)

"The new German—pardon us, European—general staff that has been set up by Western Germany is composed of men who can shed their national feelings, if Deutsche Korrespondenz, the official propaganda weekly of the Bonn government, can be relied on. . . .

The impression that they love the west but despise the east is skillfully planned for western, especially American, gullibility. But, as we said, a general staff made up of Germans may be called European, but it can never be anything but German. For this blindness we may pay a horrible price in the future."

A Dissent on German Rearmament

"We never thought Nazi jackboots would again stamp approval of an anti-Allied speech," observed the Daily Mail. "We never thought to hear frenzied Hitlerian denunciations of the 'Versailles criminals' at another German mass meeting." This comment is typical of the injured surprise with which most of the press greeted General Ramcke's speech to 6,000 S.S. men gathered for a reunion in a West German beer garden. The Daily Mail has been no blinder in its support for a German contribution to Western defense than the News Chronicle, or at an earlier stage, the Daily Herald. Like most of the national newspapers, it has merely swallowed the long series of official handouts with which first Mr. Bevin, then Mr. Morrison, and now Mr. Eden have soothingly assured us that twelve German divisions can be safely integrated into the defenses of Western democracy. Now, when the dragons' teeth begin to sprout their armed heads, those who sowed them stand round flapping their hands in dismay. "Krupp is receiving restitution! Guardians of the extermination camps are released! The Waffen S.S. receives recognition for its (premature) anti-Bolshevist crusade! But how terrible! We must at once register the strongest protest in Bonn."

Mr. Eden will make the required protest with the charming ineffectiveness which has won him such popularity, and Mr. Morrison and Sir Hartley Shawcross will chime in appropriately. These protests will be accepted sincerely enough by Dr. Adenauer. For the German Chancellor is neither a militarist nor a Nazi, but a Catholic who devoutly believes in Western European integration as a bulwark against Bolshevism. The trouble is that neither Mr. Eden's charm nor Dr. Adenauer's personal integrity count for anything in the long run. Once a sovereign German State is reconstituted—with the Ruhr industries in the possession of their old owners, with the old nationalist forces free to undermine a feeble democracy and with an army responsible to none—the Germans are bound to set out to destroy the diktat of Yalta as the diktat of Versailles was destroyed in the 1930s. In this process, Dr. Adenauer can be relied on to play a part no less high-minded and no less fatal than that of his predecessor, Dr. Breuning. German history may not repeat itself exactly, but it is still determined largely by those historical forces which unloosed two world wars.

Those who rearm a truncated Germany, therefore, as a bulwark against Communism should not be surprised when General Ramcke reminds them of some of the historical facts they wish to forget. After all, every single officer and N.C.O. of the new German army was once a member of Hitler's Wehrmacht or Waffen S.S., an organization which we dishonored and branded for war crimes only seven years ago. Now we have changed our minds: a few score "criminals" are to stay in prison; the rest must be accepted as Christian gentlemen. We have no right to be surprised if their spokesmen reply a little roughly: "You can have all or none. Admit you condemned the Wehrmacht unjustly and fought the wrong war, and we will be willing to accept you as allies. Those are our terms, and if you want a German army, we, the cadres of it, are the only Germans who really matter."

That should be clear enough. But already the ostrich heads, raised for a moment last Monday, are dipping gracefully towards the sand. Reassuringly we are told that General Ramcke is a voice from the past, out of tune with the European spirit of a new Germany.

General Ramcke is not a voice from the past, but a prophet of what will be the future, if the U. S. continues to make German rearmament the price of dollar assistance, and if Britain aids her in stamping down the protests of the French people, of the great majority of the Germans in the Western Zone, and of the whole world on the Eastern side of the Elbe.

"Speaking in Berlin, Herr Hans Lukaschek, the West German Minister for Refugees, is reported as having proclaimed that Germany's former eastern territories, 'including those occupied by Czechoslovakia,' will become German again. This ill-judged utterance is the worst possible omen before the Bonn Government's entry into the West European defence system. The Sudetenland, to which Herr Lukaschek was clearly referring, was part of Czechoslovakia when the Republic was founded. It was also part of the old Austrian Empire. The claims to it which are now being staked by neo-Nationalists in Western Germany are an echo of the Hitler-Henlein propaganda campaign of fourteen years ago. At this rate, how soon are we to expect West German claims to Austria, on the grounds that it is a 'German' country? . . .

"The 'Greater German Reich' conception may still have attractions for many Germans. Its realisation remains something which the peoples of Eastern Europe would accept almost any 'protection' to prevent."

GERMAN COMPETITION

"German industry has staked such a comeback that it is now pushing U. S. goods out of Latin America.

"Ever since 1950, German toys, chemicals, tools, and electric goods have been competing with U. S. products. But now the rivalry has moved into the field of heavy industry.

"Recently both U. S. Steel and Bethlehem Steel bid on a new bridge over the Guayas river in Ecuador—a major construction job.

"However—though they don't know it yet—the two big American firms are going to be left out in the cold, with the contract going to the Ferrostaal Co. of Hamburg, reorganized less than four years ago following 85 per cent destruction of its plants and offices by wartime bombardment.

"Bethlehem Steel offered to build the bridge linking Guayaquil with the terminus of the railroad from 9,300-foot-high Quito, for about $5,200,000. But the German firm underbid that figure by almost 30 per cent. . . ."

Saboteurs of Democracy

by
FREDERICK WALLACH

Supposing the U. S. Army in France and Great Britain has trained a secret saboteur group, consisting of French and English citizens, to go into action in the event of a Russian invasion. Supposing these saboteurs were found to have prepared black lists for the assassination of the leaders of the political opposition. Unquestionably, the exposure of such a plan would have grave consequences within France and Britain and would damage American prestige in those countries.

Yet, this hypothetical situation has actually been discovered recently as a reality in Western Germany. Unfortunately the press did not report this event in sufficient detail. One ot the first dispatches on the subject was a brief item by the International News Service (October 8, 1952) which read:

"Police discovered today the existence of a 2,000-man anti-Communist force in the U. S. zone of Germany and said it is mobilizing a guerilla army to help repel any Russian attack.

"The existence of the force was announced by August Zinn, minister-president of the State of Hesse. Most of the members of the anti-Communist group were said to be former officers in the German army."

The A. P. reporting this expose, admitted the existence of such black lists and named some of its "intended victims," including Germany's most prominent Socialist leaders. The intended liquidation and assassination was played down as a "removal if necessary." It was stressed that U. S. officials "had been unaware of what the organization was plotting." On October 10, a special dispatch to the New York Times emphasized that the plans of these saboteurs was a "betrayal of U. S. trust." The new "Division Brandenburg" (an ill-reputed Nazi saboteur unit during World War II, to which belonged a number of unsuccessful saboteurs, caught in the U. S. by the F. B. I., was said to consist of members of the Neo-Nazi "Association of German Youth," of ex-officers of the Nazi Army and Air Force and of ex-leaders of the "Nazi Waffen S. S. with former ranks as high as colonel." The Times report went on to say that:

"United States authorities said they felt that the guerrilla training program was not in itself wrong though possibly unwise. They said what most concerned them was the proclivity of the Germans involved for engaging in political activities that possibly had degenerated into a conspiracy against political and Government leaders."

That the U. S. Guerilla warfare program may very well boomerang politically, should be receiving the careful consideration of our policy-makers in Germany. It can encourage a mood of defeatism since it can come into operation only in the event of an Allied retreat. There is no question too, that the use of these Nazi elements as part of Allied military strategy will provide excellent propaganda material for the Communists in the nations of Western Europe. That it was a surprise to U. S. authorities that these ex-Nazis should "degenerate into a conspiracy" against "political and government leaders" shows once more that Allied political planning in Germany is void of realism and a basic understanding of recent German history.

Repeat Performance

This recent expose in Germany is almost an exact duplication of the beginnings of the strife which led to the overthrow of the Weimar Republic by a "combination of disgruntled war veterans, Nazis and Chauvinists, united in the "Harzburg Front." It is well worth recalling that the Treaty of Versailles restricted Germany to an army of 100,000 professional soldiers—the so-called Reichswehr. With the connivance of the German government, including Socialist and Catholic cabinet members, a black Reichswehr was secretly organized in order to increase the military potential of Germany. Only the most chauvinistic German officers and members of the ultra-chauvinistic para-military organizations were trusted to be "patriotic" enough to serve in these secret or illegal organizations without betraying the state. The Black Reichswehr leaders immediately launched a program to assassinate government officials of the Weimar Republic they feared politically or disliked. Among their victims were such men as Rathenau and Erzberger.

In order to protect their jobs they created the secret Fehme which had the mission to assassinate German "traitors" who were suspected of having betrayed the existence of the Black Reichswehr and its secret arsenals to the Allies. Hundreds of Germans were martyred in this fashion. The Fehme was financed by a front organization, the "Volkische Schutz und Trutzbund," which was devoted exclusively to the spreading of anti-Semitic propaganda. The Fehme was permitted to flourish because of the support received from leading officials and from the German legal profession which detested the Weimar Republic, and worked for its overthrow. The assassins of the Fehme, if they were ever prosecuted, were usually excused by the courts on the basis of an ad hoc fiction of an "extra legal excuse" or justified as a "defense of the State." When the Black Reichswehr even assassinated cabinet ministers, the Police either could not find the murderers, or the German government helped them to escape from Germany or saw to it that prison terms, when unavoidable in exceptional cases, were light.

Fully assured that nothing was to be feared from the authorities, the Black Reichswehr never lessened its attempts to overthrow the Weimar Republic. It was co-responsible for Hitler's Beer-Hall Putsch, and for the unsuccessful Kapp, Kustrin and Spandau putsches. The elements behind the Black Reichswehr, who also had been active in Hitler's Nazi Party from the very beginning, eventually joined hands officially with the NSDAP. The official historians of this party never have failed to acknowledge the debt of gratitude to the Black Reichswehr whom they gave the official, honorary title of "forerunners of the Nazi Party."

Does J. J. McCloy Know the Answers?

In view of this historical parallel, there are some questions which should be answered by the occupation authorities:

Why were ex-Nazis, S. S. leaders and members of a chauvinistic, Neo-Nazi organization, selected for the "secret" sabotage unit?

Shortly before Labor Day, the magazine Newsweek charged that the Allies under a defense minister Blank were giving preference to S. S. leaders in appointments to the Planning Staff for the new German army. Is this true?

If this is true, how does it square with Mr. McCloy's assurances before a Congressional Committee, that no war criminals or S. S. leaders would be employed in the new German army units?

(Note: The S. S. [Elite Guard] was declared a criminal organization by the Nuremburg Tribunal.)

Is it true or not that German police organizations are honeycombed with former members of the S. S. and the Nazi Party?

How could it happen that the saboteur unit whose members had to swear allegiance by touching a copy of Mein Kampff were not properly supervised by us and that only the German police uncovered the Black Lists and the murder plot?

If we cannot supervise the political activities of a small unit of 1 — 2000 saboteurs, what then is the value of Hicog's assurances to Congress that the new German army of ½ million will be effectively controlled?

Why was the sabotage unit not immediately dissolved when its political activities became clear as early as May 1952? In this connection, it is interesting to note that a similar organization in Japan "The Martyrs" has not as yet been dissolved.

Finally, if the Black Lists and murder plots were not sponsored by the U. S. authorities, why then have our officials prohibited the prosecutor's office of the German Federal Supreme Court in Karlsruhe to indict these individuals of conspiracy to overthrow the government in case of war and to prepare for assassination? (N. Y. Times, Oct. 9/10)

Why has the Adenauer government given 10,000 D.M. to the "Association of German Youth" in spite of the fact that this organization is not only heavily infiltrated by Himmler's Elite Guard but also employs the techniques of the "Volkische Schutz und Trutzbund" whose specialty it was to paste stickers on the doors of minority groups, Democrats, etc., denouncing them as traitors?

It is the opinion of this writer that our success in the cold war and the strengthening of American security depends on forthright re-examination and correction of the policies which have encouraged the resurgence of the most evil forces in German life. No democracy can grow in Germany, as history has shown, when would-be assassins of the exponents and leaders of this democracy are not promptly brought to justice.

UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER

"Hardly a ripple of controversy has been stirred in Washington by the announcement of the Bonn agreements. Perhaps that will come later; yet it is a rather sad fact of the times that German remilitarization is the one subject on which almost every member of Congress seemingly prefers to be either acquiescent or silent. Rep. Javits (R-Lib-N.Y.) is a notable exception; there are a few others. But in general it is said to be bad form and perhaps even a trifle subversive to question the wisdom of the Bonn deal. . . .

"This kind of paralysis of mind and thought can be fatal to a democratic foreign policy. . . .

"The resurgence of neo-Nazism is not a specter invented by nervous men. It is confirmed by almost every responsible correspondent. The sense that Germany can dictate its own price in all international dealings pervades too many areas of German life once again."

(From an editorial in the New York Post)

"To pass fair judgment on the Schuman Plan is at this stage impossible. Certainly none can fail to applaud its high purpose. . . .

"With due acknowledgment of this inspiring beginning, one is still faced with the question: will the plan in practice really work towards liberalism in trade or towards more controls, restrictions, and monopoly? It is impossible to review the extensive administrative superstructure of the Plan, and the broad scope of the powers delegated to it, without being impressed that here are the potentialities of the 'managed economy' raised to the nth degree. Though the Schuman Plan proposes to sweep away existing barriers to trade and free competition imposed by private cartels and nationalistic governments, yet it arms its administrators with the full arsenal of restrictive devices. Considering the pressures to which these administrators are bound to be subject, and the tendency of government everywhere to reach out and extend its controls, what assurance is there that this Plan may not, in fact, mean moving away from, rather than toward, the free markets and free enterprise which are its avowed objectives?"

(Monthly Letter, The National City Bank of New York)

"Recently, Von Papen stated that 'German cooperation with the Western powers on the basis of equal rights is further advanced today than it was 15 years after the first world war; which goes to show that the second world war was not fought in vain.'

"Such impudence, coming from the elegant survivor of the Herrenklub simply shows that Von Papen does not mind adding insult to injury."

History—Upside Down

by
"HISTORICUS"

Today, as after World War I, there has emerged a breed of U. S. historians who appear determined to act as the self-appointed guardians of the truth concerning the circumstances which led to our involvement in World War II. They call themselves the "Revisionists" because, in the words of one of their leading spokesmen, Harry Elmer Barnes, they are dedicated to challenging "the official propaganda that governed our views on war responsibility in the years following Pearl Harbor." (American Bar Journal, July 1951)

Pro-German Revisionism and Dr. Barnes

Unquestionably it is the right of students on world affairs to investigate the genesis of World War II, but it is their duty to present an objective and factual account of the events leading to our entry in that war. The question arises, however, whether the so-called revisionists are guided by such scholarly standards.

Revisionist literature contains many imprecations against power politics and secret diplomacy. Indeed, a superficial reading of their writings may easily create an impression that the Revisionists are moral crusaders against the evils of war. Alongside of their endeavors to expose the machinations of cynical politicians and diplomats, the Revisionists, generally speaking, are endeavoring to prove that our entrance into World War II was unnecessary and indeed avoidable.

Not only are the Revisionists self-proclaimed moralists but they strive to take on the halo of martyrdom. Dr. Barnes describes how the Revisionists have courageously faced up to "hostile opinion." "Revisionism," Dr. Barnes writes, "faces almost insuperable obstacles. Scholars, no matter how distinguished, are, if they are suspected of Revisionist inclinations, denied access to official sources and public documents which are freely opened to court historians and apologists for the foreign policy of President Roosevelt." In addition to these trials and tribulations, Dr. Barnes speaks of alleged censorship on the part of publishers and scholarly journals with regard to material prepared by the Revisionists.

In short, we have it from one of their most authoritative spokesmen, that the Revisionists are a persecuted lot who are battling against the great odds of unseen pressures exerted by the evil men of the Roosevelt regime. Of course, Dr. Barnes does not go into any details to prove these broad accusations but it is interesting to note that a leading Revisionist, Charles Callan Tansill, Professor of American Diplomatic History at Georgetown University, "was given access to the State Department Secret Files and through the efforts of scholars within the department, he was eventually able to utilize more unpublished material on pre-war foreign policy than any other historian." This fact does not seem to jibe with Dr. Barnes' lament that the Revisionists have been placed beyond the pale of respectability.

As mentioned above, the Revisionists in their writings seem to give the impression that they are great moral crusaders against immoral diplomacy and power politics. However, when their writings are examined carefully, it is easy to become disillusioned.

C. C. Tansill—Historian

To show that this is true, we should like our readers to stay with us for a while as we examine one of the oustanding Revisionist works yet to appear, namely the book by Prof. Tansill entitled "Back Door to War."

It is a massive work, rambling over 600 pages. Quotations are found galore but one does not know when the author is speaking his own mind or if it is the voice of someone else. Thus it is difficult to pin the author down as to his views on various events which he describes. Nevertheless, there are slips here and there which afford us the opportunity to examine more closely the so-called moral views of Prof. Tansill and his abhorrence for power politics and cynical diplomacy. We shall deal with the three examples of Prof. Tansill's approach to the background of World War II, namely Japanese policy in Manchuria, the Ethiopian War, and finally the Munich era and its aftermath.

Secretary Stimson's "Guilt"

Prof. Tansill tells us that Japan's interest in China was due to the growth of Communism and the threat of Soviet Russia in that region. "The Red menace was daily becoming more formidable and Japanese fears rapidly increase. The only way to insure Japanese security was through adequate measures of defense in Manchuria. This might violate some shadowy rights over sovereignty that China had over Manchuria, but these rights had not been successfully asserted since 1912 and would soon be extinguished by Russia if Japan took no action." (Page 91)

The danger of the Red menace is referred to again on Page 109 where Prof. Tansill quotes the words of Admiral Toyoda who warned the West over the dangers of Russian expansion in China. Thus, in the pacifistic mind of scholar Tansill it did not matter if Chinese sovereignty over Manchuria was violated so long as the Japanese militarists were acting as a bulwark against Communism. To some, this may seem to be a plausible excuse for the Japanese invasion of Manchuria but Prof. Tansill writes that this was not the only reason why Japan took action. Manchuria had strategic and economic significance for Japan. Prof. Tansill writes "to Japan it appeared obvious that Manchuria was essential to her as a bastion of defense and as the keystone of her economic structure." (Page 94)

Now the situation is a little more complicated. It was not only the Russian influence in China which Japan tried to sell the West as her justification for the invasion of Manchuria but it was also important that Manchuria be swallowed up as a morsel for the rapacious designs of Japanese imperialism. Apparently these contradictions do not trouble Prof. Tansill. On the contrary, he contiuues his apologetics for the Japanese militarists by trying to "prove" how Japan was "provoked" into taking over Manchuria. It is not necessary to dwell on Russian provocation which Prof. Tansill describes, but the author also blames the Chinese. "In 1931, Japan felt that she was being pushed to the wall by Chinese nationalists in Mukden and Nanking." (Page 94)

On page 96 he writes that Japanese interests "in North China were about to be crushed between the millstones of Chinese nationalism and Russian Bolshevism." Thus, the Chinese people who had the temerity to oppose the Japanese conquest of their country are also blamed for provoking the Japanese. What was the role of the U. S. during those fateful years. According to the Professor, Secretary of State Stimson played a nefarious game in needling the Japanese and by reason of failing to accommodate their aggressive demands. It was Secretary Stimson, according to Professor Tansill, who prepared the "path to war." (Page 97)

"Stimson was a pacifist who loved peace so much, he was always ready to fight for it. He also heartily subscribed to the slogan—'Perpetual war for perpetual peace.'" (Page 101)

Prof. Tansill avers that Stimson's provocative attitude toward Japanese aspirations played into the hands of the Russians. He accuses the Secretary of State of having closed his eyes to the Russian menace and "continued his policy of baiting Japan." (Page 108) So Stimson is turned into a dupe, at best, of Communist policy in the Far East. Yet, Stimson's program of opposition to the aggresive designs of Japan and Manchuria prompted the Communist Party organ in the U. S., the Daily Worker, to denounce the Stimson policy in these words: "Workers! War in the Far East means a war against the toiling masses of the world! It means the danger of a world war in the interests of the profiteers! Hands off China! Defend the Soviet Union." (Page 105)

Obviously, if Secretary of State Stimson's policy was good red meat for the Communists, one can hardly explain why the Daily Worker, a Kremlin mouthprice should denounce it so vociferously. But Prof. Tansill is not bothered by these apparent contradictions. So far as he is concerned, Stimson was a stubborn, shortsighted and gullible person whose opposition to Japanese policy in Manchuria paved the way for America's involvement in World War II.

Prof. Tansill is impatient with Stimson's "usual armor of righteousness." (Page 103) He is not at all bothered about the Chinese desire to remain independent and to assert their sovereignty over Manchuria. On the contrary, he denounces the Chinese for having dared to oppose their would-be masters. He berates the West for having been "inclined to accept the fictions and pretensions put forward by the Nanking government. The Japanese position in North China was in grave danger of being infiltrated by Reds or successfully attacked by fervent Chinese nationalists whose patriotism had turned into a 'flame of hatred.'" (Page 96) In this connection, the Chinese Nationalist government is put on the carpet by Prof. Tansill for having resisted the 21 demands of the Japanese and he alleges that this was "a fundamental cause of the deep bitterness that finally led to the outbreak of hostilities on September 18, 1931." (Page 94)

Scholarly Defense of Aggression

What were these 21 demands? According to Prof. Tansill, they were designed to give Japanese interests in Manchuria "a firm foundation."

For reasons unknown, Prof. Tansill does not go into detail about the 21 Demands and thus the reader is left in the dark as to their real implications. It is unfortunate that Prof. Tansill did not quote the State Department's White Paper on China which tells us in no uncertain terms the meaning of the 21 Demands: "Early in 1915, Japan secretly presented to China the 21 Demands which, if accepted in full, would have made China a virtual protectorate of Japan. Not only did the Japanese government demand further economic and political rights in Manchuria, Shantung and Inner Mongolia, but it also sought exclusive mining and industrial rights in the Yang Tze Valley and actually demanded supervisory control over Chinese society, and political institutions including not only schools and churches but even the government itself." (P. 7.)

However, Prof. Tansill in his peculiar approach, is more concerned with the provocative behavior of Secy. Stimson in preventing the Japanese from taking over China. There is no element of moral consideration in Prof. Tansill's support of the Japanese imperialist program. His main shafts are aimed at the Chinese themselves and the "fire brands" conducting American foreign policy. According to Prof. Tansill, the Stimson policy was more or less carried on by Secy. Hull and Pres. Roosevelt. How can one explain Pres. Roosevelt's insistence on pursuing the Stimson line? To this question, Prof. Tansill quotes Westbrook Pegler as a source for understanding Roosevelt's behavior "When one reads the colorful columns of Westbrook Pegler's 'Fair Enough' and ponders the repeated assertions that the wealth of the Delano family was partly gained from dubious smuggling operations along the coasts of China, it would seem all too true that Roosevelt's roots went very deep into the dark soil of the Orient. . . . It is possible that he (Roosevelt) had felt some spark of gratitude for the Chinese who had been exploited for his benefit." (Page 118) The Prof. had finally uncovered the truth!

Emperor Haile Selassie's "Guilt"

In discussing the sordid history of Mussolini's conquest of Ethiopia, Prof. Tansill employs the same techniques which he applied in the case of the rape of Manchuria by Japan. The reader is at first treated to a series of apologies which are supposed to explain why Mussolini's Fascists had to take over Ethiopia. On Page 167, Prof. Tansill tells us that Italy was deeply hurt because she had been left "completely out in the cold," when it came to dividing Germany's African colonies after World War I.

The reader is informed that Italy was overcrowded and required Lebensraum "for her surplus population." (Page 169) Besides these grievances, Italy was menaced by "the aggressive attitude shown at times by the tribesmen of Emperor Haile Selassie." (Page 169) Thus, poor Italy the victim of a double-cross and menaced by that tremendous military machine of the Ethiopians, had no other alternative but to defend itself by invading Ethiopia!

It is true beyond doubt, as Prof. Tansill declares, that certain European statesmen were anxious to make a deal in order to appease Mussolini. Among those who were very active along these lines was the convicted traitor to the French people, Pierre Laval. Prof. Tansill makes no reference to Laval's later role as a traitor nor is there any condemnation of his role in the Ethiopian affair. Laval, however, was not alone in wishing to accommodate Mussolini in Ethiopia. Indeed, after some lengthy maneuvering on the part of the British, the Hoare-Laval agreement was made in 1935. This agreement, according to Prof. Tansill, would force Ethiopia to "cede Italy some 60,000 square miles of territory and receive in return a slice of Eritrea with an outlet to the sea. The southern half of Ethiopia—approximately 160,000 square miles—would be reserved as a sphere of influence where it would enjoy certain economic privileges. Along with these advantages there would also go a definite amount of political control which would be equivalent to Italian domination."

Before this plot to rob a people of its independence had been unmasked, a similar plan had been favored by the U. S. Ambassador to Italy, Mr. Long. Mr. Tansill writes "his plan was based upon the belief that Italy would have to be given some 'additions to her territory in Africa' as a bribe to keep her from going to war." Prof. Tansill regarded Ambassador Long's scheme as a "judicious plan of settlement" and regrets that it had fallen "upon the very deaf ears of Secretary Hull. . . ." (Page 193) Likewise, does he praise the Hoare-Laval Pact "which might have saved for Emperor Haile Selassie a considerable portion of his empire." (Page 247) It is difficult to describe a more bitter piece of cynicism than this statement by Prof. Tansill after he had told his readers that the Hoare-Laval agreement would, for all practical purposes, wipe out Ethiopia as a sovereign state. But while condemning what he calls the diplomatic double-talk of the British, Prof. Tansill's main barbs are saved for Pres. Roosevelt and his Secretary of State.

The Neutrality Act of 1935

Prior to the outbreak of the Ethiopian war, Prof. Tansill describes how the isolationists succeeded in exposing the Wall Street "merchants of death" who led us into World War I and that it was through their efforts in Congress that the Neutrality Act of 1935 was passed. "The Neutrality Act," Prof. Tansill states, "had established a new policy of peace insurance which was ardently hoped would keep America safe from the ravages of war."

Essentially, the Neutrality Act enabled the State Department to control the export of war materials from the U. S. and in time of war an embargo could be proclaimed by the President which would put a stop to this trade with belligerent nations. On Page 237, Prof. Tansill's warm enthusiasm for the Act disappears and instead he bemoans the fact that Secy. Hull dared to invoke the Neutrality Act, "in an effort to sabotage any rapid advance of Mussolini's war machine . . ." This action and subsequent statements by Secy. Hull turned out to be "a clarion call to arms whose overtones kept vibrating along State Dept. corridors until they were magnified into a chorus of war by the tragedy of Pearl Harbor." (Page 237)

Apparently Prof. Tansill believes that the Neutrality Act was a sound piece of legislation so long as it wasn't applied against Mussolini's aggressions in Ethiopia. The failure of Western statesmen, including Secy. Hull, to give sympathetic understanding to the march of Mussolini's legions "into a country (Ethiopia) that was hopelessly backward and in dire need of intelligent direction" (Page 263) is considered by Prof. Tansill to have been unrealistic as it was insulting to Fascist Italy and contributed to the creation of close ties between Hitler and Mussolini. Such is the logic employed by this expert on world affairs.

The "Misunderstood" Nazis

After alleging that the Roosevelt administration had dissipated "a large fund of Italian good-will for the United States" Professor Tansill proceeds to discuss the U. S. relations with the newly installed Hitler Government in Germany.

According to the Professor, "the Nazi authorities were anxious to create a more friendly American public opinion. When a group of young American boy scouts visited Munich, they were given such a friendly reception that the leader remarked that Hitler 'was making true Socialism a reality.'" (Page 265) German officials expressed the hope that visiting U. S. Coast Guard Cadets would "disabuse the American mind of the stories of outrages and the persecution of persons not connected with the Nazi movement." It is understandable of course, that the Nazi cut-throats in 1933 were anxious to suppress all the facts concerning their gangsterlike tactics which had been so successful in cutting down all opposition to their drive for power. In this connection, Professor Tansill relates how certain private good-will Ambassadors from the United States tried to create a climate of mutual understanding between the American people and the Hitlerites.

Among these "pioneers in good-will," was Mr. Joseph E. Ridder who was owner of the New York Staats Zeitung. Mr. Ridder visited Nazi Germany in the early days and according to the Professor, he told a German newspaper that he had found the atmosphere in Nazi Germany "one of clear honesty in all things, whether it is in the political, commercial

POST-MORTEM

"Karl Diekow, a Munich architect, whose testimony was instrumental in the conviction and sentencing of the late Philip Auerbach for embezzling funds of the Bavarian State Restitutions Office, was sentenced to one year's imprisonment for perjury in another case."

(From a J. T. A. dispatch)

"Dear General Sir John Harding (former British Commander in Germany):

"I don't know what effect you would have upon the enemy in the terrible event of our country being once again involved in war, but you terrify me.

"Millions of British citizens who fought and suffered in two world wars must have read with shame your words to the Foreign Press Association in Bonn:

"'I think German military thinking will contribute tremendously to Western defence. After all, the Germans were the ones who fought the Russians in their own country in the last war.'

"Did you think, my dear General, about the effect of your words on the people of France, who twice in a generation have been occupied by the men responsible for 'German military thinking'?"

(By Ben Johnson in the Reynolds News)

It is not surprising that Mr. Ridder should have given fulsome praise to conditions in Germany under Nazi rule. Mr. Ridder's brother, Victor, was also an enthusiast of the Nazi regime. This fact was brought out in a libel suit pressed against Victor Ridder. It was firmly established during the trial that he was a propagandist for the policy of Hitler's Reich in the U. S. and that he put the Staats Zeitung in the service of Pan-German and pro-Nazi propaganda.

Pro-Nazi Propaganda Drive

As early as May 6th, 1933, Victor Ridder wrote in the New York Staats Zeitung "I told this gentleman from Danzig that though he may consider himself as an outpost for Germany, he is still part of the main army, only two hours away from the German border; whereas I myself, as a member of the German-American Conference have the right to consider myself a holder of an outpost (vorposten) of the German Nation 3,000 miles away."

After his return from Germany, Victor Ridder published in the Staats Zeitung, articles praising Hitler and other members of the Nazi Hierarchy. In one of his pieces, he eulogized Hitler's Minister of Propaganda, Dr. Goebbels "the principal head of this Ministry," Victor Ridder wrote "is the by now world renowned Joseph Goebbels who, by his extraordinarily wise propaganda, has turned National Socialism from a party into a movement . . . Goebbels is a man of unusually quick powers of perception . . . during our talk, he was extremely courteous and co-operative and as a newspaperman, I find him quite amiable. It could be that we both, newspapermen, had mercy with each other, but I would still be very happy to welcome him here in America." Joseph E. Ridder's other brother Bernard, was just as enthusiastic about the Nazi cause. In presenting himself to Adolf Hitler he said "I am 90% Nazi," according to the Ridder newspaper "Staats Zeitung."

Another messenger of good-will mentioned by Professor Tansill, is George Sylvester Viereck. He was supposed to be an expert on Germany and he offered his services to the White House. Viereck, according to Professor Tansill, was working assiduously to dispel suspicions between Nazi Germany and the United States. After a trip to Germany in November 1933, where he had spoken personally with Hitler and other Nazi leaders, Viereck told Under-Secretary of State William Phillips that "Hitler was the over-compensation of Germany's inferiority complex." This is the way Viereck tried to explain away the growing aggressiveness of the Nazis. From Professor Tansill's account, one could easily get the impression that Viereck's efforts to "improve" German-American relations were not based on ulterior motives but rather on the desire of a disinterested private individual to create an atmosphere of friendliness between the two countries.

In describing Viereck's so-called efforts to help America, why did Professor Tansill hide the fact that Viereck was on Hitler's regular payroll? In the first World War, Viereck was exposed by a Senate Committee as an agent of the Kaiser's government. At the beginning of World War II, he was sent to jail for suppressing important facts concerning his relations with the Nazi authorities in Germany. Prior to his jail sentence, this Nazi agent worked as one of the chief organizers of the pro-fascist and pro-Nazi movement in the United States. On May 18th, 1934, the New York Staats Zeitung, in reporting a Rally of German-Americans in New York, quoted Viereck who addressed the audience in these words: "I was a friend of the Germany of the Kaiser, I was a friend of the German Republic and today I am a friend of Adolf Hitler."

Professor Tansill omits these important facts, and as in the case of Mr. Joseph Ridder, the reader is supposed to believe that he was working on behalf of American interests. Needless to say the failure of these characters to put over their glowing descriptions of Nazi Germany is deplored by Professor Tansill. In his view, it was the fault of certain vociferous elements in the United States who were blocking the path toward full understanding of Nazi Germany. As a result, relations between the United States and Hitler Germany deteriorated.

"Deutschland Ueber Alles"

We now come to Professor Tansill's description of the Munich crisis and subsequent developments. Commenting on the political situation in Europe prior to the Munich sell-out, Professor Tansill states: "In the meantime, on April 21st (1938) Hitler had an important conference with Gen. Keitel in which a plan of operations for an attack upon Czechoslovakia was discussed in detail. Hitler's policy of 'planned aggression' left little to chance. While Britain and France nursed hopes of finding some formula of appeasement that might lead to a new Locarno, Germany was thinking of peace only upon her terms, and those terms meant Nazi dominance in Europe." (Page 392) Here is an un-ambiguous statement pointing to the fact that Hitler's policy was one of war or at best a graveyard peace for the sovereign nations of Europe. Following this accurate estimate of Hitler's policy, Professor Tansill notes that British appeasement "was the salvation of Hitler and his clique who were bent upon a policy that meant inevitable war." Off-hand, this would seem that Professor Tansill was opposed to Chamberlain's appeasement of Hitler, but on page 543 where he discusses Hitler's plan to swallow up Poland, he states that Chamberlain's pledges to support Poland were "difficult to understand." If Chamberlain "had been willing to 'write off Eastern Europe to let Hitler move eastward with the strong possibility that he would come into contact with Stalin' such a policy would have been 'the sanest and most promising course Western diplomacy could have followed.' "

The above quotation is taken from a book by William Henry Chamberlin, another Revisionist, but it is obvious that Professor Tansill has voiced his own approval of appeasing Hitler through the words of Mr. Chamberlin.

Writing about alleged peace overtures by Hitler to the President in October 1939, when Czechoslovakia had already been swallowed up and Poland bombed by Hitler's Luftwaffe, Prof. Tansill states "if the President had real courage and vision, he would have welcomed these German overtures and staged a peace conference that would have saved both Poland and Czechoslovakia. But he and Secretary Hull were fearful that a move toward peace might benefit Hitler and discourage the Allies, so they rejected the German peace feelers and thus prepared the way for eventual Red domination over both these countries. In the long chapter of historical might-have-been's, Roosevelt plays a prominent and dismal part." (Page 607) Is the reader then to believe that Hitler sought peace and the establishment of a truly independent Poland and Czechoslovakia? Prof. Tansill knows better than that, for on Page 519 he states that Pres. Roosevelt "was well aware of the fact that none of the European nations that had profited by the Treaty of Versailles were willing to give up one crumb of the spoils of war. The injustices of that treaty could be rectified only through war."

Thus, after having informed his readers about Hitler's real plans and having denounced the British in the first place for appeasement, Prof. Tansill turns his wrath against Roosevelt as a war provocateur for refusing to appease in Oct. 1939, admitting that even appeasement could not satisfy the appetite of the dictators who were resolved to make war against the "injustices" of the Versailles treaty. Rather involved—is it not?

be the main culprit, Prof. Tansill does not spare Poland or Great Britain. For example, in the Polish case, Prof. Tansill states that the Polish foreign minister Joseph Beck "was not greatly attracted by the political possibilities that lay along the path of German-Polish cooperation." Beck nursed the "hope of continued Polish independence" and "rejected a ride in the German war machine along a path that promised Poland power and plunder as a satellite state." Instead, Poland "chose the road that led to war with Germany . . ." (Page 510)

In Prof. Tansill's opinion, "Polish diplomacy in 1938-1939 was a design for disaster." Thus, the Poles are adjudged guilty of following a policy that allegedly led to war rather than joining up with the arch bandits of Europe. Indeed, Prof. Tansill states that it was the British-Polish understanding in the spring of 1939 that "led Hitler to turn to Stalin." Here again the Poles are put to task and Hitler's pact with Stalin is whitewashed on the ground that the Fuehrer had no other alternative, in view of Poland's refusal to accept his magnanimous offer.

Again, on Page 513, the Prof. berates Foreign Minister Beck for "turning his back upon Hitler . . ." On Page 514 he returns to this theme "Beck had now pushed Poland far down the road to war and national destruction. Such a policy pointed to disaster." How can one reconcile this judgment with Prof. Tansill's view that the British Prime Minister Chamberlain should have written off Eastern Europe, including Poland as geographically indefensible and permit Hitler to move eastward?

Did Hitler really want to save Poland as Prof. Tansill implies? The authoritative answer to this question appeared in the records of the International Trial at Nuremberg. Hitler is quoted in a secret talk: "there is no question of sparing Poland and we are left with no alternative but to attack Poland at the first suitable opportunity. We cannot expect a repetition of the Czechoslovakian affair. There will be fighting. The task is to isolate Poland." (Proceedings, Trial of the Major War Criminals, Vol. 10, Page 358) This statement by Hitler takes on all the more significance in view of the fact that it was made months before the Nazis attacked Poland during which time they were still pretending to be ready to negotiate. Yet, Prof. Tansill, who makes no mention of this fact, denounces the Poles, the British and Pres. Roosevelt because they were wary of Hitler's trap.

F. D. R., the "Warmonger"

Of course, Roosevelt turns out to be the arch war-monger in this whole situation. Writing about the President's criticisms of the dictators, the Prof. states that the President "provided additional tinder that awaited the sparks of war." (Page 521)

On Page 599 after Prof. Tansill discusses the agreement whereby Britain received a number of destroyers in return for U. S. leased bases in the B. W. I., he quotes with apparent approval a St. Louis Post-Dispatch headline "Dictator Roosevelt commits an act of war." (Page 599) There are many more statements dealing with Roosevelt's alleged war provocations. However, to the charge that Germany sought war with the U. S. Prof. Tansill tells the reader that Von Ribbentrop, the Nazi foreign minister, had insisted "upon the pacific disposition of the Fuehrer concerning the U. S." The Prof. adds that Baron von Weiszacker, a leading member in the Nazi foreign office, confirmed this alleged fact, namely that the Nazis did not desire war with the U. S. Has Prof. Tansill told the whole story? Let us see.

Exploding Tansill's Bubbles—Germany

In the opening address by Supreme Court Justice Jackson at the Nuremberg Trial, mention is made of a captured memorandum from Hitler's headquarters dated Oct. 29, 1940 in which certain information is requested regarding air bases and supply. The memorandum reports further that "the Fuehrer is at present occupied with the question of the occupation of the Atlantic Islands with a view to the prosecution of war against America at a later date. Deliberations on this subject are being embarked upon here." (Vol. 1, Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression—Page 153)

Additional information on Germany's military plans with regard to the U. S. were quoted at the Trial Proceedings at Nuremberg. The Nazi Foreign Minister, von Ribbentrop, told the Japanese Ambassador one week before Pearl Harbor, "it is essential that Japan effect the New Order in East Asia without losing this opportunity. There never has been, and probably never will be, a time when closer co-operation under the Tripartite Pact is so important. If Japan hesitates at this time and Germany goes ahead and establishes her European New Order, all the military might of Britain and the United States will be concentrated against Japan. As the Fuhrer Hitler said today, there are fundamental differences in the very right to exist between Germany and Japan, and the United States. We have received advice to the effect that there is practically no hope of the Japanese-United States negotiations being concluded successfully, because of the fact that the United States is putting up a stiff front.

"If this is indeed the fact of the case, and if Japan reaches a decision to fight Britain and the United States, I am confident that that will not only be to the interest of Germany and Japan jointly, but would bring about favorable results for Japan herself." (Document D-656)

As for Baron von Weizacker, the convicted war criminal, the Prof. did not refer his readers to the following passage in the Nazi diplomat's memoirs which were recently published: "it is true that attempts have been made to bring Japan into the war; but it was against England and also against Russia that Hitler wanted her to go to war and not against the U. S. For opportunist reasons, Hitler wanted to avoid a conflict with the U. S. A." (Page 260) Thus it is clear even from von Weizacker's own admission that only opportunist considerations were impelling Hitler to avoid war with the U. S. for the time being. In other words, the Nazi plan was to knock out Britain and Russia before concentrating the might of the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis on the U. S. These facts simply do not square with Prof. Tansill's attempt to clothe the Nazis with the white robes of innocence.

Tansill's Japanese "Bubble"

As with Germany, so does Prof. Tansill attempt to prove that the Japanese also sought "peace not war with the U. S." (Page 630) But on Page 641, Prof. Tansill admits that at a Japanese Imperial Conference held on Sept. 6, 1940, it was decided that Japan's preparation for war would have to be continued so "that they be completed approximately toward the end of October."

The Japanese Foreign Minister Matsuoka told the Fuehrer on April 4, 1941 that in case Japan "should decide to attack Singapore, the Japanese Navy of course had to be prepared for a fight with the U. S. because in that case America would side with Great Britain." (Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Vol. 4, Page 523) He further stated that Hitler "might give the necessary instructions in order that the proper German authorities would place at the disposal of the Japanese the latest improvements and inventions which are of interest to them because the Japanese Navy had to prepare immediately for a conflict with the U. S."

The allegations that Japan was only interested in destroying England and not the U. S. is controverted by the statements of the Japanese Foreign Minister. Matsuoka told the Fuehrer as early as May 27, 1941 that the Japanese were determined to capture Singapore and South East Asia thereafter. "It was only a question of the time when Japan would attack. According to his idea, the attack should come as soon as possible." (Nazi-Soviet Relations 1939-41 — Department of State, Page 295) In view of the fact that Matsuoka realized that such an attack against British interests would bring the U. S. to the side of Great Britain, then it is clear that the Japanese knew what they were doing; that it was not only a question of destroying the British Empire but it was also necessary to destroy the U. S., or at least render it harmless.

The Japanese plan was described in the indictment of the Allied prosecution at the trial of the leading Japanese war criminals in Tokyo. "In March, 1941, conversations between the Japanese ambassador in Washington and the United States Secretary of State took place in an endeavor by the United States to settle outstanding differences and to reach a peaceful settlement. While these were proceeding Japan continued at a feverish pace to prepare for war. At an Imperial Conference on July 2nd, the decision to advance southward, obviously directed against America, the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the British Commonwealth, was reached. At a further Conference on 6th September, it was decided to open hostilities against the United States of America, Great Britain and the Netherlands in case the requirements of Japan seemed unlikely to be realized by some time during the first part of October. On 1st December, a further Conference definitely decided on war. The decisions of the two last-mentioned Conferences were kept secret."

Prof. Tansill disregards this authoritative evidence and accuses Secy. Hull and the President of seeking war. Roosevelt is charged with having attempted to provoke the Germans and failed—now the President hoped that "perhaps some Japanese statesman would prove more accommodating." (Page 615) Thus, the concluding chapter of Prof. Tansill's book is entitled "Japan is maneuvered into war." Roosevelt is denounced because he refused to support Japanese aggressive aspirations. But what were the aims of Japan? The Japanese desired to conquer all of South East Asia as they had raped Manchuria, and they brazenly requested the support of the U. S. for this infamous design. The refusal of the U. S. to become an accomplice in this criminal conspiracy is considered by Prof. Tansill as Roosevelt's method by which he was able to maneuver the Japanese to bomb Pearl Harbor!

The Japanese plans for aggression were carefully nurtured for many years. Just as Hitler's Mein Kampf in the 1920's served as a blue print for subsequent actions by the German Military, so did the Japanese possess a "Mein Kampf." We refer to the secret plan for world conquest outlined for the Japanese Mikado in 1927 by one of the most prominent members of the Japanese general staff, Admiral Tanaka, The Tanaka Memorial, as it is commonly called, dealt with the ways and means by which Japan could achieve world supremacy and in this connection it said, "In order to conquer the entire world, the conquest of China is a prerequisite. In the future, if we want to control China we must first defeat the United States of America as we have smashed Russia in the past. As we have not enough resources at our disposal, we should be vanquished in moving too soon, especially if Britain and the United States united in order to counter our action.

"In order to preserve our race and give warning to China and the rest of the world we have to fight America now or later.

"In order to conquer China, we must first conquer Manchuria and Mongolia. If we conquer China, the other countries of Asia and those of the South Sea Islands will be intimidated and then will surrender to us. Being in possession of China's resources we can proceed to the conquest of the South Sea Islands, India, Asia Minor, Central Asia and even Europe."

Conclusion

The quality of Prof. Tansill's scholarship can be judged by the fact that in explaining Roosevelt's policy toward China, he used as a source none other than Westbrook Pegler while completely failing to inform his readers about the Tanaka memorial. Even if we should accept, for the sake of argument, the Revisionists' view that the U. S. could have stayed out of World War II, this would have unquestionably meant a total victory on the part of Germany in Europe and Japan in Asia.

Would such an Axis triumph have affected our own national security and interests? It seems that the Revisionists believe that we could have allowed Germany and Japan to conquer Asia and Europe and then made a realistic deal with them whereby the world could have been split up among the three surviving powers. Aside from the immorality of such a scheme, the documents quoted above prove that if the U. S. had remained "neutral" it would have eventually been isolated and finally subjugated by the overwhelming might of the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis. Admittedly the specific policies of Pres. Roosevelt were not always effective, but his greatness lies in the fact that he was able to perceive in time that the U. S. would be heading toward disaster if it condoned aggression and permitted the Axis powers to destroy our most reliable Allies and condemn to enslavement hundreds of millions of human beings.

Is it coincidental that Revisionism which is a fancy name employed by those who tried to cover up their apologetics for the Nazi-Fascist Axis should be coming to the fore again? It so happens that the Revisionists are endeavoring to put across their thesis at a time when the Western Allies have forgotten the lessons of World War I and are resuscitating the menace of a strong and powerful Germany.

The Revisionists, far from being outcasts as they pretend to be, are in the "swim of things" by helping to justify and underwrite this "new" approach to the treatment of Germany and Japan. Worse, they are re-writing history in such a way as to give justification for the present German and Japanese campaigns to place the onus of war guilt on the Allied powers.

It is also interesting to note that the Revisionists in an effort to prove their genuine scholarship, have invoked the name of a great historian, of American history, Charles A. Beard. Prof. Beard's competence in the field of American history is undeniable, but we are aware of the fact that he became a bitter opponent of Roosevelt's handling of foreign policy. Nevertheless, as late as the autumn of 1940, Prof. Beard wrote the following as part of his introduction to Ambassador Dodd's diary:

"It is in such a perspective that Mr. Dodd's record and wisdom are vindicated. He saw more clearly than most of his colleagues, American and foreign, in the diplomatic corps, the hard drift of things toward the tragedy of the coming years. He repeatedly predicted, despite the epithets, 'alarmists' and 'sensationalists' applied to him by unfriendly critics, the ruthless course which Germany, Italy and Japan was destined to take if unchecked by the concerted action of their neighbors. He divined the frightful crash bound to come from the policy of appeasement, intrigue and vacillation, and he fought relentlessly, as far as he was able, to stop it."

Among Ambassador Dodd's critics was none other than Prof. Tansill who attacked the Ambassador for his "continued unsympathetic attitude toward the German government." (The Deutsche Weckruf, March 25, 1937)

A Report on Germany

by

HOWARD K. SMITH

Coming back to Germany on my first visit here in three years, it is easy to see some of the causes for alarm. Germany, the worst destroyed country in the war, is recovering with startling speed. A conscientious citizen finds himself in a dilemma whether to admire the phenomenon, or to be frightened at it.

The big ugly wastes of urban ruins are giving way to expanding areas of bright new houses and buildings. The skies of the Ruhr, clear and blue over idle and broken mills just a few years ago, are dingy with smoke again. The railways crawl with long freight trains carrying rows of new automobiles, and machinery for export. Bright new shops are filled with good things to buy, markets are full of red meat such as the English have not seen since the war.

The other day, on the occasion of a Catholic festival, an altar was set up in the market square outside my hotel window, and people passed by eight abreast in an endless procession to receive blessing. In three hours, what must have been very nearly the whole population of Bonn thus passed in review beneath my window—and I have not seen anywhere in Europe average people so well dressed and so apparently well fed and sturdy . . . people who a short while ago were on the edge of destitution.

Contrasts

Coming, as I have, from Britain, I inevitably compare this country with that one. The two nations—Britain and West Germany—have nearly the same areas, the same population of around 50 millions each, and the same problems: Both are highly over-populated, highly industrialized nations depending heavily on selling in foreign markets and importing foreign raw materials.

It is sad to report that Britain, the victor, suffers in many respects by comparison with Germany, the defeated. While England's dollar gap—the excess of what she imports from abroad over what she earns funds to pay with—continues large . . . Germany has virtually closed her trade gap. In reserves of foreign currency and gold, Germany has a quarter the amount of reserves that Britain keeps for herself, and all the sterling nations—Australia, India, Scandinavia and so on, together. While Britain's position in foreign markets is shaky, Germany has been establishing herself firmly, especially in former British markets in South America.

In both countries, housing is the outstanding domestic problem. While Britain is striving, so far unsuccessfully, to achieve a building target of 300,000 new houses per year . . . Germany has attained and passed a target of 400,000 new houses built per year.

There are many reasons for these contrasts. For one thing, Britain has to maintain a big navy, an expenditure which Germany, having twice luckily failed to build an empire, does not have. Also, occupation causes a vast colony of American soldiers and officials and their families to spend millions of dollars a year in Germany; Britain has no such rich source of dollar income.

But, in addition to reasons like those, the fact cannot be denied that Germany is showing greater vigor than Britain. German workers are working harder and more conscientiously; German businessmen are going after foreign markets more aggressively.

Dominating Europe Again

It takes little imagination to project present trends into the future, and to predict that the contrasts between Germany and the other West European nations, of whom Britain is the strongest, are likely to become more pronounced.

With the stimulus of rearmament, West Germany plans to expand steel production to its old capacity of nearly 19 million tons a year—higher than that of Britain, and third in the world after those of America and Russia. Other branches of industry are expected to expand commensurately.

Moreover, rearmament will be stimulus and not strain as it has been in Britain. Britain's economy and manpower were fully employed before rearmament; therefore rearmament meant curtailment of civil production and a fall in the standard of living. Germany, however, still has great unused plant and over a million workers unemployed to take care of rearmament. Germany thus is likely to be the only country in Europe which will raise its standards and strengthen its economy by rearming.

In the realm of military power too, the advantage is Germany's. Two years after rearmament begins, Germany expects to have 500,000 troops in arms and ready to fight. Each year then there will be a turnover of 300,000 trained men leaving and as many new conscripts entering the forces. In five years Germany will have an army plus a trained reserve of around two million soldiers. . . .

The decisive difference, however, is that while France and Britain's armed might will be scattered over the globe maintaining commitments in Hong Kong, Malaya, Indo China, Egypt, Tunisia and so on . . . Germany's might will be centered in Europe, where the command is situated and where the decisions are made.

In view of these facts—Germany's coming superiority of economic power, her superior concentration of military power . . . —I am persuaded that Germany's word will come to have the greatest weight in the councils of Western Europe. At the least, the other nations will not be able to take decisions Germany is opposed to. At the most, Germany may be able to force her decisions on them. In other words, Germany is likely to become the dominant West European power.

Germany's Bargaining Power

It can be argued, of course, that America is in Europe to right the balance of decision in favor of the older allies. For five or ten years to come, while Germany depends on America for building her strength, that is so; Germany will be subject to American pressure. But, after Germany's strength is built up, a new factor—Germany's inevitably superior bargaining position—will come into play.

The simple truth is that America does not have to make concessions to France or Britain to keep them in the alliance. As a weak country, France is unalterably tied to America for help. As an island, Britain needs American sea-power. With far-flung empires, both those nations need American naval support.

Germany, a central European land power, however, has no such natural ties to America. She faces, in fact, strong natural temptations to bargain with Russia, to bargain for Germany's old traditional East European markets, for the unification of Germany, which only Russia can grant, and for German territories Russia seized beyond the Oder-Neisse.

With the always tacit threat thus that Germany might do business with Russia, America is unlikely to be in a position to force decisions on Germany; quite the contrary, she may have to make concessions to Germany, increasing Germany's weight in the western councils.

That Germany will be, in five or ten years' time, the first power in Western Europe, seems to me inevitable. All therefore depends on what kind of Germany evolves in that time to wield that tremendous power . . .

The Fate of Europe

. . . There remains the old, oft-stated fault of German history: Germany has never had a clean dramatic break with feudalism. There has been no shock to change psychology like the French Revolution or Cromwell's Civil War in England. The powerful men of Germany are still accustomed to command; the common people are still too docile in accepting command. Authority still flows down from rulers to people, not up from people to rulers.

Germany's new political system of democracy, on the principle of authority flowing up from people to rulers, is still a young and tender growth. The real residuaries of power in Germany—though that power is being used with some restraint at present—remain in the mighty Ruhr industries in the hands of all too few powerful men who operate on the feudal principle of authority flowing from the top down.

The fear of German democrats—even those who support rearmament as a necessary evil—is that it comes ten years too soon. In a still weak new society, a big army will give generals too strong a voice; and generals, like Germany's industrialists, inevitably believe in authority from the top down. The fear is that with Allied supervision now relaxed, industrialists will throw off restraint and, with the generals, sway the young growth of German democracy, or in the extreme case even break it . . .

If, however, things go on as now; if Germany is invited as a sovereign unit into a group of individual and competing national units, Germany will have to play according to the rules of competition, and she will out-compete the others.

She will attain top position so easily, I am convinced, that the temptations to dominate, to jockey between east and west, to set herself up as a power on her own, will be too great to resist. In that case support will go to the nationalists and to the principle of feudalism.

The fate of Europe thus lies still with the western democracies. If, however, in the next five years they take no more action than they have in the past . . . Europe's fate will then rest solely with Germany.

"The Germans still seem to me to be a strong and brilliant people who are obsessed with a pathological father complex—and, at the moment, they are orphans; they are desperately looking for a father. I doubt that they will find one with us, among the Western democracies. They may find one within themselves—or they may find one eastward, beyond the Iron Curtain.

"The eventual capitol of the Communist Empire may be Berlin, not Moscow."

(By Robert Sherwood in the New York Post)

CARTELS AT WORK

"Official sources have disclosed today that West Germany, which potentially is the greatest source of defense production on the Continent, was not fulfilling its promise in this respect . . .

"The Germans, already notorious for a predilection for cartels, appear still are addicted to collusive bidding practices . . .

"For example, nineteen German concerns submitted identical bids on a $17,000,000 contract for the production of torpedo nets. In another case, an attempt to place a contract for $40,000,000 worth of radio parts was met with identical bids by several concerns . . ."

(Jack Raymond in the New York Times)

"Underlying the Laborites' desire for postponement of German rearmament — a desire which is shared by political groups of varied views in France — is a persistent fear of what the Germans may do once they are armed. The Laborites wonder how far the United States will go in re-equipping German industry and restoring to positions of influence those elements which helped Hitler's rise to power."

"Prince Charming"

Never have the Germans been found wanting in the skilled techniques of propaganda warfare. They demonstrated their adeptness after World War I when they were able to overcome in a short time, the animosity of millions of people both here and abroad who had learned the truth about the German militarists and their supporters. One of their "legmen" who was particularly successful in "softening up" the American people was the fabulous Count von Luckner, U-Boat captain of the German Navy. In his book "Sea Devils Conquer America," the Count bragged how he had succeeded in squeezing "tears from the ladies' eyes and dollars from the capitalists pockets." His act evoked a wave of sympathy wherever he lectured in the United States," They (the American ladies) came with tears in their eyes and gave me their hands, and said: 'You have restored the best in us, the love for your fatherland.' "

The Luckner racket was successful beyond all expectations and in due time, Germany re-emerged in the eyes of many Americans, as the land of beer and friendly faces.

Luckner is now an old man and the romanticism surrounding his exploits has faded, but the Germans are a resourceful people. This time they have pulled out of the hat, so to speak, a genuine blue blood, no less than Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, the grandson of the Kaiser. Prince Louis is young, handsome and alert. He has a sense of humor and loves Americans. Regardless of his future in the United States, we can be sure that the Prince will leave no stone unturned to fulfil his mission of "goodwill." As an entree to his visit in this country, the Prince presented, for American consumption, his book "The Rebel Prince." Remarkable in this unremarkable book, admittedly ghosted and blue pencilled by the well known journalist, Louis Lochner, are only its title, origin, history and the fact that it was printed in the U. S.

During the early years of the Allied occupation, the Prince was generally persona non-grata with American authorities. However, he managed to remain on the most friendly terms with Merle Potter, the controversial U. S. Military Governor of his postwar residence in Bad-Kissingen in Bavaria. In this connection, the Prince became involved in one of the first postwar occupation scandals, when in 1946 Potter on his own authority, founded the Cosmopolitan Club in Bad Kissingen, with the Prince as its most prominent member. The Club was dissolved on the order of Gen. Clay when it was found that a substantial number of the Club's members were prominent Nazis, some of whom were jailed later for perjury. When Potter's friend, Senator Ball came to his rescue, Potter was promoted to Gen. Clay's staff after he had been removed by the General.

Prince Louis lost the luxurious residence belonging to the Nazi Kreisleiter of Kissingen which Potter had procured for him and which was attached to Potter's own residence. Thus the Prince and his family was obliged to take up residence in two attic rooms for a short while and these were "the unhappiest days in the life of my family." Those who are familiar with the discomforts of Auschwitz, Dachau and Buchenwald can only say "Lucky family."

In describing the Cosmopolitan Club, the Prince is careful to omit the fact that it was dissolved because it was Nazi infiltrated. As for Merle Potter, the Prince portrays him as a knight in shining armor fighting for German-American friendship against overwhelming odds.

Likewise, the Prince or Mr. Lochner's blue pencil omit some interesting data concerning his relationship to Herman Goering and his work for the Lufthansa, the Civilian Air Organization which actually did the spade work for the Nazi airforce in violation of the Versailles Treaty.

There are however, abundant photos of the Prince in the uniform of a Nazi Airforce Lieutenant, although he professed to be a fanatical opponent of militarism.

The title "Rebel Prince" is a tantalizing one, and presumably derives from the fact that the grandson of the Kaiser pretends that he was a hero of the "Resistance Movement" against Hitler. An entire chapter is devoted to his alleged role, but unfortunately, he is not at all convincing. The Prince had some conversations with some of the members of the Resistance and was advised to remain in the background. He followed this recommendation and according to the book, he never discussed the matter with his father, the Crown Prince. He was in close contact, however, with Goerdeler and Gen. Beck, the leaders of the movement against Hitler. The significance of the tie-up between these leaders and the Prince was revealed by Dr. A. W. John in the special memorial edition "July 21st" of the Bonn Weekly "Das Parlament."

John writes that Beck and Goerdeler wanted to restore the German Monarchy. Even the leader of the Socialist Resistance Movement, Wilhelm Leuschner, according to John, had accepted this ultimate aim in the conspiracy against Hitler. John also states that in 1942, it was the hope of the German Resistance Movement that contact could be made with President Roosevelt with the help of Prince Louis who was considered to be "a close friend of the President."

The book's only contribution to History is the Prince's frank admission that Hitler had promised to his father, the Crown Prince, that the Monarchy would be restored, but then proceeded to double-cross him. It was upon the basis of this pledge that the Crown Prince and his sons cast their lot with the Nazis and paraded in Nazi uniforms with prominent swastika brassards before Hitler in 1933. The Prince's uncle, August Wilhelm, was a prominent Nazi and storm trooper.

All this should make it abundantly clear that the House of Hohenzollern had one foot in the Nazi Movement and the other in the Resistance to it. Today, Prince Louis continues to play a double role—one of friendship to the United States and the other unswerving support to the German Nationalists who will, when the favorable opportunity arises, turn against the West.

In cultivating the friendship of the German Nationalists, the Prince created a rallying point for them at his ancestral castle "Hohenzollern" in Swabia. In the medieval atmosphere of this Castle, he established a shrine for the coffins of Frederick the Great and his father—outstanding symbols of Prussia's Militarists and Nationalists. Thanks to American generosity these coffins had been saved from Russian capture in 1945. When the coffins were found in a Thuringia salt mine by our troops, they were covered by a giant laurel wreath with a swastika adorned dedication "from Adolf Hitler."

The Fuehrer was not a very bright student of World History but he understood the basic forces in German History.

While in New York, the Prince and his wife enjoyed the luxury of the Waldorf-Astoria. There is no poverty or hardship in these accomplishments in spite of the fact that most of the Hohenzollern estates which are located in East Germany were confiscated by the Russians. What is the secret of his success?

The Mills of Mars

(Munition makers don't lose wars. The German family Krupp may win another war.)

by
FRANK EDWARDS

The sullen red glow in the sky over Essen, Germany, is an ominous sign: Krupp is at it again!

It is the same red glow that preceded World Wars I and II. There is reason to fear that it is the same glow from the same great furnaces that marks the opening phases of World War III. For a hundred and forty-two years the Krupp family has used its industrial empire to spread military havoc across the earth. Kings have fallen; Kaisers have fled; dictators have died in the gutter, but Krupp goes marching on.

How do they do it?

An excellent question. Perhaps we can find the answer by examining the record of past performance, although some of it will undoubtedly be obscured in the devious operations of recent years.

It makes little difference in the final analysis whether we regard the Krupp family as patriots or conscienceless profiteers. Military records indicate that some thirty million human beings have died under the guns and tanks and other war machines turned out by Krupp. Staggering but not surprising, for Krupp was the principal arsenal for Germany in the first World War as it was for Hitler in the second global conflict.

During that first great bloodbath the sprawling factories and smelters at Essen, Germany, were safe behind the lines. Short-range planes had little chance to effect bombing raids, if indeed they were able to inflict any raids, that far from their bases. Starting in 1912 the tempo of Krupp at Essen was a steadily increasing roar of heavy machinery. The Kaiser's knockout blow must be swift and invincible. The iron sinews for that blow were forged at Essen. When the Great Plan came crashing down around Wilhelm's ears he took refuge in flight; but for Krupp the only refuge was cunning. Defeat was a new experience to be met and matched with deceit.

The Treaty of Versailles supposedly reduced Germany's military power, including her ability to rearm. Actually it did no such thing. The greatest military plant in the world was Krupp—and it evaded the demilitarization causes of the Treaty in spite of efforts to enforce them.

Gustav Krupp wrote in 1941: "Without arousing any commotion the necessary measures and preparations were undertaken. Thus, to the surprise of many people, we began to manufacture products which really appeared to be far distant from the previous work of an armaments plant. Even the Allied snooping commissions were duped. Padlocks, milk cans, cash registers, track repair machines, trash carts and similar 'junk' appeared really unsuspicious and even locomotives and automobiles made an entirely 'civilian's impression."

The stage was set for quick and easy conversion to war production. Workmen were being trained. Machinery was in place. The admission will be found in the annual report of the Krupp Direktorium for 1937-1938 which states:

"In spite of numerous doubts and contrary to the advice of outside experts, it (Krupp) decided, as trustee of a historical inheritance, to safeguard the valuable experiences irreplaceable for the armed strength of our nation and through constant close ties with the works members to keep the shops and personnel in readiness if the occasion should arise for armament orders later on.

"When in 1933 we were again called upon to manufacture war materials in large quantities, we were immediately ready to do so . . . Our plants, after a short preliminary state, were soon working at capacity."

The cash registers which Krupp had made by the tens of thouasnds were beginning to jingle again to the tune of war profits. Hitler was in the saddle. War was in the air. It would take time, of course, and money. The mills of Mars ground faster and faster. The bloodthirsty paperhanger became noisier and more defiant as his war machine deevloped. The great day for which Krupp had schemed was taking shape in the sullen glow of the skies over Essen.

The same Krupp family which had served the Kaiser and his father before him found no difficulty in transferring their allegiance to the allegedly Democratic politicians of the illfated Weimar Republic. When that experiment was swept from the decks, Krupp moved in to the camp of Hitler, to become one of Der Fuehrer's chummiest and most valuable compatriots. The master munitions makers were not only durable, they were also pliable.

The trickle of war materials which began in 1933 poured from Essen in a flood by the mid-thirties. At a special ceremony in 1940, Hitler presented to Alfred Krupp, the son of Gustav, an award honoring the munitions works as a national socialist model enterprise. Krupp proudly assured Hitler that the award was recognition "of a social attitude which was rooted in a tradition one hundred and twenty years old."

If that tradition included profiting from mass murder, Krupp was telling the truth.

Whatever their personal feelings about Nazism, the Krupp family managed to submerge those feelings in order to reap the greatest possible benefit from it. During World War II they were among the foremost plunderers of German-occupied Europe. They looted tens of millions of dollars worth of property from other countries. They were notorious exploiters of slave labor.

Records show that Krupp enslaved more than 100,000 foreign workers, including 25,000 prisoners of war. These unfortunates lived and worked under conditions which were incredibly inhuman; a few miles away the lordly Krupp family lived luxuriously in its ancestral estates—another part of their tradition, no doubt.

Hitler and his gang were mindful of the very important part which the Krupp family had played in launching Nazism on the world. Gustav Krupp had induced other financiers to put up the money for Hitler's "election" in 1933. Gustav Krupp personally pledged one million marks to the Nazis at that time. While the rest of the world was in the depths of a depression, the warmakers of Essen were setting in motion their plot against humanity.

In order to show his appreciation, Hitler enacted a special law in November of 1943. Known as "Lex Krupp," this unusual instrument actually made the Krupp firm a state within a state. It could regulate itself by its own internal laws. Alfred Krupp, Nazi leader, took over all the properties as his own and became the "first Noble of Industry" in Nazi Germany.

It is worth noting that Alfred Krupp did not appear to be very noble when he was hailed before the Allied War Crimes in Nuerenberg after the war. He was convicted of the use of slave labor in violation of the Geneva and Hague conventions. He was convicted of plundering and despoiling countries invaded by the Nazi aggressors. For these crimes the Military Tirbunal sentenced Alfred Krupp to twelve years in jail. All of his property, real and personal, was ordered confiscated. This decree sought to destroy Krupp's enormous economic and political power on behalf of German militarism.

Months dragged by after his conviction and sentencing, but General Lucius Clay, the Military Governor for the U. S. zone of Germany, failed to carry out the confiscation order. Clay finally offered the excuse that since the Krupp properties were in British-occupied territory, the British would have to decide what to do about it.

General Clay's strange reluctance to carry out the court order attracted the attention of Senator James Murray. Along with several other members of the Senate, he submitted a brief demanding that Clay carry out, without qualification or reservation, the confiscation decree of the military tribunal. Said the Senator's brief:

"These properties were the instrumentalities of crime. Is there anything contrary to the spirit of Anglo-Saxon or American law in confiscating them? Do we not seize the assassin's gun . . . the bandits' automobile?"

Senator Murray reminded General Clay that the charges on which Alfred Krupp had been convicted would have warranted hanging or at least life imprisonment . . . "Instead the tribunal decreed twelve years imprisonment plus confiscation. Take away the confiscation and you have left only the twelve year sentence, without hard labor. Wait a year and there will be a general amnesty and Alfred Krupp will go back to his properties to commit further crimes."

Senator Murray qualifies as a prophet.

In January 1951 Allied High Commissioner John McCloy freed Alfred Krupp. McCloy had previously stopped the flow of equipment from the Krupp plants, equipment which had been promised to the little nations looted and destroyed by the Nazis—including Krupp.

McCloy defended his actions by asserting that confiscation is not a usual practice "under American Law." Krupp was convicted under International Law, where confiscation is legally recognized under Law number ten.

When Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt took issue with McCloy over his actions in this case, the Allied High Commissioner asserted in reply that he doubted that Alfred Krupp was really in charge of the company, or responsible for using slave labor.

The report of the War Crimes Trials to the Secretary of the Army states clearly that Alfred Krupp was in active charge of the concern and became sole owner through "Lex Krupp" in 1943.

Chief U. S. Prosecutor at the Nuerenberg trials, General Telford Taylor, declared in a statement on February 4, 1951, that Alfred Krupp took part willingly in the slave labor deals; and General Taylor named examples.

McCloy, like General Clay before him, preferred his own decisions to those of the War Crimes Court. Today Alfred Krupp is a free man, after serving only a small fraction of his time. The vast Krupp enterprises at Essen employ 60,000 people and are a billion dollar enterprise. If Alfred Krupp gets this property returned to him, as diplomatic rumor says he will, he will find himself a multimillionaire; another top Nazi who benefited by strange decisions from high Allied officials.

The Krupp plants are turning out steel in great quantity. They are turning out milk cans, automobile parts, and locomotives. They are turning out much the same sort of "junk" they produced to dupe the Allied inspectors after World War One.

The glow from the great furnaces paints the sky an angry red. A few miles away Alfred Krupp lives in luxury. He has everything but his war plants. He isn't worried about getting them back in time for the next war.

It's part of the Krupp family tradition.

GERMAN ROYALTY turned to stormtrooping. In the center is Prince Wilhelm, son of the Kaiser, who was a buck private in Hitler's private army; left, Prince Hubertus, company leader, and right, Prince Friedrich, first squad leader.

"I learned from continental sources that the German Federal Government has asked Britain, the United States and France for the return of German Archives captured in the last war. . . .

"A large part of the captured records are in fact, a blueprint for U-Boat operations. . . .

"These documents are a legitimate prize of war. They show the methods used in both World Wars to bring the British people twice within starvation. If they get into the hands of a Power planning in terms of World War III, the consequence for Britain and her Allies might be grim indeed. . . .

"One question of the greatest importance arises; suppose these documents are returned, what guarantee can be given that they, or copies of them would not be in the hands of an unfriendly power within weeks? . . .

"Today West Germany is in many senses, to be regarded as an Ally but it would be difficult to prevent much of the information finding its way into the possession of Russia. The Archives cover every aspect of Germany's capacity to wage war."

(Nowall Hall in the London Daily Telegraph)

"ALL THE NAZIS ARE STILL HERE..."

All the Nazis are still here,
After hibernating.
They scheme, conspire, agitate,
They whisper, intrigue, demonstrate,
They resurrect the Fatherland
With noisy trumpets and with song.

All the Nazis are still here,
All the Nazis, all of them.
Stormtroop-leaders strut again,
Jew baiters sing their old refrain,
This is the shining Master Race
And each rascal is an ace.

Father, son and grandpapa—
Back they are, Hopplala!
Heil! Heil! Heil!

German Realities

Our Analysis of the German Problem in Relation to Western Europe and Russia As submitted to the U. S. Senaté

IN the tense struggle against the aggressive designs of Soviet Russia, the United States, as the leader of the free world, has endeavored to create a system of alliances which will strengthen world security and democracy.

Much of American policy in Europe has rested on the assumption that Germany will become an ally in an anti-Russian coalition, as part of the defense force of the free world.

With regard to the establishment of such a coalation in Europe, Secretary of State Dulles has stated that "Germany's economic and military potential . . . is indispensable to an effective continental defense . . ." (Feb. 9, 1953). However great Germany's economic and military potential may be, it does not follow that Germany's real interests are commensurate with ours or those of our Western allies. A country no matter how strong cannot be a trustworthy and effective ally if its interests are basically opposed to the other members of the proposed alliance. The effective and enduring strength of any coalition must ultimately rest on a common heritage and a harmony of interests shared by the major participants. Allies must be reckoned in terms of reasonably certain performance—not in terms of wishful thinking.

A realistic assessment of the qualities of the proposed major ally—in this case Germany—is essential in determining whether Germany will serve the western alliance or disintegrate the cohesiveness of the West. The main purpose of this memorandum is to present a matter-of-fact appraisal of Germany from the historical, economic, political and ideological points of view.

I.

GERMANY'S NATURAL ECONOMIC TIES ARE WITH RUSSIA AND THE EAST

Our rapid rebuilding of German industry has increased the pressure for resumption of these ties. German economic and political policy today shows that it is her purpose to broaden them as soon as possible.

For decades the Germans have found the Russians to be one of their main trading partners. This is true, in spite of ideological differences which have existed through the years. German Realpolitik and economic considerations have never been inhibited by divergent ideologies. An illustration of that fact may be found in a N. Y. Times report from Germany, December 19, 1952, which disclosed that a group of leading German industrialists in the West had set up a Committee sponsored by the West German government to "activate trade with the Soviet Union and Soviet-bloc countries."

The industrialists who are at the head of this government-sponsored Committee are by no stretch of the imagination pro-communist. On the contrary, they were the key supporters of the Nazis, but just as after World War I powerful German industrialists strove to strengthen economic ties with Moscow, so do their successors of today. Just as the Weimar Republic, which was essentially anti-communist, supported the activities of the German industrialists in the 1920's to strengthen economic relations with Moscow, so today the Bonn government which is anti-communist, sponsors similar plans for closer economic ties with the East.

Illegal Trade With Russian Already Great

A Senate Sub-Committee Chaired by former Sen. Herbert

R. O'Conor reported:

(a) That during 1951 West Germany had been conducting illegal trade in strategic materials with the East, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars.

(b) That this situation was "extremely disturbing, particularly because the U. S. government has the authority and the responsibility in the occupation of Germany."

(c) That in effect, "the U. S. taxpayer is paying for this illegal trade."

(d) That "up to the time of investigation by the Subcommittee, Western Germany, an area in which the U. S. government has had authority and responsibility, was a veritable open channel for the flow of goods of strategic significance to the East."

Many West German firms were charged with selling strategic materials to the Soviet-bloc during the year 1952. The details were reported in the press (see Associated Press, April 23, 1952 and the N. Y. Times, June 4, 1952).

West German Plans for Enlarged Russian Trade Already Far Advanced

At the time when Secretary of State Acheson was flying to Germany for the signing of the contractual agreement, the Associated Press, May 6, 1952, reported that the Lower House of the West German Parliament unanimously "voted in favor of wiping out Western allied restrictions to trade with the Communist East." The Reuters News Agency on May 20, 1952 reported "West German industrialists have set up an office for West-East trade and to promote commercial relations with Russia, China and other Communist countries."

Germany's Natural Hinterland

That Germany will look toward the East, and at the same time threaten the economic wellbeing of our most reliable allies, is a foregone conclusion if we persist in the policy of building up Germany's economic power beyond her genuine peacetime requirements. The vast markets in Europe and Asia which the Kremlin can offer to Western Germany is a reality which must be reckoned with, and which will have a decisive influence on German policy.

The natural hinterland for Germany has always been the East. It therefore follows that if the Germans are given excessive economic power and capacity they will inevitably be obliged to re-establish their previous large-scale economic relations with the Eastern countries now under Soviet domination.

In this connection, the N. Y. Times, March 11th, 1953, reported that the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Lower House of the West German Parliament had recommended to the West German Government that it initiate a project to re-examine Germany's overall relations with the Communist controlled countries of Europe. "The recommendation reflected the deep seated hope, nourished by German nationalists, that the day would come when the great markets of East and Southeast Europe would be re-opened to West German industry."

II.

The Theory That German Policy Is Basically "Western" Is Historically False

The assumption that Germany historically has had a predominantly Western orientation in its foreign relations, economic and political activities, does not square with the record. The consistent pro-Russian orientation of leading elements in German life is a matter of historical fact.

In this connection the State Department in its publication: "Confuse and Control" (No. 4107, April 1951) notes:

"Hitler made much of Germany's position as the defender of Europe against the barbarians from the East. But ever since Napoleon had conquered Germany and attacked Russia, there has been much in common between the upper military and social classes in Germany and in Russia. The Czar was closely related to the Kaiser. Bismarck's policy was always to cooperate with Russia. Now that Russia has a new ruling class as dictatorial as the old aristocracy, some of the old feeling of kinship is still to be found among extreme conservatives from Germany from the Junkers to the ex-Nazis . . .

"There is some feeling among the aristocrats that they might make terms with the Soviet aristocracy because of their experience and ability, and might become indispensable and powerful members of the Soviet ruling class."

The Consistency of the Eastern Orientation

As a matter of fact, the political and ideological concept that Germany must ally with the East against the West is a very old and deeply rooted tradition in Germany's foreign policy. It was an important factor in Frederick the Great's diplomatic schemes 200 years ago, which resulted in a Russo-Prussian alliance on the basis of a partitioned Poland. This pro-Russian policy was strengthened under Bismarck. Following the establishment of the Weimar Republic after World War I, the Rapallo Treaty of 1922 was signed between Germany and Soviet Russia. This treaty aimed at the secret rearming of Germany in violation of the Versailles Treaty and the establishment of a common front against the West. In spite of Hitler's avowed enmity and opposition to Soviet Communism, the Nazi government joined hands with the Kremlin in 1939.

It should be noted that the pro-Russian orientation of Germany which manifested itself during decisive moments of history was never forsaken despite the type of government ruling the Germans, i.e. monarchy, democracy or dictatorship. Thus, on the basis of the historical record, Germany cannot qualify as the indispensable bulwark against Russian expansionism.

Soviet Russia's Postwar Policy Supports a Rearmed and Heavily Industrialized United Germany

Russia's policy in the postwar period has been carefully designed toward strengthening the powerful pro-Eastern forces within Germany. However, the Soviets have never pursued fixed tactics in their general attempt to establish a common front between Germany and Russia.

The impression that the Russians would always insist on a weak Germany which, presumably, would create a climate for the growth of Communist influence, is contradicted by the repeated pronouncements of Stalin and Molotov advocating a united, rearmed, and heavily industrialized Germany.

Ideological considerations have always been secondary in Russia's policy toward Germany. Actually the Russians advocated a powerful and rearmed Germany regardless of political coloration, because such a Germany would provide the Russians with greater possibilities.

III.

PUBLIC OPINION IN GERMANY, AND GERMAN POLITICAL IDEOLOGY SHOW THAT SHE IS TODAY A MUCH MORE LOGICAL ALLY OF RUSSIAN COMMUNISM THAN OF WESTERN DEMOCRACY

Extreme Nationalism and Adherence to Authoritarian Concepts Are Controlling Factors in German Public Opinion

The basic ideological concepts which have motivated Germany's aggressive actions in the past are a force which must be reckoned with in present-day Germany. For example, the State Department Bulletin referred to above, in discussing the business world of Germany notes that there still "remains the old habit of authoritarian control, which has more affinity for Eastern than for Western forms of government . . .

"The tradition of dictatorial power is common among older business and industrial leaders in Germany, as it is among the upper social, military and political parties. Former U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy in his Quarterly Report of October-December 1951 notes:

"Unhappily, most of the established political parties have also been stocking the merchandise of nationalism. Individuals or circles, and in a few cases, even the controlling elements of an entire State political organization, have expressed highly nationalistic sentiments . . . even some Federal ministers have not been above such actions. . . . The use of the extreme nationalist narcotic creates the need for larger doses; whereas the users must ultimately find that they cannot subsist on talk alone, they must resort to some action to avoid decline. The consequences of such a course, if long continued, must be general disaster."

Congressional Study Commission Finds Lack of Democratic Orientation

A report by a Special Study Mission of the House Committee of Foreign Affairs (February 1952) observed:

"In the light of the situation which has been summarized above and in view of the additional factors which will be enumerated, the Sub-committee cannot escape the conclusion that the people of Western Germany are not yet qualified to graduate from the course in democracy which has been offered to them during the occupation. It is the considered judgment of responsible U. S. officials, based on public opinion polls and other sources of information that too many of the German people today believe that Nazism contained more that was good than was bad."

The views of this Committee were further confirmed by a report on German public opinion issued by the Office of Public Affairs, HICOG, in which it was stated:

"The majority of the German people cannot be counted on to resist the efforts of any Nazi-Type group to return to power." (New York Times, Jan. 18, 1953)

An example of the extreme nationalism pervading all walks of life in Germany, is the utterance of Jacob Kaiser, Minister of All German Affairs in the Adenauer cabinet: "No real Europe can be formed unless the German bloc is reconstituted. I remind you that this bloc includes in addition to Germany, Austria, a part of Switzerland, the Saar, of course, and Alsace-Lorraine. When I think of the Strasbourg Cathedral, my heart hurts."

Extreme Nationalism Encourages Anti-American and Anti-Allied Attitudes

The resurgence of aggressive nationalism is a potent force in the planning and in the thinking of the Germans. For example, it manifests itself in a growing barrage of anti-American and anti-Allied criticism and villification. It has been particularly marked by the growing crescendo of demands for the freedom of the war criminals.

This campaign has the support of the German government. Indeed, the Germans have now gone so far as to accuse the allies of committing the real war crimes. For example, at a recent gathering of the notorious SS Troopers, a convicted war criminal, General Ramcke, accused the Allies of committing the real crimes. His abusive language was warmly applauded by the audience amidst the shouts of "schweinehund Eisenhower" (Pig-dog Eisenhower).

More recently, a German court reversed the judgment of the international war crimes tribunal which had sentenced to death Hitler's chief of staff, General Jodl. The German court exonerated the war criminal Jodl and prohibited the confiscation of his properties as dictated by the original verdict. The N. Y. Times of March 5, 1953 noted that this action "leads the way for other German courts to whitewash Nazis condemned by the Allies."

Results of the Resurgence of German Nationalism

It is now a matter of fact that the very forces which were the backbone of Germany's aggressive ambitions, of which Nazism itself was but one manifestation, are back in positions of power. The leading members of the present Bonn Foreign Office are over-whelmingly former Nazis and/or Ribbentrop diplomats (about 85%—according to press reports). Chancellor Adenauer, who acts as his own Foreign Minister for West Germany, and is therefore directly responsible for this state of affairs, has publicly supported the use of these Nazi diplomats, declaring that they possessed "advantages" that other officials did not have. (N. Y. Times, Oct. 23, 1952.) In this connection, it should be pointed out that it was these very same diplomats under Von Ribbentrop who served the

"FINE! JUST REMEMBER TO CLENCH THE FIST" conspiracy leading to the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939.

In his Fifth Quarterly Report on Germany, October-December 1950, former U. S. High Commissioner McCloy made the following comment:

"Critics of the denazification program also point to the presence of former Nazis in important positions and in the public service generally. It is true that there are many former Nazis in public positions. Many are school teachers, mail carriers, policemen. Some few occupy higher positions, even in the state and Federal governments. Many business men holding important posts were once members of the Nazi party. Millions of former Nazis are re-employed, most of them in their former vocations . . ."

IV.

WEST GERMAN FOREIGN POLICY AND DOMESTIC POLITICS ALIKE SHOW PURPOSE TO BUILD UP INDEPENDENT CENTRAL EUROPEAN BLOC—NOT TO BECOME PART OF FREE WORLD ALLIANCE

The aim of German political planning has always been to establish Germany as the dominant power of Europe. Under present conditions this objective has taken the form of a concerted effort to build up a third power bloc in Europe under German hegemony, which at the appropriate time would break away from the U. S. and make common cause with Moscow.

Germany's Leading Geo-Politicians Have Prepared the Secret "Third Power Bloc" Plan

The details of this plan will be found in a secret directive issued by the chief German Geo-Political Center in Madrid. The full text may be found in the recently published book "Germany Plots With The Kremlin," by an outstanding expert on German geo-politics, T. H. Tetens.

The Madrid directive calls for the following tactical actions:

(1) To avoid any hard and fast commitments by Germany on cooperation with the West, so as to remain free to come to terms with Soviet Russia.

(2) To build up anti-American sentiment in all Western European countries.

(3) To extract as many concessions and dollars from the U. S. A. as possible.

(4) To obtain all the advantages of contractual agreement and the other treaties with the West, without making significant reciprocal contributions.

(5) To establish a Third Power Bloc in Western Europe under German domination.

(6) To prevent this "third force" from becoming involved in any conflict between Soviet Russia and the U. S. A., that is, to break up NATO.

(7) To employ the strategic position of the Third Power Bloc for purposes of striking a bargain with Soviet Russia and thereby isolating the U. S. A.

The Madrid Geo-Political Center has been issuing secret directives of the type outlined above regularly. In this connection, a comparison of the Madrid directive with the statements made by leading German newspapers and politicians will show that this plan forms the basis of the present strategy of German leadership.

Significant Statements on the Need to Establish a Third Power Bloc

The leading geo-political paper of West Germany, "Christ und Welt," which according to Mr. John J. McCloy is an Adenauer newspaper, stated:

"Continental Europe would break away from the Atlantic Pact if the Soviets agree to withdraw their forces behind the Prippet Marshes and release not only the Eastern zone of Germany, but the whole of Eastern Europe into the European Union. A Western Europe standing on its own feet and possessing its own powerful army . . . could afford to carry out such an independent policy, because it would have the strength of a third power." (Dec. 27, 1951)

Dr. Adenauer himself alluded to the same idea in a more diplomatic terminology. On May 20, 1950, he stated:

". . . A federated Europe will become a third force in the world, not as strong as Russia or the U. S., but powerful enough to intervene successfully—in a decisive moment—to safeguard the peace . . . Germany has again become a factor with whom others will have to reckon in international affairs."

The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (March 15, 1952), which is the mouthpiece of the Bonn Foreign Office and also represents the thinking of leading industrial circles wrote:

"What can Russia win if she plays her trump card? . . . In order to jump out of her present isolation she can, exactly as the Rapallo Treaty did 30 years ago, place Germany as a protecting buffer between East and West. From the politico-economic point of view, she should repeat the old game for world power position by concluding long-term agreements with German industry and by reviving her trade with Germany. Thus, Russia might re-open the door to the world market."

Note: These are but sample quotations, the type of which can be found in all leading newspapers and publications in Germany, and also in the German language press in North and South America.

DANGEROUS VARIATION

". . . Strictly speaking, a revival of National Socialism in the specific and particular form which Hitler created seems unlikely.

"Meantime a dangerous variation has emerged. Its principal supporters are men who distrust what they lump as 'European parliamentary procedures' . . .

"These men are 'Nationalist' as opposed to 'internationalist.' They are essentially 'anti-western,' and they resent the ties and restrictions which co-operation involves.

"Many of them, like Naumann himself, reject the anti-Semitism of Hitler's heyday as 'outmoded' and no longer effective . . .

"They would shudder and probably sue at a suggestion that they are 'Communists,' but most of them nurse the idea that a 'deal' might be made with the Soviet Union. History is on their side, for they twice already have concluded such arrangements, at Rapallo in 1922, and in Moscow in 1939 . . ."

(By David M. Nichol in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch 2-18-53)

The Danger of a German Dominated Western Europe

In view of this over-all plan of the Germans to establish a third power bloc, their formal acceptance of integration with Western Europe would merely serve as a method by which they could achieve domination, which, in turn, is the principal pre-condition for striking a bargain with Russia at the expense of the U. S. The danger of Germany dominating Western Europe was reported by Mr. James Reston in the N. Y. Times, April 26, 1950: "It is now recognized in official quarters that the potential economic and military power of Western Germany is so great that it is likely to dominate any purely Western European economic or military organization. . . ."

The creation of a Third Power Bloc under German domination would in itself be a disaster to the American policy of trying to construct a united Europe as a defense against Communism.

The fact that such a German dominated Bloc would have a probable orientation toward the East, would be an additional disaster.

The more rapidly we rebuild German heavy industry and permit her rearmament, the more probable become both of these dangerous results.

V.

THE CONTRACTUAL AGREEMENT DOES NOT FURNISH EVEN A PAPER GUARANTEE THAT A UNIFIED GERMANY WILL BECOME OR REMAIN A PART OF THE WESTERN BLOC

In discussing a unified Germany's relationship to the agreements, Mr. McCloy told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the Germans "agree that a unified Germany shall enjoy the rights and be bound by the obligations conferred and imposed upon by the Federal Republic by the new agreements and treaties contributing to the creation of an integrated European community." (Our italics.) (Hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, U. S. Senate, June 11, 1952, Page 73.)

A Unified Germany Is Not Bound to the Obligations of the Contractual Agreement, According to Chancellor Adenauer

The New York Times, May 14, 1952, reported that Chancellor Adenauer's coalition government had adopted reservations to the agreements, stressing that "the freedom of a future government of a unified Germany to negotiate, must not be too closely restricted by linking such a government with the present treaty system integrating West Germany and Western Europe as the Allies wish to do." This reservation had a decisive effect on the formulation of Article 7 of the final agreement which reads:

"In the event of the unification of Germany the three powers will subject to such adjustments as may be agreed, extend to a unified Germany the rights which the Federal Republic has under the present convention and the related conventions, and will for their part agree that the rights under the treaties for the formation of an integrated European community should be similarly extended upon assumption by such a unified Germany of the obligations of the Federal Republic toward the three powers or to any of them under those conventions and treaties."

The meaning of Article 7 was discussed by Chancellor Adenauer in an interview with a German newspaperman on the Northwest German radio, May 28, 1952. When asked by this German journalist if Article 7 contains a clause that would automatically commit a future unified Germany to join the Alliance with the West, the Chancellor replied:

> "The final text of Article 7 says that a re-united Germany can claim the rights under the conventions if it agrees to submit to the duties." (Our italics.)

Thus Chancellor Adenauer's view of Article 7 clearly contradicts that of Mr. McCloy who told the Senate that a unified Germany is to be "bound" by the Agreements.

Further clarification of Germany's attitude toward her obligation to the Treaties was given by Chancellor Adenauer's coalition government which presented a resolution to be approved by Parliament that "the treaties were provisional and in force only until Germany had been re-united." (N. Y. Times, Dec. 5, 1952.)

It is therefore clear that the contractual agreement cannot satisfy the interests and ambitions of a united Germany, nor does this agreement contain any guarantees against its unilateral repudiation by the government of a united Germany.

VI.

PRESENT GERMAN PLANS SHOW NO INTENTION TOWARDS CONTRIBUTING TO THE COMMON DEFENSE

In fact, the Bonn budget calls for a tax reduction and decreased expenditures in defense activities next year (1953-54).

West Germany's Minister of Finance Proposes Tax Reduction

An accurate gauge of Germany's real attitude toward cooperation in the common defense of Western Europe is the German budget. While other countries of Western Europe have been heavily taxing their peoples to raise the sums necessary for defense, the Germans are determined to reduce taxes in the 1953-1954 budget. Dr. Fritz Schaefer, Minister of Finance, announced that the German budget would provide for a 15% flat reduction in income taxes and a reduction of the corporate taxes from 60 to 40%. The N. Y. Times (Dec. 2, 1952 and Jan. 28, 1953) reported that the 1953-54 defense budget for Germany would be 9 billion D.M. or 2 billion 143 million dollars. This would amount to a reduction of 1 billion 200 million D.M. from the defense budget of 1952-53 if it is assumed, in accordance with the Contractual Agreement, that Germany has been contributing 850 million D.M. (Occupation and defense costs) on a 12 month basis starting April 1, 1952.

In contrast to the German attitude toward defense contribution, the French defense budget for 1953-54 is approximately 4 billion dollars, which places a per capita burden of $100. For the Germans the per capita defense contribution would roughly amount to about $50.00.

Germany Expects the U. S. A. to Foot the Bill

That the Germans are looking to the U. S. to underwrite the greater portion of the costs for the arming of 12 German divisions (approximately 10 billion dollars) is confirmed by Chancellor Adenauer himself (Associated Press, Dec. 6, 1952) (U. S. News & World Report, Dec. 26, 1952), notwithstanding the fact that West Germany today is once again the most powerful industrial nation in Western Europe.

West Germany Is Now Foremost Industrial Power in Western Europe

The N. Y. Times, Dec. 21, 1952 noted: "the production index which stood at 138 last July rose to 167 in November 1952, a postwar high and a remarkable increase in so short a time." The U. S. News & World Report, Feb. 29, 1952 reported: "West Germany has a larger civilian industrial plant now than it did before the war. Industrial production has trebled in a little over 3 years."

An indication of Germany's power may be seen from the fact that West Germany "increased its 1952 production of steel by 17% over that of 1951, producing 17.4 million tons." (Wall St. Journal, Feb. 10, 1953.)

A special report, November 1952, by the Committee for Economic Development on the economic situation in Western Europe, declared: "Germany's stock of machine tools at the end of the war was above the pre-war level and actually as great as that of the U. S." In connection with the 1952-1953 budget, the Report declares that 40% of it is devoted to social welfare costs and "Germany has benefited from the absence of fixed interest charges since the public debt was wiped out."

Germany's export trade has reached approximately the 4 billion dollar mark, far above pre-war levels. She has again become a first-class exporting nation, rivalling Great Britain and the U. S. In view of these basic economic facts, it cannot be said that Germany does not have the economic power to make a contribution to the common defense of Western Europe.

Germany Stands Pat

It is not the lack of power but the lack of will which explains why the Germans are refusing to sacrifice as the other powers of Western Europe. The German attitude can only be explained in terms of Germany's real interests and ambitions which are diametrically opposed to sincere cooperation with the West.

Conclusion

Qualities which are requisite for a nation to play a major role as an ally of the U. S. are therefore completely lacking so far as Germany is concerned.

(a) It has been stated that a remilitarized Germany as part of a European defense force would strengthen the West against Soviet aggression. However, in the light of facts mentioned above, it is clear that German armed forces will only be employed by any German government for the aggrandizement of German power. To accomplish this aim, the Germans would not hesitate to drag the West into a war for their special interests, or to establish close ties with the Russians at the expense of Western security.

(b) It has been assumed that the solidarity of Western Europe would be strengthened by the inclusion of Western Germany. However, since this policy was announced and efforts made to implement it, there has been growing disunity in Western Europe. In short, this policy, rather than strengthening Western unity against Soviet totalitarianism, is creating the opposite result. The attempt to enforce this policy creates still deeper fears and suspicions among the peoples of Western Europe who live closer to the Germans, who have suffered at the hands of the Nazis and the German cartelists, and who are well aware of the fact that the Germans will settle for nothing less than complete mastery of Europe.

(c) It is also a fact that this policy strengthens the Soviet's grip over her Eastern satellites, whose peoples dread the resurgence of the German power which devastated their lands.

(d) It is therefore clear that if the U. S. is to avoid a breakdown of Western European unity against Soviet totalitarianism which would pave the way for the emergence of a Soviet-German bloc confronting the U. S. with overwhelming power, a thorough re-examination of our policies in Germany should be undertaken immediately, as one of the most urgent problems involved in our planning for defense against Communist aggression.

"Germany and Russia have always been able to come to agreement in crises in the past. There is no reason to think they would find it impossible to do so now.

"Frederick the Great agreed with Russia on the partition of Poland. Bismarck came to terms with Russia, thus setting himself free to attack France. In our own times Germany and Russia negotiated the Rapallo Pact and Hitler and Stalin their notorious non-aggression pact. In both countries there exists a strong tradition for an alliance of the East to overwhelm the West.

"This is a propitious moment, when Adenauer is making his first bid for dominance of Western Europe, and we are not yet fully committed to German rearmament, to re-examine our policy toward Germany to the end that Germany shall be subordinated to Europe and not Europe to it."

(Frank Kingdon, The New York Post, 2-24-53)

DOES THE BELL TOLL?

"Does the news from Germany cause a bell to toll in your memory?

"Do you remember when a German Chancellor named Bruening and a Foreign Minister named Stresemann were running a policy of co-operation with the West against Communism and claiming equality of armaments?

"Then suddenly we woke up and found that instead of a safe German watchdog on Russia we had a revenging tiger called Hitler who preferred to eat up the West before he turned on Russia.

"There is increasing evidence from Germany that the pattern is repeating itself. The new Nazis who have been arrested by the British, the American poll showing nearly half the Germans hankering after Hitlerism, are a warning that this dangerous nation is not yet fit to be trusted . . ."

(Reynolds News 1-25-53)

Editorials

THE GERMAN BUDGET

Much has been written and said about Germany's sincere determination to make a concrete contribution toward the defense of Western Europe. On the basis of the facts which have come to our attention, we cannot share this optimism. We still adhere to the old adage that in the last analysis deeds count more than words. It is in this connection that we can think of no more accurate gauge of Germany's true intentions than the budget which the German Finance Minister, Fritz Schaeffer, announced for the fiscal year 1953-54. Here we find in concrete terms what the Germans really propose to do and not to do in the way of "sacrificing" for the common good of Western Europe.

An obscure dispatch from Germany, December 1, 1952 (Associated Press) reported that the German Finance Minister had increased the total budget for the fiscal year 1953-54 while reducing defense costs to nine billion marks (approximatey 2.1 billion dollars). It was further reported that this reduction in defense expenditures would represent an average of approximately "100 million marks a month less than the 850 million marks being spent monthly in Germany in accordance with the agreement made by the North Atlantic Council . . ." In other words, the German Finance Minister proposed to reduce Germany's European defense contribution by 1 billion, 200,000 marks (approximately 300 million dollars), over a 12 months period.

As far as we know, Herr Schaeffer's announcement caused no stir in Allied circles. However, when Herr Schaeffer on January 28, 1953, told the Bundestag that the Federal government was determined to cut drastically its European defense contribution, the Allies expressed alarm and denounced Herr Schaeffer's unilateral interpretation of Germany's obligations. According to the New York Times (February 15, 1953) the Allied High Commission informed the Bonn government that Schaeffer's proposition was "likely to prejudice future negotiations on West German contributions to the European defense community."

One would expect therefore that the Allies would stand fast, but lo and behold, when the "show-down" came between Allied negotiators and the German Finance Minister, the Times of April 13, 1953, reported: "Bonn wins ceiling on defense costs." Several weeks late, April 26, 1953, the Times reported: "Bonn wins bargain on funds for Nato . . ." "Cuts its share on the defense treaty as well on interim costs of occupation force."

The substance of the agreements made in April of this year amount to nothing less than an approval of Herr Schaeffer's original reduction of Germany's defense contribution. In other words, about 1 billion, 200 million marks have been sliced off Germany's defense budget for the fiscal year 1953-54. Thus, while the defense budgets of our allies have been increasing year after year, the Germans who are being primed for a key role are actually reducing their defense expenditures. For example, the French defense budget for the year 1953 is about 4 billion dollars which places a burden of about $100 on each Frenchman. On the other hand, the German defense budget will cost every German roughly $50, which means that the French are carrying a per capita burden which is about 100 per cent greater than that of the Germans.

But this is not the whole story. While other countries in Western Europe have been increasing the tax load on their citizens, Finance Minister Schaeffer stated that his budget would provide a 15 per cent flat reduction in income taxes and a reduction in corporate taxes from 60 to 40 per cent. In addition to these cuts we find that the German budget makes ample provision for so-called welfare services. The monthly revue of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York (January 1953) reported: ". . . a recent survey revealed that one out of every four Germans is currently receiving a pension on social security payments. Of the Federal budget of 5.5 billion dollars for the current fiscal year ending March 31, 1953, about 40 per cent is earmarked for 'welfare' purposes . . ." The new budget continues to allocate about the same percentage for welfare purposes. Indeed, the New York Times mentions that the latest savings on the defense budget "will be used to increase the salaries of civil servants and for social security disbursements." All of this can better be appreciated in the light of the fact that Germany "has benefited from the absence of fixed interest charges since the public debt was wiped out and the occupation cost has not been as heavy as rearmament expenditures in other countries." ("The Economic Situation in Western Europe"—a report by The Committee for Economic Development, Nov. 1952.)

Needless to say, the Germans have been pleading "poverty" as justification for their attempts to steer clear of any significant contribution to European defense. But no matter how hard they try to pretend that they are broke, the fact of the matter is that in the short space of 8 years the Germans have again become the foremost industrial nation in Western Europe.

As early as February 29, 1952, the U. S. News & World Report stated: "Western Germany has a larger civilian industrial plant now than it did before the war. Industrial production has trebled in a little more than 3 years." By the end of 1952 the New York Times reported: "The production index which stood at 138 last July, rose to 167 in November 1952, a post-war high and a remarkable increase in so short a time." The Committee for Economic Development in its report of November 1952 discloses that "Germany's stock of machine tools at the end of the war was above pre-war level and actually as great as that of the U. S." In February 1953 the Wall Street Journal reported that West Germany "increased its 1952 production of steel by 17 per cent over that of 1951, producing 17.4 million tons." Not only has German production been soaring above pre-war levels but the same holds true for German exports so that now Germany has once again become a dangerous competitor of the Allied powers, including the United States.

The success achieved in trade can be appreciated by the fact that by December 15, 1952, Germany had increased her gold and dollar reserves to 612 million dollars. It should also be pointed out that the Germans receive approximately 200 million dollars a year through the expenditures of U. S. personnel and direct army appropriations in Germany. This of course does not include other expenditures made by the U. S., including those by the Mutual Security Administration.

Finally, Germany's plea of poverty should be considered in the light of the fact that she is investing in her heavy industries at a greater rate than that of any other country in Western Europe. The rate of capital investment is presently around 23 per cent of the national income.

The facts cited above show no poverty, much as the Germans would like us to believe that they are flat on their backs. Lack of resources and industry does not explain why the Germans cut their defense appropriations. It is not power that is lacking but will to sincerely cooperate. The Germans did not hesitate to sacrifice for "der schoene Adolf." Nothing was spared to build up the Nazi Armies for their "Herrenfolk Mission." But when the Germans are supposed to work in the interests of democracy's defense, well, that's another story. The German attitude can only be explained in terms of Germany's real interests and ambitions which contrary to the wishful thinking of many of our statesmen, are diametrically opposed to sincere and long-term cooperation with the West.

This does not mean, of course, that the Germans are not willing to set up an army (which they intend to control anyway). But their answer to the alleged necessity for such an army is simply this: "Uncle Sam must pay the bill." Chancellor Adenauer told the Bonn Parliament that he expected 10 billion dollars from the U. S. for the arming of 12 German divisions. (Associated Press, Dec. 6, 1952.) His Defense Minister, Theodore Blank, supported the Chancellor's position in a statement reported by the New York Daily News—April 17, 1953. Blank even went further. According to the News report, the Defense Minister set the cost of rearming over a period of ten years "at 50 billion dollars and indicated the U. S. was expected to pay the check." This is the way our German "friends" propose to "cooperate" with Uncle Sam.

TWELVE DIVISIONS — A BULWARK?

We do not know whether all of the problems associated with the rearming of Germany have been carefully thought through. Though we may run the risk of earning the unflattering reputation of "armchair generals," we intend to examine some aspects of this question which certainly deserve clarification.

Ever since the Western Allies publicly agreed to support the rearming of Germany, U. S. officials have emphasized the importance of this project as a means of thwarting the aggressive designs of Russia. We have been told time and again that German rearmament would so strengthen the defenses of Western Europe that the Communist armies would think twice before daring to invade the West. Secretary of State Dulles made this clear when he said that Germany's military potential "is indispensable to an effective continental defense" (February 9, 1953).

The role of a rearmed Germany in such a defense system was discussed in more detail by Field Marshal Montgomery (U. S. News & World Report, April 10, 1953). The Field Marshal told his interviewers that a German army would stand "in the middle of the shield" (the shield being the European defense organization). He said that unless there was such a German army, the shield would have "a great blank in it." Then he declared that Western Europe cannot be defended without German rearmament. "It's essential. It's essential," he exclaimed.

It is not only the German army which is deemed to be the keystone of the European Defense System but its economic war potential is considered to be vital in the general build-up of armaments. In this connection the Wall Street Journal (April 16, 1953) quoted a high State Department official as stating that the failure of West Germany to fully participate in the rearmament program is "the greatest waste of industrial capacity in Europe."

Unquestionably, the ideas expressed above and the assumptions upon which they are based deserve careful consideration in view of the fact that they reflect the reasoning of some of our leading authorities on German rearmament. That a remilitarized Germany possessing a first class war potential will ipso facto become a reliable ally of the West in the event of a showdown with the Soviets is pure assumption. On the other hand, we do know that West German industrialists have been reluctant to recreate an arms industry in the Ruhr, finding it more profitable to regain their former market throughout the world, including those within the Soviet orbit. The New York Times (May 18, 1953) reported that the Bonn Government has established direct official contacts with the Soviet Union with the intention of resuming trade relations for the first time in 12 years. We know that there has been unofficial trade relations between Germany and the Soviet block where the Germans have been shipping hundreds of millions of dollars of strategic materials to the East. Now trade relations are established on an official basis. Students of international politics know that trade relations always provide the prerequisites for the establishment of political ties.

That West Germany under present conditions should devote a major portion of its energies towards the development of war industries has not been enthusiastically received by West German industrialists. Besides believing that more profits are to be made in trade with the Communist bloc, the Ruhr industrialists believe that an extensive arms industry in the Ruhr would present great dangers because it would be "too close to the Russian armies for the Ruhr is only a little more than 100 miles from the Soviet zone border." (New York Times, September 12, 1950.)

Chancellor Adenauer has also been explicit on that point. The Times of May 6, 1950, reported the Chancellor as stating that "unless it is possible to restrain and confine the Russians, all industrial installations in the Ruhr . . . would be destroyed by war." He returned to the same theme two years later when he told reporters "our position is too exposed to an attack by the Russians and nothing attracts heavy bombers more than having an arms industry." (Associated Press, January 24, 1952.)

The contrast between the views expressed by German industrialists and Herr Adenauer and those by Allied authorities are too glaring to be ignored for our own safety. The implications of the strategy outlined by Field Marshal Montgomery which contemplates that West Germany stand in the center of the shield to absorb the first blows of a Red Army invasion, will not find favor, to say the least, among German leaders, for such a strategy involves the turning of Germany herself into the major battleground where the East German puppet army and the West German army would meet in head-on collision.

Does the Field Marshal really believe that the Germans would consent to such a role? As a matter of fact, as early as 1949 the President of the West German Government, Theodor Heuss, told newsmen, "Frankly, I cannot see the people's police waging a Socialist Unity Party crusade to conquer and subdue democratic West Germany, just as I cannot see the West fighting the men from the Soviet Zone. This would not be the German way of handling internal political matters." The implication in President Heuss' remark is clear. It is, of course, a direct challenge to the concept of the European Defense Community strategy outlined by Field Marshal Montgomery. We have no doubt that the militarists of West Germany have no intentions of permitting German manpower to act as a shock absorber. They have other plans. Chancellor Adenauer himself on December 13, 1950, publicly declared, "Our chief reason for wanting to enter the European Army is to be able to recover our Eastern territories." There is nothing of a defensive military posture in the Chancellor's remarks.

Much has been said about the great value of the 12 German divisions in bolstering the strength of the European army. Yet Chancellor Adenauer made the following comment at a news conference in Germany March 10, 1953: "What could we do with our 12 divisions in the European Army—and perhaps another 12 reserve divisions—against mighty Soviet Rossia?" Apparently the Chancellor was not at all convinced that 12 divisions would be sufficient to stop the Red Army. Thus, if the Germans reject the strategy of Field Marshal Montgomery which unavoidably would turn Germany into a battlefield and if Chancellor Adenauer himself questions the effectiveness of 12 German divisions in the event of a Russian aggression, what then becomes of the thesis that German rearmament is indispensable to the defense of Western Europe?

Of course, Chancellor Adenauer tried to give an opposite impression when he recently visited the United States. On that occasion he told American audiences what they wanted to hear. This is in line with his shrewd diplomacy which has enabled him to obtain concession after concession from the Allies and billions from U. S. taxpayers.

Since the Russians have not retreated from their present positions in Germany it is clear that a huge arms industry in the Ruhr would be exposed to the Russian airfleet, and in view of this fact—how would the Ruhr fare in the event of war? Would it be pulverized by Russian bombers or captured by the Red Army (perhaps even with the connivance of the Germans) and its weapons hurled against us?

In the 1920s American taxpayers poured billions into Germany only to find that these funds were converted into a huge military potential which threatened our survival as a free nation. Should American taxpayers be called upon again to underwrite such a poor risk with additional billions?

There is another important consideration which seems to be always overlooked in regard to the recreation of a German army. We refer to the effect of such an army on the morale of the people of Western Europe. The truth is that the very unity of the Western coalition which is supposed to be buttressed and cemented by the German defense contribution, is actually in danger of disintegration because of the rising spectre of German rearmament. The Russians are fully aware of this fact. Thus, Walter Millis in speculating on how a Russian strategist would appraise the strength of Western coalition writes:

"If he were wise, I think he would arrive at his answer by applying an x-factor, in which x would equal the degree of general unanimity and resolution which this extraordinary Western coalition presented. I do not think he would care too much whether there were or were not twelve additional German divisions in the line-up. If he had any sense, he would know that in a real war all the cumbersomeness of the existing NATO command would be tossed into the discard in the first hours. A Western coalition, substantially organized and agreed, would be stronger without twelve German divisions than a Western coalition would be which had the German divisions but was so riven by internal stresses that it could not unite when the chips were down. The German divisions are important. But they are not all-important." (N. Y. Herald Tribune, March 23, 1953.)

In our opinion the bulwark against aggressive Communism must be the United States and its trusted friends in Western Europe and not a people who "at the decisive moment" might make common cause with our enemies and whose resurgent power can only inflict grave damage to the cause of Western unity at a crucial moment in history.

". . . There are many who think that the Germans may seek to recover the lost territories by maneuvering the Western Powers into an armed anti-communist crusade. It is this which has led some people to fear that if Western Germany were to be allowed into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization she would turn it from a defense into an aggressive alliance . . .

"It is far more likely that German thinking will turn to the possibilities of re-uniting their country through a deal with the Soviet Union. Such a development, it is true, could hardly occur in the near future . . . But with the growth of German military and economic strength the situation might change, especially if war in Europe were to become more imminent. In such circumstances, the Soviet Union would have a compelling motive for detaching Western Germany from the Western alliance even at the cost of very great sacrifice. On the German side, therefore, the possibility would open up of obtaining their objective at the expense of Poland by remaining neutral—a far more attractive proposition for them than entering a war between east and west.

"Should such a situation arise, it is difficult to believe that any purely constitutional provisions, integrating the Germans into a Western European Community, would be strong enough to bind them effectively in the face of so great a temptation. Nor is it easy to envisage any sanctions, military or economic, which the west could effectively take in such a case, without precipitating the very war which all schemes for European unity are designed to prevent . . ."

(Rt. Hon. Kenneth Younger, M.P., in "THE GERMAN PROBLEM")

". . . Without France the security of the Atlantic Community cannot be organized. There is, therefore, no substitute for France, leaving aside the great imponderables, in the military constitution of Western civilization.

"It is sheer silliness and geographical illiteracy to talk about 'substituting' Germany, for France lies between Germany and the United States and the high roads to Germany must cross France. There is no possible way in which the United States could make an effective military alliance with Germany unless France not only consented but collaborated . . ."

(Walter Lippmann in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch 3-20-53)

"Former high officers of Hitler's Waffen SS or Elite Guard, pledged strong support for the European Defense Community treaty and demanded the right to serve in the contingents that the West German Federal Republic would contribute.

". . . General Steiner was reported to have said in private that the Bonn Federal Government was giving serious consideration to a proposal to permit the Elite Guard veterans to serve in the German contingents that would be called up after the European Defense Community would have become effective.

"Unofficial data give about 200,000 Elite Guard living in West Germany and available for military service.

"Former General Herbert Gille told the meeting at Alzey he regretted that these veterans were being discriminated against as potential members of the future European Defense Community forces. General Gille claimed that the concept of a United Europe was first born at the ranks of the Waffen SS. . . ."

CARTEL SHADOWS OVER THE SCHUMAN PLAN

When the Schuman Plan was announced, it was generally regarded as a hopeful sign in the efforts of Western statesmen to improve relations among the nations of Western Europe through economic integration.

The Plan was enthusiastically received by the American people who were told that its realization would eliminate cartel and other restrictive practices among the participating nations and thereby strengthen the competitive ability of West European industries in the markets of the world.

We also hailed the stated objectives of the Schuman Plan. However, we declared that their attainment required relative equal economic status among at least the major participants and that no single nation should be permitted to utilize its membership for ulterior motives. We were particularly concerned lest a strong and powerful Germany take unfair advantage of her neighbors and dominate the pool. Moreover, we cautioned against the possibility of the Schuman Plan developing into a supercartel under the guise of promoting free enterprise.

There were other voices in the U. S. who also cautioned against the potential dangers which could arise if the participating nations were tempted to turn the clock back by setting up cartel arrangements which would dwarf the old steel cartel dominated by Germany in the 1920's. For example, the prominent American industrialist, Clarence B. Randall, President of the Inland Steel Corporation, speaking before the National Industrial Conference Board on November 16, 1950, expressed fears that the Schuman Plan might be turned into "the most pernicious cartel the world had ever seen . . ." Mr. Randall observed that "European business men have the cartel way of life. They are government control minded by tradition. They are restrictive—convenient-minded by habit and they are writing their impression on the Schuman Plan . . ."

On June 26, 1950, the Sub-Committee on the European Recovery Program of the National Association of Manufacturers issued a statement which also expressed concern over the danger of the Schuman Plan turning into a gigantic monopoly. The well-known columnist, David Lawrence, writing in the N. Y. Herald Tribune, June 8, 1950, took even a more catgorical stand on the Schuman Plan. He stated that in reality the Plan was a cartel, that it could threaten the markets of American producers and that it bore similarity to the industrial cartels established under the Nazis. "Politically," Mr. Lawrence wrote, "the move is all-important in signifying Franco-German unity. But the old-time Nazis in Germany and the Fascist business men of Italy must be smiling to themselves at the resurrection of their mode of controlling industrial production."

Recent developments now provide additional justification for the caution expressed by many far-sighted industrialists and commentators in this country as to the way the Schuman Plan would actually turn out.

The lofty ideals of the Schuman Plan are now in grave danger. This is borne out from recent press reports (N. Y. Times, May 1, 1953). (Wall Street Journal, May 1, 1953.) According to these reports it appears that the participants in the Schuman Plan are beginning to wink at the old cartel game. In this connection, the N. Y. Times correspondent writes that "the High Authority is well prepared for its battle against cartels." If this is true, then why has the Authority failed to use its powers to eliminate the bulk marketing arrangements and common selling practices which are still employed in many of the six countries which are members of the Schuman Plan pool? Is the High Authority aware of the fact that the four leading steel producers in the Plan "have signed a secret price-fixing agreement aimed at capturing the world steel markets of the U. S." (United Press, April 5, 1953)? The U. P. dispatch reported that experts "have called the move a revival of the pre-war European steel cartel."

This sensational disclosure has thus far been met with a loud silence on the part of the High Authority but its ramifications, particularly with regard to the United States, are far reaching. According to the United Press, one of the basic objectives of this "gentleman's agreement" is to keep prices "below the American level for advantageous competition with the U. S. in the world markets and the simultaneous attempt to seize the American markets is said to be the main reason for the pact." There certainly is no ambiguity in this report—little is left to the imagination.

The members of the Schuman Plan organization have agreed to use Belgium prices as the basis for the export of steel because these prices are higher than those which obtained in France and Germany, yet low enough to undercut the United States. The agreement is a brazen violation of the Schuman Plan. Article 3 of the Plan stipulates that its members must do all in their power to establish the lowest prices. However, a few days after the so-called gentleman's agreement entered into force, steel prices quoted by the pool jumped from $73.00 per ton to $86.00. According to Business Week (May 2, 1953) this price is still well below the internal German price of $98.00 a ton, "so the agreed export price can be expected to rise greatly to somewhere near that figure."

Confronted with these facts, the legal minds in the High Authority of the Schuman Plan declared that agreements of this kind, i.e., price discrimination between sellers and buyers, are illegal only if they apply to the members within the pool. Since the gentleman's agreement does not affect "free competition" within the common market itself, it is "legal."

It will be difficult for sincere supporters of free enterprise and the Schuman Plan to accept this strange type of reasoning. A rose is a rose and no legal hair splitting can justify this arrangement, especially when it is intended to hurt the American consumer and the country that did so much to rehabilitate the steel industries of the nations participating in the Plan. Basically it would be most dangerous to accept this principle since there is no guarantee that the next step will not result in cartel agreements aimed at the domestic agreements within the pool itself. A hint that this may be the next step on the agenda was reported in the prominent Belgian publication, Mercure Belgo-African:

"Perhaps there are other angles under which this reconstruction of the steel cartel could be envisaged.

"What has been decided by the steel makers constitutes the first step towards the return to practices which prevailed before World War II and which have been renounced, not because they were bad—they have given excellent results—but because they went counter to certain principles held dear by Americans. These principles, we regret to say, were often tainted with a certain hypocrisy; we have seen that on numerous occasions America took advantage of its hostility towards cartels, or what looked like a cartel, in order to buy raw materials which she badly needed, under most advantageous conditions for her. That happened with tin, rubber, etc. It was inevitable that the producers would be tired of such practices. Their stake is as important as that of the consumers."

Where do the Germans come in on these agreements? In the first place their Parliament has voted by a huge majority to double the turnover tax on coal and steel, thus cutting the very heart out of the Schuman Plan. By increasing the import tax of the products from other members of the Pool from 6 to 12 per cent, the Germans plan to crush French exports of finished and semi-finished steel products to Germany. In other words, the Germans who pose as the champions of European unity and of free enterprise, operate in a different way when they feel that public attention has been diverted elsewhere.

It is no coincidence that these developments come at a moment when the recartelization of Germany's coal and steel industry is taking place under conditions where Germany has become the foremost steel producer in Western Europe. Moreover, the very same elements who spearheaded the creation of the old steel cartel in Germany, have again resumed their former positions of power. Thus, the shadows which are growing over the Schuman Plan are but the reflection of the rising power of the old German steel trusts. The relation between the reconstitution of the German steel trusts and monopolies and Germany's willingness to participate in the Schuman Plan was analyzed by Walter Lippmann:

"It stands to reason that if there is to be a single free market in the six countries, then the German monopolies of the Ruhr must be broken up—in the language of the occupation statute they must be "deconcentrated." Otherwise, the free market will simply mean the complete and the unopposed domination of that market by the German monopolies.

"The occupation statute calls for the deconcentration of the German monopolies. As a matter of law, the three occupying powers could impose the deconcentration on the Ruhr monopolies. But such an imposed solution is no longer possible or desirable. The Germans would resent it and in their resentment they would certainly refuse to vote for the Schuman Plan, which cannot come into existence except by their free and equal consent. For these reasons the fulfillment of the deconcentration policy of the occupation statute has not been imposed but has been made a matter of negotiation at Dusseldorf—actually between Mr. McCloy and the Germans.

"The authors of the treaty for the Schuman Plan have acted on the hope that the Duesseldorf negotiations would succeed, that the Germans would be induced to agree voluntarily to a plan of deconcentration, and that then the Schuman treaty would perpetuate as the general law of European industry the principles of a free market.

"What has happened is that the German industrialists have felt themselves strong enough to reject deconcentration and the creation of an open market." (Walter Lippmann, Washington Post, March 5, 1951.)

It is not surprising that the Germans would consent to enter the Schuman Plan only after they had succeeded in scrapping the deconcentration and decartelization laws originally devised by the Allies. The German cartelists could never stomach the concept of free enterprise nor were they ever accustomed to "cooperate" with their neighbors on a fair and equal basis. Cooperation for them has always been synonymous with domination. Having now succeeded in rebuilding their former power in the Ruhr, it is not hard to figure out that they will utilize their new position of strength to dominate the Schuman Plan and to pervert its praiseworthy goals by re-establishing the international steel cartel.

These are the facts which should be considered by the American taxpayers despite all of the flowery phrases of the German politicians who appear before American audiences. These are the facts which must be pondered by our taxpayers, especially when it is no secret that the High Authority is anxious to obtain from us hundreds of millions of dollars for investment purposes.

According to the Plan, the High Authority possesses the power and responsibility to stop the re-emergence of the cartels, but promises are not sufficient. As we say it to the Russians, so must it be said to the Schuman Plan officials that deeds and not words count. Unless the High Authority puts an end to these maneuvers, which receive their real inspiration and direction from the Ruhr, it would be bad morals, bad economics and bad international politics to finance or support the makings of a super cartel.

A Twelve Million Dollar Investment

ON CHANCELLOR ADENAUER'S VISIT

It is not the intention of this piece to analyze all of the ramifications arising out of Chancellor Adenauer's recent visit to the United States. We know this much, however—the visit was prepared with meticulous care. Money was no object. The Bonn Government left nothing to chance in their effort to build up Herr Adenauer as the great knight of freedom whose sole desire was to defend Western ideals. In this connection it has been reported that the public relations job for this vast enterprise which consumed months of preparation, amounted to no less than 12 million dollars (Neue Woche, Sarrbrucken, April 16, 1953).

Since Adenauer remained in the United States for about two weeks, the cost for winning over the affections of the American people amounted to approximately one million dollars daily. How the Bonn Government was able to scrape together these funds is a question which should interest every U. S. taxpayer. Be it as it may, the fact of the matter is that Herr Adenauer was highly pleased with the outcome of his trip. Indeed, upon his return he boasted to German politicians that the United States had been most sympathetic to his cause. He did not specify what promises had been made to him but he hinted that great things were in the make. If such is the case, one could hardly tell from the formal communiqués which were issued after his talks with Washington officials. Indeed, Chancellor Adenauer told his political colleagues, "only a few participated in the Washington talks so that even members of the American Cabinet have no knowledge." How long this veil of secrecy will last we do not know, although it is our opinion that the American people are certainly entitled to know what commitments have been made to the Germans.

This much we do know—that from the first day he set foot on these shores, the Chancellor made sure that every statement he made would be of the kind which Americans would want to hear. He posed as the great champion of European unity and proclaimed to his audiences that his fellow country men would sacrifice to the limit in order to act as the effective bulwark against the Russians. These were things Americans were happy to hear. That Adenauer knew how to make friends and influence people in the United States is unquestionably true. We recall his statement to the Bonn Parliament of May 26, 1950, when he admonished his fellow politicians to behave. "Let us be quite clear about it," the Chancellor said, "if in such an important matter we were to oppose the efforts of the United States to bring about a united Europe, the United States would not maintain in the future her pro-German policy."

This was the theme of Adenauer's speeches during his visit and by the time he was through he was even more convinced than ever that the United States would continue "her pro-German policy."

Adenauer and the Recent Nazi Plot

There are, however, certain aspects of the Adenauer visit which deserve comment. For example, in his speech before the National Press Club he told his audience that the German people by an overwhelming majority have declared themselves for democratic principles. We are especially intent on maintaining internal stability and strengthening our democratic institutions."

Apparently Adenauer was confident that none of his listeners would recall the fact that when the British seized a group of leading Nazis who were planning to restore Nazi power in Germany, "the Federal Government's immediate reaction has been surprise, chagrin and a lukewarm attempt to associate itself with the British action." (New York Times, January 16, 1953.) The New York Times (January 23, 1953) reported "the reaction of the West German press and politicians to the seven arrests has been a mixture of mockery and anger." Only when the British proved that they had overwhelming evidence dealing with the conspiracy, did Chancellor Adenauer come forward and endorse the British action. Does this episode support the Chancellor's allegation that the majority of the Germans are dedicated completely to the strengthening of democratic institutions?

The "Poor" War Criminals

While we are on the subject of democracy in Germany it is noteworthy that one of the Chancellor's first demands upon his arrival in the United States was to call for a re-examination of the sentences of 300 leading war criminals with the view towards their release from prison. The United Press (April 9, 1953) reported, "the German leader emphasized the importance of such a review because of strong pressure at home."

Is it not strange that a people who are allegedly infused with the spirit of democracy, should insist upon the pardon and release of some of the most dangerous enemies of democracy? Herr Adenauer was not at all troubled by this contradiction. As a matter of fact, he went still further at his Press Conference at the Waldorf-Astoria where he declared that the German people were of the opinion that if the War Crimes Trials had been held two or three years later, "the results would have been different."

Here is a direct attack on the principles which motivated the Allies to prosecute and punish those who had violated elementary norms of human decency and who had committed grave crimes against humanity. Does Dr. Adenauer imply that the German people do not believe that the men who were responsible for cremating millions of people, are not under all circumstances criminals regardless of time or place? Do the Germans believe that because the United States today is justly strengthening her security against the threats of Soviet totalitarianism, that it can by the same token forgive and forget the deeds perpetrated by criminal Germans?

In the same interview Herr Adenauer stressed that it was important for the Germans "psychologically" to have these criminals released, "especially as regards the former soldiers." But should we not consider the effect of such action on the psychology of our Allies?

Substantially speaking, we doubt that there is any real difference between Adenauer's demands for the freeing of these criminals and those made by S.S. General Ramcke who led a German demonstration denouncing President Eisenhower as a "pigdog" and charged that the real war criminals were the Allies.

In our opinion it would be the height of naiveté to believe that the majority of "democratic" Germans do not stand squarely behind the campaign to whitewash these criminals. As a matter of fact, the Chancellor himself has encouraged this crusade by going so far as to deny the validity of the War Crimes Trials. The real attitude of Adenauer was very neatly expressed when he appeared on the radio program, Youth Wants to Know, April 12, 1953. When one youngster asked the Chancellor for the reason why there was increased activity of neo-Nazi groups in Germany today, he replied, "Well, they want to be active too." Does this need any further comment?

The "Democratic" Germans

If there are people who still defend Adenauer as a sincere exponent of democracy, we refer them to a full-page article in the Rheinischer Merkur, No. 14, Easter 1953, which is regarded as the Chancellor's own mouthpiece. The writer of this article, a Dr. von Heidte, begins his piece with the statement:

"Today it is fashionable in Germany to be a democrat. It is a matter of course that every German is a good democrat—if you want to 'belong' you have to be. But basically the Germans do not cherish democracy. They submit to it as perhaps people submit to a fashion although deep inside resenting their uncomfortable plight.

. . ."Twice when the Germans tried to rebuild their political life and social life (1918 and 1945) on a democratic basis, the idea of democracy was brought to them by the victorious enemy together with the army of occupation. Therefore the Germans link democracy with collapse, defeat and foreign uniforms stalking German soil. Especially during the first few years the Western occupational forces, though they showed good will, were lacking in understanding, and in the name of democracy committed acts which in the eyes of Germans looked so much like Hitler's authoritarianism that one could not differentiate the one egg from the other."

So much for the great wave of democracy which according to Adenauer is sweeping Germany.

Double Talk as Usual

Speaking in San Francisco, Chancellor Adenauer returned to the theme which he knew Americans would love to hear. "Germany," he said, "would not give up its role in the European Defense Community in the event of reunification of our country . . ." It should be pointed out that the former U. S. High Commissioner McCloy had told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in June, 1952, that the Germans "agree that a unified Germany should enjoy the rights and be bound by the obligations conferred and imposed upon the Federal Republic by the new agreements and treaties contributing to the creation of an integrated European community." One can easily gain the impression both from Chancellor Adenauer's assurance and those by Mr. McCloy that a unified Germany was duty bound to participate as a member of E. D. C. However, the facts show that there was no justified basis for the statements of Adenauer and McCloy.

A reading of Article 7 of the Contractual Agreement clearly stipulates that a unified Germany is not bound to the obligations assumed by the Bonn Republic. As a matter of fact, Chancellor Adenauer himself confirmed this fact. Knowing full well that the majority of Germans have always wanted to keep their hands free from any rigid obligations to the Allies, the Chancellor tried to prove to the Germans that the Contractual Agreement would not be binding on a unified Germany. Thus, in a radio interview, May 28, 1952, the Chancellor stated, "The final text of article 7 says that a reunited Germany can claim the rights under the convention if she agrees to submit to the duties." Subsequently, Chancellor Adenauer's Coalition Government presented a resolution to be approved by the parliament to the effect that "the treaties are provisional and enforced only until Gemrany has been reunited." (New York Times, December 5, 1952.) Therefore, all of the neatly phrased statements by the Chancellor, specially constructed for American ears, that a unified Germany would stand firmly within the European Defense Community, are meaningless and the Chancellor knows this very well, just as J. J. McCloy knew it.

German-Russian Tie-ups

The final point which deserves comment at this time, pertains to Chancellor Adenauer's references with regard to German-Soviet relations. The sensational book, Germany Plots With the Kremlin (reviewed on page   of this issue) appears to have had a profound impression upon the plotters in Bonn. Ever since the publication of this book they have been endeavoring to cover up their schemes by mountains of promises that the Germans were completely dedicated to Western ideals. Chancellor Adenauer, too, tried to dispel these suspicions during his sojourn in this country.

Addressing the Overseas Press Club in Washington, the Chancellor declared that the possibility of a German "arrangement" with Soviet Russia should be considered in the light of the fact that Germany today is relatively free of communists and fellow travellers. "No other people in Western Europe," he boasted, "are as immune to Communism as the Germans." Adenauer forgot to tell his audience that the Germans under Hitler seemed also immune to Communism but that did not prevent the Nazis from making a deal with the Russians when it suited their purposes.

Adenauer went further and said that to Germany, "weakened as she is, a pact with Soviet Russia on the basis of partisanship and equality is an impossibility." Has the Chancellor really answered the question or has he merely implied that "an arrangement" with Russia is excluded—for the time being—at least until the moment when the Germans have sufficient power to treat with the Russians on a basis of equality?

Just before he left Germany for the United States, Adenauer discussed German-Soviet relations in a press conference. On that occasion he said that it was "ridiculous" to think of the Federal Republic as being able to play a decisive role alone. "How could this be without an alliance with Russia?" he asked. (New York Times, April 6, 1953.) Here again the Chancellor provides us with some tempting speculations. For example, if it were true, as the Chancellor states, that West Germany could play a decisive role if it were allied with Russia, then what could prevent the Germans to grab this opportunity at the appropriate moment? What the Chancellor is saying as regards German-Soviet relations could easily be understood at follows: Germany must become still stronger with the help of American dollars before she can make a deal with the Kremlin. That would not only be beneficial to the Russians but would enable Germany to play a decisive role in the affairs of Europe and ultimately in the world.

The Independent Third Power Concept

As shown in Germany Plots With the Kremlin, Adenauer has been working on the establishment of a Third Power Bloc in Europe which would be subordinate to Germany's long-range plans. "... A federated Europe will become a third force in the world, not as strong as Russia or the United States, but powerful enough to intervene successfully—in a decisive moment—to safeguard the peace ... Germany has again become a factor with whom others will have to reckon in international affairs." (Article by Konrad Adenauer in the Rheinische Merkur, May 20, 1950.) The concept of a Third Power Bloc was mentioned by the Chancellor in his speech at the Waldorf-Astoria. "Only through union can Europe achieve a political weight of its own ..."

The Third Power concept which would exercise independent authority in international affairs has been expressed in the most important sections of the German press. For example, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, the mouthpiece of the German Foreign Office and of leading industrial circles, ran an editorial (June 5, 1952) which said:

"If we Germans would come to feel that the other powers, openly or tacitly, try to hinder German equality and reunification, the (Western) treaties would quickly turn out to have been built on quicksand ... The fact that we are tied up with the NATO pact does not make it impossible for Europe, as soon as it is strong enough and the international situation has changed, to become one day independent from every side ('nach allen Seiten unabhaengig')."

With reference to the Third Power Bloc and Adenauer's plans the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung on April 3, 1952, stated in a front page editorial:

"The Chancellor follows a tremendous bold plan: First rearmament, followed later on by talks with the Russians in order to persuade them to remove their armies behind the Bug River. For this goal the Chancellor has been working tenaciously for some time. And because he sticks to his timetable, he is presently opposed to the Russian Note."

It is in this connection that one can understand the report of the New York Herald Tribune correspondent (April 5, 1953) which observed that the chief aim of Dr. Adenauer's visit was to smash any move that would bring East and West together for purposes of negotiating over the fate of Germany. According to this report, the vision of such negotiations is "a constant nightmare" for Dr. Adenauer.

We submit that the real reason why Dr. Adenauer opposes such negotiations, is not because he is anti-Communist which everyone knows, nor is it because he is opposed to negotiations with the Russians as a matter of principle or of distrust. We contend that he is opposed to such negotiations which would be undertaken between the Allies and Russia rather than between Germany and Russia, and this is the real key to his diplomacy.

Thus, when one examines the substance of Adenauer's talks in the United States it becomes clear that behind all of the diplomatic phraseology the Chancellor has not made any commitments whatsoever that are binding on the Germans. On the other hand, he appears to have obtained commitments from Uncle Sam which, as we mentioned above, should be made known to the American taxpayers. Though he hopes to discredit the possibility of Allied negotiations with Russians over Germany, it would not in any way prevent the Germans from making their own secret deals with the Kremlin.

To sum it up, it appears to us that, while the Chancellor talked and talked, Uncle Sam will continue to pay and pay.

Germany: Shadows of Tomorrow

How the Germans Like Their "Allies"

by

H. A. REINHOLD

"You Americans are fools and don't know the first thing about statesmanship," said the lady doctor acidly. We were sharing a bottle of refreshing Moselle on a hot and stuffy evening in Hamburg last August. "Why did you have to disturb Hitler in his effort to crush the Reds? And then your stupidity at Yalta and Potsdam! We always knew Russia. You should have kept out of things you know nothing about." She was a bitter-looking woman who had seen the terrible things that happened in her native Silesia in 1945, when Breslau surrendered and the Red Army swept over her homeland raping, looting and killing. Almost the same words rang in my ears in the Rhineland, in Bavaria and the small German enclave south of the Brenner pass in Italy.

There is a temptation to write off German griping and carping as no more than a natural psychological reaction to military occupation and the inevitable blunders made in the occupation. The Americans in Germany, consular personnel and occupation employees, I talk to brushed it off as fairly irrelevant. But this is more than "griping" —this is disaffection of such dangerous proportions that it may make the present rebirth of Germany something akin to the one in 1933 and her rearmament a threat to Europe, especially when it coincides, in this country, with a barrage of pro-German articles and anti-British and anti-French publicity. . . .

The first disheartening experience upon returning to your native land is that few take you seriously when you explain that your citizenship papers in the United States imply loyalty to your adopted country. Everyone seems to be convinced that a well-educated European can't possibly be serious about becoming a real American. At first they assume you are just pretending. This, of course, makes you angry and teaches you your first lesson: the average German today has a sovereign contempt for America. . . .

Morning, noon and night, sometimes openly, subtly or brutally, practically every citizen of the Federal Republic will let you know how abysmally inferior we are—the "stupid" British, the "sadistic" French, and the "coarse, untutored" Americans. A well-educated Benedictine tells you how American GI's "starved, froze to death and maltreated German prisoners of war in the compounds of Saffig and Marseilles." One army doctor tells you how his children's favorite pet dog was "stolen in open daylight by an American officer." . . .

Another favorite is the air raids,* above all those on lovely Dresden, which was supposedly destroyed from sheer whim and sadism by "Negroes" from American slums, with the "planes returning to machine gun the refugees on the meadows along the Elbe and in public parks"—or the Allied fighter swooping down "in fun" on a farmer tilling his field, machine-gunning him.

You never hear the end of their complaining about the case of that "noble gentleman," Marshal Kesselring, who "only retaliated" against the brutal assassination of thirty-two German soldiers driving along a highway near Rome. That he not only "retaliated," which, I am told, is permissible in occupied countries, but killed three hundred and fifty men and boys, more than ten times the number of German soldiers killed, is not mentioned. . . .

Most Germans despise all occupying powers, with fine distinctions in pejorative terms given to the Americans and British, but they become incoherent and almost obscene when they speak of the French. How can you enjoy your "homecoming" and seeing old friends again when you have to listen to this, day in and day out, from one end of the republic to the other? . . .

That such bitter criticism often coincides with Russian propaganda, as in the remark of a leading businessman who told me that "Wall Street engineered the Korean war to find an outlet for the glutted steel production of Gary and Pittsburgh"—I quote—seems of no concern to these people who by education and social position ought to be the leaders of their people.

When pressed hard, of course they express their deep abhorrence of Communism, or the Red Army and of Soviet methods. And I do not believe they are consciously repeating Russian-inspired propaganda. It is rather their fierce pride, the chauvinism and their ineradicable superiority feeling which make them carry on a propaganda line that is so consistent, so ubiquitous, so incessant that it almost seems to owe its crushing momentum to a mastermind like the late and unlamented Joseph Goebbels. This spontaneous outburst would delight his heart. It all seems to work without that mastermind, although to the naked eye of the observer it seems to be kept going by the encouraging pats coming from Moscow and certain gentlemen in Washington. . . .

*Pope Pius XII offered to negotiate an agreement on air raids, similar to his Roman truce, and found attentive ears on the Allied side and rebuff from Nazi Germany. The reason for this callous rebuff was that the Nazis were preparing more destructive and more efficient air raids (V2) and were not going to be hamstrung by any agreement, when their turn came.

What is the meaning of this all-pervading complaining and criticizing? Let us try to reason this out. No German takes the responsibility for the past. Hitler and his chief lieutenants are dead and with them all sense of guilt. For the average middle-class German that chapter is closed. . . .

As long as the Soviet means what it was in 1944 and 1945 (rape, murder, looting and cruelty) and what it is now (terror, the police state and its diabolical methods) no real effort is needed to say that you disagree with it. But the Germans will not be identified with those who were right, who were wiser, more humane, more powerful and in many ways more civilized than they during the bitter war years. Therefore this frantic, bitter, spiteful looking for flaws, for frailty, for inefficiency and misjudgment. It is a refusal to be coordinated, to fit oneself into a position of equality, to accept the superiority of others in any field whatsoever. . . .

Yet how are you, a member of a nation famous for learning, for music, for cleanliness, for efficiency, for jolliness in beer gardens and at sing fests, a member of a nation that beat all of Europe into a pulp, twice in twenty-five years, and kept the world at bay two times for four years, who rose from ruins twice by craftiness, hard work and sheer collective gumption, who in defeat was praised for having the only good superweapons, like the V2—how are you going to sing second tenor in the chorus of nations, while by right you should not only have the solo part but be the conductor and really provide the score?

We Americans are apt to belittle this attitude as griping, just as we thought at first that Hitler was only an impossible paperhanger. But this carping criticism is a symptom of something far more serious. It shows the same disaffection and "divine vocation" that have been growing in Germany since Bismarck. It went through gradual stages. Then it became more virulent, and finally ended up by finding its symbol in Hitler. It now has become a neurosis common to a whole class or nation. The sense of humor needed to keep balanced, the subtle feeling for proportion, are gone. To forget the recent past helps.

Does Adenauer himself have tongue in cheek? I don't think so, but the Germans I met certainly have. They have, like Hitler, gambled before—didn't they almost win? Adenauer has got out of the Allies, one by one, more than anybody could have dreamed of, and he will get more, conjuring up a paper army which is then whisked off the conference table, to get more. In their way the Germans are wiser than "the first time," after Versailles: they use Adenauer and his plodding consistency to get as much as they can, without disturbing him, assuming that he is playing a shrewd game. Bit by bit he has led the West to surrender, not only funds, but also the symbols of victory. Nobody doubts his patriotism. The West now has to admit that "the world situation has to be seen our (the German) way. Nothing can be done without us."

This is a triumph, not just national vanity. It is part of a determined course to change defeat into victory and to regain a position lost by the awkward Fuehrer who lost his head at the wrong time. It is no prophecy to predict that Germany will not join the Western defense unless it leads it, and the West makes an unmistakable gesture of surrender. Against the mood expressed by all with whom I came in contact, except a very small minority, the chances of seeing a chastened, cooperative and responsible Germany in a commonwealth of free nations are very slim indeed. It seems to me that either our officials over there don't hear what is being said, or we have another case of their intelligence's going un-evaluated.

With the Reds right in the Germans' backyard, and with our own grim experiences, with our horror of Communism and our firsthand knowledge of Russian aims and methods, American readers may say: How can anybody strike such an attitude? Why don't they see that, unless they join up on the side of freedom, they will themselves be the first victims? Are they mad—or is your interpretation mad?

The answer to this very rational question is not easy, because this situation has all the madness of a real gamble. In the first place I think it is clear what these people think of their would-be allies—the French, the Italians, the British and us. Their conception of an army able to resist the onslaught of the fanatic millions of the East simply differs from what they have seen and now see. . . .

Secondly they have been in similar tight spots before and they got out of them. Weren't they disarmed in 1932 and armed in 1938? Things are in flux, a little aid here and a little aid there can change situations beyond recognition—just remember Rapallo, Berchtesgaden 1938, the 1939 pact. Who knows what will develop and who will take up the reins when Adenauer, who is near eighty, is gone? The Hitler experience, the misery following it, the example of others, have taught them collectively that gambling isn't the worst risk you can take. This vindictive and spiteful attitude, this fierce determination to get back in the saddle, this contempt for the noble gestures of some victors and the fearful caution of another, betray that deep down in their souls they believe that World War II was an unfortunate, costly, yet somehow glorious interlude in the forward march to a German overlordship over Europe. Their own collapse may give them confidence that the same could happen any day to Russia—after all they saw her anxious and willing to be friends in 1939. . . .

Griping and carping don't take these extreme forms unless paranoia has become acute. When paranoid conditions reach a certain stage reason and moral inhibitions vanish. The symptoms are evident now and we had better take an account of them. No young German will collaborate in a cause which he resents as insincere, hypocritical and inferior to his own. Somehow we have not proved our superior ideals in a language the middle-class German understands. Above all we have failed to show him his own record, calmly and factually. We have failed to ask the guardians of his conscience either to abdicate or to demand an examination of conscience. We have forgotten to keep Germany reminded of her misdeeds, while we gave her ample occasion to chalk up petty complaints against us.

I think it is now time to ask the Germans whether they want to be delivered to the Russians or do their part. If they prefer to join the Reds, let them go—before we get more involved. But I know my Germans: when they hear the soft voice and see the big stick they will come around. While we hurt the feelings of the French and English by the tone of our advice, we seem to be more anxious to look the other way whenever the skeleton in the German closet appears. And all the time the Russians carry on their cunning propaganda and the middle- and upper-class German not only plays hard to get, but systematically builds up a mentality which desperately resembles the one that spawned Hitler—only this time it is even fiercer, more determined and far, far more cynical.

ECHOES OF SIEGFRIED

by

ROBERT C. RUARK

I see some stuff about smiling Albert Kesselring, the former German field marshal who wasn't so able at his task in defending Italy against the inroads of democracy, and some more about ex-Field Marshal Erich von Manstein, who just got himself a permanent parole.

Interesting thing is that both gentlemen were sprung as war criminals and already they're beginning to be heroes with Wagnerian overtones and Siegfried himself all ready to work for them.

Von Manstein, sentenced to 18 years for the mass killing of Jews, Russians and hostages, has just been greeted joyously by 2000 villagers. He is a hero in his own home town.

Smiling Albert, that scarfaced old fraud, has just been made chief of Germany's biggest veterans association. He said, "Freedom is still threatened. To ward off this danger the Western world must become united." He also added that to insure German cooperation the West should release the remaining German war criminals.

Mr. Kesselring has been out of jail as a war criminal just seven months.

I don't know how this noble operatic heroism sounds to you, but it sounds sour to me.

I know we need to stand off the Russians, but I still remember Germans, and I wouldn't trust one as far as I could throw him if he had a little defeated weltschmertz going for him. There was World War I and out of it came some forgiven officers and generals. The names are hard to remember, but from the same standing start as Kesselring and Von Manstein, a bloke name of Hitler and another called Goering came up swift like the daisies. Or the poppies in the fields at Flanders.

And the approach is always the same. A hero released from prison, comes home to be decked with roses and to call a meeting of the young embittered at the nearest bierstube. They start out yelling "hoch." And conclude with "sieg heil." Hitler was only a corporal with a fanatic imagination and Goering was a fugitive from Richtofen's famed flying circus, but man what a mess they handed the world. I agree thoroughly with smiling Albert's statement that the Western world must be united but the way smiling A. and his friends have gone about uniting it in recent years leaves me just a touch cold.

You'll pardon my skepticism, I hope, but I do not cotton to ex-German officers who suddenly crawl out of holes and begin to make noble noises. It is a saber-rattling race, and one which rebuilds itself from adversity with fine sentiment. To me a German is still a German and if you will check this sentiment in England, France, and Alsace-Lorraine, you will find it echoed.

I can't fault a military man for working for his country unless he is too free with the baking ovens and the fat-rendering factories. But I am certain sure I will not revere him as a hero when they let him out of jails, nor as a moralist on what we must do to remake the world.

The Two Dangers

by

VISCOUNT NORWICH
(Alfred Duff Cooper)

Since Great Britain became a Power in Europe her consistent foreign policy has been to prevent the domination of the Continent by any one nation. . . .

It would seem therefore that the direction of British foreign policy should in practice prove simple. All that is required is to determine where lies the principal danger to European peace and freedom, and to co-ordinate our own forces with those of our friends in order to prevent that danger from materializing.

Nor, it will be agreed, can doubt exist as to where that danger lies today. Russia is the country that has profited most from the last war. What she lost in men and material counts for nothing with what she gained in territory, in power and in security. The two nations that Russia most feared, and by both of whom she had within this century been defeated in war—Germany in the West and Japan in the East—have suffered disaster. . . .

Russia is vaster and more powerful than she has ever been, and her empire, stretching from the Pacific Ocean into the center of Europe, is, on paper, the most formidable empire the modern world had to face. . . .

Every attempt that has been made by other nations since the war to improve international relations and to provide a basis for a better world community has been deliberately sabotaged by the representatives of Russia and the Communists. . . .

This, briefly stated, is the case against Russia, and it is overwhelming . . .

Yet it may be permissible to believe that of all things the invasion of Western Europe by Russia is the one that is least likely to happen. . . .

Let it not be thought that I undersestimate the magnitude of the Russian peril because I doubt its taking shape in so crude a manifestation as the invasion of Western Europe. The peril exists and we need armed force to withstand it. For two years we have been withstanding it with armed force in Korea, and had that force been stronger that war might now be ended. But the end of it would not mean peace. We know not how or where Russia would strike again, but we can assume it as probable that the soldiers she strikes with will not be Russian soldiers.

Now the most remarkable phenomenon in the modern world is that, seven years after the complete defeat of Germany in the second war which she declared against the civilized world within one-quarter of a century, those free nations, which twice narrowly escaped defeat at her hands, should not only be permitted but should be urging and imploring Germany to rearm as rapidly as possible.

There is one other phenomenon not less surprising. From the earliest times the German people were divided into many different States, and throughout those centuries they contributed their full share in art, literature, music and philosophy to European culture. Nor did they during that period present any particular problem to their neighbors. Eighty-two years ago they were united in one State. Ever since that time their culture had declined, and would hardly have survived if it had not until 1933 been kept alive by the Jewish elements in the population. Ever since that time they have indulged in one war of aggression after another and have twice nearly succeeded in subjugating the free world. In the face of these facts our statesmen appear to have resolved that it would be wise to reunite Germany as soon as possible. A reunited, rearmed Germany would seem to be now one of the principal planks in the platform of Anglo-American foreign policy.

How did it come about? Seven years ago, when Germany had been recently defeated, the main thought in the minds of all who had contributed towards that defeat was that she must never be allowed to do it again. The idealists urged that the German people, who were really just like anybody else but has been misguided, must be re-educated, while the more practical advocated the dismantling of the munition factories which had enabled them to make war.

It would be interesting to inquire how much public money was spent on the program of re-education, and at what date and by whose decision that program was finally abandoned. It might also be asked whether Parliamentary sanction was obtained. The dismantling of German munition factories continued until and possibly after their swift reconstruction had been approved. Although a diligent reader of the newspapers, I cannot remember this astonishing reversal of policy forming the subject of a debate in the House of Commons.

Where there is agreement between the two Front Benches a debate is unnecessary, and it needs a microscope to detect any difference in the foreign policies of the two principal Parties. The main consideration . . . was that the Russian menace was so terrible and so immedate that we must seize upon any weapon that was available to defend ourselves against it. Mr. Churchill is reported to have said, when Russia was forced into the war in 1941, that he would have welcomed the devil out of hell as an ally at that dire moment. And now that the devil has proved, as was ever his wont, an untrustworthy friend in the long run, he is doubtless glad to greet another devil out of a different hell to lend him aid against his former ally. The theme of the first volume of his great work on the last war was summed up by himself in one great lapidary sentence: "How the English-speaking peoples through their unwisdom, carelessness and good nature allowed the wicked to rearm." Will the history of the third world war be prefaced by an even less edifying introduction in which the attributed motives will be replaced by the one word "panic," and "compelled" be substituted for "allowed"?

Nobody will seriously maintain that the Germans of today, the majority of whom enthusiastically supported Adolf Hitler a few years ago, are less "wicked" than their fathers, a smaller majority of whom lent less enthusiastic support to the Hohenzollerns . . .

The only difference between the Germans of thirty years ago and those of today is that these latter have two defeats to avenge instead of one.

My contention is that this great decision of foreign policy, to re-create a powerful, united, armed Germany, has been drifted into rather than calmly arrived at in cold blood, and that the impulsion behind the drift has been fear. It is a decision fraught with consequences which I should like to feel certain has been given full consideration. When it has been implemented Germany will be again, as she was in 1939, the strongest Power on the continent of Europe. Have we any guarantee, have we any reason to suppose, that she will not then act as she acted in 1939? We may be told that there exists today violent animosity between the German and the Russian peoples. But love and hatred play no part in the policy of great nations . . .

Germany today has lost territory on her eastern frontier which she will wish to reconquer. So had she in 1939. It is possible that, when she considers herself strong enough, her first action will be to invade that territory—as it was in 1939. But having recovered it, why should she not then turn against the West as she did in 1939? It suited the Russians then to allow the Germans to do so by coming to terms with them. Will it not suit them equally well next time? As has been said already, Russia prefers to fight her wars with soldiers who are not Russian. Nor are the Germans likely twice to repeat the capital error of Napoleon. They will not invade Russia a second time.

There are those who believe that the character of the German people has undergone a profound change in the last few years, and that two defeats have taught them that war is not a profitable pursuit. . . .

If it be true that war has wrought this miracle, a few more wars may succeed in converting into angels the remainder of the human race. I remember the late Lord Tyrrell saying to me shortly before the outbreak of the last war: "There is going to be a debate in the House of Lords on the question whether there are any good Germans. If I speak I shall say that I don't know, but one thing I do know is that in all my long experience of Germany I have never heard of a good German stopping a bad German doing what he wanted to do."

Nobody but a fool would pretend that there are no good Germans. Doubtless Herr Adenauer is one of them . . .

Taking therefore their behavior in the past and their intrests in the present as our guides, we may endeavor to form some estimate of their conduct in the future. In 1914 they were stronger and more prosperous than they have ever been. They had the best army in the world and the second largest navy. They had a considerable colonial empire and their commerce was capturing the markets of the world. But they complained that they had no place in the sun and they went to war.

In 1939 they had made the most remarkable recovery from defeat that any country has ever accomplished. After twenty years they were in a stronger position than any of their victors. They had broken every treaty they had signed and had successfully ignored such feeble protests as had been provoked. They were assured that if they still had any grievances they had only to bring them to the council table, where they would be favorably considered. But they said they had no room to live (Lebensraum), although they were less densely populated than many other countries, and they went to war.

The false excuses that they gave before are true today. They have no place in the sun, and owing to their refugees their country is overcrowded. They had everything to lose by war in 1914. They had much to lose in 1939. Today they have little, if anything, to lose and everything to gain. And what they have to gain, after they have rectified their eastern frontier, lies in all the West—wealth, overseas trade, rich land and vast colonies. Can anybody believe that a rearmed, reunited Germany will not demand these advantages and will not go to war if they are denied to her?

"But you cannot hold down indefinitely a nation of sixty million," is an objection that is frequently encountered. If it were true, it was a pity that it did not occur to our statesmen before they launched their country into two wars in order to do this very thing. If we are now willing to hand to Germany on a golden plate the hegemony of Europe, then the Governments of Mr. Asquith and of Mr. Chamberlin would stand convicted of criminal incompetence and the young men who died at their behest would become their sorry dupes.

But of course Mr. Asquith and Mr. Chamberlin were right, and those who fell were heroes fighting for the cause of freedom. The argument is one of defeatism and despair . . .

". . . There are millions of people in Britain and the West who look with fear on this plan to build a great new German Army and Air Force in the heart of Europe.

"There are millions who do not believe that once the Germans have got this powerful military machine they will remain obedient and docile members of the European Community.

"The lesson of history is that when Germans like Speidel feel themselves strong enough they become once more the old arrogant bullies of Europe.

"Once the West German soldiers and industrialists have this powerful army they will soon be demanding the right to once more dictate the course of events in Europe . . ."

(By H. O. Ward in the Reynolds News 5-3-53)

". . . The three Western powers have created conditions under which a majority of the war criminals now in prison can obtain their release.

"They have done this because they will do almost anything to soothe and cajole German opinion into acceptance of the rearmament plans. . . .

"They have not, however, answered the question of whether the Germans thus brought into military cooperation with the West will, in fact, prove reliable allies in peace and war."

(By Drew Middleton in the N. Y. Times 2-24-53)

To raise the argument to a high level, why should we fight against the power of evil without hope of administering a complete and everlasting defeat?

But the problem is neither so grave nor so insoluble. There are many ways in which the re-emergence of Germany as a menace to world peace can be prevented.

The first and the simplest was the creation of a real union of Western Europe. Such a union could never have been a reality except under the leadership of Great Britain. After the war we had the great opportunity of uniting the western European world, which would have comprised practically the whole continent of Africa, under British leadership. In so powerful a confederation Germany could have played a useful and a subordinate part. That opportunity was missed. In a united Europe, without Great Britain, Germany must predominate, and we cannot blame our continental friends if their enthusiasm for it has evaporated since our withdrawal.

In a European army to which Great Britain contributed, and behind which the United States stood as guarantor, German units might have been welcomed. But a European army without Great Britain, an army based upon units counted in divisions, becomes simply an armed army from which any ally can withdraw at a moment's notice.

United Europe and the European army are lost causes and Great Britain is heavily to blame for their loss.

But if we accept this fact, as many people will be reluctant to do, just as they were reluctant to accept the bankruptcy of the League of Nations in the early 1930s, there still remains an easy way of protecting ourselves against a recrudescence of the German menace. We have only to put the production of the Ruhr and the Saar under strict international control. Germany would be represented on the board in order to protect the wages and conditions of the workers, but the distribution of the products would be decided upon by the western democracies. The prosperity of Germany would not suffer. The condition of her people would improve and her armed forces would receive the weapons with which, in the opinion of the peace-loving countries, they could be trusted.

It may be said that this is roughly what the Schuman plan is intended to do. But the Schuman plan, like the European army, has been robbed of reality by the refusal of Great Britain to participate. Without the powerful sanction of Great Britain behind it the plan becomes no more than a signed agreement between Germany and some of her neighbors. Can such an agreement bind a reunited and rearmed Germany? Neither Fredrick II, nor William II, nor Bismarck, nor Hitler, nor any other German has ever held himself bound by a treaty that it suited him to break. If we make it possible for the Germans to regain complete control of the Saar and of the Ruhr, there is no earthly power left at our disposal by which we can prevent them from doing it again.

I have entitled this article "The Two Dangers." The awful thought occurs that they may be only one. What interest divides the resurgent nationalist movement in Germany from the narrow nationalist imperialism of Russia? . . .

Anti-semitism, which seems to be growing in Communist countries and which has never died in Germany, might well furnish a background to a better understanding between the new Germany and the old Russia. Such an understanding, leading to alliance, would be true to the best tradition of German diplomacy. The Russian alliance formed the very backbone of Bismarck's foreign policy, and immediately after the First World War it was to Russia that the Weimar Republic first turned for an ally. Then Germany was divided from Russia by an independent Poland, upon whose new-won liberty both Germans and Russians cast covetous eyes. Now Poland lies moribund in the grip of Russia, but there is still enough flesh on the carcass to satisfy the appetite of the two hyenas should they come together on a policy of partition. Then Germany, her eastern territorial demands satisfied by Russia at the expense of Poland, her armed foces splendidly re-equipped at the expense of America, untrammelled by any entangling ideologies, would be once more in a position to challenge the world.

(Condensed—Courtesy, The National and English Review)

". . . Russian policy toward Germany will always be dangerous to the interests of the United States and a united Europe as long as the Germans recognize that Russia is the only country which can reunite Germany.

". . . German nationalism is a Russian ally. As long as its leaders toy with dreams of an independent, neutral and armed Germany created by Russian indulgence and see beyond that Germany the prospect of recovery of lost territories now under Polish rule, the natural and laudable desire of a patriotic people for reunification of their country will be played upon by Soviet political strategists to the detriment of European unity."

"MY, HOW OUR FAMILY HAS CHANGED!"

Views on Germany

by

R. H. S. CROSSMAN

. . . Dr. Adenauer's unexpected strength is due to what observers in Bonn call "the Restoration." An astonishing economic recovery has been accompanied by a revival of reactionary and nationalistic forces which cannot be appreciated without a visit to the Federal Republic.

. . . In this capitalistic paradise, politics center on foreign affairs. As a Rhineland Catholic, Dr. Adenauer is ideally suited to negotiate with France those elaborate schemes of economic and military integration which within five years will enable fifty million Germans to dominate Western Europe. The Chancellor is sincerely anti-Nazi, sincerely in favor of European Federation, sincere even in his preference for a German contribution to E. D. C. as against a German Army as part of Nato. But behind him stand men who regard all these schemes as a cover for a renewed bid to dominate Europe. The neo-Nazis and nationalists are still in the penumbra of politics; they are content to let Dr. Adenauer and his dim, respectable lieutenants hold the limelights. Because the postures of democracy are still necessary to keep the Americans sweet and get the dollars, Adenauer is the man of the hour, just as Stresemann was the man of the hour in the1920s. But when German power has been built up and the twelve divisions created, these postures of democracy will be unnecessary. Then the Adenauer regime will give place to something a great deal tougher.

The one thing which could spoil, or at least interrupt, this second stage of "the Restoration" would be an outbreak of peace. If there were free elections in a united Germany, the Socialists would probably get a clear majority. Moreover, if Germany became a military vacuum, America would lose interest and the dollars cease to flow. Without the cold war, the Government in Bonn and the industrialists in Düsseldorf would be in a very poor way. They know this, and they have drawn the necessary conclusion: the cold war shall not be allowed to thaw out.

The Socialists see all the dangers of the Restoration. "The feeble beginnings of German democracy are withering," one of them said to me, "as the Right-wing politicians appeal more and more openly to the ex-Nazis and the last key positions in the Civil Services are stormed by the Old Guard." But what can Ollenhauer do? He would like to have a strong domestic programme, but the trade unions, which since the war have been non-political and include Catholics, are not in fighting mood. He still opposes German rearmament under E. D. C., but he has been forced to shift his ground until he is now prepared to accept it under Nato. Of course, the German Socialists would prefer a Four-Power agreement which made all this unnecessary. Indeed, most of them, I think, would still be prepared to accept some form of neutralization, as an interim stage, if this was the price the Russians demanded for free elections in the whole of Germany. But in the present atmosphere they dare not say so for fear of being denounced as appeasers. The one clear piece of advice I got from Socialist Headquarters was: "If the British Government really wants to test the sincerity of the Russian peace offensive, the one thing it should do is to shut its ears to Dr. Adenauer."

How wise this advice was I realized when I heard Dr. Brentano, who leads Dr. Adenauer's C. D. U. in the Bundestag, explain to the Anglo-German gathering at Königswinter his Government's attitude to the Russian peace overtures. Dr. Brentano is the kind of party politician who moves loyally with the times. His speeches, therefore, reflect with sensitive accuracy the growth of German nationalist egotism. On Sunday he was peremptory. The Western Powers must realize, he told us, that there can be no question of any sacrifice whatsoever by Germany for the sake of unity. Whatever the Russians propose, integration with the West must proceed; every form of neutralization must be excluded; and the claim to the lost provinces East of the Oder Line must be fully maintained.

Since Dr. Brentano spoke from a carefully prepared brief, and in the knowledge of what Dr. Adenauer and Mr. Eisenhower had agreed in Washington, his words cannot be dismissed as idle vaporing. The Bonn Government's minimum demand is the unconditional withdrawal of Russia from Eastern Germany; and it further gives notice that, if the Russians were mad enough to agree, the next demand would be for those parts of Prussia and Silesia now incorporated in Poland. By putting forward such claims, Dr. Adenauer is telling the world that Four-Power talks would be pure waste of time.

What is significant is that he now feels strong enough to behave in this way—to forbid a détente, even if Britain and France desire one. So much for the argument that West Germany would be easier to manage if she were integrated into the West! What this argument overlooks is that the Germans have a vested interest in cold war; and, as their industrial and military strength grows, so will their national ambitions and their bargaining power. They have convinced themselves that, if only a peace settlement can be prevented, rearmament will soon produce a situation where the Russians can be forced to withdraw, not only from the East Zone but from Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, too. Once the Federal Republic is rearmed, they are confident that, with the help of Mr. Dulles, they will force the jittery French and British to accept a real Liberation policy.

Back in London reflecting on Dr. Brentano's words, I feel already that they have lost something of their force; and I can understand how those who have not been to Bonn recently console themselves with the thought that, after all, German politicians are often tactless and that, if the Bonn Government really tried to make serious trouble, we should be able to keep it in order. Today this may still be so. But what about 1956, when a stridently nationalist Germany will control the main land forces of the West and a huge arms industry? Will it be so easy then to prevent trouble? We are told that German divisions are essential to the defense of the West and that for this reason we cannot afford any agreement with the Russians which would postpone German rearmament. Let those who harbor this delusion make the pilgrimage to Bonn and survey the field where the dragon's teeth are being sown.

Germany Plots with the Kremlin

by

T. H. TETENS

Reviewed by Albert Simard

To recognize a deadly disease is an important achievement, but still greater is the triumph when the disease is checked and eliminated.

Following the end of World War II we recognized in good time the malignancy of Soviet totalitarianism, but have we been able to devise a cure? The truth of the matter is that having evaluated correctly Russia's expansionist aims, we proceeded to set up the "German bulwark" against communism and then proudly proclaimed it as the "cure-all."

Our experts on Germany were sure of their ground—so sure that this fundamental revision in our German policy was treated as though it were of no affair ot the American people or their representatives in Congress. It was presented as a fait accompli—a sacred cow that was above public and congressional debate or investigation.

Thus, for 7 years or so, the American people have found themselves in the position of bystanders who are expected to sit it out until the final act of this tragedy unfolds to completion. Perhaps this will suit some of us, but the onrushing crisis in our German policies will not permit any of us to sit on the sideline. We are all involved.

We can meet the crisis—yes, and solve it—provided that we recognize the "cure-all" for what it is—a drug which has dulled our sense of realism and moral responsibility. "The bulwark against aggressive Communism must be the United States (and her proven friends)—and not a people who—'at the decisive moment'—will make common cause with our enemies."

These are the concluding words of the recently published book, Germany Plots With The Kremlin, by T. H. Tetens. We should be thankful that in this period when wishful thinking determines our policies towards Germany, this book has appeared. Germany Plots With The Kremlin, if carefully studied, can equip the people and their policy-makers with the kind of realism which is so necessary if we are to avoid a catastrophe in Europe on a scale that would resemble the emergence of Communist power in China. In this connection, the author quotes Senator Guy M. Gilette who, on April 19, 1950, in a speech at Town Hall in New York declared:

"A day of reckoning will come over Germany just as it came over China. I suspect that the resulting explosion in the U. S. will make the outcry on China seem like a pleasant afternoon tea.

"For in Germany it will be seen that we have not only lost the second world war—and that the Nazis, rather than we, were the victors—but that we have, unconsciously, prepared the way for us to lose a third world war if it comes."

Mr. Tetens is not a novice in German affairs. He is German born and lived a good part of his adult life in Germany. The author has written numerous newspaper articles, pamphlets and books dealing with the most fundamental aspects of the German problem. Because of his extensive knowledge in this field, he was employed for highly confidential assignments by the U. S. Government. In all of his works one can detect not only the talent and ability of a student of German geopolitics, but a courageous fighter for truth.

Germany Plots With The Kremlin is no ordinary book. On the contrary, it has the quality and indeed historic significance of the famous ride of Paul Revere. One of the unique aspects of this book lies in the fact that the author has devoted page after page to comments by the Germans themselves as to their real feelings towards the East and West. Mr. Tetens has indicted the German plotters through their own mouths. He has done so by the utilization of an unprecedented wealth of documentation ranging from statements made by Germany's key leaders, including Chancellor Adenauer, to the most authoritative newspapers and publications in Germany.

For the first time the American people are given an intimate glimpse of the workings of the German geopoliticians who were the inspirers and guides for the Nazis in their drive toward world conquest. One of their secret directives issued from Madrid is published for the first time and this 30 page document (translated from the German) provides a clear and concise blueprint for Germany's future plans to re-emerge as a dominating world power despite military defeat in World War II.

The sensational aspect of this document is the fact that, when it is compared with the statements of Germany's leading politicians and newspapers, it becomes clear that the geopolitical masters who blueprinted Hitler's drive for conquest, are once again secretly guiding the destinies of Adenauer's Germany.

The appendix of the book contains other authoritative documentation all attesting to the fact that German policy, past and present, has never veered from the age old Pan-German dream of "Deutschland über alles."

Mr. Tetens shows how our policy-makers in their haste to combat Soviet totalitarianism, adopted policies in Germany which ignored the basic forces that had molded Germany in the past and will determine Germany's actions in the not too distant future. Our policy-makers, according to Mr. Tetens, while grabbing the few straws which point toward a Western orientation in Germany, have ignored the fact that Germany, perhaps more than any other major power in Europe, has had close and intimate ties with the Russians for decades. By accepting the superficial evidence rather than the substance, we have built a policy in Germany based on the unfounded assumption that Germany would cooperate with the West as a trustworthy ally and serve as a bulwark against the Communist East.

Mr. Tetens shows how this optimism is divorced from reality and that the Germans are once again carefully building up their bridges in the East.

During the period when Hitler ruled the Reich, it was generally assumed by Western statesmen that a Nazi tie-up with the Soviets was unthinkable. This illusion, however, was shattered in 1939 only to be reborn after World War II. The fact of the matter is that regardless of our dreams, the Germans are steadily working toward a new tie-up with the Russians in the spirit of the Treaty of Rapallo which confronted the world in the 1920s with the menacing spectre of a Russo-German alliance. The spirit of Rapallo has risen again and Mr. Tetens has amassed extensive documentation to prove it. Thus, for example, one of Germany's leading newspapers and mouth piece of the German Foreign Office writes:

"What Can Russia Win If She Plays Her Trump Card? . . . In order to jump out from her present isolation she can, exactly as the Rapallo Treaty did 30 years ago, place Germany as a protecting buffer between the East and the West. From the politico-economic point of view, she could repeat the old game for world power position by concluding longterm agreements with German industry and by renewing her trade with Germany. Thus, Russia might reopen the door to the world market." Editorial in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, March 15, 1952.)

A similar allusion to Rapallo was carried in an editorial of another important German publication:

"Never before has the world political situation been so favorable for Germany as it is today . . . It is not for nothing that both power blocs concentrate their efforts on Germany in order to dominate it politically and economically. Therein lies our chance and our obligation. Our economy has to be kept independent from both sides . . . This is the way that leads towards sovereignty and equality which finally will eliminate all those clauses which were imposed upon us as a result of the lost war . . . While integration with the West restricts our industry to markets where we are subjected to a cut-throat competition, the Eastern bloc offers us markets where countless millions are hungry for our industrial goods. Here (in the East) is Germany's market . . . Thirty years ago, on April 16, 1922, there were courageous men who, in Rapallo, through direct Russo-German negotiations brought a great turning point in Germany's post-war policy . . . The situation in present day Germany should exhort our leading statesmen to show courage . . . courage towards a Rapallo Policy." (From the editorial "Courage Towards A Rapallo" of the weekly Der Fortschritt, Essen, May 16, 1952.)

On January 18, 1952, Der Fortschritt insisted that the strategy of the German Foreign Office must be:

THE GERMAN DEAL

"There appears to be a minor panic in Washington over the possibility that the new Soviet diplomatic offensive will wreck the drive for West German rearmament. If the strategy of freedom can be so fatally swept aside by a few fresh winds from Moscow, it is time we took a critical look at our strategy.

"The Post has long believed that it is unwise to treat Germany as Western Europe's indispensable military man. Millions on both sides of the Iron Curtain cannot lightly banish their gruesome remembrances of German aggression. Moscow knows all that and is shrewdly exploiting such emotions.

"It is easy for some Americans who have never endured German conquest to dismiss the fears as irrational; surely the immediate peril is the spectre of Soviet armed power. But Europeans may justly retort that it is equally irrational for Americans to forget so swiftly the terrors of German militarism and the occasion on which it suddenly joined hands with the Soviet despotism to set off World War II.

"When Dr. Adenauer was in Washington the other day, a band played 'Deutschland Uber Alles' in recognition of the new diplomatic way. Somebody hastily explained that the more bellicose words of this historic theme-song of conquest have been altered. But it still sounds like funeral music to free men . . ."

ON POLITICAL TOURS (Sueddeutche Zeitung: E. M. Lang)

London 1952: His Lordship

Paris 1953: Mr. Conrad Chevalier

Washington 1953: Old Shakehand

Moskau 19—?: Comrade Konni Adenarov

"Never burn the bridges towards the East; gain time and keep on with diplomatic negotiations."

Recent events show how some of the most powerful forces in Germany are working towards that end. For example, Germany's leading industrialists and Hitler supporters are operating behind the scenes to prepare the groundwork for new economic ties with the Russians. History tells us that an economic entente of such a character usually foreshadows political alliances. Thus the industrial captains of the Ruhr, according to the Swiss journal Wochenzeitung (March 6, 1952), have admitted that they

"underestimated Russian strength when they looked at the East through the ideological glasses of Nazism."

Now these industrialists will follow their real interests by collaboration with the East. Mr. Tetens quotes the newspaper as stating that while Chancellor Adenauer

"has still to function as an ice breaker in order to remove the barrier that is blocking the road to full independence . . . the geopoliticians in the meantime have to study the problems and prepare the terrain for further diplomatic actions."

One of the leading magnates of the Ruhr told this Swiss newspaper:

"Indeed, Germany's prospects in the East are far more attractive than those which are offered us in the West."

This thought finds its echo in the leading newspaper of Western Germany, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung:

"The Chancellor is stubborn but he is a realist . . . It is obvious that he follows the correct thesis to do at the same time one thing, namely to increase our strength by cooperating with the West—and not to neglect the other, namely to come to an agreement with the East." (June 23, 1952.)

"Germany knows for sure that in a new war between the great power blocs it will suffer far more than all the others . . . Our foreign policy should assure the Russians that the West European potential will not be employed against the East, a suggestion that can be used as a trade-in for territorial concessions in the East . . . When Stresemann concluded his Locarno Treaty, he made it a condition that no foreign troops should be allowed to march through Germany. Thus Russia must feel sure that during peace time only German troops will be stationed in Germany." (July 10, 1952.)

In the sharp conflict between the opposing ideologies of democracy and Communist totalitarianism, our policy-makers appeared to have forgotten that nations are not permanently wedded to one another on ideological or sentimental grounds alone. Above all this holds true for the Germans, the masters of Realpolitik. Yet, we have ignored this simple truism and have been content to build the edifice of our German policy on supposedly common ideological grounds with the Germans. Mr. Tetens shows that the Russian Communists were never swayed by ideological differences in their estimation of Germany's intentions.

How do the Germans hope to regain their former position and from there launch a third try at world domination? They believe that this can be done by agreement with the Russians but only when they can prove to the men in the Kremlin that they are powerful in their own right and have the resources of Western Europe behind them. Mr. Tetens shows that this is Chancellor Adenauer's concept of the Third Power Bloc. Writing in his newspaper, the Rheinische Merkur on May 20, 1950, the Chancellor said:

"A federated Europe will become a Third Force in the world, not as strong as Russia or the United States, but powerful enough to intervene successfully—in a decisive moment—to safeguard the peace . . . Germany has again become a factor with whom others will have to reckon in international affairs . . . There is also a long-range economic goal: the colonization of Africa . . . If we Europeans colonize Africa, we create at the same time a supplier of raw materials for Europe which will be of the greatest importance."

In his speech at the Waldorf-Astoria during his visit to the United States, the Chancellor returned to this theme of the Third Power Bloc. This concept has been repeated time and again in leading periodicals and newspapers and by the geopoliticians. This Bloc must be strategically located and relatively safe from Soviet Russia and America. Thus, the German geopolitician Anton Zischka writes in his book "Africa":

"Our present position might be unpleasant but it has one advantage: The East is blocked to us and the process of Americanization has reached its dead-end. Thus, the only way open is to the South, to Africa."

The leading geopolitical newspaper of Western Germany, Christ und Welt, which is also close to Chancellor Adenauer, carried an editorial which said that a strong Germany dominating Western Europe will be able to make the following offer to the Kremlin:

"Continental Europe would break away from the Atlantic Pact if the Soviets agree to withdraw their forces behind the Pripet-Marshes and release not only the Eastern Zone of Germany, but the whole of Eastern Europe into the European Union. A Western Europe standing on its own feet and possessing its own powerful army . . . could afford to carry out such an independent policy because it will have the strength of a third power." (December 27, 1951.)

The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung has also dealt with the setting up of the Third Power Bloc:

"We do not need to call the attention of the experienced men in the Kremlin to the fact that a strong and unified Western Europe can defend its independence against every side. Why should the Kremlin not be interested in such an independence? . . . If the world, which is split today in two parts, could be reshuffled into a number of independent power groups, it may prevent this horrible conflagration for mankind. A flexible and prudent Russian policy could, for instance, grant German unification in exchange for the independence of Europe which could be defended against every side. In such a case the reunification of Germany would become a guarantee for peace. The treaties which are presently signed will not prove to be a curb toward reunification if the Russians remain interested in such a solution." (May 30, 1952.)

The above are merely samples of the numerous quotations from the German press which clearly indicate that the Third Power Bloc is Germany's trump card by which she hopes to regain her mastery over Europe. When this is achieved, and at the appropriate time, this power bloc will then break away from the United States and make common cause with the Soviets.

The creation of a Third Power Bloc under German domination would in itself be a disaster to the American policy of trying to construct a United Europe as a defense against Communism. The fact that such a bloc would have a probable orientation toward the East would be an additional disaster. That the Germans hope to dominate Western Europe with the new power granted to them by the grace of the Allies is understood by all the peoples of Western Europe. Mr. Tetens reported a statement by Senator Hickenlooper during a Hearing in the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee in March, 1952:

"I was told . . . that Europeans were not so fearful of German military resurgence but that basically there was running through the minds of each of those countries, the French, the British, the Italians and so on, the thought that if they took Germany into a comparatively integrated Europe, in 10 years' time, Germany would own all of Europe, that is, the German industry, the German organizing ability, . . . would completely dominate the economy of Europe, and the rest of them would be more or less economic satellites of Germany within about 10 years' time . . . Within 10 years, they will have obtained by peace what they could not obtain by two wars . . ."

The Germans themselves make no bones about it. Jacob Kaiser, the Minister for Unification in the Adenauer government, declared:

"No real Europe can be formed until the German bloc is reconstituted. I remind you that this bloc includes, in addition to Germany, Austria, a part of Switzerland, the Saar of course, and Alsace-Lorraine. When I think of the Strasbourg Cathedral, my heart hurts."

In a similar vein, Dr. Hans Christian Seebohm, Minister of Commerce, addressed a mass meeting of Sudeten Germans on September 15, 1951, where he denounced

"the monstrous crime the victors had committed against Germany, Europe and the whole world."

As to the question whether Germany must join the West or the West be dependent on Germany, Herr Seebohm said:

"Does free Europe want to join Germany? Germany is the heart of Europe, and the limbs must adjust themselves to the heart, not the heart to the limbs."

The idea of a German dominated Europe is not something new. It is as old as Pan-Germanism itself. One of Dr. Adenauer's friends, the I. G. Farben tycoon Dr. Duisberg wrote the following in a book by the father of German geopolitics, General Haushofer:

"Only an integrated trading-bloc, stretching out from Bordeaux to Sofia, will enable Europe to gain that innermost economic strength which is necessary to uphold her leading position in the world . . . the longing for a thousand year Reich cries for a new approach. For such a purpose we can use the mirage of a Pan-Europe."

Thus, under the guise of posing as the crusaders for European unity, the Germans are rapidly marshalling their forces to sink their claws into Europe as the "prelude for their "big day" with the Russians.

After World War II it was generally accepted by our policy makers that a weak Germany would be dominated by Russia as the first step towards her communization. On that assumption our experts on Germany devised the policy of "rehabilitating Germany" which meant in essence a policy of enabling Germany to regain her former economic power. The line that Russia wanted a weak Germany was never supported by the facts. On the contrary, both Stalin and Molotov repeatedly emphasized the permanence of the German State and the necessity of allowing full freedom for the development of Germany's economic potential. The Soviet proposals of last year underline the fact that the Russians were never wedded to a policy of whittling down Germany's industrial war potential. The Kremlin has now made it perfectly clear that they will support a strong powerful Germany based on an unlimited industrial war potential which could support a national German Army.

Under these circumstances one can rightly ask the question whether our present policies towards Germany are actually playing into the hands of Russian calculations. It is unquestionably true that the Russians would like to foist Communism upon the Germans but they may not be in a hurry to do that job. What they are more interested in at the present time is to create such a Germany that would possess the material wherewithall to launch its own independent actions and to be able to pursue an independent policy in all directions. This would open up great possibilities for the Russian bloc because it would offer the Germans the great opportunities of the vast markets in the East and consequently, it would offer military and political guarantees of a nature which would enable the Germans to wield their power against the West. As Mr. Tetens points out, this thought was expressed in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung on September 4, 1952:

"Western Germany should follow a policy of cooperation with the Western powers. But this must never lead to a situation in which Germany becomes the battlefield and the Germans the cannon fodder . . . When, however, against all expectations and reasons, the Americans should start an aggression against the East, disregarding our determination and probably those of other Europeans to stay out of the war, then we should not be forced into participation in a war just for the reason the Americans had helped us in our rearmament. In such a case, the superior strength of Europe should then be automatically directed against any disturbance of the peace that comes from the West.

Can it therefore be that the Russians have in a subtle way egged us on to increase Germany's war potential, hoping that its ultimate use would be against the West?

The imposing evidence of the plot which Germany is hatching must not be ignored. We would repeat the statement of the Los Angeles News in its review of Germany Plots With The Kremlin:

"In the light of what has happened to us in connection with Germany we believe we should be well advised to heed Mr. Teten's warning. At least we should read his book. We hope the President reads it. We hope Secretary of State John Foster Dulles reads it, too, for that matter. It's something that needs telling and the least we can do is listen."

". . . In Spain, Schacht spoke out against 'Bolshevism and Dollarism.' Asked how he felt about the Allied occupation of West Germany, he replied, 'The same way Spain felt towards Napoleon when he attacked you.'. . ."

THEIR HEROES

". . . The Chancellor has been Washington's white hope in Germany during his four years in office; he has been one of the leading champions of everything the United States has sought to achieve in Europe; accordingly, he has the right to feel that the American government will want to help him.

"One matter on which this kind of assistance is being sought is the burning issue of German war criminals. About 800 war criminals and other military criminals and other military prisoners are still held by the three Western Allies, one-third of them by the United States. Almost all these prisoners are regarded as innocent, and even as heroes, by a large part of the German public.

"Dr. Adenauer would like to get a bilateral American-German board into operation immediately to grant a series of clemencies before the elections. This would undoubtedly be of importance at the polls . . ."

(Gaston Coblentz to the N. Y. Herald Tribune 6/11/53)

GERMAN DIPLOMATS

"Accusations were leveled against secretary of State Dr. Hallstein for his personnel policy. One of his proteges is Ernst Ostermann von Roth who at present is embassy counselor in Santiago de Chile. Not only was Ostermann von Roth an SS man, he also was honored by Himmler with an SS dagger. He is expected to be recalled to Bonn shortly and the development is watched with interest."

EASTWARD HO!

"West Germany's drive to become a major economic power in the post-war Middle East is accelerating again after a temporary slowdown. The large German firms re-entering the Arab markets were reported this week to include the Krupp interests . . .

"The extent to which West Germany is active in the Middle East, long a favorite field for German ambitions, is indicated by three current developments.

"The first of these concerns Egypt, where competitive bids are being made by foreign firms to provide machinery for exploitation of the untapped iron ore resources of the Aswan region. Four of the six leading bidders are German . . .

"In another development, Iraq—one of the Arab League states most annoyed by the German-Israeli deal—is reported this week to be dickering with German firms on a development project in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley . . .

"Prof. Ernst Heinkel, one of Germany's leading aircraft builders, returned recently from Cairo where he was feted by the Egypt Air Force and government."

GERMANY'S ACE SALESMAN

". . . Dr. Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht, once Hitler's highly publicized financial adviser, now is sitting behind the president's desk of a new Duesseldorf Bank, Schacht & Co., explicitly established to organize German-Arab trade.

"Fit and active at 76, and appropriately 'de-Nazified,' Herr Schacht recently visited every Arab country. In Cairo, he talked about barter deals involving Egyptian cotton and German machinery, in Damascus about the development of new iron mines, and in Teheran, about the advantages of an Iranian oil mission's being based on Bonn.

"Herr Schacht's objective is to bring West Germany's trade with the Middle East up to its profitable pre-war level—to Germany's 1938 10 per cent of all Egypt's foreign trade and 25 per cent of all Iran's import trade."

GROWING CHAUVINISM

"German nationalism, the kind that flourished long before Hitler, is coming back fast in Western Germany. The Nazi troublemakers get the headlines, but reviving nationalism is more important. it will probably be the dominant force in West Germany before long . . .

"The nationalistic spirit has already reached the point where Germans who have worked for the Allies during the occupation are viewed with suspicion. Germans who have visited America for educational training are likewise suspect. Newspapers that wrangled permits from the Allies so they could publish early in the post-war period are derided as the 'licensed press.'

"And, in court, if a German lawyer wants to get a light sentence for his client, he need only remark in passing that the defendant once suffered in an Allied prisoner-of-war camp . . ."

BLUEPRINT

". . . The blueprint for Germany's comeback as a power in the aviation field was disclosed by Herman Kastner, associate director of the 'Association for the Development of Air Transport' . . .

"In an interview, Kastner said: 'First, we shall build sports and training planes. Then we hope we can build transport planes under foreign license. We've already discussed this possibility with the Douglas, Lockheed and Consolidated companies in America.

" 'Once our aviation industry gets going, we'll be a tough competitor. After all, a German will work for two marks (46 cents) an hour while an American wants at least two dollars. So we can undercut American plane producers in the world markets.' "

GERMAN BANKERS

"The CDU banker and deputy Pferdmenges of Cologne has taken over again the directorship of the Oppenheim Bank following the death of Baron Oppenheim. Baron Pferdmenges is in very close contact with the new Schacht Bank in Dusseldorf. It was the expressed desire of Schacht that Pferdmenges got in touch with the Arabic States. The late Baron Oppenheim was against this move. Now Pferdmenges is free to do as he wants to do. Pferdmenges is also an opponent of the ratification of the reparation agreement with Israel. However, he cannot succeed since the majority of the Socialist Party is in favor of the agreement. By the way, the connection of the Oppenheim Bank, i.e. Pferdmenges, with the Schacht Bank is not official."

A GERMAN OPERATOR

"Symptomatic of West Germany's powerful economic resurgence on world markets is the announcement by Dr. Herrmann von Siemens, chairman of the board of Siemens & Halske, that his company and a Swiss associate have been awarded a contract by Venezuela to install a modern telephone system in Caracas. . . .

"Herr von Siemens said in his annual company report the contract was valued at 100,000,000 Deutsche marks ($23,800,000). New telephone installations, he said, would service 85,000 subscribers and would incorporate the new Siemens motor dialing system.

"Siemens & Halske and its affiliate, Siemens-Schuckert, are leading manufacturers of electrical equipment and machines in Europe. Their turnover last year was in excess of 1,200,000,000 Deutsche marks ($2,857,000,000). Their combined exports last year were 20 per cent higher than in 1951 . . ."

The organization possesses a complete archive of files, passports and papers of soldiers who died in the war. NAZIS AT WORK

"The B D J (Bund Deutsche Jugend), the terrorist organization, the unmasking of which a few months ago caused a general indignation in all the countries, has just held its Congress to elect a new leadership. It appears that 67 industrial firms in West Germany have supported this gang, the purpose of which, among others, was to assassinate the leaders of the democratic movements and to destroy all monuments erected to the victims of Nazism. According to the Swiss publication, 'Die Tat,' the members of this organization received a monthly subsidy of 50,000 marks per month from the American High Commissioner.

"According to the German weekly, 'Der Spiegel,' this gang was slated to become the backbone of the new German army.

"Another gang of Nazi killers operates under the camouflage of 'Shock Brigade Against Bolshevik Decay.' In a secretly circulated brochure to its members, the organization begs its members not to reveal the true name of the organization which is a 'protection of the German Fatherland,' the purpose no doubt, being to conceal the para-military character of this organization which has secret military organizations in various regions, the structure of which corresponds exactly to the Chief of Staff of the Wehrmacht."

WORKING BOTH SIDES

"The German industrialists indeed want to rearm Germany in order to do business with both the West and the East. Western markets cannot satisfy the Germans; they would like to be able to sell in both central and eastern Europe. It is known that they have already established contacts with the Iron Curtain countries. Recently a Duesseldorf paper reported that a very important firm ostensibly delivered a large order of cranes for Norway. However, this order was transshipped in mid-ocean to a Polish ship and delivered at a Polish port. This story was never denied."

DREAMS?

"Germany's 200 out-of-work generals are on the warpath again. Make no mistake about that. With dizzy dreams of conquest, undeterred by defeat, these ambitious, clever and relentless men are back on the job of arousing the latent militarism in 50,000,000 West German hearts.

"In rooms draped with nationalist flags, the generals talk of 'military honors,' of the need to free every war criminal before German soldiers side with the west . . .

"There is little disagreement among the members of the generals' club on what it is they want—only about the means to achieve it.

"The wiser heads remember the slow-but-sure methods used by their predecessors to get round the restrictions of the Versailles Treaty after World War I.

THE SENTENCE

"For killing 21 Jewish prisoners in the Buchenwald concentration camp in one day in November, 1939, a former Master Sergeant in the SS has been sentenced to nine years in jail by a German court at the nearby town of Waldshut."

(From J. T. A., 6/15/53)

"... Most Saarland political leaders realize that the Saar's coal and steel is so important to France as a counterweight against the German Ruhr, that European peace would be difficult if not impossible if the Saar were restored to Germany. France, gravely weakened, would be a bitter and resentful partner in the European team at best.

"Saarlanders also remember unhappily what happened when they voted overwhelmingly to return to Germany under Hitler. He promised them 1,000 years of well-being and predicted they would not recognize the Saarland in ten years. The prediction proved correct, for the Saar, as one of the main targets of World War II, was smashed . . ."

THE LEOPARD'S SPOTS

"Thirteen years of Nazi domination and six years of total war have had almost no effect on the 'essential' character of the German people, it was reported yesterday by Dr. Henry J. Meyer Jr., professor of Sociology at New York University.

"Dr. Meyer was one of the American consultants to a group of German students who conducted a three-year study of Darmstadt, which suffered heavily from bombing raids during World War II. From this survey, and his own personal observations while living in Darmstadt, Dr. Meyer found the Germans are still fond of authority and the old way—German style—of doing things . . ."

The persons arrested are all former officers under the Nazi regime who profited from it and who were disappointed that they didn't enjoy the same privileges under the new regime. These members staked out for themselves advantageous positions. Hawranke was Gauleiter at Hamburg. Frauenfeld had the same post at Bremen. From 1925-1930 Stephan was the administrator of the German Democratic Party and then became one of the founders of the Staatspartei (Liberal Party). The Re-Nazification of Germany

THE NAUMANN CIRCLE MENACE

When Werner Naumann, former Secretary of State in the Himmler Ministry, was arrested by the British authorities last January 14, West Germany was greatly shocked. The event took place on the eve of the Bonn ratification of the peace treaties that was supposed to give Germany back her sovereignty. Was this another sinister attempt by "perfidious Albion" to discredit democratic and Western oriented Germany, most Germans asked? Many decent Germans were convinced that they detected another Machiavellian British plot—to torpedo the E. D. C. or at least to put a brake to the forward movement of the Western European community.

Official Germany was both shocked and surprised. Chancellor Adenuaer, his Minister of Interior, Dr. Lehr and Minister of Justice, Thomas Dehler, tried to minimize the significance of the Naumann conspiracy. The British were accused of unfairness, even of violating the occupation statute. The British were openly told that they had no business looking into a strictly domestic affair.

Less than four months later, on May 5, 1953, Minister of Justice Dehler suddenly discovered there was a threat to German democracy and unhesitatingly declared that "the Naumann Circle represented one of the greatest dangers to Germany. Its aim was to seize power after the forthcoming elections which were supposed to be the last consultation of a free people."

Dr. Dehler also discovered that the intelligence work performed by the Naumann group was superb and diabolical, and Naumann's ability to make friends in high government and industrial circles unsurpassed and his cunning unmatched. The Minister of Justice agreed that the democratic world was justified in its apprehensions about the activities of the Naumann Circle.

The Record

What made Dr. Dehier change his mind so drastically in a few months? Did High Commissioner Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick show him the 200 reports on the activities of the Naumann Circle prepared by the British Intelligence Service? At any rate, it is no secret now that the activities of the Naumann Circle ranged far and wide and its members enjoyed the confidence and cooperation of the most prominent politicians of the F. D. P. (Free German Party) and D. P. (the German Party), the backbone of the Adenauer regime, and were in close touch with some of the most prominent German industrialists such as Otto Stinnes and Flick, and the representation of the chemical industry at Leverkusen and other industries.

Numerous files captured by the British clearly show that the heart of the movement was located in Dusseldorf, the industrial center of Western Germany. The anti-democratic forces of that region have done a magnificent job in undermining the conservative parties by infiltrating them with a host of unregenerate Nazis. This work was performed with the financial help of some prominent German politicians, especially Friedrich Middelhauve.

Middelhauve is the leader of the Right Wing of the F. D. P. At the Conference of the Party at Bad Ems, November 1952, the Middelhauve program succeeded in defeating the left or liberal wing of the party. Middelhauve won again this Spring at the local Congress of the F. D. P. Party at Dusseldorf. He is the undisputed boss of the land Rhineland-Westphalia which contributes at least 73 per cent of the total income of the F. D. P. He has been a long-term advocate of admitting all former Nazis to the F. D. P. Today, he is openly advocating an alliance with the Rightist D. P. Party as well as all and sundry smaller extremist parties that have infested Germany recently.

Astute observers of Germany's political scene claim that Middelhauve is now playing the role of the late Alfred Huggenberg, who, in the 20s, financed Germany's extreme rightist movements and worked closely with Hitler, Von Papen, Dusterberg (the former chief of the Stahlhelm) and Schacht, to defeat the Communist menace. This movement was known as the Harzburg Front. Although the Communist Party is no menace in West Germany today, Middelhauve has set himself up as the champion fighter against radicalism.

Middelhauve of course disavows any Nazi tendencies. By a strange coincidence Middelhauve, like the pre-war magnate Huggenberg, is mostly interested in the publishing business and like Huggenberg is closely linked with the German heavy industry in the Ruhr. Middelhauve's publishing house has received large orders during the past year from the Stinnes firm. The latter is also subsidizing heavily Middelhauve's printing plants. His sole aim, Middelhauve says, is fighting against Marxism under any form. He also claims to be a friend of the new German government by trying to do away with splinter parties which have done so much harm to the Weimar Republic. Although Middelhauve claims that he has never engaged in conspiracies, he played a prominent role in setting up the pro-Nazi government in Schleswig-Holstein, whose chief, the former S.S. W. Kraft is a close friend of his, as is former S. A. Fuhrer Stuckert, Himmler's collaborator. He is now making an open bid to all extreme Rightists to organize a united front in the September elections.

The Role of Achenbach

The real brains behind the Naumann Circle and Middelhauve is Mr. Ernst Achenbach (his attorney and friend). During World War II, Achenbach was one of the closest collaborators of Otto Abetz in France. After the war he distinguished himself as an attorney for some of the most important Nazi criminals at Nurenberg. He also helped to denazify some of the most important Nazi industrialists. Achenbach rendered great service to Otto Stinnes during his de-Nazification trial and later became his close friend and confidante. Not long ago Achenbach succeeded in whitewashing a Thyssen company which was caught selling iron and steel and other strategic goods to the Iron Curtain countries. In fact, there is hardly an important denazification case before the West German courts that Achenbach would not be asked to defend.

Achenbach became a close friend of Werner Naumann during the Nazi occupation of Paris. Naumann was a member of the Abetz propaganda office where he also met a certain Herbert Lucht. Another person who played a prominent role in the Abetz propaganda office was a young Belgian woman, Lea Van Dievoets, whose family was very close to the Belgian Rexist Leader, Leon Degrelle. This young lady who married Herbert Lucht later is known as "Sliccy." Achenbach, Naumann, Lucht and "Sliccy" comprised a most intimate circle, extremely active in carrying out the Nazi ideas in France. Their friendship continued after the Nazi defeat, and in 1949 this group founded an import and export house in Dusseldorf under the name of H. S. Lucht. The firm has grown tremendously since then and seems to dispose of large resources. Its capitalization amounts to 17 million marks and the chief administrator of the firm is Werner Naumann while Achenbach represents its legal interests. "Sliccy" Lucht is also active in the firm, and she finds time to act as liaison between the Naumann Circle and the Rexist leader, Leon Degrelle, now living in Argentina.

The Naumann Web

W. Naumann, the chief plotter arrested by the British, has succeeded in establishing a network of political and economic collaborators within and without Germany. His friends are operating in South Africa, Spain, Argentina and Egypt. Financially, Naumann's firm's successes have been truly phenomenal. Not long ago the firm succeeded in obtaining an order to construct the railroad linking Egypt with Sudan. Recently the project was extended to South Africa.

One of Naumann's chief aids in Germany is Paul Zimmerman (one of the eight accused plotters). Zimmerman is the former chief of the Economic Ministry of the Hitler government. Zimmerman in turn is an intimate friend of Wilhelm Voss who, jointly with former S. S. Herzel, constitute Egypt's present economic braintrust.

In 1952 Paul Zimmerman paid an extended visit to Cairo and Alexandria. In turn, Wilhelm Voss came to see Zimmerman in Germany shortly thereafter to discuss various business deals with Ruhr industrialists. As a result of these visits, numerous agreements have been concluded between Egypt and Germany and German firms have re-entered the Middle East. In the last six months alone, four German firms have succeeded in outbidding foreign firms with their plans to develop the untapped iron ore resources of the Aswan region. Among these firms is the Krupp Stahlbau Rheinhausen, maker of heavy industrial equipment. It appears that most of the economic successes in the Middle East were due to the excellent work performed by Naumann's close friend Wilhelm Voss. Thus, the German industrialists are making excellent use of the political and military connections of prominent Nazis living abroad in order to regain their former position in the Middle East.

Naumann is a wealthy man now. His friend and boss Lucht having died in the meantime, Naumann became the head of the Lucht import and export house in 1951. His intimate connections with the German industrialists were most profitable; he took advantage of them to place his friends in positions of importance in the German economy. His friend and lawyer Achenbach, the paymaster of the Ruhr industrialists, helped him to select the proper spots for his trusted friends.

Thus the former S. S. General Lengenfeldt of the Central Secret Services of Germany under Hitler was made Legal Adviser to the Stinnes concern. M. Diewerge, former chief of the Nazi propaganda office in Danzig, was introduced to Deputy Middelhauve and became one of his closest collaborators.

The famous Hitler radio propagandist, Hans Fritzsche, who was acquitted at Nurenberg, was helped to become an agent for a French lipstick firm. However, it is known that he has placed his ability as a radio propagandist at the service of the Naumann Circle and is trying to evolve a program which is very close to that of Hitler for the Rightist parties. This program is known as the "German program" and envisages the dissolution of both houses in the election of a president by popular vote. Wilhelm Zogelmann, a Hitler Youth Leader and "close collaborator of Conrad Henlein, the Sudeten quisling who destroyed Czechoslovakia, has become the editor-in-chief of the D. P. Right Wing publication "German Future."

F. R. Salat, former director of Hitler's publishing house "Eherverlag" has taken over a publishing house "Edeka."

J. Von Leers, the well known propagandist and theoretician of the Third Reich was sent to Buenos Aires to run the Neo-Nazi publication "Der Weg." Although the circulation of the magazine in Germany is prohibited by the Bonn government, it is widely circulated by the Vohwinkel house at Heidelberg. When Von Leers left Germany he went under the name of Hans Euler. His litrerary name now is K. Neubert. Von Leer's activities in Argentine Nazi circles were uncovered by anti-Nazis and made public.

The former gauleiter of Hamburg, Karl Kaufmann, and Dr. Gustav Scheel, former fuhrer of the German students, were entrusted with the task of directing the activities of S. S. associations.

Another prominent Nazi, Dr. Heinrich Haselmayer, who was singled out by Hitler for his work in sterilization of ill people, is active practicing medicine again.

Rogues Gallery

The five most important members of the Naumann Circle arrested in January 1953 were: Naumann, Zimmerman, Scheel, Haselmayer and Kaufmann. Two others who were arrested but who played a less prominent role were: H. Scharping and Dr. H. Siepen. The latter is a member of the Rhineland-Westphalia Diet and reported to have a financial interest in the plant of Punkdal at Solingen.

Although Dr. Achenbach is the brains behind the Naumann Circle, he was not arrested and he has thus been able to play a most influential role in the F. D. P. In addition to his legal and political activities, he is also directing an office at Essen, the purpose of which is to agitate for a general amnesty for the war criminals. Among the very prominent Nazis Achenbach employed in this office were former Nazi Commissioner to Denmark, Dr. Best and S. S. General Prof. Alfred Six. Dr. Best was the author of the Nazi Terror Plans and a close collaborator of the Gestapo Chief Himmler.

Other prominent Nazis who have emerged recently on the political scene, thanks to the efforts of the Naumann Circle, were former Nazi Mayor of Frankfurt, Dr. H. Krebs, and Mr. Schranz, former Mayor of Offenbach. Dr. Krebs is again municipal counselor in Frankfurt, having failed to become Mayor of the city, and Mr. Schranz is head of the Deutsche Partei in Hessen. The Vice-president of the D. P. in Hessen, Derichsweiler, former high official of the Nazi regime, is one of the guiding lights of the "German Union," an extreme rightist party. In the ranks of the Naumann Circle we also find gauleiters Grohe and Florian.

Dr. H. Schacht is also reported to be very close to the Naumann Circle. He has recently founded a new bank in Dusseldorf, having failed to accomplish his aims at Hamburg. When he was looking around for a place to establish his new bank, a prominent member of the Christian Democratic Union (Adenauer's Party), Dr. Vomfelde, used his political influence to enable the financial wizard to establish his bank in Dusseldorf. Dr. Schacht's bank has been very helpful to Dr. Naumann. In recent years, Schacht has made many trips to South America, the Middle East, India, Egypt, Spain and other places. While in Spain he was the guest of the famous S. S. Colonel Otto Skorzeny, a close collaborator of the Naumann Circle. Otto Skorzeny, the liberator of Mussolini and one of the most prominent S. S. officials, has been living in Madrid in recent years and has been active in both political and economic fields

Skorzeny has been very busy of late; he is active as representative of Germany's machine-tool interests. He is also directing the Nazi propaganda there. Recently he went to Egypt at the suggestion of Dr. Schacht. Due to the fact that he is closely connected with the Lucht house in Dusseldorf, his business ventures with Egypt have proved very successful.

In Spain, Skorzeny is known under the name of Steinburger. His success there is due to the excellent work done in his behalf by the German Countess Finkenstein, a longtime resident in that country.

Skorzeny also has excellent connections with the Duchess of Valencia, who is not on very good terms with Gen. Franco. This notwithstanding, the Duchess has been very helpful in introducing him to some of the most important personalities of the Franco regime as well as those opposed to the Caudillo. Col. Skorzeny does not seem to have any difficulties in travelling in Spanish Morocco and Tangiers. The S. S. Colonel seems to be particularly interested in Africa and recently he almost succeeded in wresting a large order for cement for the Canary Islands from the British.

Although the Naumann Circle believes that the former Nazi Stuka ace, Col. Hans Rudel is not discreet enough, nevertheless they have established a close working relationship with him in Argentina.

Col. Rudel is a member of a very powerful Nazi group known as "Das Reich" which in reality is directed by Skorzeny. The Nazi air ace is also a member of a very militant Nazi group known as the German Bloc, along with the fiery Nazi General, Paul Ramcke, who, ever since his liberation from the French prison, has been one of the most rabid Nazi agitators in German veteran circles.

The Notorious Mufti

Dr. Gustav Scheel deserves special mention. He is a very close friend of the former Mufti of Jerusalem and was instrumental in introducing him to Hitler. He acted as the liaison between the two for a number of years. As gauleiter of Salzburg, Dr. Scheel was in a position to give asylum to the Mufti after the Nazi debacle. There is conclusive evidence that Dr. Scheel smuggled the Mufti into Switzerland.

The wartime friendship proved beneficial to both conspirators. A few years ago when the Germans began casting their eyes on the Middle East, Dr. Scheel turned to the Mufti for help. The latter was only too glad to introduce the German businessman to his friends in the Arab League. Conclusive evidence shows that both the Mufti and Dr. Scheel did all they could to bring about the Arab intransigent attitude toward the Israeli-German Reparations Pact.

It has been frequently reported that Dr. Scheel has contributed funds to the Grand Mufti. There is also evidence that the Naumann Circle has been receiving money from foreign sources. The truth of these reports no doubt will be revealed at the forthcoming trial of the Naumann Circle leaders.

At any rate, it is certain that the Mufti's pro-German propaganda has found a fertile field in Egypt. In the course of a recent interview Gen. Naguib gave to a foreign correspondent, the general flatly expressed his great admiration for the Germans. This is what he said about them: "I want you to believe me when I say that I have not changed the great admiration I have for the Germans. Their efficiency, their extraordinary gifts as scientists and technicians and their loyalty are quite unique. I have been seeing all these qualities in recent times, watching the work of the German officers and experts in my army. . . . At present we are working very hard on the great Aswan project. This is a Five Year Plan and it offers tremendous possibilities to the Germans."

The Growth of Nazi Elements

Meantime, while the most prominent leaders of the Naumann Circle are awaiting trial, the slow infiltration of the Nazi elements into the German public life is continuing. All over Germany, small and large groups of Nazis or Nazi sympathizers have become very active. Invariably these Nazi groups have been found linked to the Naumann Circle. Some of the most prominent of the smaller groups is the BDJ (Federation of German Youth), the "Free Corps Germany," "Das Reich," and more recently "The German Community."

It is definitely established that these semi-secret organizations have had close links with the Naumann Circle. It was Naumann who financed and nurtured the Union of Former Soldiers. Naumann's close collaborators, Kaufmann, Salat, Scheel, Alfred Frauenfeld, former Austrian gauleiter, have been most active recently organizing former S. S. members. Thus we find that Gustav Scheel is a member of the "Free Corps Germany"; Rudel and Ramcke are members of the German bloc; Skorzeny and Rudel are members of "Das Reich"; Fritzsche and Achenbach are members of the German Union and Haselmayer and Naumann belong to the mysterious Bruderschaft whom "Prevent World War III" exposed a couple of years ago.

Col. Rudel is the brains behind "Free Corps Germany." This group is organized along military lines with a Fuhrer, General Staff, membership cards and rigid military discipline. Its members swear allegiance to Admiral Karl Doenitz now serving a 10-year prison term at Spandau. The political views of the group are a revised version of the Nazi 25 Point Program. Its philosophy is anti-Semitic, anti-Jesuit and anti-Freemason. Its aim is to seize power by force and then have it legalized.

Nazi-Communist Flirtations

Through the Bruderschaft, the Naumann Circle and the extreme Rightist Parties have been in contact with the Communists. The two leaders of the Bruderschaft, Beck-Broichsitter and Franke-Grieksch have fallen out and the organization is not what it used to be. Nevertheless, they have been able to cooperate through F. K. Bornemann who is director of a publication in Dusseldorf. Bornemann was also the link between the Naumann Circle and the two leaders of the Bruderschaft. He was cultural director under the Nazis and in recent years his house has served as a meeting place for former Nazi big-wigs such as Dietrich, former chief of the Nazi Press, Axmann, former Fuhrer of the German Youth and the above-mentioned gauleiters Florian and Grohe.

It is definitely established that Beck-Broichsitter collaborated closely with Kaufmann and Scheel. On the other hand, Franke-Grieksch who has friends among the Soviet leaders in Eastern Germany, was charged by the Naumann Circle to negotiate for the delivery of Ruhr steel products to the iron curtain countries.

Franke-Grieksch also had extensive contacts with two pro-Soviet former officers of the German Wehrmacht, Col. Lehwess-Litzmann and Col. Boldt. The latter two are definitely known to be working on the closest terms with the Soviet military authorities in Eastern Germany. Franke-Grieksch has been living recently in the Eastern part of Berlin and has not returned to Western Germany.

Whether the disappearance of Franke-Grieksch eliminated the danger of collusion between the Nazis and the Communists is problematical. However, the Bonn government has indicated strongly that collusion still exists. At any rate, it is certain that Col. Lehwess-Litzmann has definitely allied himself with the Communist cause. The Colonel has many friends among the West German military leaders and was known to be a great admirer of Stalin. He has been in Russia recently and, since his return to Western Germany, has spent his time recruiting officers for Soviet East Germany.

Nor was the Bruderschaft alone in its flirtations with Communism. The famous group "Das Reich" as well as the "Sammlung zur Tat" are also known to be in close contact with Communist elements in Eastern Germany.

The International Fascists

There is also in Germany a small group of most fanatical Nazis known as "International Fascists." Its leader in Germany is K. H. Priester who lives in Wiesbaden and who openly says that he is a National-Socialist. The Party was founded in 1949 as an ultra-Nationalist group strongly opposed to the "Western tendencies" of Adenauer. Fr. Bornemann is the link between Priester and the Naumann Circle. Priester is a close friend of the S. S. Generals Gille and Hauser. Priester's organization held various meetings last year at Hanover at which were present many prominent German Nazis, formerly members of the "Condor." Skorzeny was also present.

The first meeting of the International Fascist Movement took place at Malmoe, Sweden, May 1, 1951. Karl Priester represented Germany; Per Engdahl represented Sweden; M. Bardeche represented France, and Italy was represented by Marsanich and Gen. Graziani. This International Fascist group has also close links with Sir Oswald Mosely of Great Britain. All these representatives are very active in their respective countries, trying to create a Social European Movement. Their aim is to remake Europe according to the Hitler principles, with Germany as the master. These leaders have been able to enroll the support of elements in Norway, Denmark, Spain, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Argentina and India.

This International Fascist Movement publishes a prominent periodical called "Nation Europa" at Cobourg. Arthur Ehardt is its editor. In addition, the International Movement has been publishing various periodicals in several countries. The International Fascist Movement seems to be prospering most in Argentina. There we find Leon Degrelle, Col. Rudel, Gen. Galland, Ante Pavelitch, the fuhrer of Croatia, the Italian Fascist T. Abelli and F. di Giglio who are publishing the Fascist Manifesto.

As mentioned above, the most prominent German publication is "Der Weg" which, through Von Leer, constantly interchange articles and ideas with "Nation Europa."

Mention must also be made of "Natintern" or International Nazism led by the Nazi Wolfgang Sarg. Its headquarters are in England and the movement has supporters all over the world. One of its most important collaborators is the Mufti of Jerusalem. The slogan of Natintern is "Nationalists of all countries, Unite. You have nothing to lose but your Jews." One of its publications is entitled "World Dictatorship by 1955." Gen. Ramcke who is tied to the Naumann Circle is also a member of "Natintern." Gen. Ramcke is now trying to enroll the leaders of the Stahlhelm into the movement.

"Natintern" numbers among its members, Dr. Voss, the adviser to Gen. Naguib, mentioned above, Col. Skorzeny and

Col. Rudel.

To return to Rudel, it is definitely established that in December of 1952 Rudel came to Berchtesgaden to discuss with the members of the Nazi movement "Das Reich" the liberation of the war criminals now detained at Werl. The attempt to imitate Skorzeny by freeing the war criminals by plane was discovered in time and the plot was foiled.

Mention must also be made of an inactive German leader known as Hek Rau. His real name is Heinz Erich Krause. He is connected with Col. Rudel and his movement "Das Reich." Rau is very active spreading Julius Streicher's ideas. Rau believes that the West Germans are not sufficiently compensated for going with the West. Therefore, the Germans should go with the Russians. Rau is also active among the Veterans.

The Mysterious General Gehlen

One of the most mysterious characters in Germany today is Gen. Gehlen, the invisible and ever-present organizer of the "Abwehr." He was a close collaborator of the murdered Admiral Canaris, head of the German Secret Service. During World War II, Gen. Gehlen was in charge if Eastern European affairs. He was chief of that section in the German General Staff known as "Foreign Armies-East," which had to learn all about Russia and their Eastern armies, their size, armaments, training, fighting tactics, etc. He was arrested by the Americans in 1945 but was released shortly thereafter. "Gehlen's vast network has been reorganized and built up during the past two years and is now more or less integrated into American military intelligence, which largely finances it." (K. von Wiegand, New York Journal American, 1-27-52.)

During the last few years Gen. Gehlen has been active recruiting the most prominent members of the former German Secret Service and has seen to it that they be placed in important positions in the Bonn government, such as ministries, courts, police, border patrol, etc. Thus, Gehlen's men are in an important position to carry out his ideas. It is widely reported in Germany that Gehlen's men fully exert their power.

Although Gehlen and his men are known to be anti-Communist, they are also known for their anti-Resistance philosophy and they are closely related to the Nazi ideology. Once they decide to eliminate someone, they do not hesitate to smear him immediately with the label of anti-Communism. At any rate, Gen. Gehlen seems to have a special predilection for former S. S. men whom he conveniently placed in various economic enterprises in Germany.

Gen. Gehlen has had a hand in denouncing the League of German Youth in Hessen as Communist, although it is known that the organization is Fascist. The whole movement was denounced in the Bonn Parliament Oct. 8, 1952, by Socialist Deputy Zinn. The "error" was quickly acknowledged by Gen. Gehlen, but the denunciation served its purpose since Gehlen and this "Youth League" are now cooperating fully. The organization of the German Youth is a para-military one and its main purpose was to liquidate its enemies, especially Social Democrats.

It is strongly rumored the German Youth Organization was financed by Americans.

In recent times two terrorist organizations have been uncovered: one called the New National Socialist Youth is led by K. J. Arnim, a former high official of the S. S. and a close follower of Otto Strasser. Another movement is led by H. K. Anders of Brunswick. The latter had a list of all those to be liquidated in case of attack by the Soviets.

Anders was known to have had close relations with the B. D. J. mentioned above. Anders claims that Bonn knew about his activities and that he was doing intelligence work for NATO. At any rate, the B. D. J. and the Anders movement are closely related.

There are, to be sure, other circles and more Nazis to be found in Germany, but on the basis of what is said above it is clear that all of them are inter-related, directly or indirectly, with the personalities involved in the Naumann Circle plot.

EXPECTING SOMEBODY?

Trafficking With the East

"An essential part of the new German policy will be to foster its trade with Eastern Europe and China. It is constantly asserted that Germany must buy from countries to which it can sell in increasing quantities and on a long-term basis, even though prices in the Soviet bloc may be above the American level. German-American trade was not important in prewar times, and many Germans are convinced that it never will be again once the natural links with the Eastern bloc are re-established. An effort to overcome the political handicaps to this trade will certainly be made during the new phase on which Federal Germany is now entering."

". . . Business men in West Germany . . . are also eager to benefit from increased trade with China and are concerned that their old rival, Britain, may get a headstart. "Surprisingly little notice was given to the announcement in mid-May that the Federal German Republic had opened direct trade negotiations with the Soviet Union.

"The announcement was made in the official Federal Government publication in Bonn, the 'Bulletin'...

"In government quarters there is a growing feeling that the embargo on strategic exports is too rigorous. Various leading Germans, including the Federal Government's representative in Berlin, Dr. Vockel, and a state secretary in Bonn, have protested against the provisions. They believe that sooner or later Russia will make a major 'peace offer' and that Federal Germany will benefit from it only if she shows a readiness to keep her trade connections with the Eastern bloc working in the meantime.

"Another German argument is that there is now a 'D-mark gap'—in fact, Germany is producing and selling so fast that debtor nations are unable to pay for German imports. The phrase 'D-mark gap' has been adopted by the important Ruhr trade journal, the 'Handelsblatt,' and has led the organ of German big business, the Duesseldorf 'Mittag,' to state: 'Our existence depends now on trade with the East'..."

"Small business men? Fly-by-night operators, experts in perennial bankruptcy and fire sales? Not at all. The combine, according to the responsible Dusseldorf newspaper which announced formation of the company, includes some of the biggest names in West German industry. Nearly 250 German firms of repute have been approached by the 'East-West' company and have expressed what the newspaper described as a 'lively interest' in the prospects. A Communist operation? On the contrary, the president is the head of one of the leading machine-tool manufacturing concerns in the Ruhr.

"A mere propaganda stunt? Its spokesmen claim they already have firm, sounds orders and government import-export licenses (which is more important) for about $30,000,000 worth of trade with the Soviet satellites. A fair beginning for a new business . . ."

A Significant Chapter in Dr. Adenauer's Political Career

by

"RHENANUS"

The lack of realism shown by some of our policy makers as regards the post war treatment of Germany has baffled and indeed alarmed competent students of German affairs, both here and abroad. They are particularly concerned over the fact that our experts on Germany appear to be unable to recognize that the historical and national forces at work in Germany make it impossible to consider Chancellor Adenauer as anything else but an interim figure soon to be discarded in the name of "German unity and independence." If this should happen, it would be the second occasion in the life of Dr. Adenauer.

Perhaps a brief re-examination of Dr. Adenauer's past role in the political life of Germany will enable many of us, including our experts, to adopt a more realistic evaluation of the basic forces which will determine Germany's actions in the future. Serious students of the subject should consult the following reliable sources: Clémenceau, Grandeurs et Misères d'une Victoire (Grandeur and Misery of a Victory) (Paris, 1930), and Deutsches Zentrum-Deutscher Rhein (German Center Party-German Rhine) by the Center Party politician and diplomat A. Koehler (Trier, 1932, Paulinus Druckerei).

Dr. Adenauer and the Nazis

Dr. Adenauer was removed as Mayor of Cologne when the Nazis came to power in 1933. Following the attempted assassination of Hitler on July 20, 1944, Adenauer, like many other prominent non-Nazis, was arrested. Nevertheless, he was soon released and after the collapse of the Third Reich, Dr. Adenauer was "discovered" as "Heaven's gift to the occupation powers."

There is historical irony in the fact that Adenauer had been fired by the Nazis. Though he was not a Nazi, indeed a devout Catholic, Adenauer's political activities had turned out to be a boon to the Nazis and German nationalists. It should be emphasized that Adenauer did not intentionally desire to help the Hitlerites. He worked toward the perfection of his own schemes; yet in that process he helped in no small measure to contribute to the victory of the Nazis.

Shortly before the Nazis seized power, the chancellor of Germany was the notorious Franz von Papen, formerly a Reichstag representative of the Center Party of the Rhineland. Taking advantage of his position, von Papen endeavored to smash the only anti-Nazi stronghold remaining in Germany, namely the government of Prussia led by the Minister President of the State, Otto Braun. To achieve his objective, von Papen sought to apply emergency power granted to the Federal Government, supposedly derived from Article 48 of the Weimar Constitution. Blocked by the German Supreme Court which declared von Papen's attempt as partly unconstitutional, he proceeded to take measures to dissolve the Prussian diet. In this way he hoped that Braun's supporters would be swept out of office by new elections, thereby enabling the Nazis to grab power in Prussia.

According to the Prussian Constitution, the right to dissolve the diet rested with the "Council of Three," consisting of the Minister President, the Speaker of the House, and the President of the State Council. In view of the fact that the Speaker of the House was a Nazi as opposed to the Socialist Braun, the fate of the anti-Nazi Prussian Government rested in the lap of von Papen's friend Dr. Adenauer, who was at that time the President of the State Council. Von Papen requested his friend to vote with the Nazis for dissolution and Dr. Adenauer complied though he must have known, like everybody else, that in so doing he paved the way for Nazi power in Prussia and probably in the entire Reich.

The results were disastrous for all of Germany because the undermining of the anti-Nazi stronghold of Prussia swept away the last and perhaps the most important obstacle to the establishment of the Hitler regime.

Yet, why did the Nazis overlook Dr. Adenauer's merits and achievements and why did von Papen, who later became Hitler's Deputy Chancellor, fail to come to Dr. Adenauer's aid when his friend was in trouble with the Nazis. The answer is that Dr. Adenauer had become entrapped in Nazi propaganda against alleged "separatist" activities of the Center Party in the Rhineland in 1919 and the early 1920s. The Nazis employed this propaganda to destroy the Center Party in the Rhineland prior to 1933 and used it as a club to force the Party in 1933 to vote for the "Enabling Act" which legalized Hitler's dictatorship.

Dr. Adenauer's "Legal Separatism"

In November 1918 revolution had broken out in Berlin after the collapse of the Kaiser war machine. Bolshevism threatened. The Allied armies were poised to march into the Rhineland. There were rumors that the French intended to annex not only the Saar but also the Palatinate and the Rhineland. In this critical hour, 5,000 Rhinelanders assembled on December 4, 1918 in Cologne, Dr. Adenauer's bailiwick, to call for the establishment of a Republic of the Rhine which would serve as the nucleus for the future German Reich. The assembly's resolution stated that the setting-up of this republic was necessary "in view of the impossibility of obtaining an orderly government in Berlin and in view of the far reaching political changes to be expected in the German Reich" (cf. Koehler, p. 14).

Both Clemenceau and Koehler agreed that this move was intended to prevent the annexation of the Rhineland by France and to stem the tide of Bolshevism which might swamp the Rhineland (cf. Clemenceau, p. 174, and Koehler, pp. 14 and 16). Dr. Adenauer came to the fore of this movement shortly after it had been initiated in Cologne. On February 1, 1919, the mayors of the Rhineland, led by Dr. Adenauer, adopted a resolution calling for the foundation of a West German Republic within the framework of the German Reich (cf. Koehler, p. 21, and Clemenceau, p. 175). The latter phrase had also been used in the Cologne resolution of December 4, 1919.

The French, of course, did not like the phrase "within the framework of the German Reich" (cf. Clemenceau, p. 175). They encouraged the separatist movement led by the German politician Dr. Dorten aiming to create a buffer state in the Rhineland which would be forever separated from the rest of Germany and under the protection of the French. For a while some of the key leaders of the Center Party in the Rhineland had contact with this movement sponsored by the French but subsequently they broke with Dr. Dorten.

Nazi Propaganda

The above mentioned activities of the Center Party leaders were denounced by the Nazis and other political enemies of the Party. Hitler attacked the Catholics belonging to the Center Party as "poor Germans" willing to give up German unity in favor of special treatment for the Catholic Rhineland. The charge was "separatism" and the leaders of the Center Party were called "Versackungspolitiker"—meaning politicians willing to accept truncation and the bolshevization of the greater part of the Reich in order to obtain special treatment for certain provinces dominated by their Party.

In the 1920s the Center Party fought these charges in the courts which were influenced by judges favorable to it. In the celebrated decision of Limbourg v. Stadtanzeiger (Cologne 1928) the Cologne Court managed to squeeze in a statement to the effect that Dr. Dorten's separatism was treason whereas the separatism of the Center Party leaders was "legal separatism" within the framework of the German Reich—referring to the famous phrase in the above-mentioned resolutions.

The question of treason against the State of Prussia was never discussed. Leading members of the Party including Dr. Adenauer were called as witnesses but never heard. As a matter of fact these politicians went over to the offensive. Now it was their turn to hurl the charge "Versackungspolitiker" at their opponents and accuse them of trying to block all financial support to the Allied occupied Rhineland so as to create such a degree of chaos that the Allies would be driven from that area. Nevertheless, the Nazis continued their propaganda of "treasonous separation by the Catholics in the Rhineland" with unbelievable frenzy. Among their main targets in the 1930s was none other than Dr. Adenauer himself. Since by this time the courts were more and more coming under the influence of the Nazis and decisions were rendered implying that the Catholics were "bad Germans," it was a foregone conclusion that, when the Nazis assumed power in all of Germany, Dr. Adenauer would be promptly removed as Mayor of Cologne. Needless to say, other leaders of the Center Party also felt the wrath of the Hitlerites.

Dr. Adenauer's First West German Republic (1920)

What were Dr. Adenauer's aims when, on February 1, 1919, he called for the establishment of a West German Republic "within the framework of the German Reich." One explanation is that he desired a temporary separation of such a state from the German Reich as a means of checking the virus of Bolshevism which seemed to be infecting all of Germany. As we have seen, this was the aim of the Cologne resolution of December 4, 1918.

The other explanation is contained in a letter from Limbourg (a representative of the Rhineland in the Prussian Diet) to Dr. Dorten, dated November 1, 1923. The sudden discovery of this letter ended the case Limbourg v. Stadtenzeiger, a case where Limbourg had sued the newspaper for slander because he had been called a separatist. In this letter Limbourg wrote: "Herr Adenauer was entrusted by Herr Stresemann to proclaim the so-called legal (Rhineland) republic, i.e. a Bolshevist republic by the grace of Berlin" (cf. Koehler, p. 35). Limbourg implied that Adenauer's republic was influenced by and dependent on the Radicals called "Bolshevists" by him.

The implication of this statement points to the fact that Dr. Adenauer was acting in cahoots with the radical Federal Government in Berlin and the Ruhr industrialists whose trusted representative was Dr. Stresemann. Their aim was to prevent the setting up of a Rhineland buffer state under French domination and this seems to be Clemenceau's view (cf. p. 175).

The Lessons of History

The question whether Dr. Adenauer's first West German Republic was a sham or merely planned for the purpose of a temporary separation from the German Reich may never be answered. Yet, it is an important issue when one endeavors to judge whether the present German situation is a temporary one or a sham.

Beyond this question there is, however, an important historical lesson to be learned. The forces making for unity are so powerful in Germany that no important German politician, no matter how noble or justified his aims may be, will be spared from retribution by his fellow countrymen if he fails to act in a way that will show his realization that the unity of the German Reich is the paramount law of all Germans.

Against this supreme fact of German politics it becomes clear that Dr. Adenauer's present course of action is but an interim episode, a phenomenon of the passing hour. American policy in Germany will cease to be out of step and will return to reality when our statesmen accept this truth.

"An assiduous reader of the West German press frequently gets the idea that the Allied war-crimes prisons are bursting at the seams with thousands of men whose only offense was to have been patriotic German citizens and to have been on the losing side in the war. Actually, only a few hundred war criminals—almost without exception those found guilty of mass murder—are still confined in prisons. Not only have men like Naumann been at large (to hatch their patient and clever plots), but they are prospering mightily.

"The whole case suggests, in fact, that perhaps the war-crimes prisons were never filled as full as they might have been and that they are being emptied prematurely, not only for the security of the Western world, but for the stability of the West German Republic itself."

The Cartel Comeback—A U. S. Failure

According to the dictionary the word "reform" has two meanings; the first definition pertains to the abolition of abuses, the second meaning, however, could convey almost the opposite, namely the recreation of conditions which were considered to be wrong and pernicious. These two definitions immediately came to our mind when we read an Associated Press dispatch from Germany May 3, 1953, announcing that the reorganization of the German steel industry "under the Allied trust busting program was virtually completed." The title of the dispatch read "German Steel Trust Reformed." It may be that the person who applied the word "reformed" in the context referred to the first definition of the word, but on the basis of the facts which will be cited in this article we are forced to the conclusion that the second definition would convey the appropriate meaning.

Lobbyists At Work

In the summer issue of Prevent World War III (No. 42, 1952—see editorial "The Trickery of the Trust Busters) we noted that the Bonn Government had prepared laws which allegedly were aimed toward carrying out the original Allied program of deconcentration and decartellization. After 7 years of endeavoring to break up the German monopolies the Allied authorities decided that the task could be more effectively carried out if it were turned over to the Germans. However, the legislation prepared by the Bonn Government was full of loopholes which made it possible under certain conditions for German industry to "reform" their monopolies and cartels; yet even this anemic legislation was vigorously attacked by the lords of German heavy industry.

The New York Times (February 1, 1953) reported that a powerful West-German lobby was battling the Bonn proposals and insisting upon provisions that would permit the reconstitution of cartels. The lobby was determined to get a law "that would establish penalties only for too much cartellization rather than for cartellization itself." Of course, it does not take too much imagination to perceive that this proposal was merely a play on words and nothing more.

Because the Bonn Government itself had been lukewarm to the whole concept of deconcentration and decartelization, the West-German lobby of industrialists became bolder and bolder. Two months later (March 26, 1953) the New York Times reported that the lobby had succeeded in forcing the German Government to retreat still further by agreeing "in principle to permit a recartelization of industry . . . ," under certain conditions. By accepting this proposal the Bonn Government has legalized the re-establishment of cartels and other types of monopolies in Germany.

When the lobbyists became active, they pretended that their opposition stemmed from the fact that they merely wanted German industry to be protected in the event of economic difficulties. However, the New York Times in commenting on the legislation which appears to be accepted by the government states that by its terms it "would appear to reopen the door to the recartelization of the industry, even in advance of an economic recession and depression . . ."

Latest reports indicate that the so-called anti-cartel legislation will be shelved until after the election. However, important political forces within the Adenauer coalition, such as the Free Democratic Party, are planning to make up for the lost time once the elections are over. "Then they will concentrate on a program to cheapen all production, to rationalize (divide up) marketing for internal consumption and to build export cartels to secure a 'united German front' in the export markets of the world." (Overseas News Agency, June 2, 1953.)

The Role of Allied Trust-busters

How can one explain the defiance of these industrialists to some of the most basic policies which have governed our occupation of Germany? The answer to this question, we regret to say, may be found in the way the Allies themselves have handled the deconcentration and decartelization of German industry.

If the Allied authorities had shown determination and independence to implement the original decartelization laws, the present brazen attitude of the West-German industrialists would have been impossible. While the Allied program started off with a "bang" it fizzled out to such an extent that we asked the guilty parties, namely the German cartelists, to prepare plans for the liquidation of their cartels and trusts. One does not trust hardened gangsters to guard a bank. By the same principle it was short sighted in the extreme to expect the German cartelists to be accommodating. Of course, they took full advantage of our generous offer and they devised plans which not only preserved their own position but also the strength of the most powerful monopolies and cartels in West Germany. In reality, therefore, the actual deconcentration and decartelization plans for Germany were devised for the most part by the cartelists themselves.

At this point we think that a few examples of how the trusts have been "reformed" would be appreciated.

The Case of Alfred Krupp

Among the most notorious Nazis and Hitler supporters was Alfred Krupp, the munitions king. For his war crimes, Krupp had been sentenced for 12 years and deprived of his properties. The former U. S. military governor of Germany, General Clay, watered down the original verdict with regard to the confiscation of these properties and his successor, former U. S. High Commissioner McCloy rescinded it in its entirety. This did not mean that the properties involved legally belonged to Alfred Krupp. In November 1943 the Krupp family's title to these properties was withdrawn by Adolf Hitler by virtue of a special law (lex Krupp). Under this law Hitler's favorite, Alfred Krupp, became the sole beneficiary and administrator of the properties although the Nazi Party reserved the right for itself to appoint Alfred Krupp's successor. All of the property of the defunct Nazi Party is at present vested in the German Federal Republic but the properties controlled by Krupp, valued at approximately 140 million dollars, were presented to Krupp as a present for his misdeeds. Disregarding the fact that the legal title to these properties had not been established, the U. S. High Commissioner asked Krupp to prepare a plan for the "reorganization" of these properties.

The Krupp plan, which has received the blessings of the Allied authorities, stipulates that Alfred Krupp should sell his holdings in the coal, iron and steel industry by 1960 and in return the Allies would lift all remaining controls over his other industrial enterprises.

In our Open Letter to Secretary Dulles (on Moral Principles, January-February 1953, Prevent World War III) we cited statements from reliable sources indicating that there were no guarantees that the coal and steel properties would ever be sold. More recently the Manchester Guardian (February 9, 1953) came to the same conclusion. The Guardian further points out that, while Krupp signed a statement to the effect that he would never re-enter the coal and steel industry, the Bonn Government has rejected an Allied request that it make sure that this promise is kept. Indeed the legal advisors of the Bonn Government pointed out that the Federal Constitution guarantees the right for every German citizen "freely to choose his own trade or profession." The Guardian also noted that the agreement made by a private individual (Krupp) with the three occupying powers may produce some strange situations in the future. In this connection this British publication declares, "It must be very doubtful whether such an agreement is binding under international law." Since Krupp originally devised the plan it was to be expected that he would take good care of himself. Thus, the London Economist, March 7, 1953, observes that the net result of the deconcentration of the Krupp industry enables the war criminal Krupp to remain "one of the richest men in the world."

But this is not all. During the transition period of the so-called reorganization of the Krupp properties, trustees have been appointed who are responsible for the disposal of the coal and steel properties. Scanning the names of those who were appointed to this post, we find among them some of the most notorious enemies of democracy and of the United States. For example, one of the Krupp trustees is Geheimrat Heinrich S. Albert. Who is Herr Albert? Albert was a very close friend of Franz von Papen, one of Germany's master spies who had been indicted for war crimes at Nuremberg in 1946. Albert came to the United States under the guise of a German commercial attache before World War I. Actually he raised over 30 million dollars from pro-German elements in the United States to finance the espionage and sabotage activities which von Papen directed in this country during World War I.

Albert's partner, Dr. Westrick, was a close collaborator of Baron Kurt von Schroeder, the German banker, who has been called the midwife of Nazism.

Another trustee for Krupp is Dr. Hermann Puender, who served as a lieutenant colonel in the Counter Propaganda Service of the German High Command. He was stationed in Division III-H, the Division concerned with preserving morale and correct Nazi ideology in the military forces. It was Herr Puender who was responsible for selecting a galaxy of leading Nazi industrialists and Hitler supporters to act as German trustees for the German steel industry in 1949. Truly

". . . The original French plan to go into partnership with Germany seems to the present leaders the best way of avoiding a resurrection of a nationalist and war-minded German Reich. As Prime Minister Churchill phrased it, France was to 'lead Germany by the hand back into the Western community.' But this involved a strong France and a weak and defeated Germany. Now that the economic and political balance is reversed, France is less certain about who will lead whom. . . ."

NOW IT IS OFFICIAL

"Western European steel producers are operating an export cartel system, a Schuman Plan Assembly group disclosed today.

"The assembly's common market committee, in a report drafted by Victor-Emmanuel Preusker, of West Germany, said the existence of such a sales agreement had been confirmed by the steel and coal community's executive branch, the nine-man high authority.

"The report said the high authority had studied the agreement thoroughly and had authorized its continuation on the ground that the export cartel would not influence the six-nation common market nor interfere with the free play of business competition within the six-nation area."

"SPRINGTIME IN PARIS"

Herr Krupp has placed his properties in safe hands.

The Mannesmann Steel Trust

While the Krupp case has received much publicity, it is by no means the only instance where the powerful forces of German heavy industry have regained their former influence. For example, the Mannesmann Steel Trust was also to be deconcentrated. The criminal record of the Mannesmann interest is well known to Allied authorities. This huge steel combine was a reliable supporter of Hitler's aggressive plans. In this connection we dealt at length with the Mannesmann combine and its nefarious activities (Prevent World War III, No. 19, February-March 1947). We showed that leading officials of the Mannesmann combine including Dr. H. Rasch, had been playing an important role in preserving the close collaboration among the leading steel trusts and monopolies of the Ruhr. It was Dr. Rasch who convened a secret meeting of the representatives of the German iron and steel industry in November 1946 to deal with the Allied policy which aimed at the elimination of trusts and cartels. In discussing the benefits that the Mannesmann combine obtained under the Nazi regime it was pointed out that their profits had increased enormously and that their production tripled between 1926 and 1943. "By virtue of its international position and its importance in the German domestic economy Mannesmann became perhaps the most significant instrumentality in the Nazi government. The company contributed millions of marks to the Nazy Party and to its affiliated organizations. As a reward for these generous contributions Mannesmann shared liberally in the spoils of war." In discussing other aspects of Mannesmann's activities we mentioned the fact that during the war this steel combine had employed more than 10,000 slave laborers.

Though the Mannesmann combine was slated for liquidation under Allied policy, somehow or other the implementation of this policy met with many obstacles. Needless to say these delays played into the hands of the Mannesmann interests and they were asked to write their own ticket with regard to "reorganization." Of course, on paper the Mannesmann Steel Trust appears to be deconcentrated but on closer look we found that there is more shadow than substance. Here is what the official British publication Background Letter (August 15, 1952) reports on the Mannesmann reorganization plan: "Because there were no unduly large shareholdings in the Mannesmann Steel Works, it has been possible to distribute the shares in the new companies to former Mannesmann shareholders on a simple pro-rata basis. This means that a person who held shares of old Mannesmann stock will receive shares of stock in each of the three successor companies, giving him the same proportionate interests." Background Letter also discloses that every shareholder "will receive shares amounting to double the face value of his old shares."

One cannot say that the shareholders of Mannesmann have suffered or sacrificed. Indeed, one cannot expect them to assume any significant burdens in view of the fact that the Allies gave them every opportunity to work out a plan which will safeguard their interests in this huge enterprise.

Other Cases

Approximately the same kind of procedures were applied to other German steel monopolies. For example, representatives of the Haniel family who controlled important steel plants including the Gute Hoffnungs Huette, were also asked to submit "reorganization" plans. According to Allied High Commission, the plan was accepted by the Occupation Authorities because there are so many members of the family who have interests in the company that after reorganization it will be difficult for any one of them to obtain control of the new successor companies. Whether Allied optimism will be born out by future events remains to be seen.

A similar procedure was applied in the case of the properties of Friedrich Flick, another prominent steel monopolist who was one of the most powerful and enthusiastic backers of the Nazi regime. Reuters (December 30, 1952) describes the reorganization of the Flick properties in these words, "The Allies today put Friedrich Flick, multimillionaire industrial leader under Hitler, back into business action." Flick had been sent to prison as a war criminal in 1947 but within 3 years he walked out of jail in an elegant suit and drove off in a big red Mercedes after shouting to reporters, "get out of here, I don't want to have anything to do with you."

On the basis of this brief survey of the state of deconcentration in German heavy industry it is doubtful, to say the least, that much has changed substantially. The London Economist (February 28, 1953) stated that the Allied deconcentration law has so far not "affected the efficiency or profits of the Ruhr . . . on the contrary, the fact that steel production has risen to a figure exceeding pre-war output (considering the reduced area of population) indicates that the steps taken have not hindered—and in some ways have aided — the first stage of the reconstruction in the Ruhr."

I. G. Farben

A special case in the "reform" of the German trusts is that of I. G. Farben, the great chemical empire. We do not believe that it is necessary for us to go into details with regard to the notoriety of Farben. It was fully exposed in the Allied War Crime Trials and was subsequently written up by the prosecutor of the I. G. Farben war criminals Josiah Du Bois in his recent book, The Devil's Chemists.

The fact is that I. G. Farben was the main bulwark of the Nazis in their predatory plans. The voluminous evidence attesting to the criminality of the leaders of this outfit is now a matter of public record. Indeed, because of the unique importance of I. G. Farben a special law was passed by the Allies which was designed to break up this all-embracing combine. Year after year since the beginning of the occupation news would come out of Germany to the effect that Farben had been liquidated; in reality, however, Farben managed to survive. Now, in the year 1953, a final plan for its liquidation has been put into effect.

This plan, however, is a strange one from many angles. In the first place, many of the leading Farben industrialists who were responsible for the criminal policies of this outfit, are back in positions of power. One of these individuals, Wilhelm Menne, speaking before the Society of Chemical Industries in October 1952, demanded the "complete rehabilitation" of the German industrial leaders condemned in the trial of the I. G. Herr Menne told his audience that the "self respect" of the whole German chemical industry required that the "men who had been condemned unjustly in the I. G. Farben trial" be defended by the industry. Herr Menne declared further that none of the "bad accusations against these honorable men, well known in the whole world, could stand up to objective proof." Apparently Menne is under the impression that humanity has forgotten the crematoria at Auschwitz. We know that he is mistaken in that regard but it is tragic that some Allied officials have preferred to forget and thus condone. Menne has no cause for complaint because he knows very well that many of his criminal colleagues have returned to or are in the process of regaining their old posts.

Just as many of these criminals are reasserting their power so has the so-called reorganization of Farban itself turned into a rationalization of the chemical trust which will make it more efficient—yes, and more deadly. The London Times, March 21, 1953, in announcing the reorganization of Farben, noted that the plan "will give much satisfaction to shareholders . . . for the terms are generous." The New York Times (April 26, 1953) reported that the comments in the West-German press on the deconcentration of Farben and the reorganization of the trust's assets in three major and two minor successor corporations "would indicate that West German industry did not receive a 'bad deal' from the three Western governments."

Thus, in spite of the new reorganization of the Farben properties, the same gang who ruled the roost under Hitler, are back in business with a vengeance. "Despite war damage and loss of plants in East Germany I. G. Farben is still the third largest chemical company in the world." (New York Times, March 29, 1953.)

In this connection Business Week (May 16, 1953) reports that "a group of British, German, Swiss, Danish and French pharmaceutical firms is said to have tied up the European market for a wide range of basic products. Their agreement lays down strict rules for production, sales prices and export territories. Machinery has been created to impose sanctions on members who step out of line." Needless to say, this is just the kind of cartel set-up that has always attracted the men who ruled I. G. Farben.

Conclusion

The meaning of the "reform" of the heavy industry of the Ruhr now seems clearer. It is but the re-emergence of the same powerful interests with the same criminal leadership which brought so much ruin and misery to the world.

The counter-attack of German heavy industry against free enterprise is spreading through all segments of the economy. Thus, the Handicraft Guilds which in the past had a stranglehold on small enterprise, have been reborn with the official sanction of the Bonn Government. Their re-emergence is now regarded as "one of the most serious and humiliating defeats suffered by the U. S. policy makers since the Occupation Authority was established in 1945" (Times, March 28, 1953). The Handicraft Guilds in Germany had always exercised strict control over hundreds of thousands of artisans who aspired to independent economic activity. All small enterprises, from the butcher to the baker, were under the control of this archaic institution which stifled all initiative on the part of the individual enterprise.

The guilds were abolished when the occupation began because they were an important seat of political reaction and prevented the development of democratic free enterprise. The economic importance of the enterprises which the Guild system had controlled is shown by the fact that the handicraft products had an estimated value of more than two billion dollars in 1952 and were exceeded only by agriculture and industry. But now, the German Parliament thumbs its nose at the Allies and officially sanctions its return. In defending the action to restore the monopolistic powers of the Guilds, Dr. Herrmann Veit, Minister of Economics in the State of Wuerttemberg and Baden, told the United States in effect to mind its own business (Christian Science Monitor, April 15, 1953).

The United States Authorities who are disappointed over this body blow against free enterprise in Germany really have no cause to complain in view of their sorry record insofar as deconcentrating German heavy industry is concerned. A cynic could well say that if the "big boys" can get away with it why cannot the "little boys"? It is worthwhile noting that while the Bonn Government has refused to guarantee that Krupp would not repurchase his properties on the grounds that every German citizen has the right "freely to choose his own trade or profession," it does not hesitate to give its blessings to an institution which will destroy whatever individual initiative has developed in Germany since the end of the war.

It is clear that when the Allies defaulted on their own obligations to deconcentrate and decartelize German industry it became possible for the Germans to fully exploit this failure by devising plans that not only helped to "reform" the trusts and cartels but to give them respectability under German law. The poison of the recartelization and trustification of German industry has not stopped at the borders of West Germany. It is spreading beyond the confines of Germany and has begun to eat into the very vitals of the European Coal and Steel Community, better known as the Schuman Plan Organization. The significance of this development is discussed in the editorial on page 11.

Toward the End of a Free Press?

Following the end of World War II the Allies were confronted with the necessity of preventing powerful pro-Hitler forces from retaining their grip on the German press. Under the Nazi regime, a complete transformation had taken place with regard to the control and ownership of the German press. For all practical purposes the press had been converted into a powerful propaganda arm of the Nazi state. Publishers who resisted the Nazis, were quickly disposed of so that all other printing facilities were owned and/or controlled by the Hitlerites and their henchmen.

Under Allied law No. 2 and subsequent Allied regulations it became possible to break the Nazi stranglehold over the press. In the first place the Allies set up a licencing procedure which was designed to thwart the efforts of former Nazi publishers to resume operations. Thus licences were issued only to those who had anti-Nazi and democratic records. In addition to this measure, the Allies made available to the newly licenced press the printing facilities and equipment belonging to the pro-Nazi publishers, for a specified period of time.

Unfortunately the Allies failed to confiscate the printing equipment which would have been fully justified under law No. 2 and other Allied regulations. Thus the future existence of the licenced democratic free press became hazardous because of the fact that, when the leases expire, the former publisher who served Hitler, could reclaim the printing facilities.

Yet, even before the leases began to expire, powerful pro-Nazi industrialists began to conspire against the licensed press. In the vanguard of this plot was the notorious Bosch cartel which had cooperated with the German general staff and whose properties in the United States were seized by the Government on security grounds and on the basis that the Bosch subsidiaries owed their first allegiance to Germany.

The Bosch interests instituted legal action to regain control over their former press. It was alleged that the Bosch interests had actually been opponents of the Nazis and had been forced to turn over their printing facilities and newspapers to the Nazis. The fraudulent claims of Bosch were exposed in detail in the November/December 1950 issue of Prevent World War III (Nazi Industrialists Regain Hold on German Press).

Bosch was highly successful thanks to the German judges who turned out to be tools of the Bosch interests —two of them had been judges under the Nazi regime. The victory of Bosch was not challenged as it could have been by an appeal to the American Court of Restitution. As a result it served as an opening wedge for other groups to seize important sections of the German press.

It is now a fact that many of the old pro-Nazi publishers backed up by powerful military and industrial interests are quickly regaining their former influence in the field of German journalism. They have been aided and abetted by the German banks and by leading officials in the Adenauer government. The degree of their resurgence can be seen from the fact that by the fall of 1952 they had attained full respectability alongside those publishers who had sincerely opposed the Nazis. Not only are their papers gaining more and more readers but as the leases on the printing facilities used by democratic publishers expire, such facilities revert back to their former owners. The democratic publishers are left high and dry unless they are fortunate enough to obtain the funds that would enable them to purchase adequate printing equipment to remain in business.

In the early days, U. S. officials in Germany performed an admirable job by encouraging the development of an independent democratic press. This was not only done through the licencing and leasing procedures but also through financial help. Yet, our officials failed to understand that much more was required to guarantee the continuation of a truly democratic press, particularly when the old pro-Nazi publishers still owned a substantial portion of the printing facilities and had the backing of powerful financial groups.

If our officials had confiscated outright the printing facilities, the democratic free press would have received solid protection.

By the end of 1948 the U. S. military government abolished all licencing of the press on the grounds that a free press required free competition from all sides. In other words, under the guise of promoting a free press in Germany, the U. S. Military Government, in effect, enabled the old pro-Nazi crowd to re-enter the field. As for competition between the old and the new publishers this was really a meaningless concept in view of the fact that the financial resources that would ultimately decide the fate of the German press, were substantially behind the pro-Nazi publishers.

It is true that in present-day Germany some newspapers still manage to maintain their independence, but it is also a fact that changes are in the making that will have far-reaching adverse effects on the future of a democratic free press in Germany.

It is a truism that an independent free press is one of the most reliable bulwarks of democracy. The strength of our own democracy has in no small measure been due to a free press. On the other hand, we find that there is a definite correlation between the traditions of German authoritarianism and the lack of an independent German press. Even under the Weimar Republic important sections of the German press were controlled by powerful interests that were constantly planning the destruction of democracy.

The extent of the resurgence of these forces was reported recently to the Overseas News Agency by Terence Prittie. Because of the importance of this subject we are publishing on page 44 the full text of Mr. Prittie's report. His revelations and their implications deserve to be pondered by Americans who have been hoping that democracy in Germany will ultimately triumph over its opponents.

The German Press in the Coming Election

by

TERENCE PRITTIE

The post-war German press, which has already weathered plenty of storms, may be entering into a crucial period of its existence in the months preceding the Federal general election scheduled to take place between August 30 and September 6.

The immediate reason is a move by big business interests to use the press for the support of Dr. Konrad Adenauer's present coalition. The fundamental reasons are far more deeply rooted.

The great proportion of Western Germany's 900 newspapers are financially unstable and have little prospect of increasing their circulations. Lack of their own printing presses, shortage of equipment and trained staffs, and uncertain finances have all contributed to hamstring their development. They now face a direct attempt to buy their services for the coming election campaign.

This attempt, financed by circles supporting Federal Economics Minister Ludwig Erhard's policy of liberalizing trade and encouraging private initiative, has so far taken two forms.

The first has been the formation of an association called "Die Waage"—the "Scales"—which is buying up space in newspapers in order to print "advertisements" which are, in effect, favorable commentaries on the economic policies of the Adenauer Government. "Die Waage" pays 452 newspapers to print a series of ten such advertisements.

A paper with a large circulation, which in Germany means more than 100,000, is paid up to 120,000 marks, or $30,000, for printing the series. In Germany this is big money—so big that even some Social Democratic newspapers have agreed to print the ads.

The backers of "Die Waage" have announced that they also will soon launch a poster campaign on a grand scale and have bought up 41,000 big hoardings for it. They intend to distribute 140,000 free work satchels to the children of "readers" of their advertisements. All this under the aegis of a purportedly "neutral" body.

Working parallel with "Die Waage" is the "Association for Trade Marked Articles" which is also buying space in newspapers and assisting groups of businessmen who are determined to see a right-wing government in power.

The Social Democrats have pointed out that these groups have been demanding tax remissions on the grounds that their propaganda campaigns are for business purposes. Thus one group in Hamburg, headed by the "tobacco king" Philip Reemstma, has filed a claim for tax remission totalling about 100 million marks, or $25 million. To the Social Democrats this means that the national treasury is being defrauded to pay right-wing electioneering expenses.

Moreover, for some time there has been a definite drive by industrial circles to knock out those papers which the Western Powers licenced after the war and have tacitly supported ever since. Thus the textile industry has financed a "Brunswick News" with the obvious purpose of putting the existing Socialist paper in Brunswick out of business.

In Hamburg the right-wing political parties have launched at least three big newspapers during the last year in order to recapture the city from the Social Democratic camp. One of these papers distributed 600,000 copies free—which would be a total impossibility for the struggling non-subsidized papers. None of the new Hamburg right-wing papers has a chance of paying its way.

Such outside interference is not confined to business circles. Even Government officials have sought to interfere with the existing official news agency, and the independent Northwest German Radio.

Members of the Bonn Government, including some at high level, have uttered threats against editors and reproved them for publishing criticism of the Government. Government officials have helped form independent associations, such as "Democratic Circles" and the "Federal Bureau for Local News Services," which are spending large sums on meetings, pro-Government propaganda and study groups.

Well known old names of tycoons of the Nazi and violently Nationalist press are cropping up again with increasing frequency. Allied officials have noted with alarm how more and more of the ownership and management of newspapers is returning to the hands of these men who believe that they cannot afford a left-wing victory in the coming election and that they must prevent it by every possible means. The outside world probably is mostly sympathetic to Adenauer but would regard his victory as a tragedy if it were achieved at the cost of a democratic press which has had too little time to find its feet.

KRUPP IN SPAIN

From the Worldover Press 4/1/53:

"An event of great importance to Spain has received so little publicity, thanks to the government censorship, that it is known only to Spanish citizens who can read the French, British or American press. It is the arrival of the West German government's ambassador, Prince Adalbert of Bavaria, and his key role in building up a Spanish armament industry. Adalbert is busy helping the German firm of Krupp establish under Spanish names a number of arms factories to turn out, notably, not only small weapons but heavy artillery and tanks.

"Germany has already sent hundreds of technicians into Spain, and these are to be followed by high-precision machinery....

"The Spanish press insists that all this has solely to do with economic questions. The leading Paris daily, Le Monde, however, states flatly that the armament factories to be put up by Krupp are to be financed by the United States."

FOR OLD TIMES SAKE

From a dispatch to the N. Y. Herald Tribune 5/29/53:

"The question has arisen whether German officers and soldiers in the planned West European Army will wear the swastika-encrusted decorations they received for valor under the Hitler government.

"The viewpoint of the Adenauer associates is that German contingents in the projected European force should be permitted to wear decorations awarded for personal military distinction in World War II, but that the swastika, the prime symbol of Nazism, should be removed . . .

"This middle-of-the-road plan was sharply challenged by Col. Gen. Kurt Student, chairman of the Association of Former German Parachutists.

"Gen. Student, who led the Nazi airborne invasion of Crete in 1941, was loudly cheered by 7,000 members of the association at a rally in Kassel when he assailed current proposals to reissue decorations without the swastika emblem. I. G. FARBEN VS. AMERICAN G. I.s

Frank Edwards over MBS 5/28/53:

"WASHINGTON—Special—55,000 American G. I.s who were held prisoner by the enemy in World War II have not been paid . . . Additional funds to pay the ex-G. I.s must come from the sale of alien properties now held by the government... unless those properties are quietly returned to the former enemy interests.

"Here is the story which may cost the ex-G. I.s many millions of dollars: Early in World War II, we seized the giant General Aniline and Film Company, owned by German interests. Like all other alien properties it is supposed to be sold to American interests . . . with the veterans to get the money from the sale through the War Claims Commission.

"But an outfit called Interhandel, claiming to be a Swiss concern has been trying for years to get control of this General Aniline and Film Company property through court action, claiming that we had actually seized a Swiss property. The courts have ruled, however, that the Swiss have no claim to the property. Interhandel is apparently nothing more than a Swiss dummy for the German cartels . . . And the Swiss decline to produce the records which they say would prove their claim. The Washington, D. C. District Court has given them until June 15th to bring to court the documents of Sturnzegger Banking House, which is a dummy front for the I. G. Farben cartel. If the court throws out the Swiss claims, an outfit made up of New York and California interests is offering Interhandel $60 million for General Aniline Corp., evidently on the presumption that the Government will approve the deal —even though Interhandel cannot prove ownership. If that happens, it would mean that a $125 million property would be sold for half price, and the money would go to European financiers instead of to the American boys who were held prisoner by the enemy. June 15th is the deadline . . . watch the General Aniline deal."

THE "KNIFE IN THE BACK"

Le Monde, Paris, 2/53:

"Col. Rudel, the German flying ace, recently wrote: 'Of all the statesmen of our times, only Adolph Hitler, the chief of the German state, understood the world situation and acted accordingly. When Hitler said that he had reasons to believe that Bolshevism was ready to give a mortal blow to Europe and to Germany, the present situation proves to us that what Hitler said was no propaganda.'

"According to Rudel, 'Germany in 1945 was beaten the same as it was in 1918—by a knife in the back.' "

DECORATIONS FOR SALE

From the London News Chronicle, 5/21/53:

"Walk into a tobacconists in the Ruhr city of Essen. Ask to see what is in those cigar boxes labelled 'German Unity.'

"They hold swastikas, Iron Crosses and other decorations that used to glitter on Nazi tunics. Not partworn souvenirs but brand-new medals turned out by a big factory in defiance of the occupation laws.

"For this shop is one of the outlets for a booming underground trade in military insignia....

"A German M. P., Erich Mende, is now urging the Allies to lift the ban on the manufacture and wearing of military medals."

THE CRIME AND THE PUNISHMENT

From an AP Dispatch, 6/16/53:

"The West German Supreme Court released today two more of the seven Germans arrested last January on charges of plotting to revive a Nazi dictatorship. Only one remains in jail. He is Werner Naumann, an alleged ringleader.

"The men were held without bond after their arrest by British authorities, who turned the case over to the Germans....

"Released today were Gustav Scheel, former leader of the Nazi Students' League, and Paul Zimmermann, a former S. S. (Elite Guard) officer.

"In releasing them the court ruled that there was no danger of their fleeing the country or destroying evidence."

". . . Dr. Adenauer, hand-picked by Washington as the first Chancellor of the Bonn Republic, has been an enthusiastic supporter of the Truman-Acheson policy, precisely because he was shrewd enough to see that it would make West Germany the dominant West European power, placing it in a position to play off Russia against the West. Having with consummate skill finessed West Germany into an almost incredible position of power, it is not hard to see that the last thing Dr. Adenauer would now like to contemplate would be a uniting of the two Germanies on a basis of demilitarized neutrality.

"The choice confronting the Eisenhower Administration is, therefore, not only the basic choice between France and Germany, but also the choice between seeking peace through restoring the unity of Germany and, eventually, the unity of Europe—or seeking peace through a precarious balance of military power in a permanently divided Europe, with the balance depending upon the loyalty to the West of a restless, unnatural and as yet unregenerate West German state."

(James P. Warburg in Pamphlet, "France, Germany and Nato")

"UNTIL JUSTICE IS DONE"

From an ONA Report, 6/12/53:

"... Minister of Justice Thomas Dehler stated in Hamburg that he saw no reason why compensation should be paid to victims of Nazism 'until justice is done to the whole German People....' "

DISMANTLING—GERMAN STYLE!

From JTA 5/31/53:

"The State of Bavaria has closed down and dismantled an exhibit of Nazi methods and brutality at the site of the former Dachau concentration camp, without consulting any of the Jewish, German or international organizations interested in the memorial exhibition which was entitled 'Never Again.'

"Bavarian authorities told the JTA that the museum was being used for 'private ends' and that they could not tolerate such a state of affairs. However, they made no explantion of their failure to consult the organizations interested in the project before tearing it down...."

BACKWARD STEP IN GERMANY

"If there is one thing which nobody wants to see in Germany again it is a return to the days of political party uniforms....

"Despite the opposition of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer and the warnings of German moderates, the Bundestag at Bonn has just decided, 174 to 130, to lift the ban placed upon political party uniforms after the war. . . . As evidence that . . . certain elements there learned little from the last war, the Bundestag's action is discouraging. Hitler's uniformed party guards were his first army; one would think that the memory of this alone would be enough to make the Germans ponder seriously whether a return to this sort of thing is the way to reassure their neighbors of Germany's concept of her place in the new Europe. Uniforms and politics are as dangerous a combination today as they were twenty years ago."

MARIANNE: "WHAT WILL THEY DO WITH THEM?"

Germany - a reliable ally ?

Here is what the American press says about "Germany Plots With The Kremlin" by T. H. Tetens:

"Never before has United States policy in Europe been questioned so provocatively . . . Mr. Tetens presents incontrovertible proof of the activtities of these neo-Nazis who gloat about 'the helpless Americans who have lost the peace, the cold war and their entire future, but are not yet aware of it'."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

"An extraordinary book . . . It would seem an elementary precaution to suggest that the entire German policy be re-examined."

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE (leading editorial)

"A scathing attack upon the German leaders whom our policy makers have chosen as allies . . . Mr. Tetens is surely right in holding that any optimism with regard to Germany's future loyalty is hardly a sufficient basis for policy . . . A disturbing book which deserves serious consideration by American citizens."

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Gordon A. Craig, Prof. of History, Princeton University

"This reviewer agrees with Mr. Tetens' main convictions that our German policy is hazardous and fundamentally ill-conceived; that a powerful Germany will almost certainly seek an alliance with the Soviet Union, or at least cynically play off the Kremlin against Washington, and vice versa."

NEW YORK TIMES

Dr. S. Padover, Dean of the School of Politics at the New School, N. Y.

"Sobering documentary evidence rather than geopolitical dramatics . . . these papers add up to a grim picture."

WASHINGTON POST

"A slashing attack on U. S. policy in Germany. Our policy toward the Bonn Government is dangerous and ill-conceived because . . . the Germans will inevitably seek an alliance with Russia."

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

"Germany is not interested in defending the West; Germany is interested to make a deal with Moscow. This book contains documents which seem to support the author's belief all the way."

THE CLEVELAND PRESS

"A convincing array of documents to show that Germany regards the outcome of World War II as a temporary set-back rather than a defeat. . . . There should be a thorough congressional investigation of our policy toward Germany now, before we discover that we have created another Frankenstein."

WICHITA EAGLE

"The pungent comments Tetens makes about United States-German affairs carry some weight because the book appears well documented."

HOUSTON CHRONICLE

"The U. S. may well be building its own death trap in building up Germany . . . This book is a shocking eye-opener—it magnifies the eight-year-old question: Who won the war?"

FORT WORTH STAR-TELEGRAM, TEXAS

"A well-documented book—literally stuffed with quotations from authoritative German officials and newspapers, with equally many quotations by prominent Americans and the American press."

CHARLESTON, S. C. POST

"The American people should take the author's message to heart . . . One wonders why the press and radio commentators aren't pointing out the dangers that Tetens sees. What are American diplomats in Germany reporting about the situation?"

DURHAM, N. C. MORNING HERALD

"We should be well advised to heed Mr. Tetens' warning. At least we should read his book. We hope the President reads it. We hope Secretary of State John Foster Dulles reads it, too, for that matter. It's something that needs telling and the least we can do is listen."

LOS ENGELES DAILY NEWS (Editoirial)

"Here we go again . . . Germany still plans to dominate Europe, establish colonies in Africa and economic dependencies in South America. America is to finance Germany's revival, but the Fatherland will go over to the Russian side in the end."

THE CALL-BULLETIN, SAN FRANCISCO

"Convincing documentary proof that . . . Germany conveniently will forget the billions of dollars made available to her and enter into a new alliance with Red Russia."

ARIZONA REPUBLIC

"An exceedingly disturbing book . . . Every reader will hope that Congress and all in authority will consider this evidence carefully and either give us adequate proof that Mr. Tetens' conclusions are unwarranted or act to change our policy."

HARTFORD, CONN. TIMES

"Mr. Tetens knows whereof he speaks. He has conducted his own Gallup poll on Germany's attitude toward America and Russia. On the basis of his findings, Mr. Tetens arrives at the conclusion that the American people have been deceived about Germany's reliability as a bulwark against Russia."

NEW REPUBLIC

"This is no 'peace of mind' book. . . . Every American had better read or come to know the particulars the volume contains. On these pages are authentic documents revealing the secret plans of powerful German individuals and groups to betray the West, and specifically the United States. Also it is disquieting, to say the least, to read some of the directly quoted statements of Dr. Adenauer."

CHRISTIAN HERALD MAGAZINE

"The book raises questions which deserve to be answered. It lays bare the extremely difficult course the United States is taking in its present policy toward Germany. . . . The United States is banking on the fact that the Germany it is helping to rebuild under Dr. Adenauer, will be a state friendly to the West and content to take its proper place in a free Europe. The author presents some cogent analysis which shows that this kind of treatment did not work with Germany as recently as a generation ago and seems to be taking the same turn now that it took then, and designedly so, according to the author, because of the scheming of the Bonn Government."

Kenneth Herian, S.J., in the CATHOLIC REVIEW SERVICE,
St. Mary's College, Kansas.

"An explosive book . . . Mr. Tetens is not the first American to state this thesis in print, but he is the first to adduce such a volume of circumstantial evidence of its validity. The German press, including that segment termed 'responsible,' has been full of editorials explaining and acclaiming the policies of Konrad Adenauer as designed to ditch the West and marry the East."

Our Tenth Anniversary

This year marks the Tenth Anniversary of the founding of the Society for the Prevention of World War III, Inc. In this connection Senator James E. Murray has commented: "Strange as it may seem the Society for the Prevention of World War III was founded during the latter part of World War II when the fortunes of the Allies were rising, and the future of the Rome-Tokyo-Berlin Axis was bleak. Yet its founders were far-sighted enough to stress the importance of preventing World War III. They were realists, and it was their firm conviction that unless the seeds of World War I which flowered into World War II was destroyed, then the United States and the rest of the world would be confronted with a greater and more devastating holocaust."

Since 1943 the Society for the Prevention of World War III has been working in the field of international relations. We have been particularly concerned with the German problem, feeling that its realistic solution would contribute decisively to world peace and security. Toward this end, the Society endeavored to advise the American people as to those principles which it believes could have contributed to a secure peace with Germany. We proposed:

1. That Germany's war potential be whittled down to genuine peacetime needs.
2. That encouragement be given to the development of German light industries.
3. That Germany compensate at least in part in reparations to those nations victimized by her aggressions.
4. That the huge German cartels and economic concentrations be eliminated so as to foster the development of genuine free enterprise, something which the Germans have never known.
5. That all the major war criminals who were responsible for the mass slaughter of millions of human beings be apprehended and prosecuted to the fullest extent of international law.
6. That a realistic and thorough-going denazification program be enforced so as to prevent the same forces which served the Kaiser and then Hitler from regaining positions of power.
7. That German political institutions be decentralized, thereby avoiding the re-creation of a new Reich.
8. That all German assets and loot salted away by the Nazis in neutral countries be vested in the Allies and allocated proportionately to all the victims of German aggression.
9. That a broad program of democratization be instituted as a first step toward eradicating the superman obsession of the German people.
10. That such institutions and organizations as churches, trade unions, business associations, be encouraged to partake in the development of a truly democratic Germany which could be accepted into the family of nations.

These recommendations were not out of step with America's national interests. On the contrary, they formed the core of United States policy in Germany in 1945. The failure to carry out this program has resulted in the reemergence of a powerful Germany. Is there a correlation between this fact and the growing tensions between the democratic West and the countries behind the Iron Curtain? In reply to this question we refer to the prophetic remarks of elder Statesman Bernard Baruch who warned the Senate in June, 1945, "What is done with Germany holds the key to whether Russia, Britain and the United States can continue to get along. . . ." Amplifying this statement he declared, "The occupation of Germany will be difficult enough at best. In the absence of a common policy as to the long-range fate of Germany, the Soviets are bound to question Allied moves as dictated by a desire to rebuild Germany into a buffer against Russia. In turn, the Western democracies will suspect Russia of seeking to communize Germany. The Germans can be expected to resort to every imaginable trick to foment discord among the four occupying nations. They will play one nation against the other, one zone against the next, hoping to break the common unity of the Allies, so controls will be permitted to lapse, giving her a chance to recoup, as after Versailles."

The emergence of a powerful Germany has not reduced world tensions but has heightened them. The emergence of a powerful Germany has not decreased the threat of Communist power and influence but has strengthened it. Last—but most ominous—the emergence of a powerful Germany raises the spectre of an alliance between German technology and Russian manpower.

The founders of the Society were aware of all these potential dangers in 1943. Today they no longer exist in the realm of mere speculation. This is not to say that the Society relishes the idea of being able to say "we told you so." Nevertheless, we have not taken the position that all is lost and that we must sit back and wait for the inevitable doom.

On this Tenth Anniversary we are more determined than ever to continue our program of education through our magazine PREVENT WORLD WAR III and other literature because we are convinced that a well-informed public opinion can check the trend which bodes ill for our security and peace.

We are proud to say that the Society's message is receiving wider and wider attention both here and abroad. This fact encourages us that perhaps the future may be more promising than the past.

On this occasion we express our gratitude to all persons near and far who have supported the Society's work and have encouraged us to continue the good fight. We also express our appreciation to all the members of the Advisory Council and the officers and staff who have remained steadfast to the principles upon which the Society was founded.

In view of this special occasion we have asked one of the founders, the world-renowned philosopher and scholar, Professor Frederick Wilhelm Foerster (born in Prussia) to express his views on this crucial problem. It is our pleasure and privilege to be able to print below the text of his statement.

On The German Problem

By

FREDERICK WILHELM FOERSTER

Once again the German problem has become the focal point of world tensions. It is the enigmatic uncertainty of all of Germany's intentions, the deep division prevailing in the nation, the unexplored areas between the different political tendencies, that becloud possible arrangements with regard to relations among the nations of Europe.

Even the great East-West world problem is dependent on its solution. Indeed, the two main spheres of power harbor opposite expectations as to Germany's reliability. Thus, what encourages the East discourages the West, what arouses distrust and suspicion in the Western world inspires hope and confidence in the world beyond the Elbe.

What is Germany? Wither Germany? How long will she proceed in a given direction and at the appropriate moment make a "volte-face"? The answer to the first question is: There are two Germanys. Therefore, the decisive question is: Which of the two Germanys will decide the fate of the nation and the fate of the world?

Let us examine this perplexing problem as it appears in the context of a most confusing situation. History may enter the discussion. Goethe was embarrassed by the question "What is Germany?" He answered, "I don't know. Where spiritual Germany ends, political Germany begins!" He believed that this political Germany was not the logical expression of spiritual Germany; rather was it an invasion from the East which penetrated and dominated that northern part of Germany which K. Lamprecht called "Colonial Germany."

By its organizing and state-building power, this Eastern force succeeded in taking over what Lamprecht called "Mother Germany." Prussia, the embodiment of this power, had been founded by the Teutonic Knights, disciples of Byzantine totalitarianism and despotism. (The right of the State against the right of man.) It can be said that Germany's modern tragedy has its origin in the fact that Asia and Europe met in the midst of Germany and exposed the German world to two invasions—one coming from despotic Asia — the other from liberal Western Europe, particularly from England.

The basic difference in the political dynamics of the Eastern and the Western orientations may be described in the following manner. The Eastern totalitarian influence emanated from a powerful type of man formed by long centuries of political organization and warfare, while liberal Germany thrived on ideas imported from England but separated from British history and the British character. Whoever ignores this fact will never understand the fundamental political weaknesses underlying the leftist movement in Germany.

It also explains the reactionary tendencies of the majority of German intellectuals. "They settled first," Nietzsche observed, "on the milky way, then preferred to exchange this silver-like, glittering idealism for political madness."

When Madame de Staël remarked that God gave the land to the French, the sea to the British and the clouds to the Germans, she did not foresee that the day would not be far when the German spirit would descend from the clouds and place its power in the service of reactionary nationalism. This strange union was described in October, 1914, by Professor Werner Sombart: "German militarism is the most complete union between Weimar and Potsdam. It is Beethoven in the trenches."

It is a great tragedy that the Allies have never been able to comprehend the meaning of the two Germanys on the basis of Sombart's incisive analysis. They always supposed that Weimar stood against Potsdam and that Weimar belonged to the Occident while Potsdam belonged to Asia. As a matter of fact, Weimar voted for Potsdam and backed Potsdam by ideological power and enthusiasm.

The Weimar Republic would never have been tolerated by the German rightists if that government had not been able to protect the international credit and standing of German Reaction. The Republic could not have survived had it not functioned as a democratic façade which gave succor to a defeated nationalism and permitted German militarism to restore its war-making power. In this sense the rightists tolerated and appreciated the Weimar statesman, Stresemann, because without his pacifistic game they could never have realized their secret rearmament plans. (In the same sense, the overwhelming success of Adenauer in the last German elections, is not at all convincing proof that the sympathies of the German majority are for his plans. The Adenauer victory merely showed that even the German reactionary regard him as the only possible German representative who is able to obtain American financial help and to reestablish the German army.)

The catastrophic and ever-repeated fault of the victors lies in this fact. They have always assumed that German armed forces would surely serve the defense of Western civilization, but they have failed to obtain real moral guarantees against the misuse of Germany's material and military reconstructed power.

The reader might say: but is the guarantee not to be sought in the personality of Adenauer? It is true that during his long political career, Adenauer has, at times, displayed a firmness in the face of the rightist threat. But one man's strength and determination cannot be omnipotent in the face of the deeply rooted and wholly unconverted political and ideological power of rightist Germany.

It is this reactionary force which has at its disposal the Ruhr barons, the military veterans and their militaristic traditions, and last but not least, the many former Nazis who have regained positions of power in government and, indeed, in all walks of life. The dynamic power of this rightist force would be lacking were it not for the fact that it is led by an intellectual leadership which has already elaborated long-range plans, exploiting every opportunity to rebuild Germany's military establishment as the direct instrument for Germany's domination of Europe. In their plans, distributed among key personalities in Germany, these geopoliticians think it possible that with Europe as its base, this German power will proceed to Africa and with the combined resources of two continents realize the Pan-German dream of world conquest and reduce America to the status of a colonial satellite.

These far from idle dreams have been disclosed by students of German geopolitics over the years. For example, as early as 1925, the British author Worthley in his book "Europe versus America" referred to a series of publications emanating from the school of geopolitics headed by General Haushofer. These documents suggested that Germany must use its future rearmament for purposes of dominating Europe, and then Africa. With this accomplished, the European and African resources at Germany's command would isolate America economically and politically. More light on the subject may be found in the book by T. H. Tetens "Germany Plots with the Kremlin" published in the early part of 1953. Additional documents are published in this book which confirm the fact that the geopoliticians have not been asleep since the end of the war.

Persons who are uninformed about these facts may say —how can you insult "Deutschland" by imputing to her such diabolical plans? But we do not speak at all of "Deutschland" who is no less threatened by these "dreams" than the rest of the world. We only point to these facts:

FROM A GERMAN COLONEL'S ALBUM

1. That these plans exist and are propagated with cunning and great knowledge of the present distribution of power in the world.

2. That the silent adherent sympathizers and propagandists of these plans have proved again and again that they can win over to their aspirations the greatest financial powers in Germany.

3. That they were always organically linked with military Germany.

4. That they are linked with the deep-rooted authoritarian traditions of centuries.

5. That the peace-loving spiritual democratic minority of the German people has always been disregarded when the great historical decisions of the German nation were made.

The most dangerous fact within the present world situation is that the Allies have never seemed to be able to face the German reality. After two catastrophies they could have drawn realistic conclusions. Unfortunately, what the Americans call "wishful thinking" seems to have completely blinded them. Animal learns from experience. Man does not . . . If a miracle fails to intervene, they will continue to be paralyzed by these incurable illusions about the power and capacity of the honest and democratic Germany to withstand the ever-renewed conspiracy of German reactionary nationalism. They will grant the new German army. But this army, as they will see, will serve Potsdam Germany.

The Allies naively suppose that the army they are going to present their former enemy, will deepen Germany's ties with Western civilization. One day they will regret this terrible error. They will see that just by submitting to his temptation, they will strengthen those very elements in the German nation which—when the situation seems ripe—will overthrow Adenauer in order to realize their "dream" of a German-dominated Europe which would confront America with overwhelming power.

A ray of hope may yet be found in the new German generation as well as in that generation which has undergone experiences of the last war. Yet it will depend on a great and systematic effort to give these generations a new moral and political orientation; immunizing them against any extremist agitation and opening their eyes, their intelligence and their conscience to the great chance now available to Germany. It is the opportunity that the country might again become the center of reconciliation of opposing principles and traditions and that it may abandon and reject all temptations to become the center of explosive destruction and final self-destruction.

"For most of humanity the elections did not solve the German problem. It will exist until we get far more solid assurance that Germany has turned its back on aggressive nationalism and militarism. Its apparent willingness to join a European army is unlikely to ease Europe's anxieties on that score. The risk that we may forfeit our oldest allies for Germany's uncertain partnership is still with us."

". . . In five years in Germany, at any rate, I saw very little mass support of democracy. . . .

"Too many American experts in Germany ignore the dangers of totalitarianism in that country because they have been connected with the crusade to denazify Germany. 'The Nazis are finished,' they report. A dangerous half-truth; the Nazis as Nazis are through. Fascism, the basic ethos of National socialism, is very much alive. . . ."

(Drew Middleton in N. Y. Times, 9-6-53)

"Over in Europe, (the Roman Catholic leader) Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, desperately fearful lest German rearmament fail to go through thus frustrating his desire for greater power, begged President Eisenhower not to enter into any direct negotiations with the Russians. Knowing rearmament is unpopular with millions of his countrymen, he wants to convince the world that German unity can't be had without German remilitarization. The truth is just the other way around. Adenauer and his friends would prefer a national army, but knowing they can't have it, they have stubbornly plugged for a big share in the European Defense Community—a share they would try to make bigger and bigger at every opportunity. Everything, even a possible settlement of the cold war, must be bent around to fit the Chancellor's internal program."

(Worldover Press 9-53)

POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS FOR EUROPE

"Dr. Adenauer, who is in his late seventies, will not be at Germany's helm indefinitely, of course. And Russia's soft talk may get unpredictably softer in the future. When and if these events take place, there is no guaranteeing that Germany's vigor will not be again applied in the wrong channels, as in the past.

"Democracy's tender roots here could be threatened. A strong Germany might leave Dr. Adenauer's course of conservative international cooperation and try to further build up its power by playing off the East and West against each other. It may be lured by its own self-confidence, by the promise of its old Eastern markets and by the promised return of Silesia and Pomerania into trying to make 'deals' with Moscow while retaining its own independence. . . ."

(Warren H. Phillips in the Wall Street Journal, 7-9-53)

Editorials

WE ARE FOR THE U. N.

Out of the ashes of World War II a new design for peace was born—the United Nations. It was not the utopian handiwork of diplomats remote from the realities of the day. On the contrary, the U. N. was the concrete expression of the irrepressible will of the peoples throughout the world. Nor was this worldwide movement for peace the result of despair. Rather did it reflect an overpowering optimism. The people wanted peace, not only because they were tired of war, but they had also come to the realization that a positive program for peace was the only way by which man could enjoy the things of the spirit as well as of the world.

Perhaps the greatest success achieved by the U. N. to date was in defense of the principle of collective security against aggression in Korea. Here the U. N., young as it is, beset with internal and external difficulties, treated with scorn and contempt by obscurantists and false prophets, was able to prove to the world that the collective will for peace can conquer aggression.

The United Nations has been charged with faltering at times. The accusers should examine the mote in their own eye. For the apparent failures of the U. N. are but the reflection of the shortcomings of its members. To the degree that the charter is upheld both in letter and spirit, will the United Nations march forward to greater victories over aggression, disease and poverty.

As conceived by the people, the United Nations is the instrument through which the nations of the world would act together in turning the swords of yesterday into the plowshares of tomorrow. This would not only be a victory in the negative sense of relieving the people of the burdens of armaments, but it would contribute mightily toward peace and concord among nations.

It is in this connection that we are reminded of the fact that the main Powers in the United Nations did agree to a program of disarmament for Germany. It is true that this agreement had not been arrived at through the United Nations. Yet, is it not feasible for the United Nations to utilize this agreement on the disarmament of Germany as the basis for a comprehensive and practical U. N. disarmament plan? We firmly believe that this is not only achievable but absolutely necessary if disarmament can ever be realized.

The Society's representatives accredited to the United Nations have participated in various phases of its work. We intend to continue our labors on behalf of the United Nations because the Society holds to the conviction that the United Nations can and must work.

Because the Society is dedicated to the strengthening of U. S. security, it is also dedicated to the great ideals and purposes of the U. N. In the last analysis, America's freedom and liberty must rest on the concept of collective peace and security through the United Nations.

The world is passing through many crises. The lust for conquest did not pass away with the destruction of the Rome-Tokyo-Berlin Axis. Totalitarian forces feeding on economic and political distress are rampant. But in the midst of these raging forces of evil we do possess a potent instrument for good. Let us all work toward strengthening the edifice of the United Nations and every word of its Charter a living reality!

GERMAN ROLE PONDERED

"Those concerned about possible German military dominance, however, wonder if the time may not come when, as Germany begins to contribute troops to the European Defence Community, the United States will not be tempted to withdraw its forces from Europe (in the name of economy), leaving Germany the dominant power. Here is expressed the long-term apprehension of all Frenchmen and many other Europeans—that any retreat of the United States would leave Germany paramount in Europe. . . ."

(William H. Stringer in The Christian Science Monitor, 10-17-53)

". . . In addition to the French attitude toward Germany, the thing that worries me most is our American attitude. It seems to me we may be in danger of blindly deciding that the Germans represent the only things good in Western Europe; that, since the French can't get themselves in order, we should say to hell with all the rest, now that we've got the Germans.

"No greater psychological mistake could be made. This is a mistake with respect to the other European nations. It is a mistake with respect to the Germans themselves, who would be the first to take advantage of such a situation. . . ."

(R. H. Shackford in N. Y. World-Telegram and Sun, 10-16-53)

THE OLD MASTER VERSUS BOY

Vicky, London Daily News Chronicle

AMERICAN POLICY—MADE IN GERMANY?

The latest Soviet rejection of the Allied proposal to negotiate on Germany was unquestionably a basic reason for the convening of the Bermuda Conference of the Big Three in December. In refusing to meet the Western powers at Lugano in November, the Soviet note alleged that German unification and the establishment of a European army containing West German units are incompatible concepts. On this point the Wall Street Journal (November 9, 1953) seems to concur. In this connection it states, "One must wonder just how, had that Conference taken place, the American negotiators propose to present a persuasive case for a German unification predicated on the existence of a European army. It couldn't be done and it is seriously to be doubted that anything can be done toward German unification as long as the U. S. remains inflexibly committed to the European army." Thus, the editorial declares that the U. S. stand is "illogical."

That the United States position appears to be "illogical" has been noted by serious students of Germany including James P. Warburg and Walter Lippmann. On the surface, it does appear that the U. S. approach is based on two premises which are irreconcilable. Then why, if this is true, do our policy makers continue to hold fast to this contradictory policy? Are they not aware of the fact that the EDC is based on a disunited Germany while a united Germany pre-supposes an independent Germany which will make alliances and commitments as it sees fit. Whether it is wise to meet with the Russians at this time is beside the point. What has intrigued so many people is the fact that our statesmen support a program whose basic elements are mutually antagonistic.

The answer to this riddle, we think, can be found not in Washington but in Bonn. It was Adenauer and it has been Adenauer all along who has insisted upon the creation of a European army and he has never retreated from this position. Months before M. Pleven proposed the establishment of a European Defense Community, Chancellor Adenauer declared that "a German military formation should be constructed as part of the European formation" (ONA, Nov. 28, 1949). The New York Times, Dec. 8, 1949, reported Adenauer as stating, "if our people are forced to take a hand at some unforeseen time in the defense of Europe, then we could do so only on the basis of equal rights and within the framework of a European army."

To those who accused the Chancellor of fostering a disunited Germany, the Chancellor vehemently denied the charge. More recently (U. P., Oct. 20, 1953), the Chancellor reiterated his belief that the integration of Western Germany with the European Defense Community "is in no way contradictory to a policy of re-unification of Germany."

We could cite other remarks made by the Chancellor along the same lines. Is his position illogical? It appears so but if one will take the trouble of carefully examining Chancellor Adenauer's public expressions and views, it will be found that there is a "method to his madness." What is that method?

On the eve of his trip to the United States in 1953, the Chancellor told a press conference that it was "ridiculous" to think of the Federal Republic as being able to play a decisive role alone. "How could this be without an alliance with Russia?" he asked. (N. Y. Times, April 6, 1953.) Since it is a fact that Adenauer's main aim is to enable Germany to play a decisive role in world affairs, his reference to a possible alliance with Russia must not be ignored.

Bearing this thought in mind, we proceed to another significant statement made in a speech at the National Press Club, Washington, D. C., April 8, 1953. Discussing what he called "the possibility of a German arrangement with Soviet Russia," Adenauer said: "for Germany, weakened as it is, a pact with Soviet Russia on the basis of partnership and equality is an impossibility. The era of the Treaty of Rapallo has not come again. At that time Soviet Russia was weak. It sought and found as a partner a still powerful Germany. Should we attempt such a partnership we would soon find ourselves reduced to a satellite of Soviet Russia." The basic thought in this statement infers that so long as Germany is weak there can be no "arrangement" with Soviet Russia.

The question then arises, i.e., how can Germany become strong, thereby creating the precondition for a possible "arrangement" with Russia? In a copyrighted interview published in the U. S. News & World Report, Nov. 13, 1953, Adenauer answered that question. He stated that if the EDC was finally established, then the possibility

ADENAUER'S FIFTH COLUMN

"Victor everywhere—in Bonn, in London, in Washington — Chancellor Adenauer presented his new Cabinet to the Bundestag in an address which was both confident and generous in tone. . . . And he claimed that the elections had brought the extremists of the right under control.

"In fact, the extremists have been brought under control through the simple process of being absorbed into the Chancellor's own following. One of the reasons the Nazis did not make a better showing was that they decided it would be absurd to fight as a separate party when they could work from within the ruling coalition. The Nazis are the real fifth column in the present West German regime, but a tolerated fifth column. The government is placing former Nazis in subaltern posts at an increasing rate: the cadres of the future army, now in preparation, are full of them, and they are reappearing in the press, radio, the publishing houses, and the theater. . . ."

of a pact with Russia would exist. In other words, given the formation of the EDC which, as is generally acknowledged, would be dominated by Germany, then the Chancellor would be in a position to talk turkey to the Russians. Here is the road to the reunification of Germany as envisioned by the Chancellor.

On the basis of the power created by the EDC, Adenauer hopes that the Russians will be willing to allow the unification of Germany. It may be asked what would the Russians hope to gain in return. We recollect that on May 20, 1950, Adenauer declared "A federated Europe will become a Third Force in the world not as strong as Russia or the U. S., but powerful enough to intervene successfully in a decisive moment to safeguard the peace." (Rheinischer Merkur.) What this actually means is that the establishment of a German dominated Western Europe isolate the U. S. if that became necessary. Who can deny that this would be a tempting offer to the Kremlin?

Thus, Adenauer's position is not illogical. It is cold-blooded Realpolitik. The irony of it all is that the Adenauer policy has been adopted by U. S. policy makers as though it conformed with our own national interests and security requirements.

It also appears that our policy makers consult with Dr. Adenauer before making any decisive moves with regard to the Allied policy vis-à-vis Russia. The recent exchange of notes between the Western Allies and the Kremlin shows how this works. Thus, on Sept. 4th the N. Y. Times reported, "Dr. Adenauer said in a written statement that the Western notes were the result of the initiative he took in a letter to the U. S. Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, at the time of the Washington Conference of the Western Big Three foreign ministers." In this connection, the Times further reported, "Dr. Adenauer, in fact, had a hand in shaping the final form of the Allied invitation to Moscow. A draft of the notes was shown to him last week, and on Monday he made some suggestions for changes which were accepted by the three Allied capitals." When the Western Allies were in the process of preparing a reply to a subsequent Soviet note, Adenauer was again consulted. "Dr. Adenauer's opinions will be passed along to the three Western Governments and presumably will be taken into account by the Allied experts who are to meet at London this week to draft a reply to the Russians." (Associated Press, Oct. 5th.) Indeed, the N. Y. Times of October 15th reported that Bonn had submitted a memorandum on the question of German unity to "be studied at the meeting of the foreign ministers of the U. S., Britain and France, opening in London." The last Allied note rejected by the Kremlin bore the marks of Adenauer's influence. Writing in the N. Y. Times, Oct. 20th, C. L. Sulzburger stated, "in fact it was Chancellor Adenauer who obtained a change in the Western Big Three notes to Moscow sent yesterday . . ." The following day, Mr. Sulzburger re-emphasized the Adenauer influence stating, "thus West Germany asserted its increasing strength."

To bring the Adenauer influence up to date, we refer to Secretary of State Dulles' comments regarding possible action that the Allies would take in the face of the Soviets' latest rejection. According to the A. P. (Nov. 9th), Mr. Dulles said that Chancellor Adenauer "would have to be consulted first about steps to restore German sovereignty."

Is it not strange, to say the least, that the United States, a mighty power with problems of its own, should lean so heavily on a foreign politician for advice? The Adenauer policy, as we have seen, is not illogical in terms of Germany's perennial interests and ultimate objectives. But this policy must appear as incongruous when it is foisted upon the U. S. as though it corresponded to our own interests and objectives. As a result, a stalemate has been created with regard to a realistic solution of the German problem. Such an impasse provides Herr Adenauer with sufficient scope for maneuvering to further his own plans. This is the crux of the situation as we see it.

In the Summer 1953 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III we analyzed the Adenauer strategy and tactics and pointed out that Adenauer had not made any commitments whatsoever that are binding on Germany: "On the other hand, he appears to have obtained commitments from Uncle Sam . . . Though he hopes to discredit the possibility of Allied negotiations with the Russians over Germany, it would not in any way prevent the Germans from making their own secret deals with the Kremlin."

This is the method to Adenauer's "madness," but it ill becomes a mighty power such as the U. S. to permit itself to be manipulated like a marionette. When our leaders meet with the French and English, it would be wise for them to examine the German problem afresh—and to keep the door closed to the siren songs of wily Realpolitikers.

ANOTHER MYTH

Many arguments have been adduced for purposes of justifying the rearmament of Germany. The more familiar ones relate to the allegation that Germany could serve as a reliable military bulwark against Soviet Communism. These arguments, however, have not made the impression on the peoples of Western Europe as had been hoped for by their advocates. Consequently, a "new" reason has been thought up which, it is hoped, will be more acceptable because it appears to be logical. We are now told that, unless Germany is rearmed, the other countries of Western Europe will be at a disadvantage competitively in the commercial field since they are burdened with huge armament expenditures while Germany is not. Presumably the statesmen of Western Europe who propound this new line, hope that it will be accepted as the lesser of two evils.

As early as March, 1950, Winston Churchill expounded this view in a debate in the House of Commons. He observed that the Germans were not saddled with huge taxes for defense and that therefore they could devote all of their energies to peace time commercial activities. Mr. Churchill stated further that the Germans "may also comfort themselves with the important advantages which this relief from taxation gives to German commercial competition in all the markets of the world, growing and spreading with every month that passes." His views have been repeated by other leaders in Britain, including Mr. Anthony Eden, and have also been publicized in leading British periodicals.

Particularly at this time when Western European countries as well as the United States are beginning to feel the impact of German competition, the thoughts expressed by Mr. Churchill recur over and over again as though they were a panacea for all of the troubles besetting the Western Allies.

There is no question that it is an argument which appears to be plausible in terms of economics. Yet, when one examines the record of Germany's economic activities prior to World War II, the soundness of Mr. Churchill's thesis is debatable. A sampling of Germany's export figures reveals the following:

In 1928 Germany produced 101,701 passenger cars of which 4,578 were exported, or 4.5 per cent of the total produced. In 1937, when German rearmament was in full swing, total passenger car production in Germany amounted to 264,441. Exports, however, soared to 57,164 or 21.6 per cent of the total passenger cars produced.

In 1928 Germany produced 36,366 motor trucks of which 3,413 were exported, or 9.4 per cent of the total production. In 1937 total motor truck production rose to 60,384 of which 12,411 trucks were exported, or 20.6 per cent of the total production.

In 1934 Germany exported 35.6 thousands of metric tons of textile machinery. In 1938 these exports rose to 37.8 thousands of metric tons.

In 1934 Germany exported 24.4 thousands of metric tons of agricultural machinery, but in 1938 exports of these machines more than doubled to the amount of 58.5 thousands of metric tons.

During 1934 Germany exported 66.7 thousands of metric tons of machine tools. In 1938 the export of machine tools reached a total of 99.4 thousands of metric tons, or 50 per cent more.

In 1934 Germany exported optical glass and technical and scientific instruments amounting to RM 44,451,000. By 1938 the export of these goods was valued at RM 78,571,000.

The export of rubber manufactures in Germany in 1937 increased by 70 per cent over the year of 1932.

Needless to say that the German chemical industry, led by I. G. Farben, also showed a remarkable increase in exports. Thus, the German export value of pharmaceuticals in 1933 amounted to RM 72,119,000. In 1937 German exports of pharmaceuticals soared to RM 139,800,000.

Not only did the export of the commodities cited above increase considerably but other German exports, in general, held their own. Yet, it was precisely during the period when German rearmament had accelerated that many of her most important exports increased significantly. The State Department, in discussing U. S. economic policy for Germany (publication 2630), noted that as early as 1936 the German economy "was heavily geared to war preparations."

It would appear from these facts that German rearmament, far from stymying exports, actually had a favorable effect on Germany's ability to export and to drive on for new markets. Moreover, it should be borne in mind that Germany's drive for markets also included efforts to penetrate regions where important raw materials were available for rearmament and export purposes at the expense of her competitors.

It is not true that the building up of Germany's heavy industry for war purposes crippled her endeavors to gain supremacy in the commercial world. Indeed, the very building up of her industrial war potential prodded Germany to expand her export possibilities. To achieve this goal Germany did not hesitate to employ the most ruthless trade practices. It is appropriate at this time to quote a passage from a report issued by the U. S. Foreign Economic Administration in 1946. Germany, according to the F.E.A. "has expanded its heavy industry beyond the level required for peace time domestic consumption or normal exports and dumped the excess on the world market for whatever price could be obtained. This practice, notably in the machine tool, machinery, aluminum and other heavy industries, upset established channels of trade and tended to increase the dependence of neighboring countries upon Germany for supplies in this field. A favorite device was the subsidizing of exports to enable the underselling of foreign competitors. For example, the export subsidies were so high on certain machine tools—25 per cent of the domestic sale price—that many producers hastened to increase their capacities and take advantage of the situation."

It is incredible how leading statesmen can forget the Germany of the 1930s. How can they ignore the fact that the very ruthlessness of Germany's trade practices during the 1930s is in itself proof that Germany, in spite of her huge armament preparations, left no stone unturned to conquer markets by hook or by crook? There is absolutely no ground for hoping that the building up of Germany's war potential today will develop to the economic advantage of their neighbors as well as the United States. Those who preach the doctrine that German rearmament would rescue the export industry of the Western Allies are indulging in wishful thinking.

AGRESSION'S PAY-OFF

"West Germany's economy has taken another swing upward in its fantastic rise. . .

"Output of industrial plants was the largest in history. In October the industrial production rate reached a new peak of 170 per cent of the 1936 level, the year that the Nazi rearmament boom began.

"West Germany moved into the position of No. 1 creditor in the European Payments Union, . . . and is now $691,000,000 in the black.

"Bonn also passed the U. S. to take second place after Britain in world shipbuilding. . . ."

(From A. P.,11-30-53.)

"But Germans know that Eastern Europe was always the steadiest source of profits and have already organized an 'Eastern Committee' for the purpose of increasing trade with the Soviet Union up to a minimum of $140,000,000 a year—last year's total was less than half a million dollars. The committee will also work for the resumption of trade relations with the satellite states. It wants to obtain oil, wheat, and basic minerals in exchange for the machinery and steel goods which Germany is finding more and more difficult to sell. The Eastern Committee is still only in its infancy, but it is destined to become a force in Central European politics, not because the Germans intend to 'go behind' the provisions of the American Battle act but because they are convinced that the markets of the Western world must be supplemented.

"Restoration of trade with Eastern Europe would cushion the effects of an economic recession. It would enable Germany to avoid the possible political consequences of competing too fiercely for traditional British or French export markets. It would further the delayed recovery of Berlin and after eventual reunification—in which every German believes—make it easier for the new Germany to recapture its old economic position in the heart of Europe."

(Terence Prittie—The Nation, 10-3-53.)

MORE NAZIS IN THE BONN GOVERNMENT

From time to time we have published information concerning the reappearance of Nazi and pro-Nazi elements in the Bonn Government. For example, in the No. 39 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III we proved that many Ribbentrop diplomats were back in key positions in the new German Foreign Office. In this connection we cited 20 specific cases of former Hitler diplomats who are re-employed by Chancellor Adenauer in his capacity as the German Foreign Minister. This exposé received wide comment in the press both here and abroad and was inserted in the Congressional Record by Congressman Arthur G. Klein on January 9, 1952.

The above-mentioned article did not exhaust the subject. On the contrary, there are many more similar cases, and they are not only confined to the Foreign Office. Therefore, the purpose of this piece is to keep our readers abreast of this situation as far as is possible.

Some weeks ago the German press carried a letter addressed to Chancellor Adenauer written by a German journalist, Michael Heinze-Mansfeld. It was Mr. Heinze-Mansfeld who did much of the spade-work in uncovering the Nazi-diplomats who have returned to the Bonn Foreign Office. In his letter to the Chancellor, Mr. Heinze-Mansgeld made additional disclosures.

Thus, the present head of the East European desk of the German Foreign Office, according to Heinze-Mansfeld, is Dr. Otto Bräutigam. During the war Herr Bräutigam served as Deputy Chief of the Political Department in Alfred Rosenberg's Reichs Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories. In this capacity he played a notorious role in arranging for the deportation and decimation of the Jews in the Baltic States, the Ukraine and Byelo-Russia. His infamous exploits were set down in his own diary and have also been recorded in the files of the International Military Tribunals at Nuremberg.

The Counsellor of the Bonn Ministry of Justice is Dr. Franz Massfeller. This character once wrote the official commentary to the Hitlerite law "for the protection of German blood and honor." Massfeller also composed the "expert legal opinion" which permitted the non-Jewish partners of mixed marriages to sue for divorce merely because of the Jewish antecedents of their spouses. He also participated in the infamous Wannsee Conference which was concerned, among other things, with the question of instituting compulsory sterilization. Incredible as it may seem, this same Massfeller is now in charge of drafting new marriage and family legislation.

Among those employed in the German "Defense" Ministry is Lt. Col. Friedrich Wilhelm Heinz. Mr. Heinze-Mansfeld reminds Dr. Adenauer that Heinz was "a pioneer of bloody and murderous National Socialism and anti-Semitism" during the Weimar Republic. Moreover, Herr Heinz was an accessory to assassinations of political opponents including that of Foreign Minister Walter Rathenau.

So much for the basic facts contained in the Heinze-Mansfeld letter to Chancellor Adenauer. One would think that the Chancellor, when apprised of these facts, would react vigorously against these criminal characters. Yet, as far as we know, they have not been ousted from the Bonn Government. More than that, Adenauer recently announced the appointment of another notorious Nazi, Herr Hans Globke, as head of his Chancellery.

The record of Globke is a matter of public knowledge. As early as 1933 Globke was appointed as legal advisor to the Nazi bigwig Wilhelm Frick in the Ministry of the Interior of the Hitler Government. In collaboration with the Nazi Wilhelm Stuckhardt (as SS Obergruppenfuehrer) he wrote an official—and therefore approving—commentary on the Nuremberg race laws. Not only did Globke demand in his commentary the exclusion of "non-Aryans" from every field of German life, he also construed these statutes in a much harsher way than some well-meaning German courts had interpreted them. In his commentary on the German racial laws Dr. Globke affirmed that these laws "mean a renunciation of the liberalistic idea of the equality of human beings . . . A nation can flourish only if the leadership is entrusted to the elite . . . Only those of German blood can be citizens." For the unfortunate and unhappy victims of Nazi-Germany's barbaric racial legislation Dr. Globke has this comforting thought, "they should have chosen their parents more carefully."

Chancellor Adenauer's reorganized cabinet also contains individuals with Nazi background. Theodor Oberländer, who is now in charge of expellees, joined the Nazi Party in 1933. Waldemar Kraft, Minister without Portfolio, fought in the reactionary Free Corps, one of the forerunners of the Nazi Party itself. Subsequently he joined the Nazi Party and was a member of the Hitler SS.

We do not wish to give our readers the impression that these are the only current cases of Nazi infiltration in the Bonn Government. But we do think that they will help our readers to evaluate realistically the character of the Bonn Government. Of course, there are many officials who are free from the Nazi taint. They are the ones who are always placed on exhibit when it is necessary to convince the world that the Federal Republic is a shining example of democracy. However, real democracy is more than skin deep. Beneath the surface of the structure of the Bonn Government the pillars of pro-Nazism are intact to a frightening extent.

"My, my, I knew you when you were that high."

"'. . . We would be foolish not to recognize the survival in Dr. Adenauer's Germany of certain tendencies—the admiration of arbitrary power, nationalism, militarism, political arrogance, racial intolerance—which have with the exception of a few short years been pre-eminent in German life since the unification of 1871. . . .

"Fascist tendencies in Germany are encouraged by the refusal of the German people, as a people, to accept responsibility for the excesses of the Nazi regime or even to recognize that such crimes were committed. I feel strongly that the majority of Germans indict Hitler and the Nazis for failure rather than for Dachau or Rotterdam or Oradour or Malmedy. . . ."

(Drew Middleton in N. Y. Times, 9-6-53)

". . . Too many foreign observers have assumed that most Nazis were Nazis by conviction, and so jumped to the conclusion that the failure of the neo-Nazis in this election provides some evidence for a German change of heart. This is a crass delusion. . . . In the golden years of the Weimar Republic, from 1926 to 1929—when Germany could boast of an economic revival just as miraculous, and just as unstable, as Dr. Ehrhardt's—National Socialism was an addiction of a few cranks and fanatics. The salesmen, minor officials, shop-keepers and academics, who a few years later were to break up Jewish shops and shout for Danzig, were perfectly content during the boom to vote for respectable National parties and accept their share of capitalist prosperity. It was only when the boom collapsed that they began to worry about the Versailles Diktat.

"I fear that the same is true today. . . .

FACTS TO REPLACE FICTION

The hosannas which have been sung in praise of Dr. Adenauer's re-election have been most impressive. Particularly in the U. S., the Chancellor's victory was regarded as a stupendous triumph for U. S. policy. Few individuals in the U. S. have received such fulsome praise in our press as the Chancellor. Indeed, some columnists displayed more enthusiasm over Adenauer's triumph than they did when the Allies defeated Germany in 1945.

The American people have been bombarded with all kinds of assurances that with the Adenauer victory Germany has undergone a new birth of freedom. Of all the pieces which we have read on the Adenauer victory, one of the most striking, in terms of its exuberant optimism, was the editorial which appeared in BUSINESS WEEK September 19, 1953. Among the main points made in this editorial are the following:

A—"Chancellor Adenauer's triumphant election victory marks the beginning of a new era in Germany. For the first time, the German people have decisively aligned themselves with the West."

B—"The U. S. has played an important role in this triumph. Acting in the belief that Germany would serve as an imposing bulwark against Communism, we helped bring the country back from the debris of war to a healthy, thriving position. In fact, Germany is once again the dominant power in Europe."

C—"Chancellor Adenauer must be listened to as we listen to Churchill—as an independent and respected ally who shares the same basic principles but whose views are indubitably his own."

It is no exaggeration to say that these thoughts have been repeated over and over again by dozens of newspapers and periodicals throughout the country. Yet, in spite of this seemingly irrepressible wave of enthusiasm, these were some voices which expressed a note of caution. On page 21 we have reprinted a complete article on the subject of the Adenauer election by John Cordelli of the Magazine of Wall Street. While we do not share all of Mr. Cordelli's views, we regard his comments as among the most judicious and objective that we have seen on this subject.

There are other voices who have managed to maintain a sense of perspective despite the bandwagon psychology which has been drummed up for the Adenauer cause. These voices, too, deserve to be heard especially since they differ from the popular interpretation of the Adenauer victory as expressed in Business Week.

Point "A" of the Business Week editorial alleges that the German people have "decisively" teamed up with the West. The Wall Street Journal (Sept. 8, 1953) is by no means certain that this is a fact. "Despite the claims of some of the post-election comments, the Wall Street Journal writes, "it is by no means clear that the German voters—as we would like to believe—were giving a vote of confidence to American foreign policy."

The editorial continues in this vein, pointing out that the so-called pro-Western policies of Adenauer may not have had as much influence on the voters as the domestic issues. It continues, "the voters enjoying prosperity and observing the effects of Socialism elsewhere in Europe, may have been more influenced by this than by questions of foreign policy." Further on, the editorial states, "so here as in most elections, snap judgments on why voters voted as they did are dubious. So too are predictions as to what the vote portends about the future running of German sentiment." In conclusion, the editorial declares that the claim that the Adenauer victory "is an endorsement of our own policy for Germany, must be tempered with caution until the causes of the victory are clearer. One election does not settle the future of Western Germany."

Whether we can be proud of our role in making it possible for Germany to become the dominant power in Europe (Point B of the editorial), is certainly open to question. Business Week itself (September 12, 1953) observed, "it's quite possible that a united Germany may some day aspire to play an independent role between the U. S. and Russia." Such a perspective, we believe, would not be welcomed by our policy makers, yet it is inherent in the fact that Germany, through the help of American taxpayers, has been restored to the dominant position in Europe. Moreover, the specter of a German dominated Europe is not at all to the liking of the British and French who have been our tried and trusted Allies for generations.

Indeed, the Adenauer victory, according to this same issue of Business Week, may result in a greater split between the U. S. on the one hand and our Western Allies. This is not theory—it is a fact if the press of Western Europe is regarded as a true reflector of public opinion. More than that, if our policy makers are determined to boast about their responsibility for the resurgence of Germany, then the anger and fear expressed by the peoples of Europe towards Germany may very well turn towards the United States.

To put Adenauer on par with Winston Churchill (Point C of the editorial) is indeed a tall order. In effect, the people

LEST WE FORGET

[They knew the value of that for which they fought, and that the price was worth paying.—The Queen, at the Cloister Memorial.]

To these unburied dead give tribute due,
Let their memorial be magnificent;
Though all too soon their light and life were spent,
Destined to die, for what they died they knew.
These into everlasting darkness flew,
But laying down their lives were well content,
Streaming like the stars across the firmament,
To dive in flame down hissing gulfs of blue.

These, called to make the supreme sacrifice,
Thought they knew why; but had they lived to learn
For what indeed they so untimely died,
Would they have deemed it worthy of the price?
They died that Hitler's Generals might return, of this country are asked to place their very future in the hands of an individual who is notorious for dictatorial tendencies and more important, who depends for support on powerful forces in Germany who would like nothing better than to restore an authoritarian regime in Germany. As regards the latter point Mr. Walter Lippmann in discussing the fate of Western defense on the basis of a rearmed Germany, reports that the British now realize "that the nationalist and Nazi forces in Germany are stronger than they appear to be on the surface and that it is not safe to contemplate a military withdrawal" (New York Herald Tribune October 27, 1953).
And Krupp and Thyssen fatten side by side.

In an earlier report (October 20, 1953), Mr. Lippmann discussed the dangers of following a policy based on the goodwill of one man. We think it is worth-while to quote his warning in full:

"In almost every critical situation within the Western orbit there is now a man, a party, a government on which one or more of the three powers has staked everything—has staked, that is to say, much too much. These diplomatic darlings have been encouraged to see themselves as the indispensables, have quickly realized that the easiest way to get what they want when they want it, is to act like Dr. Rhee. They climb out on the windowsill or, like others who shall be nameless, they threaten to stick their indispensable heads into the Communist gas oven."

Mr. Lippmann did not identify the other "diplomatic darlings" but the whole world knows that Dr. Adenauer is the white haired boy of our State Department. Shall we, as Business Week advocates, place the very security of our country in the lap of the "diplomatic darling" of the West? To believe we can equate our common interests with Britain and France and the hidden aims of Germany is not only folly but will surely lead to disaster.

Incidentally, the cry for withdrawal is rising. The U. S. News and World Report (November 6, 1953) itemizes the potential strength of West Germany. It questions why American taxpayers continue to foot the bill to protect a country which has the power to defend itself and therefore the rest of Western Europe. It is strange indeed that this publication which seems to be so concerned for the American taxpayer, did not tell its readers how the American taxpayers were taken for a ride in the agreement on Germany's post-war debts. That agreement cost the American taxpayer two billion dollars. We believe that this new campaign for the withdrawal of troops from Germany has been encouraged by the Germans themselves but we doubt very much if Western Europe can truly afford to allow itself to be placed under the beneficent guardianship of a new Wehrmacht—even if it should be camouflaged within a European army.

In our judgment, the United States is approaching an important crossroad in its history. The choice, as we see it, is not between the Germany of Adenauer or the Britain of Churchill. It is rather a choice between consolidating a heritage which we share with our Western friends or walking a path which leads to our political, military and moral isolation. In this connection, Mr. Lippmann declares that he is sure that Great Britain "will do nothing which separates Britain from France in their relations with Germany." Let us hope that our statesmen will give up a policy which is separating Britain and France from the U. S. in their relations with Germany.

MEMO TO AMERICAN DIPLOMATS

". . . Mr. Grew's career mirrored two world wars and the stresses and strains that accompanied the emergence of the United States to world power. He was the First Secretary of the Embassy in Berlin when war broke out in 1914, and it is interesting to note how stubbornly pro-German his attitude was at the beginning. 'We all believe here that this war was carefully cooked up by Russia, England and France,' he wrote at the time. But later he said: 'It shocks me profoundly to remember that at the outbreak of the war in 1914 most of us in the embassy in Berlin accepted the German point of view, hook, bait and sinker, for in those dramatic days we were unused to war and war propaganda, and we were, for the time at least, cut off from all other points of view.' . . ."

(From Review of "Turbulent Era" by Joseph C. Grew. N. Y. Times, 11-16-52)

"Before the European Consultative Assembly on Friday, Mr. Alfred Robens, Britain's former Minister of Labour, made a sensible proposal for dealing with the problem of Germany.

"His plan is to keep Germany disarmed for five years while Russia and the West seek agreement on the German problem and on the wider issues of general disarmament. . . .

"It is equally certain that once Germany has this powerful army it will be used as a weapon to establish German dominance in Western Europe.

"France, in particular, will be more concerned with checking German ambitions than with contributing to a genuine collective defence of the West.

"Reynolds News has opposed German rearmament since the idea was first mooted precisely because we believe it will weaken and not strengthen the West.

"It is a dangerous plan which must be fought up to the last. For that reason we welcome Mr. Robens' proposal as one which even at this late hour can give us time to find some better solution to our problem than planting a Trojan horse in the heart of Europe."

(Reynolds News, 9-20-53)

". . . As to the broader international implications of Adenauer's landslide they can be summarized in one sentence uttered immediately after the official election return were in by one of the few 'trustworthy confidantes' of the Bonn Chancellor: 'For all practical purposes the Big Four conference is now dead for a long time.' In Western Europe the question asked these days is: Will Washington listen to Adenauer rather than to Churchill?"

The Indelible Record

By
R. H. S. CROSSMAN

Just twelve years ago—On October 25, 1941, to be precise—Dr. Hinrich Lohse, a small-town Nazi who had just been made Reichskommissar for the occupied Russian territories, under Alfred Rosenberg, received a letter from his Minister's office, which ran as follows:

> Herr Viktor Brack, Oberdienstleiter in the Führer's Chancellery, is ready to collaborate in the installation of the necessary buildings and gas plants. He thinks it easier to construct the latter, of which we are short, on the spot. He would like to send his chemist, Kallmeyer, to Riga. . . . To judge from the actual situation, one need have no scruple in using Brack's method to liquidate Jews who are unsuitable for work. . . . On the other hand, Jews suitable for work will still be sent East to be attached to the Labor Service. Naturally, employable men and women must be separated from each other.

Now that he is living in retirement on a monthly pension of 263 Marks awarded him by the German Federal Republic, Dr. Lohse has the leisure to reflect on the consequences which flowed from this letter. I recommend him to spend part of his pension on purchasing The Final Solution by Gerald Reit*linger. To those of us not so intimately acquainted with the complexities of Nazi bureaucracy, the story of the gas chambers makes very difficult reading. But Dr. Lohse should feel thoroughly at home in it. And, if he wishes to check Mr. Reitlinger's facts, he has only to consult with a few of his friends.

Has he forgotten about "Deutschland III," the department of the German Foreign Office, which co-ordinated genocide throughout Europe? He can drop a line to its chief, Dr. Rademacher, now living in the Argentine, or have a word with Herr von Grundherr, who twelve years ago was in charge of Scandinavian affairs during the Jewish deportations from Norway and Denmark and since then has served Dr. Adenauer as Ambassador in Athens.

Is he in doubt about the precise role of the Ministry of the Interior? He can visit Franz Stuckart, the Secretary of State (released from prison in 1949). Has the helpfulness of the Reich Chancellery slipped his mind, when it transferred its Euthanasia experts to Dr. Lohse's territory for use in the extermination camps? Hans Lammers, its chief, is now out of prison and can refresh his memory. Is the issue the connection between his own Ministry and the S.S.? Lt.-Gen. Juettner, personal adjutant to Himmler, has just been denazified. Finally, what about "IVA 4b" (the bureaucratic hieroglyph which stood for the Jewish sub-section of the Religious Section of the Internal Division of the Gestapo)? True, Colonel Eichmann, who issued the orders for extermination, has gone underground, along with his No. 2, Captain Guenther. But Dr. Lohse can do without them; Dr. Gerhardt Peters, manager of the I.G. Farben affiliate which supplied the Zyklon B gas, is a free man and in business once again.

One of the most striking facts that Mr. Reitlinger has elicited by his years of scrupulous research is that nearly all the men engaged on the "Final Solution" are alive and free. Of those who actually committed murder or controlled the campus, a handful were tried and executed; the rest disappeared.

But the Civil Servants and Army officers, who arranged the transport facilities, initialled minutes and passed them from one department to another, and the diplomats who delivered the instructions to the satellite Governments, are either back at their desks in Bonn or, like Dr. Lohse, in pensioned retirement.

One of the conveniences of a totalitarian State is that no one, except the Leader himself, need feel personally responsible for any paper which crosses his desk. At Nuremberg, even Freiherr von Weizsaecker, Ribbentrop's Secretary of State, could claim that he was "merely acting as a postman" when he was shown his signature on the damning papers.

To collect three million human beings, scattered all over Europe, into ghettoes; to transport them from these ghettoes hundreds, sometimes thousands, of miles; to sort them out and index them; and, after gassing them, to dispose of the corpses—all this demanded not only a gigantic organization of its own, but the co-operation of every branch of the Army and the Civil Service. Yet, when it was over and the elaborately concealed facts had been revealed at Nuremberg and in the other trials, it became more and more difficult to nominate the real criminals. As Mr. Reitlinger observes, there is a nightmare quality about this picture of hundreds of respectable Germans, with their in-trays and out-trays all neat and tidy, each fixing his eyes on his own paper work and discreetly refusing to visualize what the end result of that paper work was:

> In each crematorium there were five three-door furnaces with mechanical stokers, ash tips, and corpse lifts, but in the two larger crematoria the gas chambers were on the same level as the furnaces to which the corpses were run on the rail-wagon. The underground gas chambers of the smaller crematoria were approached by a subway, gently graded, down which fathers of families pushed perambulators. The aspect of the buildings was not unfriendly, in spite of the chimneys, so ominously big for a mere bath house. The ground over the gassing cellar was converted into a well-kept lawn, in which stood at regular intervals mushroom-like concrete objects, and these, though they might not intrigue the newcomers very much, were the shafts down which, after methodically unscrewing te lids, the sanitary orderly was to scatter the amethyst-blue crystals when the Sergeant-Major gave the order. Slowly the gas escaped from the perforations in the sheet-metal columns. Generally the victims would be too tightly packed in to notice this at first, but at other times they would be few enough to sit in comfort, gazing up at the douches, from which no water came, or at the floor, which, strange to say, had no drainage runnels. Then they would feel the gas and crowd together away from the menacing columns and finally stampede towards the huge metal door with its little window, where they piled up in one blue clammy blood-spattered pyramid, clawing and mauling each other even in death. Twenty-five minutes later the "exhauster" electric pumps removed the gas-laden air, the great metal door slid open, and the men of the Jewish Sonderkommando entered, wearing gas masks and gum boots and carrying hoses, for their first task was to remove the blood and defecations before dragging the clawing dead apart with nooses and hooks, the prelude to the ghastly search for gold and the removal of the teeth and hair which were regarded by the Germans as strategic materials. Then the journey by lift or rail-wagon to the furnaces, the mill that ground the clinker to fine ash, and the lorry that scattered the ashes in the stream of the Sola.

Extermination was very rarely mentioned in the files. The two organizations, for instance, whish first collected 60,000 aged and insane persons from the German public assistance institutions and the asylums and then gassed them in fourteen Euthanasia clinics were discreetly called the "Charitable Foundation for the Transportation of the Sick" and the "Charitable Foundation for Institutional Care."

The code name for gassing Jews was Sonderbehandlung, and each trainload of victims destined for extermination at Auschwitz was preceded by a teletyped message from "IVA 4b," which read, "To be treated according to the directives for special treatment." The officials concerned knew what was happening but, since they did not know officially, their consciences are now clear. The only weighty objection came from the Wehrmacht Transport Command, which protested against the slowing up. of military movements by the trainloads of useless Jews. Curiously enough the Vichy and the Fascist Governments also put up some resistance and successfully evaded Himmler's plan for exterminating their own nationals. But they made no protests against the gassing of foreign Jews within their borders. So, too, the Protestant and Catholic bishops in Germany stopped the mercy killing of Germans but did nothing about Auschwitz. Dr. Lohse can enjoy his pension with a good conscience, particularly since he did make at least one protest. If he were to suffer, so should thousands of other bureaucrats all over Europe who connived at the Final Solution. . . .

Of course, the whole operation was classified as "Secret," and that supplies an easy alibi to modern consciences. Those in the secret cannot tell what they know, while those outside are patriotically bound to turn a blind eye. Moreover, in the case of the "Final Solution," there was the further excuse of extreme confusion. Perhaps the most illuminating part of Mr. Reitlinger's book is his separation of the various strands which had to be woven together in order to produce Auschwitz.

Hitler and Himmler started with the idea of expelling Jews from the Reich, if possible at a profit. In this way three birds could be killed with one stone: the Reich would be made Jew-free; the recipient countries would be poisoned by Jewish immigration; and Germany would earn some useful foreign exchange. To some extent this policy continued right up to the end. Throughout the war, rich Jews were purchasing visas and, even in the concentration camps, the S.S. were always open to business deals. As late as the autumn of 1944, the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee was offering Himmler fifteen million Swiss francs in exchange for the Hungarian Jews.

The second strand was the use of Jews for slave labor. Auschwitz was started as a camp to provide labor for a new I.G. synthetic rubber factory, and it was never clear, even to the S.S., whether this factory was a mere cover for extermination or a serious project. It seems to have been a matter of chance whether any particular trainload of Jews was destined for the gas chamber or the Buna plant. Moreover, throughout the war both the Wehrmacht and the Economic Ministry hoarded their skilled Jewish labor for arms production.

The third strand was extermination in the strict sense. This began in September, 1939, as Euthanasia; and up to 1941, when the German bishops stepped in, it was applied to the aged and insane inside Germany, irrespective of race. Then the Euthanasia teams were transferred to extermination proper, apparently in order to accelerate the process of making the Reich "Jew-free." Owing to the secrecy attached to it, this never replaced the other policies, but was superimposed upon them. Thereby a macabre confusion was created.

At the most critical period of the Russian war, the transport system was overstrained by trainloads of Jews, being concentrated into ghettoes, shifted Eastwards for extermination or sent Westwards to arms factories. The muddle—intensified by the usual inter-departmental disputes—became sheer chaos when the Russian advance began and the Jews, who had been shifted Eastwards, had to be shifted Westwards again. It was now that Himmler and a number of his senior officers conceived the plan of keeping the gas chambers going, but simultaneously offering to save Jews from them—at a price. So the two strands—exploitation and extermination—crossed and recrossed right to the bitter end. . . .

"Buenos Aires: . . . The German publishing firm Editorial Durer today published a book containing what were alleged to be almost 2,000 sworn statements by German officers and soldiers charging Allied forces violated rules of war. The statements were said to have been made by prisoners at a camp near Darmstadt, where they were interned after May 8, 1945.

"American forces were accused of 1,094 crimes; the Russians, 528. . . .

"The accusations include a wide range of brutalities, with rape predominant. There are also charges of bombing and strafing hospital units, plunder, beatings and other forms of torture."

Russian Policy and Propaganda

Why Russia Wants a Strong Germany

On the eve of the elections in Germany the New York Herald Tribune (September 6, 1953) stated in its leading editorial: "The Soviet Union wants a weak Germany in which it could intrigue at will . . ." These words express a point of view which has been shared by many of our leading policy makers since the end of the war. It has led many Americans to accept the thesis that the Soviet Union hoped to communize Germany or at least to exercise a predominating influence on the country by pursuing a policy that would weaken Germany's power.

Because so much of our policy towards Germany has been based on this premise, it is essential we believe, particularly at this time, to scrutinize this idea with more care.

As we review the past eight years of Soviet policy in Germany, one fact stands out most sharply, i.e., that the Soviet have never pursued fixed tactics with regard to their postwar treatment of Germany. It is true that in the latter period of World War II, and immediately thereafter, the Russians appeared to advocate a "weak" Germany. Yet, even during the war itself Stalin made public statements which indicated that the Soviets were not at all wedded to the idea of a permanently "weak" Germany. The Soviet dictator emphasized the resilience of the German state and even went so far as to talk about the need for the re-establishment of a German Army. In spite of these broad hints as to the flexibility of Russian tactics, our key policy makers developed a program which assumed that a "strong" Germany was anathema to the Russians and therefore perfectly suited for the West.

The Stalin statements of the war years were carried forward after hostilities had ceased. For example, in the summer of 1946 Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov made a declaration which definitely supported the revival of a "strong" Germany. Among the points made by Mr. Molotov were the following:

(a) The Russians opposed a separation of the Ruhr from Germany proper.

(b) The Russians opposed the "imposition" by the Allies of any program for the federalization of Germany into autonomous states, unless approved by a plebiscite of the German people.

(c) The Russians opposed the "agrarianization" of Germany and the "annihilation" of her main industrial centers.

Point (c) mentioned above deserves to be quoted in full: "In the light of the interests of world economy and tranquillity in Europe, it would be incorrect to adopt a course of Germany's annihilation as a state, or that of its agrarianization, including the annihilation of its own main industrial centers, and that such a course would result in undermining the economy of Europe, in the dislocation of world economy, in chronic political crises in Germany, which would spell a threat to peace."

Falling for the "Line"

Apparently, Mr. Molotov's statement did not make the impression that it should have made on those responsible for the formation of American policy toward Germany. Some of these policy makers were too busy denouncing those who demanded the whittling down of Germany's economic power as dupes or, still worse, as mouthpieces of the Kremlin.

The Soviets returned to the theme of rebuilding a powerful Germany during the Moscow Conference of the Council of Foreign Ministers in 1947. This was in sharp contrast to a prior recommendation of the Russians that German steel production be limited to 3.5 million tons a year. In this connection the Russian Marshall Sokolovsky stated on December 21, 1945, that "to leave Germany an annual capacity of 9 million tons of steel will mean war in a few years." This declaration by Marshall Sokolovsky was a sample of some of the pronouncements made by Russians which conveyed the impression that the Russians were aiming at a "hard" peace that would produce a "weak" Germany. Following this line, one of Russia's leading propagandists, Ilya Ehrenburg, wrote: "Some people think that beaten Germans are less harmful. They are mistaken. Germans remain true to themselves . . . The Germans haven't changed much. It is senseless to hope to bring them to reason, to shame them, and then to reform them."

Statements such as Sokolovsky's and the highly publicized emotional appeals by Ehrenburg apparently convinced our policy makers that the Russians would never agree to a "strong" Germany because it would act as the spearhead of a Western Bloc. Yet, the record shows that each time the West adopted programs which increased Germany's economic strength, the Russians went still further—as in the case of German steel production.

If a "weak" Germany were truly in the interest of Soviet Communism, then how can we explain Molotov's proposal in 1947 to increase Germany's steel production to 12 million tons after the Allies had proposed the figure of 7.5 million tons? This question, unfortunately, was never really pondered or answered by Western statesmen.

Could it be that the Russians deliberately cultivated the impression that they were for a "weak" Germany hoping that this would automatically induce the West to build up a "strong" Germany? Whatever the answer is, the evidence of the last two years shows conclusively that the Russians are not afraid of a "strong" Germany.

Appeal to the Germans

The Moscow diplomatic notes of 1952 on the unification of Germany underline the fact that the Russians advocate a strong and powerful Germany based on an unlimited industrial war potential which could support a national German army. For example, the Soviet note of March 10, 1952, stated that there should be "no limitations" placed on Germany's industrial might. As a natural sequence to this proposition the Soviets proposed that "Germany will be allowed to possess its own national armed forces . . . Germany will be allowed to produce war material and equipment . . ." More recently, Prime Minister Malenkov in a little publicized speech (August 22, 1953) at a dinner which the Kremlin tendered to the leaders of the satellite Soviet regime of East Germany, declared: "For a long time many achievements of the German intellect and labor were used by militarists for war. In conditions of peaceful development the German people will apply the might of their highly developed industry, all the achievements of science and engineering, all their creative energies and abilities to improving the living conditions of the populace and securing the country's progress. Germany will be able to establish close economic relations with peace loving states to receive the necessary markets, to resume traditional trade relations with the countries of Eastern Europe and with other states. Only by following this path will Germany rise again as a great power and take her proper place among the nations of the world."

This is not a statement which can be interpreted as a call for a "weak" Germany; on the contrary, it is a non-too-subtle appeal for collaboration between a strong and powerful Germany and the Soviet Union. Malenkov dispensed with questions of ideological differences for he knows that the Germans are past masters of Realpolitik.

As though he had anticipated Malenkov's tempting offer, Chancellor Adenauer stated in an interview (Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, July 7, 1953):

"Already today the states of the European Schuman Plan have formed a market of 157 million people. Thus, these countries are for the Russian economy a highly interesting trading partner. The German and Russian economies once before complemented each other in a magnificent way. The economy of an integrated Europe including Germany could offer even more. The greater the economic meshing (between Western Europe and Russia), the greater the political security."

Adenauer's "line" was repeated by no less an anti-communist stalwart than the late Mayor of West Berlin, Ernst Reuter: "In keeping with its tradition, a 'unified' Germany will again try to form a commercial bridge between East and West . . . But it will do as much business with the U. S. S. R. and the Balkans as they can handle. For the Soviet Union these trade relations will be a better guarantee of our peaceful development than any security treaty . . . Our country can therefore be expected to give its full support to the budding European Federation, regardless of the party that is in power at home. Thus we Germans will constitute a new force for stabilization on the continent." (World Magazine, November, 1953.)

These statements by the two outstanding leaders of Germany cannot be regarded as isolated outburts. They definitely reflect a view that is shared among the most important circles in Germany today.

In view of these facts one can rightly ask the question whether our present policies toward Germany are actually playing into the hands of the Russians: What are the calculations of the men in the Kremlin? It is unquestionably true that they would like to communize Germany. However, this is secondary to them. What they are more interested in at the present time is to create a Germany that would possess the material wherewithal to launch its own independent actions and be able to pursue an independent policy in all directions. This would open up great possibilities for the Russians, because it would offer the Germans the vast markets in the East. Moreover, as a consequence, it would create military and political guarantees of a nature which would enable the Germans to exert its power against the West. In other words, only a "strong" Germany can create an independent Germany, so far as the Russians define the word independent, and such a Germany would enable the Russians to gain another trump card in its dealing with the West.

Malenkov's statement implicitly recognizes this great opportunity as do the views of Reuter and Adenauer. Actually, Malenkov's views were outlined by Stalin himself in his last dissertation on foreign policy problems. It will be recalled that he expressed confidence that a "strong" Germany as well as a "strong" Japan would ultimately break away from the West. Can it therefore be that the Russians have egged us on in a subtle way to increase Germany's industrial war potential in the hope that it would be ultimately employed against the West?

Appeal to the West

The Russian approach to Germany has still another side. While Soviet propaganda raises the hopes of the Ruhr industrialists, it works overtime spreading fears and alarm among our Western Allies regarding the specter of a "strong" Germany.

In the same month of August 1953 when Malenkov toasted the Soviet-German friendship, he publicly addressed the French reminding them that the Franco-Soviet Pact of 1945 could be the backbone of "European security" against a resurgent Germany. Soviet propagandists have hammered away at the dangers to the West of a powerful Germany. Thus, Mr. Ehrenburg writing in the Soviet publication "News" September 1953, under the title "Revival of the Wehrmacht—Deadly Menace to France," reminds the people of the West of the threat of a "strong" Germany. "It would be wrong," Mr. Ehrenburg wrote, "to assume that French opposition to recreation of the Wehrmacht comes from only one section of society, the workers, and from only one political party, the Communists . . . However, during the German occupation it was not only the workers and not only the Communists but all decent-minded Frenchmen who fought the invader. It is only natural that now when German militarism is being revived, representatives of different classes should voice their protests together with workers . . ."

In a similar vein A. U. Yerusalemsky writing in the Soviet publication "New Times" September 19, 1953, observes: "Hitler's policy is still fresh enough in the memory of European peoples from whom German imperialist oppression has executed a heavy toll of blood and sacrifice." The entire article of Professor Yerusalemsky which runs for about 6 pages, is devoted to this theme.

In the October 1953 issue of the "News" another Soviet propagandist, I. Lyadov, reminds the people of Western Europe that "the Bonn Revanchists do not even take the trouble to conceal to what use this future military might will be put. They openly call for a 'restoration of Germany's pre-Versailles frontiers.' 'Deutschland Ueber Alles' which contains the lines 'Germany from the Maas

". . . The dilatory tactics of the Kremlin suit the plans of West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. He does not want any agreement with the USSR now, even on German reunification; he prefers to wait until West Germany has become strong enough, militarily and economically, to talk to Moscow in the language it understands.

"Such a time may not be too distant, since the technical organization and personnel for a powerful West German army are available whenever the Allies give the word. . . ."

to Memel, from the Adige to the Belt' has become the official national anthem of the Bonn Republic."

In the very same issue of the "News" the former Soviet Ambassador to the United States, Alexander Troyanowsky, writes that the development of a powerful Germany "is causing sharp and growing dissatisfaction in England too, whose sons have twice in the course of one generation gone to their deaths fighting German aggression."

The "New Times" of October 24, 1953, ran a 6 page propaganda piece by L. Sedin which was particularly directed towards the British. "The eyes of ordinary Englishmen," Sedin writes, "are turned to West Germany with fear and apprehension. The creation by the Bonn Reich of an army half a million strong, an airforce and a navy is, naturally, not a comforting prospect to those who have not forgotten Dunkirk or who saw German war planes hovering over London and Coventry."

The propaganda beamed at the French and the English in particular, is growing with deadly effectiveness. The Russians have plenty of evidence which can be found in the German press, to show the growing belligerency and arrogance among important German groups. They can even point to the report of C. L. Sulzberger in the New York Times, October 18, 1953, that "many West Germans are gradually coming to believe that civilization would have a difficult time continuing without their aid. They take pride in this assumption—and some of them ask a price."

The Secret of Success

The Russians know that it would be difficult indeed to convince the peoples of Western Europe that the future fate of their freedom rests with the Germans. Unquestionably, most West Europeans want no part of the tyranny of Russian Communism. Yet, much as they fear the designs of the Communist East, their most harrowing experiences in so far as physical contact is concerned, have been with the Germans. The Russians are aware of this too and they are playing it up for all they are worth. Thus, Russian policy and propaganda do not suffer from any fixations, nor are they tied to one tactic or another for the realization of its ultimate objectives. Russian policy and propaganda have shown their dexterity in playing two contrasting melodies simultaneously. One tune fires the imagination of the Realpolitikers in Germany while the other stimulates the emotions and deep rooted fears of our Western friends. The Russians have kept open the door leading to a rapprochement with the Germans and at the same time they have managed to keep open the door leading to the West.

How have they been able to achieve this feat? It is not that we have failed to spend hundreds of millions to challenge Russian policy and propaganda, nor have we been remiss in our efforts to help rehabilitate our Western friends. But all of our actions have been conditioned by one overriding objective, i.e., to re-invigorate the German powerhouse. This has been the great blind spot in our entire approach toward the Russian problem in Europe. Had we defined realistically the basic elements of strength which are prerequisite for our security, we would never have become so vulnerable to the Russian challenge.

By making all factors subservient to the rebuilding of a powerful Germany, we have produced a policy which is psychologically unsound and disastrous in terms of our political and security interests. Thus, the secret of Russia's success is the failure of our own policies.

". . . The dilemma is this: if the U. S. insists on the European army, which was given a sizable shot in the arm by German Chancellor Adenauer's election victory, it almost certainly cannot achieve the unification of Germany. If the U. S. vigorously pursues the unification of Germany, there almost certainly will be no European army. Right now, both are goals of U. S. policy. . . .

"It should be remembered that not creating EDC would not render Western Europe defenseless. It would still have the NATO forces, which it could strengthen as much as it wanted or thought necessary. It would still have what is probably the most powerful deterrent there is to Soviet attack in Europe—the U. S. commitment, in the Atlantic Pact, to come to West Europe's aid in the event of attack.

"There may be other ways out of the dilemma —other ways to negotiate EDC with the Soviets, even ways to make our EDC policy consistent with our German unification policy. But before anything very constructive can be done, it is essential to recognize that the two policies are not now reconciled. . . ."

(Joseph E. Evans in the Wall Street Journal, 9-14-53)

"We prophesy that September 6, 1953, the date when Dr. Adenauer was given a sweeping electoral victory by the West Germans, will once more bring the German menace into the life of Europe.

"Adenauer stands for a rearmed Germany. He wants to liberate the East Germans. Behind him are the Ruhr Industrialists and the same old gang of financiers who backed Hitler.

"Adenauer's Germany is to have an army of 12 divisions. Nominally, they will be part of the West European defense force. In practice, once the new Germany begins to feel its strength, these divisions will soon slip through paper safeguards and become instruments for the furtherance of German ambitions.

"And these ambitions are? Ask history. 1914 . . . 1939 . . . 19 . . . ?

"Adenauer is the blue-eyed boy of the present American Government. The Americans are so terrified of the Red terror that they cannot see the black menace oozing to the surface again.

"From now on the voice of events will be saying: This is where we came in."

LIONEL GELBER

Toward the middle of the nineteenth century the developing patterns of American life were brilliantly described and analyzed by a French visitor, Alexis de Tocqueville in his "Democracy In America." His remarkable insight is now generally recognized by our own historians who employ his work as an important source of reference. The historical importance of de Tocqueville's work should remind Americans that the careful evaluations of American life by non-Americans may be more accurate than our own self-judgments.

Our country is older by more than 100 years since the days of de Tocqueville. By 1900 the United States had reached the limits of what are now our present geographical frontiers. However, there are no fixed boundaries to our economic, political and social achievements—and failures.

The changes that have occurred and are now rapidly transpiring before our eyes are not only momentous in terms of our future as a democracy but they have a direct bearing on the future direction of world events. Once again an "outsider," a Canadian born scholar, has placed mid-century U. S. A. on the canvass. It is not a canvass of blacks and whites but of many shades and colors, and the artist has exhibited a technical competence coupled with a profound understanding of his subject.

Mr. Lionel Gelber, the author of "The American Anarchy," is a recognized authority on international affairs and a sober student of the political and social sciences. Educated at the University of Toronto and then at Oxford (Rhodes scholar), he has taught at the University of Toronto and served with the RCAF during the war. Since the end of the war he has lived in the U. S. A.

Mr. Gelber is an accomplished writer. His earlier books, "The Rise of Anglo-American Friendship" (1938), "Peace by Power" (1942), "Reprieve from War" (1950), were acclaimed by scholars and journalists. With such intellectual equipment and achievements it is not surprising that in his latest work Mr. Gelber should attain further distinction.

THE AMERICAN ANARCHY is not a book to be read at one sitting. The wise observations which literally pack every sentence of this work, require careful study and thought. It is a book that grows in meaning and instruction as one rereads it.

While describing basic trends and developments in the United States today, THE AMERICAN ANARCHY also presents a historical and philosophical analysis of the present world crisis. "Man versus the machine remains a major issue of the twentieth century, the question being how to control it so that it can be exploited in common to the common advantage." This is certainly one of the great problems of our time but, according to Mr. Gelber, it is not only man versus machine but responsibility versus irresponsibility, order versus disorder, in all aspects of American life.

The author not only delves into the basic problems of American economics, education, morals and politics, but projects these problems to the world scene.

One of his most thought provoking chapters is entitled "Foreclosure and Dissent." Here, Mr. Gelber discusses the crucial issue of responsibility versus irresponsibility in the fields of public opinion and the instruments which condition American thinking. Perhaps the theme of this chapter may best be expressed in his quotation of a statement by the celebrated Artemus Ward, "It ain't so much people's ignorance that does the harm as their knowing so much that ain't so."

Mr. Gelber describes the development of what he calls large scale organizations in the realm of opinion. "Large scale instrumentalities which are themselves monopolistic, thus become the chief means for that exchange of ideas which, properly conducted, will be the antithesis of monopoly." In other words, Mr. Gelber does not fear bigness per se, for in his opinion, bigness in itself is not the real issue, whether it be in the realm of economics or politics. The real issue is responsibility versus irresponsibility. The author insists that a democracy, to be well rounded, must be well informed, "and that is why opinion industries, though they deal in imponderables, are for it the most basic of all."

In discussing the relations between the organs of public opinion and the formulation of government policy, Mr. Gelber makes the following observations.

"After 1945 the débâcle of the West in East Asia was bruited about. Over another crucial issue, the abrupt switch in American policy toward Germany, a more studied reticence hovered. Its potential consequences were never fully published before that portentous change had been speeded up beyond recall. Mass media, so eager on occasion to expose, promoted this fateful volte face unquestioningly; Congress, which examines everything else, proceeded on the unexamined hypothesis that Germany's interests would lie with the West. And so the American public could not be warned that in the long run German nationalism, as revived through the Bonn Republic, had most to get from Moscow; that, in the absence of East-West agreement, land and brethren in Soviet clutches can be repossessed through another Russo-German agreement; that in fostering the restoration of an industrially powerful West German State the bipartisan policy of the United States might itself have played into Russia's hands. World War III can result from such irresponsibility, and if it does this may be proof that a manipulated large-scale democracy, being selectively informed, is not really an informed one. But the proof will again have come too late.

"Opinion industries, like government itself, thus waver between foreclosure and disclosure. It is not enough therefore that mass media watch each other and that government also be watched. It is as important that views independent of them all should be heard. For a diplomacy which may be treated or mistreated in accordance with the interests of mass media is, to those who reject organized conformities, not an open one either. War and peace is the major issue of the twentieth century; and open diplomacy can be the most democratic of procedures if citizens are apprised generally of what goes on, if new departures in policy are fully debated. Yet, when proposals, prior to submission for approval, are being negotiated, there should not be the sort of publicity which makes diplomacy itself impossible."

In another instructive chapter, "Democracy In Error," Mr. Gelber examines the problem of leadership:

"The era of bigness, with the national and the international so interdependent, requires an expert leadership which might handle and advise upon the enlarged scale of public affairs. To preserve peace, or win a war when it comes, is still the cardinal task of government. By the same token the political role of the technician in a modern democracy can, over and above routine administration, be appraised through the specialized qualities he contributes to the making of foreign policy."

The author does not imply that genuine leadership must bear the imprimatur of infallibility. "Error is not treason," he declares, but society can scarcely afford one or the other when either is raised to a point "coextensive with society itself." It is not enough to have an illustrious name or the claim of distinguished ancestors as qualifications for leadership. Nor is it sound, Mr. Gelber writes, to accept leaders solely on the basis of technical and administrative competence. In the realm of foreign policy sound leadership must possess a "rich background of full acquaintance with the vital interests of a free world everywhere." Further on he states, "Statesmanship is not only wisdom in public affairs, it is wisdom in time."

Because of Mr. Gelber's style interspersed with philosophical observations, the reader may lose sight of the specific targets discussed. But upon a careful re-examination, the lines become clearer, the subject matter more concrete.

In every way THE AMERICAN ANARCHY is a challenging experience. Mr. Gelber writes without the confusion of ambiguity; on the contrary, he is direct and courageous and he speaks without malice but with the dignity of one who is thoroughly imbued with the democratic spirit and who perceives clearly the roots of American democracy.

Dr. Adenauer's Vote in the "Council of Three"

In the article, "A Significant Chapter in Dr. Adenauer's Political Career" by "Rhenanus" (Prevent World War III, No. 42 issue), it was stated that Dr. Adenauer had voted with the Nazis to dissolve the Prussian Diet at the request of Franz von Papen.

Since we received inquiries regarding Dr. Adenauer's position on that occasion, we asked the author "Rhenanus" to clarify the matter. Rhenanus' reply is published below:

"1. The Prussian Diet was dissolved by the 'Council of Three' on February 6, 1933. I was mistaken in reporting that Dr. Adenauer voted for the dissolution. He actually abstained. Cf. Otto Braun, 'Von Weimar zu Hitler,' (Zurich and New York, 1940), p. 445. The two members of the 'Council of Three,' who voted for dissolution, were von Papen and the Nazi Speaker Kerrl.

"2. Dr. Adenauer abstained for constitutional reasons. He considered the vote illegal because he regarded an executive order (February 6, 1933) by von Hindenburg and von Papen replacing Braun as the 'legal Premier' in the 'Council of Three' as unconstitutional. He also considered the executive order to be a violation of the decision of the Constitutional Court (October 25, 1932) which had upheld the 'legal government' of Braun (cf. Braun, ibid.).

"3. Nevertheless, neither Dr. Adenauer as President of the Prussian Upper House (State Council) nor Otto Braun as legal Premier, carried through new proceedings before the Constitutional Court because of the illegal dissolution of the Prussian Diet. This Diet was only one year old and just had defeated a Nazi motion for dissolution. (cf. Braun, ibid, p. 444 f.)

"4. Dr. Adenauer's abstention in the 'Council of Three' and his subsequent omission to resort to the Constitutional Court was as much a service to the Nazis and to von Papen as if he would have voted for the dissolution. By a similar abstention Premier Reinhold Maier just has assured a ratification of the EDC treaty by the Bonn Bundesrat (Upper Chamber). Supposing a would-be-dictator attempted to dissolve the United States Congress and dispose of the President of the United States of America. What would he think of a president of the U. S. Senate who did not try to resort to the courts against such illegal actions? Dr. Adenauer as President of the Upper House did not resort to the courts although this was quite feasible since the Third Reich was only 6 days old. Thus, when neither Braun nor Adenauer acted, the potential legal resistance to the Nazis crumbled and the latter were enabled to carry out their 'revolution.'

"5. My error was due to the reports of the Nazi press at that time which had suppressed Dr. Adenauer's abstention which I now accept on the strength of Braun's book. The official Nazi newspaper 'Völkischer Beobachter' of February 4th, 1933 reported that the Nazi Speaker Kerrl consulted Dr. Adenauer with regard to the dissolution of the Prussian Diet in accordance with Art. 14 of the Prussian Constitution. The same newspaper reported on February 7th, 1933 that the 'Council of Three' consisting of Adenauer, Papen and Kerrl had dissolved the Diet. The 'Völkischer Beobachter' made no reference whatsoever to the fact that Dr. Adenauer had not approved the resolution. On the contrary, at the end of the newspaper report it was stated that Dr. Adenauer opposed the intention of Braun to resort to the Constitutional Court (because of the illegal dissolution of the Diet) and had characterized Braun as 'a private person with no legal standing in the Constitutional Court'."

What Does Adenauer's Victory Mean

By

JOHN CORDELLI

The United States government was very much heartened by e unexpectedly stunning victory of Chancellor Adenauer ıd his party of Christian Democrats in the recent West Ger- an elections. While optimism over the results is height- ned because, in effect, the Soviets received a political drub- ng, it must be tempered because we do not know which rection a resurgent and powerful Germany will finally take.

The problem is how safely to harness the potential mili- ry and economic might of the new Germany into the service the Western democracies. The most obvious course—to hich our government is deeply committed—is to bring Ger- any into a fully functioning European defense system. How- er, the French who are the original advocates of the system, e now fearful lest the dominant position in this grouping occupied by their old foe. Weakened by a chronically in- fective government, and harassed both by economic prob- ms of the first magnitude and debilitating effects of the war Indo-China, France finds herself in a position of distinct feriority as compared with the politically stable and eco- omically expanding Germany.

Nevertheless, the choice before France is quite limited. If it oes not agree to enter the European defense system, it is a ertainty that Germany will be invited into NATO. This oses a terrible dilemma for the French, as the Germans, with powerful army, would have much more freedom of action an if they were securely wedged into a European defense stem. There is also the not inconsiderable factor that failure act cooperatively from the American military viewpoint ould cause France to lose American support. Perhaps the ew recommendation of the National Security Council to ex- nd an additional $385 million in military aid to France to nable her to more successfully wage her war in Indo-China ill help her make up her mind.

While it is a cause for elation to the free world that West ermany has firmly decided in favor of the West, a special roblem has been posed for the United States as Germany ill undoubtedly exact a stiff price for her allegiance. As soon s she rearms, which cannot now be prevented in any case, he will have enormous bargaining power as between Russia nd the United States. It must not be forgotten that the Soviets ave a very large and valuable ace in the hole in the form of e East German territories which they annexed at the end of e war, and, more important, controls the former German rritories which the Poles now occupy. With Poland a mere awn in the hands of Russia, it would not cause the Russians e slightest embarrassment to offer a return of these terri- ries to the Germans in exchange for a neutralized and nified Germany. This would be very tempting bait and diffi- ult for the Germans to resist. We, of course, can counter by ffering increased financial aid and other inducements but e might be forced to continue it indefinitely as long as the ussians were in a position to offer the Germans something they all so deeply want. This is not a pleasant prospect for the American taxpayer but it might as well be faced, as we apparently have no alternative.

While the victory of Adenauer is welcomed in the United States, we should look a little more deeply below the surface and see that, in reality, it is a victory for a new and potentially powerful Germany, which intends to be fully in command of its own destiny. In the long run, probably neither we or the Russians will be able to do much about it.

Among the first things we may expect is pressure by the Germans to increase their trade with the East. This is already clearly in evidence. German businessmen are not particularly bothered by such considerations as ideology and, if they can make a favorable trade deal with the Soviet bloc, they will do it, regardless of our wishes.

It would appear that we have gotten ourselves what may eventually prove to be an unmanageable ally. It is true that we need his strength at this particular juncture of world affairs, with the Soviets posing an ever more serious threat to the peace and stability of the world. But in our relief at the moment, let us not ignore historic German expansionist pressure through any means available. We need not fear this under Chancellor Adenauer, who is first and foremost a good European, but Germany has many times in the past shown she will follow a "strong" man. It would not be pleasant for the rest of us if the strong man to follow Adenauer turned out to be more of an old-time German nationalist and less of a European.

Europe's Worry

By

WALTER LIPPMANN

There is a misunderstanding between French and American opinion which is still far from being irreparable. However, with sufficient stubborn and reckless stupidity it could be made irreparable. There are catastrophists in both countries who think it will be made irreparable.

They see only too clearly what would happen if the worst happened—if the logic of the misunderstanding were followed to the bitter end. The United States, exasperated by the French reluctance to decide how Germany is to rearm, would make a separate military alliance with Germany. Then France, reacting against such external coercion by swinging to the left, would fall into disorders that were too much for its democratic institutions to deal with.

I would not like to give the impression that such a disaster is imminent or is probable. I mention it because it is in everyone's mind: It is in everyone's mind because men think desperately when they despair of getting and making themselves understood.

"Looking at a Map"

Yet there can be no doubt, I submit, that the two countries are involved in a misunderstanding and not in a conflict of national interests. Our national interests are now, as they have always been, complementary. There is a fundamental community, going back to our own beginnings, which is in fact greater today than it ever was before.

It is impossible for the United States to play any effective role in Europe, to have any serious co-operation with Germany or with anyone to the East of the Rhine, except in callaboration with France. If anyone doubts this, let him study the map. Let him try to imagine the Atlantic Community without France and the French Union.

Nor is the present misunderstanding in the domain of morals, manners, and culture. The differences have always existed. Nor does the national misunderstanding stem from an ideological conflict. On the contrary, the ideological conflict in France feeds upon the misunderstanding.

"Simple U. S. Assumption"

The basic misunderstanding is due, I am convinced, to a different estimate of the international situation. Reduced to its simplest elements the governing assumption of American policy is still that of 1950—that Western Europe is threatened by a Soviet military aggression, and that all policies must be directed, must be pinpointed, to the objective of resisting that aggression. To have any other serious preoccupation is on this assumption blindness, folly, frivolity, escapism to the verge of disloyalty.

This American working assumption is held and is announced in varying degrees of rigidity and simplicity by the swarms of politicians, admirals, generals, and visiting firemen who at home and abroad issue public declarations in the name of the United States.

"Germans and Reds"

This assumption is, however, no longer that of any West European government, including the British, or of any important section of opinion in Europe. There is nothing uniquely French about the French view. It is the European view, namely, that Western re-armament in NATO, the discontent inside the satellites, the post-Stalin social and economic developments inside the Soviet Union, have together produced a situation different from 1950.

A military aggression, an overt orthodox organized military invasion is not now a primary preoccupation.

If it is not, then it follows that the big question is how Western Europe is to live at peace and in freedom with Germany. The Franco-American misunderstanding can be resolved only if we start from the postulate that in 1953 the problem is not how to contain the Red Army at Elbe but what is to be the place of Germany in post-war Europe.

This is now the paramount question everywhere in Western Europe. This great problem with its vast historic consequences can never be solved, can only be hopelessly muddled up, by the simple-minded notion that the twelve German divisions would make Europe safe against the Russians and would permit the larger part of the American ground forces to be withdrawn.

"Power with a Grievance"

It is in this context that the problems of the European Army and of the still larger project of political federation have now to be dealt with. It is, I believe, reasonably plain what is the problem that has to be solved.

It is how to achieve and maintain a balance of power within the Western continent which will prevent German hegemony and domination.

E. D. C., for example, is advocated as a device for restraining the dominating power of Germany; it is opposed on the ground that it will not restrain and might facilitate German domination in Western Europe.

This preoccupation with German domination is not imaginary, hysterical or sentimental. It is general in all sections of West European opinion and it is shared by a very considerable number of impeccable and highly responsible Germans.

It rests on the evident fact that Western Germany is the largest, strongest country in Europe, that it is at once full of energy and at the same time bound to resent the partition, the dismemberment and the occupation. A great power with great grievances is not something to be shrugged off.

It is absurd that any American should find it difficult to understand the reluctance of the French to merge their own sovereign independence in a superstate which on present prospects is certain to be dominated by Germany.

An American who dared to suggest the relinquishment of American sovereignty to a supernational, to a super American Federation, would probably be investigated by the F. B. I. and hauled up before the McCarthy Committee.

Now there may be, and probably there are, good reasons why the French should do what neither we nor the British would dream of doing. But it is indecent to treat their natural and legitimate reluctance as a sign of moral inferiority.

"For French Reconstruction"

The problem to be solved, I repeat, is how to achieve and maintain an equilibrium of power within this integrated Europe. France is as "European," indeed more European in spirit and by tradition, than any other nation. But it will not be able to play voluntarily, and therefore adequately and effectively, a European role until it has—in terms of French conditions—made an internal reconstruction and revival which is comparable with that of Germany under Adenauer.

This is the indispensable condition of genuine progress toward the greater and smaller European unities. It may be that the French could be dragooned into ratifying E. D. C. before they have recovered their economic independence and their self confidence.

But it will be a poor kind of diplomatic victory, which will soon be undone and reversed, For, as Americans ought to find it easy to understand, it is a tremendous thing to ask any people to give up an important part of its sovereign independence: to force it when the nation is reluctant and resentful, is to ask for trouble.

A British View on German Rearmament

Propaganda for the idea of rearming Germany is being pushed out all the time. There is an urgent danger that the British people may come to accept the idea as right.

Here is Mr. Anthony Nutting, Undersecretary for Foreign Affairs, making a scandalous speech to foreign journalists at Bonn. He says that he sees no objections to British troupes being placed under German command.

The statement goes a great deal further than anything that has been said before. It will horrify most people in this country.

War Would Follow

If the British people have any sense they will let it be known that in no circumstances can they support the project of rearming Germany. Certainly not until the people of the country have shown themselves to have changed in mentality and character.

The Germans are a war-like people. After a few head hunting and savage tribes they are the most war-like people in the world. And although this may be a reason for admiring them, it certainly is not a reason for rearming them.

Only a fool would think that the Germans would not sooner or later make war-like use of any arms they were given.

Not-so-good Reasons

Two reasons are always put forward by those who advocate German rearmament.

First they say that German divisions can greatly strengthen the western alliance. Perfectly true. But in a very short time German divisions would also dominate the alliance—and most likely involve them in war.

The second argument is based on economics. It is said that the German industries, free from armament orders, are going to beat up Britain in the export field.

But there is a perfectly satisfactory way of getting around both points.

This Is the Answer

The duty of the British Government is to make peace with Germany and thereafter withdraw the strong British forces now occupying this country.

It will be said that the whole of Northern Germany would then be exposed as an open invasion route from the East.

Well then, let it be made a condition of the peace that the Germans should make a financial contribution towards the arming of those nations which are protected by the British forces.

By all means let the Germans provide arms. But by no means give them the opportunity to handle them.

The Pentagon Shapes a New Plan

By

FRANK GORRELL

The visit of Admiral Arthur Radford, Chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff, is regarded in Paris as the most important visit to Europe of an American military leader since General Eisenhower crossed the channel in wartime.

Europeans know that the Eisenhower Administration has been engaged in a basic review of US strategy. They have not been told, but they can further guess that pressure for a revision in strategy is mounting in the US as the result of five major developments.

First, while the demands upon France to ratify the European Defense Community agreement have been intense following the victory of Chancellor Adenauer, the European army is all but moribund.

Second, NATO has stalled at the halfway point in its objective of 50 divisions in being, and without these divisions, NATO's plan for holding the Russians at Europe's Eastern frontiers is in limbo.

Third, American army leaders have long believed that Germany alone is willing and able to organize the ground forces that can defend Europe. They have watched with growing impatience, while the French have vetoed even the most minute increases in Germany's border guards. A choice between reluctant France and willing and industrious Germany seems imminent to some American leaders.

Fourth, the Russians have steadily built their air forces in the West and now are constructing rocket platforms for guided missiles around Europe. They can quickly establish command of the air over Europe in wartime, making the reinforcement and supply of European armies next to impossible.

Fifth, the US is "running out of the ears" with atomic bombs. The immensity of the atomic stockpile and the cost of a dual defense system, of atomic and conventional weapons, is leading Eisenhower's civilian advisers to challenge the concept of limited, conventional warfare and to base American military strategy on the assumption that future wars will be all-out atomic wars.

This last conclusion is not shared by the Joint Chiefs. It is the product of the amateurs, principally Defense Secretary Wilson, and his deputy Roger Kyes. These men come to the Pentagon with the natural assumption of industrialists that any machinery installed in a factory 10 years or more ago is out of date and should be thrown away. Their central, driving motive is not the defense of the free nations but the reduction of America's military budget. They are searching for military miracles as a cheap way out. They began by cutting back the air force. Now they suspect that they have found the magic answer in the air force and the A-Bomb.

The professionals in the Joint Chiefs of Staff of course disagree, but the pressure to economize is on. It takes primarily the form of reducing the six American divisions now in Europe. These forces might be withdrawn as part of a bargain by which Russian troops were also pulled back. Or they might be re-integrated in a new force in which the presence of British and American troops continue to serve as a counter to a German army. But the prospect is for more German soldiers, under fewer guarantees.

France is the nation that seems most in danger of isolation. During December the National Assembly in Paris will choose the man who is to be the next president of France for (in theory, at least) a period of seven years. One of the hints from Bonn has been about this election. Chancellor Adenauer has given notice—in a public statement—that West Germany is "willing" to wait that long—but not much longer—for the French Assembly to make up its collective mind to ratify the European Defense Community—or else!

The peremptory form of the statement, implying an ultimatum, is significant because General Eisenhower has made known—also in a public statement—his boundless confidence in the greatest German (and European) since Bismarck, and his willingness to consider any and every suggestion from the West German Chancellery with the most sympathetic attention. And after the Adenauer "veto" at the London conference, this unusual endorsement has seemed over here to confirm that the Chancellor is a species of semi-official mouthpiece of the White House in Europe, his words speaking the President's—and also the Pentagon's—thoughts.

The first decision expected by the year's end is, therefore, that West Germany's army, already blueprinted and prepared by Theodore Blank and his loyal generals, will start getting its booted feet on the ground. Since the chances of French ratification of the EDC are no better, and the probability of a French veto of West German entry into the NATO is excellent, Adenauer's ultimatim fits with a second hint from Bonn. This is to the effect that there may be a US-West German military pact outside the NATO, similar to the ones with Spain and Greece. As a matter of fact, the whole NATO system may gradually be replaced by a network of military agreements in which the British as well as the Americans will take part.

Also during December the NATO council will meet in Paris for what (according to the hints) will be the most important session since its creation. It will hear some—but not all—the details of the US plan; and it will learn in the form of reports from the US Joint Chiefs of what the Pentagon had decided before their departure about the next phase—the "nuclear-economy" phase. In this phase, the hints fall into a contradictory pattern: US public opinion is being told that the six US army divisions on the European continent will gradually be replaced during the next five years by the new German divisions. Western European opinion on the other hand is being carefully led to believe what Gen. Walter Bedell Smith told French Ambassador Henri Bonnet—that the US troops will remain.

The difference between the two versions, it is believed over here, is a matter both of short-term psychological targets and longer-term practical timing. In any event, the new US plan will make the US Sixth Fleet in the Meditearranean steadily more important in strategic terms—as the guardian of a "Radford Line"—than the six divisions on the ground. Other hints published in European newspapers, and neither denied nor confirmed by US military authorities in Europe, are to the effect that the carrier Midway has already been equipped to use tactical nuclear weapons.

The "Radford Line" is said to be the sea-air juncture at which these tactical weapons afloat are to be co-ordinated with strategic nuclear weapons ashore. The line is, roughly, the 38th Parallel of latitude which cuts a broad arc from southern Spain through southern Italy and Greece to northern Turkey. Military treaties permit use of bases in Spain and Greece for such bomb-carrying planes as the new US 8-jet intercontinental B-52. Other arrangements permit the use of Italian and Turkish ports and bases. The ill-fated Trieste project indicated that Yugoslavia was no longer on the Radford Line; and Gen. Nathan Twining on the eve of his departure with Air Secretary Harold Talbott for North Africa suggested that the line was north of Morocco—he said that two big air bases planned for North Africa would not be built because of the Spain bases now available.

Lines drawn from the western (Spanish) end of the southern arc and the eastern (Turkish) end to a central area in northern Europe are about equal in length. That area is Germany. The geographical relation between the area and the arc is the equivalent of the strategical relation in the new US plan between orthodox, conventional armaments and deterrent nuclear armaments. There are in fact three levels in the plan: orthodox conventional; tactical nuclear; strategic nuclear.

The role of the first is to protect the West's industrial power in Europe. This means England, France, Northern Italy and West Germany—above all Germany because it is the country which holds the industrial balance of power between West and East not only in Europe but in the world. The second level is a bridge between the first and third, gradually closer to the conventional than to the absolute. The role of the nuclear weapons, both strategical and tactical, air and sea combined—atomic and hydrogen bombs, rockets, jets, guided missiles, the equipment needed to use them and to protect against the enemy's use of them—is to guarantee dreadful retaliation for any atomic aggression on the part of the enemy. The Soviets might win a few battles; but their victory would be suicidal; their industrial power would quickly be annihilated.

The new US plan (or rather the hints about its nature) is already meeting opposition in Western Europe. Some observers are nervous about the apparent allocation of military roles. The Sunday Times of London says: "What disturbs members of the NATO is that it looks as if it implied adapting the military strategic concept to the Republican concept of budgetary solvency." The Monde of Paris rebels against the notion of bargain-counter cut-rate armies of European mercenaries; while a US Army division costs annually in peacetime some $300 million, the same fire power can be obtained in Germany for some $65 to $80 million, and in Greece and Turkey for as little as $10 to $20 million.

Saving money may be an important consideration in the US, but there is little chance that a German army, especially an independent army, can become politically "safe" enough to take specifically political risk of removing the US divisions in the foreseeable future. This is particularly true because the horrendous absolute nuclear weapons on both sides, West and East, may cancel each other out; neither may use them, and the issue may be decided—as it was, for example, in Korea—by the relatively old methods. Western Europeans can see no lasting peace in the victory of the West, led in military terms by German arms, over the Soviets.

Another objection is that the plan tends to mobilize whatever "diplomatic" action that might be taken, in the service of military rather than political goals. There has been much talk of negotiation with the Russians to get them out of East Germany, either through the van Zeeland plan, or the Bonn plan for a demilitarized zone between the Elbe and the Vistula. It would be fine if this could be done: so long as the Russians have bases in East Germany, they can bomb Paris and London with their 500/600-mile range rockets. But it would be better if diplomatic efforts were directed, Western Europeans believe, toward unfreezing the present West-East status quo with all its tensions.

GROWTH OF LITTLE FRITZY—A CAUTIONARY CARTOON

But the most serious objection to the US plan is that it does not provide a fourth level. Protecting Western European industry against possible military attack is not enough; it must also be protected from economic and social attack. In building up the essential forces of military defense, the domestic economies of the Western European countries must not be made vulnerable to subversion. As the London Observer says, "We must not allow civilian consumption to fall so low that it causes political trouble."

Chancellor Adenauer has given more than hints about his attitude toward labor. The Christian Democratic attack on the labor unions suggests, as the Manchester Guardian points out, "that an attempt is being made to split the unions in order to weaken the opposition of the bulk of German industrial workers to the present government"—and to its military plans worked out in conjunction with Republican big-business anti-labor elements in Washington. Such an attempt may have success in Germany (though that is doubtful), but it certainly would, if tried, cause trouble in every other Western European country.

Above all, the failure to provide the fourth level of the US military plan is already being exploited by Moscow. The effects of economic and social injustice have permitted the Communists to start conversion and recruiting campaigns among workers and other low-level economic elements of the population which up until now have been non-Communist and anti-Communist. The slogan, "workers of the world unite to impose peace," which dominated the Third Congress of the World Federation of Trade Unions in Vienna suggests the Kremlin's political strategy against the new US military strategy. Louis Saillant said: "the workers of the world want to tear down the barriers erected by separatist labor union leaders," meaning, of course, the non-Communists. Giuseppe di Vittorio said: "The WFTU aims to win over people of all political beliefs. If it is to get the support of both the workers and the intellectuals, it must not be officially labelled Communist or Soviet-run."

The Communists and their agents in the labor unions may not succeed in getting the non-Communist workers in Western Europe to believe that the military defense against Communism equates or condones or even permits aggression against the whole working class.

But the defense of Western Europe's industrial power—used as a justification for creating the German divisions—will, if it is also used as a justification for leaving Western European military control and leadership to Adenauer's Germany, without US ground troops, almost inevitably give Moscow a good weapon of attack against the made-in-Washington new US five-year strategic plan for Atlantic defense.

"DUSSELDORF—Chalk up as a failure the attempt to sell American-style capitalism to German big business.

"West Germany today has a private-enterprise economy; that is, it's not run by the state. But it can hardly be called a free-enterprise economy in the American competitive sense, and it's probably going to become less so. Quietly and methodically trade and industry are returning to their traditional pre-war patterns of cartel and trust. . . .

"Germany is the home of the cartel, and the Germans are if anything proud of the institution; they say the pre-World War I coal and steel cartels helped to make the Ruhr the dominant industrial power of all Europe. It is this attitude, perhaps more than anything else, that the U. S. has failed to change."

GERMAN ASSETS

". . . The confiscation of these assets and patents was agreed at Potsdam, and the Allied intention then was that they should be liquidated and used as reparations. This was not only to be done in countries which were at war with Germany but in neutral States like Spain and Turkey. . . . Liquidation is, however, a slow business, and some neutral countries have failed so far to implement the terms of the 'Safehaven Treaties' originally negotiated between them and the Allies for the disposal of enemy assets. . . . The German view is that all assets abroad which have not already been disposed of should be returned into German hands. It is a curious paradox that, had the Bonn 'General' Agreement between the Western Powers and the Federal Republic already entered into force, the Germans would be legally bound not to interfere with any arrangements which have been made, or will be made, in relation to former external assets. . . . Hence Professor Erhard's desire to get a settlement favorable to Germany before the Bonn Agreement enters into force.

"Hence also the recent appeals to the Allied High Commission. Hence the German pressure which is being brought to bear on the neutrals. . . . Hence the German efforts to detach one of the occupying powers, America, from the Allied front—efforts which have failed so far in Bonn but which are sure to enlist sympathy when Professor Erhard states his case in Washington. The Germans are using every sort of diplomatic wile and pressure in order to get their way. . . . The policy of the Western Powers must be to press for the speedy liquidation of German assets in Spain, Portugal, Turkey and Sweden. . . . The longer the question of external assets is left the more it will fester in the German mind—unless the Western Powers are surprised into making concessions for which there is no legal or moral obligation."

Adenauer's Democratization Program

As an organization which has been following the German scene for many years, the Society paid particular attention to Chancellor Adenauer's election campaign and its results. Our interest did not stem from the fact that we are enthusiastic supporters of Adenauer or his foe. Our own tastes were not involved but nonetheless our interest was great because we know, as everyone knows, that our policy makers have literally placed all of their hopes on the Chancellor. The success of his re-election however shows that hopes are one thing and realities quite another proposition.

Electioneering

The kind of election campaign that Adenauer waged is discussed in detail in the article by James H. Sheldon (see page —). Mr. Sheldon supplies important evidence attesting to the fact that Adenauer appealed to those groups in Germany who are bitter enemies of democracy.

For example, the Chancellor went out of his way to visit some of Germany's worst war criminals imprisoned in Werl. He knew full well that in demonstrating his sympathy for these criminals the votes of hundreds of thousands of German soldiers and officers would be corralled. The appeal that he made to these dangerous elements was launched as early as April 1953 when, in reporting on his visit to the U. S., he boasted that the United States had promised to review the cases of these criminals. He then went on to say:

". . . I would like to stress this today, at the occasion of my first public speech after my return, because former German soldiers of all ranks have complained to me that they are much concerned about the fact that there are still many prisoners at Landsberg Prison who have been tried and convicted when, shortly after the end of the war, judgment was passed somewhat hastily. I believe that our former soldiers may be satisfied that the last stigma—if there was any at all—will be removed from our former armed forces."

This kind of electioneering by Adenauer had a definite imprint on his actions immediately following his re-election. Here are some of the more important events which occurred shortly after Dr. Adenauer returned to office.

The Day After

The Chancellor's first public speech was a well calculated attempt to reawaken the aggressive instincts of the Germans. "Liberation" was his theme—and who can doubt that it received a welcome response on the part of his listeners. It was not a speech which is indicative of a man dedicated to the ways of peace but rather the echo of Germany's belligerent past. It may very well be that some people in the West were not concerned because it appeared that Adenauer's "call to the colors" was directed against the East. But this was a short-lived illusion. Shortly after his liberation speech, the United Press, September 16, 1953, reported:

"Chancellor Adenauer will give France 60 to 90 days to ratify the stalled West German Peace Pact and the European Army Plan before taking any decisive alternative action. . . ."

Such ultimata are, of course, familiar to students of Germany history. They were frequently used by the Kaisers and Adolf Hitler. Chancellor Adenauer, filled with a sense of his own importance and indispensability, and unquestionably encouraged by his cheerleaders in the United States, unfurled his banner. Apparently he is confident that the threats which work so well for his predecessors will intimidate the French.

Towards Domination of the Unions

Having shaken his fist eastward and westward, Adenauer flaunted his fist at the German trade unions. According to the New York Times (September 11, 1953), the German Trade Union Federation received an ultimatum from the executive committee of the CDU under the chairmanship of the Chancellor "to submit to a re-organization of control that would place the union under the domination of the state." This brazen attack against the independent trade union movement should be considered in the light of the role that the trade unions in Germany have played since the end of the war.

We have never taken a special position of pleading the cause of trade unionism in Germany for its own sake. We do believe, however, that democratically controlled trade unions free from governmental dictation could contribute, together with other free institutions, toward the strengthening of democracy in Germany. In this connection it is noteworthy that the United States occupation authorities have, from the very earliest days of the occupation, encouraged the development of free trade unions in Germany to serve as a reliable bulwark against all forms of totalitarianism. The Third Quarterly Report on Germany issued by the U. S. High Commissioner (April-June 1950) stated "throughout the period under review, trade unions continued to be a strong positive force of democracy." Discussing the leadership of the German trade union movement, the report comments:

"They are conscious of their key role in preserving the competitive ability of the German economy and in backstopping Germany's slowly developing democracy. They have also been in the forefront of the struggle for a peaceful, prosperous Germany, and have given strong support to U. S. reorientation and democratization policies. They were among the first Germans to be accepted as equals by their colleagues abroad, and the Federation of German Trade Unions is a potent member of the anti-Communist International Confederation of Free Trade Unions."

The report adds that although the trade union leaders are proud of their achievements:

"they are still haunted by the specter of German democracy's collapse without a fight in 1933. They express the opinion that an alliance between German governmental leadership and big industrialists not only precipitated this collapse, but paved the way for World Wars I and II. History threatens to repeat itself, they hold, unless Germany achieves industrial as well as political democracy."

The German trade union leaders were not alone in their fears of a resurgence of the same authoritarian elements which did so much harm to German democracy following World War I. As early as 1949, Mr. Matthew Woll, Vice President of the A. F. of L., and Mr. Walter Reuther, President of the C. I. O., publicly warned that the industrial war lords of the Ruhr were endeavoring to re-assert a stranglehold over the democratic forces in Germany.

Of course the Chancellor may claim that he issued this ultimatum, not in his capacity as head of the Bonn government, but in his position of leader of the CDU. In our opinion, this argument amounts to sheer sophistry. It would be equivalent to accepting a situation in which the President of the United States attempted, as leader of his party, to dictate terms to the American trade union movement.

Towards a Controlled Press

After brandishing his whip against the trade unions, the Chancellor went to work on the German newspapers. Apparently German officialdom is not satisfied with the fact that scores of former Hitler supporters and Nazis have returned to the newspaper field. The fact that there is still a core of crusading journalists in Germany is not to the liking of those who are accustomed to a servile press. Thanks to some enterprising German journalists, it was revealed that Dr. Lenz, State Secretary in the Chancellor's office, had concocted a scheme to coordinate the work of the Bonn Foreign Office News Department, government propaganda, the independent news agency and political work among the Germans behind the Iron Curtain. As the London Economist (October 3, 1953) pointed out, this attempted coup was but the culmination of prior efforts on the part of the Bonn government to cripple the independence of the German newspapers.

When the news of this plot leaked out, Adenauer was put on the spot. The official news service of his own party had already attacked the German journalists who opposed the plan. The Koelnische Rundschau, which serves as Adenauer's personal mouthpiece, also defended the Lenz project. Nevertheless, the unfavorable publicity was too great to be ignored and so Adenauer finally broke his silence and averred that the plan was dead. To this assurance, the London Economist commented:

"The fact remains that Dr. Adenauer's ministries (and the Foreign Office in particular) contain large numbers of men who held responsible posts under Herr Ribbentrop or his colleagues. Though they are loyal supporters of the present regime, they are expected to have at least the average German urge to suppress the critics and conduct one-sided propaganda . . . In spite of this week's victory, the German journalists will have to fight for their freedom time and again."

Another Target

Even the Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany could not escape the pugnacious arrogance of Herr Adenauer and his colleagues. Apparently the Germans are not completely satisfied with all that they have received from the United States. Surely they cannot complain about the favorable publicity which they have received here, nor can they afford to grumble about the billions of dollars dumped in their laps since the end of the war. Yet, somehow they are still dissatisfied and the immediate target of their resentment is the Office of the U. S. High Commission itself.

Apparently there are some Americans in the High Commissioner's Office who have maintained a sense of historical perspective. These few have become the butt of recent attacks by German officials. Thus the Manchester Guardian (October 2, 1953) disclosed that high German officials have developed a plan "to have members of the U. S. High Commission removed from Germany as a result of a calculated diplomatic whispering campaign. Details of this plan were published by an American paper which listed about a dozen American officials in Bonn as being 'suspect' of anti-German feelings. This story has not yet been authoritatively denied."

A Business Deal

The more recent episode of the Chancellor's activities since his return to office involves flirtations with the Soviets. The United Press (October 14, 1953) reported that West German businessmen had closed their first post-war foreign trade deal with Russia. The agreement will involve the use of accumulated American dollars and Swiss Francs to pay for Russian wheat and oil. The report declares that the negotiations were completed "with the blessings of the West German government at Bonn." Apropos of these negotiations, it is interesting to note that the deal was consummated in East Berlin. The U. P. reported, "West German financial experts insist if the cold war were ended, West German trade with the Soviet bloc would jump up a billion dollars in 12 months."

While Adenauer's business friends were negotiating in East Berlin, the Chancellor himself has been working on the political level in the same direction. In an interview granted to the United Press on Oct. 22nd he stated:

"If the Soviet Union desired a special one (separate agreement) with Germany, let them have one."

The idea of unilateral negotiations between Germany and Russia has also been advocated in West Germany's leading conservative newspaper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. It pointed out that only Chancellor Adenauer himself "can convince the Kremlin of the necessity and usefulness of German policy."

These are some of the highlights of Dr. Adenauer's activities since he was swept back into office. The line of action taken by Adenauer since the election is but the logical result of the campaign he waged prior to his victory. It is not a pretty picture nor can it be regarded as a hopeful sign of things to come.

"IN THE BACK ALLEYS OF BERLIN"

The Germans Talk Trouble

By

SEFTON DELMER

Correspondent for The London Express

BAD GODESBERG—Things could not look more peaceful. Under my window paddle steamers chug importantly up and down the Rhine, drawing behind them long trains of heavily laden barges—German, French and Dutch.

The little ferryboat which, just 15 years ago now, scurried back and forth across the river carrying peace-or-war messages from Hitler to Chamberlain and back, is busier than ever.

As this was being written it was carrying loads of well-fattened, contented-looking Rhenish burghers returning from the polls where they re-elected Dr. Adenauer.

And yet I feel uneasy.

"Aggressiveness"

For everywhere I went in Germany two weeks before election, I have found evidence of a returning truculence, a returning sense of aggressive mission.

Take, for example, a quiet-looking little manifesto which has been widely circulated among the VIPs of Western Germany. It asks them to use their influence in favor of getting agreement between political parties for a common foreign policy.

The manifesto is signed by a whole platoon of generals who commanded Hitler's armies during the last war, including a good number of those younger ones who, like Maj. Gen. Dethleffsen, are booked for general staff posts in the German forces now to be created.

It is further indorsed by big industrialists like up-and-coming Ernst Schneider, president of Dusseldorf Chamber of Commerce.

What is the foreign policy which they wish to see supported by all? Here is a passage:

The Soviet system, says the manifesto, has suffered an attack of weakness which has reduced its capacity for action to a much greater extent than has generally been accepted. The Soviet leaders are forced to seek an understanding with the West. . . .

On our side we can and must make the Western powers, and the U. S. in particular, adopt the liberation of the Soviet zone of Germany as their own cause, and give it top priority in their program of action.

Dr. Adenauer himself, who retained the chancellorship—talked at a pre-election lunch which I attended. He also stressed the weakness of Russia and the opportunity this presented for the reunification of Germany.

"We Might Be Back"

Among ordinary folk this kind of thinking has begun to gain some ground as well.

"The way things are shaping, it looks as if we might be back in Russia soon, doesn't it?" said an ex-soldier truck driver to me in a bar.

He took me for a fellow-German. "I only got back from there myself in '49," he said. "Never thought I'd be a soldier again. I don't like soldiering. But if it is to have another go at them I will be there—and this time we'll exterminate them the way they said we did last time."

What is behind this wild and dangerous talk?

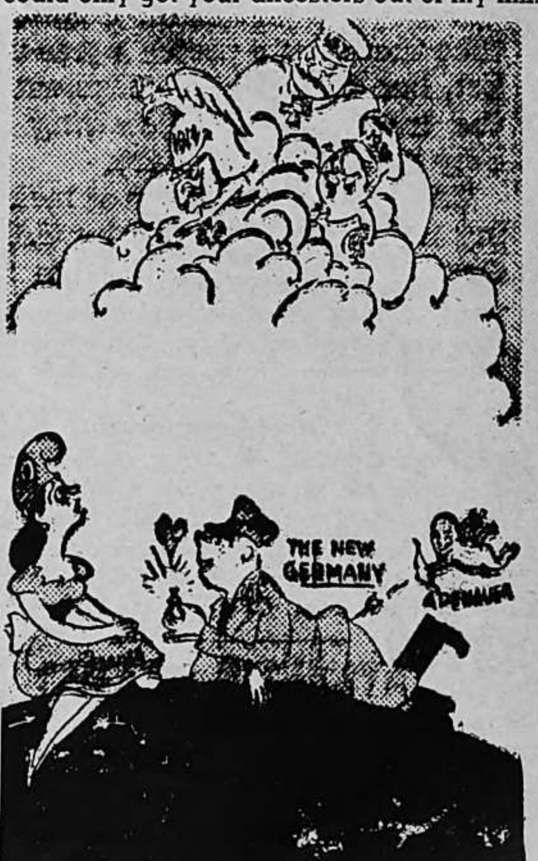
In the first place, of course, the Berlin rising of June 17 and the risings that accompanied it in Leipzig and the rest of the Russian-occupied zone.

This has filled everyone here in West Germany with an immense pride in the desperate courage of their fellow-Germans who faced Russian tanks and machine guns unarmed. Above everything, it has convinced many Germans of the vulnerability of Soviet power.

Their "Dilemma"

In Berlin a German with considerable influence on Adenauer's policy-making told me: "The Russians are in an impossible dilemma today. They cannot use their German police force against revolt in their zone because policemen won't fire on Germans. They cannot use the Soviet Army either because this would cause international complications. They don't feel strong and united enough at home to face international conflicts at this time. For they know anything might happen in the Soviet Union with all the discontent that exists there if a foreign war started now."

"If I could only get your ancestors out of my mind."



(Yardley in The Baltimore Sun)

The second reason is the immensely increased feeling of importance and self-confidence Adenauer built up in Germans by his visit to President Eisenhower.

Everyone here professes to know that Adenauer carried back a secret agreement for U. S. support in an active liberation policy, going far beyond anything that was published.

The remarks of Mr. Dulles stressing the importance of Adenauer's re-election, far from shocking and angering these particular Germans, has reassured them of American support for a German eastward push.

"This time," said my Berlin friend—there is a lot of "This time-ing" going on in Germany these days—"we shall not run out of supplies half-way through like we did during the other two efforts. There is no question that with American supplies to back us we can go as far as we please."

How far is this?

A speaker at the reception in Frankfort for a party of June 17 heroes from Berlin put it this way: "And when we get going we shall not stop at the Oder-Neisse frontier" (with Poland).

Prof. Hallstein, Adenauer's State Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in an unguarded moment was even more explicit.

"All Europe must be liberated." he said, "up to the Ural Mountains."

But I have found a third motive, and in many ways it is more sinister and more practical than the rest.

Otto Klepper, ex-banker, Minister of Justice in the Weimar Republic, refugee from Hitler, and one of the manifesto men, gave me the clue.

"If the cold war is allowed to fall down still further," he said, "there will be a bad slump, both in morale and in trade. At any rate in Europe. That will mean more unemployment.

"The Soviets, who are now down, will be up again. Therefore we have to move fast and exploit the weakness of the Russians to get them out of East Germany before there is any slump or recession. That in turn will stop the slump."

This Is Important

They sound ingenious, don't they, all these German hopes of stampeding the Americans into a policy of which they are to be the main profiteers? But don't write them off altogether. For the Germans have one important asset.

The many body of United States Intelligence about Soviet Eastern Germany and Soviet Europe in general comes from a German source.

This is the American-financed organization of the German Gen. Gehlen, Hitler's wartime expert on Soviet Intelligence.

Such is his authority with the U. S. intelligence people that Gehlen is in a position to put to them at any time he chooses such information about Russia as will suit German policy and German plans.

Yes, the Rhine looks peaceful enough. But I feel uneasy all the same.

THE CHOSEN PEOPLE

God has called upon Germany to save Christianity . . . The fate of Europe, Germany and Christian culture depends on the outcome of the ballot.—
Dr. Adenauer.

Germany hears God's voice once more
In the Western German State.
The Federal German Chancellor,
Like other Chancellors gone before,
Is charged with Europe's fate.
And the message is handed on—
Germans must save the West,
Heed the divine behest,
For the voice of God is the voice of Bonn.

Destiny once more strikes the hour,
The task must be begun.
If free elections return to power
The party of Dr. Adenauer,
The will of God be done.
The mark of heavenly grace
Is shown to Germans still,
For Bonn's will is God's will
And God has chosen the German race.

Western Christians in other lands
May ask why it should be
God confides them to German hands,
Why Christianity falls or stands
By the vote of Germany?
Why—God only knows,
But Germany hears the Word,
They above all preferred,
Always the race the Almighty chose.

Since God the mandate to Germans gave
By him to be employed,
Christian culture and faith to save,
Will Germany raise from Europe's grave
The world that she destroyed?
What is left of it all?
Though the vote for Bonn is won,
What's done can't be undone,
And the past is gone beyond recall.

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to effect,
And "Gott mit uns" the Germans say,
"For we today as yesterday,
Are still the Lord's elect."
And thought the choice seems odd,
The fate of the Christian West
On the German vote will rest,
For the voice of Bonn is the voice of God.

Toward a New Rapallo?

By T. H. TETENS

We have asked the author of GERMANY PLOTS WITH THE KREMLIN to give us his analysis of West Germany's diplomatic approach to the present world situation. We have been specifically interested to know whether new evidence has come to light which backs up the author's thesis that Germany's long range policy aims at the betrayal of the West. Here is the answer from an expert who has been intimately acquainted with German geopolitical thinking and writing for thirty years.

Germany's diplomatic strategy for a comeback to power has not changed during 1953. The Bonn Republic pursues the same objectives which were the goal of those masterminds who once blueprinted Hitler's scheme for world conquest. General Haushofer's geopoliticians and the old Ribbentrop diplomats are plotting now as they did during the 1920s and 30s, with the only difference that their diplomatic approach has become more subtle and refined under Dr. Adenauer. Where Hitler tried to bully Europe into submission, Adenauer uses a more gentle approach to gain the same objective. The German plan, as it has been stated in Germany's leading political papers, is to make, with the help of America, the Bonn Republic the strongest power in Europe and then, by a diplomatic somersault, strike a bargain with Moscow. The soundness of this scheme is well understood by many Germans and this was the reason why they registered an overwhelming vote of confidence for Dr. Adenauer.

The election victory of September 6, 1953, was decided on the foreign policy issue, i.e., on Dr. Adenauer's blueprint for a United Europe. The German press emphasized the "great political instinct" which the German voters showed in re-electing the Adenauer coalition by a decisive majority. In his election speeches the Chancellor clearly outlined the two basic principles of his policy: a) to obtain full sovereignty for Germany and to make her again a leading power in world affairs; b) to avoid the risk of a war with Russia and to reach friendly agreements with Moscow. The latter principle was stated in a speech two days before the election and it made a profound impression on the German voters.

In his pre-election speeches, the Chancellor told the Germans bluntly that their vote must now show that Germany deserves the trust and confidence that he has gained for the Bonn Republic during his four years of leadership. He stressed the point that the only big hurdle which Germany has to overcome, is to dispel the still lingering distrust in the Western world against a resurgent and rearmed Germany. This hint was clearly understood in Germany, especially among the extreme nationalists and former Nazis. In the months before the election the Chancellor used his influence and that of his industrial backers to warn the rightist elements against any action or propaganda that in any possible way might damage Germany's future.

Adenauer's election victory should not be considered as a change of mind and heart on the part of the German masses, but must be regarded as a shrewd tactical maneuver to blind and fool the Western world. The Chancellor himself made the significant overtures to the extreme rightists and Nazis by visiting the war criminals at the prison at Werl and by giving assurances to the leaders of the Waffen SS and other veterans organizations, that his policy is aimed at re-establishing the honor of the German soldier and creating a Europe for which the Waffen SS fought during World War II. Millions of former Nazis who had boycotted the election in 1949, flocked behind Adenauer, and Nation Europa, the mouthpiece of the European Fascists, praised Adenauer as "the champion of the coming German army."

Adenauer's position was enormously strengthened by Secretary Dulles in a statement on the German election. The German papers admitted that the Dulles statement was well understood by the German people, that it was not regarded as a meddling in German affairs, and that the masses did not resent it but reacted realistically and showed their "great political instinct." The German press stressed the point that the voters in the Bonn Republic acted quite differently than the people in Italy and France would have done under similar circumstances. The Germans read in their papers or heard it from the election speeches, especially from Dr. Adenauer himself, that only with the help of America could Germany re-emerge as a leading world power.

It was strongly impressed on the German voters that France is the sole roadblock which prevents Germany from regaining her sovereignty and stalls her comeback to glory and power. If France would yield and ratify the EDC treaty, then the way would be open to new German adventures in world politics.

The true meaning of Adenauer's brand of European unification was expressed by Germany's leading geopolitician, Dr. Klaus Mehnert, in an editorial in Christ und Welt (Sept. 24, 1953), in which he pointed out that the "fatal day" of ratification of the European treaties would mean the execution of a death sentence on France. Dr. Mehnert asserted that France, in not ratifying the European treaties, acts "like the beautiful Scheherazade in Thousand-and-one Nights who delayed her execution from one day to the other by telling the Sultan each night a new fairy tale."

It is interesting to note how the Germans interpret the meaning of European integration. Many German papers have pictured the advantages of European unification to the Fatherland in the most glowing terms. The same Christ und Welt stated in another editorial:

> "The French have the jitters from the thought that they must sit with us in the same boat. They fear that the German oarsmen will pull with such forceful strokes that the others will lose control over the boat. . . . Nobody has to gain more from the unification of Europe than the Germans, the most numerous and vital among all European nations west of the U. S. S. R. . . ."

The Germans who lost two world wars and do not enjoy full sovereignty hope to gain within a very short time the economic and political mastery of Europe via the European Community. They believe that for France "integration" means "the execution of a death sentence." It is precisely this fatal consequence which stirs deep fears among the French whose instinct for political trends has been sharpened by the tragic history of the last 80 years.

In order to inveigle "Marianne," Dr. Adenauer has employed a quick-shifting diplomatic finesse and cunning double talk to anesthetize his intended victim. Adenauer operates on the following premises: Washington is "inflexibly committed" to back a powerful Germany as the leader and "protector" of Europe; France is in "hopeless confusion" and unable to counteract Germany's diplomatic moves, whereas England is so absorbed by troubles in Asia, Africa and in the Arab world that she cannot devote her main attention to the growing power of Germany. Thus, Dr. Adenauer belives he can carry out the most daring diplomatic maneuvers and persuade the other Western powers, via Washington, to do his bidding.

There is a growing belief among Germans that Adenauer is playing a decisive role in shaping American policy. The feeling, according to the Deutsche Zeitung (September 19th, 1953) is reflected in a popular quip making the rounds in Germany: "Who makes Washington's European policy?—Konrad Adenauer in Bonn."

Dr. Adenauer's nightmare is the possibility that the Western powers together, or one of them, might come to an agreement with Russia on Germany. Yet, as long as the present occupation statute is still in force, the right to negotiate with Russia on the German question belongs to the Western Powers alone. This is the true reason why Dr. Adenauer is doing his utmost to prevent a Four Power talk on Germany and why he is pressing so hard to regain full sovereignty for the Bonn Republic. It is for this reason that in the Chancellor's own words "Germany has come to the end of her patience," and he hinted that if the Western Powers will still withhold sovereignty then the Bonn Republic will find her own solution (Frankfurter Allgemeine, Oct. 22, 1953). Whatever the meaning of this threat might be, the fact is that the Germans in recent months have shown bitter resentment against France which, as an occupying power, can oppose and veto Washington's diplomatic moves and can still block Germany's dream of a comeback to world power.

The Germans allege that all the conditions which France likes to see fulfilled before she can ratify the European treaties—the acceptance of various amendments to the treaties, a settlement of the Saar territory, and special commitments by Great Britain and the USA—are only a pretext in order to evade ratification.

The French have been blamed by Germany for not following through with their own suggestion for a common European defense which they themselves originated under the Pleven Plan. But this argument does not hold water. The Pleven Plan never originated in France but was first ventilated shortly after the war by Dr. Adenauer, long before he became chancellor.

German newspapers have admitted that little has been left from the original Pleven Plan. In 1950, when Russian aggression was feared, the French reluctantly agreed to the use of German manpower in small military units under the command of other European officers. In the meantime, the Pleven Plan has undergone so many changes that leading French and British newspapers fear the European Army will some day fall under the domination of the German militarists.

To overcome French opposition the Germans have spread the warning that if France does not submit to German rearmament then she will be confronted with a Bonn-Washington military alliance. But the unwillingness of the Frenc parliament to ratify the EDC rests on the opinion that this step would upset true European balance of power an would finally result in German domination of the European continent. Yet, th German press is still hopeful that unde the prodding of Washington, a majorit of the French National Assembly wi approve the defense treaty. These hope have been raised since Bidault came ou more positively for the treaty and Gu Mollet, the General Secretary of th French Socialists, became one of the advocates of ratification. He is reportedl trying to impose party discipline on al Socialist members of parliament.

Dr. Adenauer's mouthpiece, the Rheinischer Merkur, has set its hopes on th French Socialists by recalling Bismarck' words who once stated that "in the German interest it is desirable that France i governed by a cabinet of the left whic keeps her weak politically and militarily. To obtain French ratification, the conservative Adenauer would not hesitate t cooperate joyfully with the French Socialists.

There is a great contradiction betwee the American and German arguments fo ratifying the EDC. The American versio

". . . It will be said that the weak showing of the extreme pro-Nazi groups (like the debacle of the Communists) is proof that democracy is flourishing in Western Germany. Such a view is cheerful but premature; for many of the neo-Nazi elements undoubtedly have to make larger movements the base of their operations. What would happen to Dr. Adenauer's party if this revered but elderly leader were to leave the scene tomorrow? What sign is there of the emergence of any effective democratic leadership around him? . . ."

(N. Y. Post, 9-8-53)

". . . On occasion Dr. Adenauer has indicated genuine feeling about the creation of a European Defense Community. We should like to believe that the election returns signify Germany's repudiation of nationalism and the evolution of a new and humbler view of Germany's world role, but it is hard to believe that the meaning of the result is quite that simple.

"How many of the millions who voted for Dr. Adenauer really believed in the concept of collective security—and how many felt that this was simply the most practical way of beginning the remilitarization of a great Germany? How many were voting their allegiance to the fight against all tyranny—and how many were merely responding to the sound of familiar anti-Bolshevist symbols? How many saw Dr. Adenauer as the spokesman of the cause of freedom—and how many were impressed by the deals he had seemingly swung with America?" . . .

is that the "German military contribution is indispensable for an effective defense of Europe." The Germans, however, have frequently declared that "twelve divisions will not constitute a serious hindrance to Russian aggressions, but it will be the first step to make Germany a strong European factor. Dr. Adenauer himself declared that the "EDC and a United Europe are a reasonable idea in itself and absolutely necessary irrespective of whether Europe is threatened by the Soviet Union or not." (Stuttgarter Nachrichten, November 5, 1953.)

Washington's policy to rearm Germany will make Germany again "buendnisfaehig," which means a desired partner for an alliance or, as the Frankfurter Allgemeine (April 13th, 1953) stated: "Out of the reality of the military partnership grows the political reality that Germany will become an ally of tomorrow."

Dr. Adenauer stated recently before the new Bundestag that the German people were becoming impatient with the delay in the ratification of the treaty and that Germany must soon obtain "full authority over its internal and external affairs." The German Chancellor is urgently in need of French consent to the European Army Pact because this Treaty is interlocked with the Contractual Agreement. Without obtaining full sovereignty the Bonn Republic is handicapped in the pursuit of her long range political objectives. The "Frankfurter Allgemeine" made this very clear in an editorial of October 26, 1953, in which it stated that if Germany had her sovereignty "only for a few hours," it would be a world shaking event of greatest magnitude because it would change with one stroke all historic national patterns and power relations in Europe. Germany would "sacrifice her own sovereignty as a gift" and would "happily re-emerge in a new Europe." It is this "new Euorpe" of which every German is dreaming; it is the "new Europe" for which Hitler's Waffen SS fought so fervently. Thus, the picture is clear: France fears instinctively that the ratification of EDC will automatically bring her independence to an end or, as Dr. Klaus Mehnert stated with cold cynicism, it will mean "the execution of Marianne." For the Germans, however, it will be a new start in Europe in which Germany will be the dominating factor.

The "European spirit" which Dr. Adenauer projects so often, is nothing more than a window dressing and a fraud. In reading the German press today, it does not appear that nationalism in Germany is less rampant than under Hitler. The Germans are confident that they are on the way to become the overlords of Europe.

According to the official German news agency (dpa), the Germans together with the Italians can marshal about 60 per cent of the votes in the Council of the EDC which could place France, with her 27 per cent of the votes, in a hopeless minority. (New York Staats-Zeitung, October 31, 1953.)

Dr. Adenauer certainly does not intend to make France an outright satellite of Germany in the very beginning. But the Germans hope for a France responding to German wishes; they dream of a collaboration as it once existed under Marshal Petain and Hitler.

For the time being the Germans will move with great caution because Dr. Adenauer has—as Goebbel's deputy, Dr. Naumann, stated in his diaries—"to play the role of a Stresemann."

Today, not only the Chancellor but important sections of the German people are "playing the role of Stresemann." Western Germany, said the Bonn correspondent of the New York Times, "acts like a small boy who, pleading for a rifle, fervently promises that he will be very careful and not shoot anybody." But the Germans know the cycle from defeat to victory. In the 20s it was Versailles-Stresemann-Hitler; this time it will be Potsdam-Adenauer-???.

Today, "Marianne" receives the same assurances of eternal love and adoration from her German groom as she did 20 years ago. The French Ambassador André François Poncet once heard from the lips of a German chancellor:

"The sole ambition I have in my life is to be remembered in posterity as the man who brought France and Germany together. Between us stands nothing else than the Saar question."

The man who said this to André François Poncet, on September 15, 1933, was Adolf Hitler. The same François Poncet, acting today as French High Commissioner in Bonn, hears the same assurances from Chancellor Konrad Adenauer.

If the Germans were the "good Europeans," as Dr. Adenauer so often asserted, why are they not willing to accept, as first proof of their new spirit, the europeanization of the Saar with such economic provisions which would at least partly repair the wrongs that have been done to France from 1940-1945? But the Bundestag and Chancellor Adenauer proclaim haughtily Germany's "rights" to the Saar, ignoring their moral and legal responsibility for the great crimes committed only yesterday.

After their tragic experiences in the past, nobody should wonder why the French distrust the Germans and question the soundness of American policy toward Germany. When France was bled white after World War I, America rebuilt Germany with billions of dollars which ultimately resulted in World War II. France fears a repetition of this vicious cycle. No wonder that the French are deeply concerned about the future. Official announcements that Washington intends to reduce American troops in Europe, caused consternation in Paris because the French regard the presence of American divisions in Europe as a protection against a reborn German militarism.

It is interesting to note that at the same time when the French had the jitters, German papers openly discussed possible negotiations with the Soviets in order to get rid of all American bases in Europe. Shortly after the September election, German papers reported that the Bonn Foreign Office had drafted plans in which German reunification and the simultaneous withdrawal of all American, British and Russian troops were suggested. On October 3, 1953, Germany's leading paper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine, suggested in an editorial "direct talks between the Bonn Republic and the Soviets" and added: "Only Chancellor Adenauer can convince the Kremlin of the honesty and general usefulness of Germany's policy."

The Frankfurter Allgemeine mentioned even the program of such direct German-Russo negotiations, namely "to explore the mutual intentions and opinions with regard to European problems" and to develop "a European policy which ultimately aims at the creation of a Third Force and an independent power in the center." (Oct. 3, 1953.)

That is what the Germans want from Russia. What are they willing to pay the Kremlin? The Germans have made up their mind on that score too. They are offering Moscow the liquidation of all American bases in Europe, if the Kremlin allows Germany to become the backbone of this "Third Force." Here is the German offer carefully wrapped in diplomatic phrases by the editor of the Frankfurter Allgemeine:

"The Soviets demand that American military bases should be abolished.... Should and must not the countries, which harbor those bases, become strong enough in a given time so that they can carry on without those bases? Could these bases not be liquidated with the gradual strengthening of the weak European countries? Is it not possible to negotiate such agreements which, amended by security pacts, would lead to general peace? Such topics and others might very well convince the Russians that an independent and free European center would be to their own advantage." (Oct. 3, 1953.)

People familiar with the documentary evidence presented in my book GERMANY PLOTS WITH THE KREMLIN will easily discover that the Bonn Republic continues the time-honored Stresemann-Hitler strategy of "finassieren," i.e., the play off of the West against the East and vice versa.

To those who can see through Germany's master scheme, it becomes clear that Dr. Adenauer's real aim is not the EDC but to become a highly attractive partner in a rapproachment with Moscow, in which Germany expects great territorial and trade concessions from the Soviets. As long as Germany has nothing else to offer but her own neutrality, the price to be paid by Moscow will not be impressive. However, if Germany can negotiate as the chief representative of a United Europe and offer not only the liquidation of all American bases in Europe but also the neutralization of Europe and the breakup of the Atlantic Pact organization, then the Russians would certainly be willing to pay a high price for such a political and strategic deal.

The mutual advantages of a Russo-German deal have been openly discussed for months by Germany's leading political papers. Such statements have shown the identity between Adenauer's policy and the blueprints of a daring geopolitical masterplan. Let us remember that the Frankfurter Allgemeine, which is frequently used to air the views of the Bonn Foreign Office, declared in an editorial on April 3rd, 1952:

"The Chancellor follows a tremendous, bold plan: First rearmament, followed later on by talks with the Russians in order to persuade them to remove their armies behind the Bug River. For this goal the Chancellor has been working tenaciously for some time. And because he sticks to his timetable, he is presently opposed to the Russian Note (of March 1952)."

In the influential Christ und Welt, the geopolitician Dr. Klaus Mehnert wrote in an editorial as early as December 27th, 1951:

"It would be necessary that we first create a united, healthy and strong Western Europe in whose name the following offer to the Kremlin could then be made: Continental Europe would break away from the Atlantic Pact if the Soviets agree to withdraw their forces behind the Pripet-Marshes and release not only the Eastern zone of Germany, but the whole of Eastern Europe into the European Union. A United Europe, standing on its own feet and possessing its own powerful army, could begin with the development of its colonial empire in Africa."

From the foregoing does it not become clear that Dr. Adenauer is proceeding full steam ahead with his plan: first to create a German dominated Europe and later to strike a bargain with Moscow? The success of this policy can only be obtained by the isolation of France and the break-up of all post-war treaties which sought to prevent the resurgence of a war-breeding Germany.

Up to now, Dr. Adenauer's triumphs have been unprecedented, especially since he has had to work with a prostrated rump Germany, lacking an army and full sovereignty. Yet the biggest hurdle Germany still faces is the growing opposition in France. With recent history fresh in their minds, most Frenchmen feel that by ratifying the European Army Pact they will open the Pandora box of German militarism. France hesitates to make that fatal step which the German geopoliticians have correctly defined as "Marianne's execution."

Germany, Key to Peace

By
JAMES P. WARBURG

Reviewed by Gordon A. Graig
Gordon A. Craig is Professor of History at Princeton Uni-versity, and Co-Editor of "The Diplomats."

Since 1945 Mr. James Warburg in a series of books and articles, in letters to the press and in Congressional hearings has argued that American policy in Germany is defeating the purpose for which it was designed: namely, the creation of a Germany that would be a force for peace rather than a menace to its neighbors. Those arguments have been given a respectful hearing, but have had little effect upon the course of events. Mr. Warburg is a persistent man, however, and, in his new book, he has recapitulated the case he has made so often before. It is one which deserves consideration, especially at this time, when there is a possibility of renewed four-power discussions on German and related issues.

At the risk of over-simplification it may be said that the author has two principal points. The first is that, under President Truman, the United States committed itself unwisely to a policy, first, of creating a separate West German state and then of re-arming it and making it a member of the European Defense Community. The merits of this policy were never widely debated in this country—largely because of distractions in other parts of the world—and the political risks were disregarded. Those risks were, and are, great. A Western Germany which has regained its sovereignty and is being encouraged to re-arm cannot be expected to subordinate its policies indefinitely to those of its patrons. Nor, as its strength grows, can it be expected to resist the temptation to seek unification with Eastern Germany and the reacquisition of its lost provinces. It may even try to achieve those ends by extreme means—by dragging the West into war with Russia or, alternatively, by making a deal with Russia at the expense of the West.

Despite those risks, the Truman administration pushed ahead with its policy and, essentially, Gen. Eisenhower has continued it. Indeed—and this is Mr. Warburg's second point—the government has been so intent on achieving its objectives that it has refused seriously to consider other solutions to the German problem. Specifically, although it has continued to insist that its real goal is the unification of Germany (which can be achieved only by negotiation with Russia) it has shown an alarming tendency to avoid any real opportunity to negotiate. Even at moments when it has seemed possible that the Russians might be prepared to make concessions to Western views on Germany, there has been a tendency to "try to show that the Russians do not mean what they say [rather than] to try to find out whether or not they do." This has led to the stultification of diplomacy and, by arousing doubts as to our intentions among our allies, has weakened rather than strengthened the unity of the West.

There will be many who feel that Mr. Warburg's fear of Germany is exaggerated. Yet it must be admitted that Germany's past history throws considerable doubt on her reliability as an ally. German irredentism has not been unknown in the past and has generally had frightening results. Moreover, the Germany of the 1920's proved highly adroit in playing Russia off against the West and, as one of Stresemann's intimates, Konrad Adenauer received a thorough schooling in what the author calls the art of finessing one's way to power. To argue that conditions have changed and that the Germans wouldn't run the risk of making their country a satellite by trying to make a deal with Russia is not conclusive. The Germans have always had great faith in their ability to manipulate rather than to be manipulated.

As for Mr. Warburg's second point, it is enough to note that European concern over what is considered to be American inflexibility has mounted so steadily in the last six months that it seems finally to have impressed Washington. At any rate, new approaches have now been made to Moscow, although their issue is still in doubt.

In the event that the Russians proved willing to negotiate on European questions in general, what should be the American position on Germany? Mr. Warburg is quite clear on this point. He would abandon our past policy almost completely. As a sine qua non for a German settlement, he would insist that the Soviet Union agree to a revision of the Eastern frontiers which would return to Germany all the territories annexed by Poland in 1945 except East Prussia and Upper Silesia. Such revision, he believes, would remove the greatest danger of a possible future German deal with Russia at the

BONN DOES NOT TRUST THE UNITED NATIONS

Recently the official "Bulletin" of the Bonn Government dealt wiht the suggestion that "a re-unified Germany should be included in a security system within the framework of the United Nations." In an authorized article in the "Bulletin" this suggestion was "emphatically rejected" on the following ground:

". . . The United Nations have been organized for the purpose of holding down the former Axis powers . . . and to maintain the status of 1945 forever. Those who seek the protection of the U. N. will find themselves in the arms of a stillborn giant."

In reporting this "unequivocal renouncement" of the U. N., the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung stated that Germany aims "to develop the power of the West through integration of Europe to a point from which negotiations with Russia will be possible."

expense of Poland. In return for this he would propose that Germany be disarmed and demilitarized for a period of five to ten years, with the provision that, if universal disarmament had not been achieved at the end of that period this restriction would be removed; and, furthermore, that Germany be neutralized and placed under international guaranty for the period in which she was denied the right to re-arm. Under these conditions—and with additional agreements concerning reparations and the future of the Saar—he would propose the creation of an All-German government by free elections, guaranteed by Russian promises of complete constitutional freedom for all citizens.

Would the Russians accept such a proposal? On the basis of past Russian notes Mr. Warburg believes that they might find it to their interest to do so. In any event, Russian rejection of such a concrete proposal, especially if it were supported wholeheartedly by our allies, would cause the Soviet Union a loss of influence amounting to a political defeat, while, at the same time, it would resolve the doubts of those who hesitate to create an effective Western defense system until they are convinced that all reasonable efforts to reach agreement with Moscow have been made.

Would the Russians abide by such a settlement even if they accepted it? This is a more difficult question. Mr. Warburg's answer is that they could violate it only at the cost of war and that it is not reasonable to suppose that they would do so "unless conditions in the meantime so change as to make the Russian rulers seek war. That risk exists with or without a German settlement." The author does not believe that we lose anything by giving up the hope of German membership in EDC. A lot of soldiers, he says, have argued publicly that Western Europe cannot be defended without the Germans; "they have not said that Western Europe can be defended with the Germans." It is more important to seek to prevent the outbreak of war than to cling to a plan which does not at present promise to be effective; and Mr. Warburg believes the neutralization of Germany will remove a provocation and a bone of contention and improve the chances of creating a context in which "the strains of the cold war will be relaxed." German Nationalists Must Face Their Past

By
SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA

Of all the nations of Europe, Germany has the greatest capacity for good or evil. The recent elections suggest that its tremendous potential may be put to constructive ends. However, judging from comments I have received on articles of mine . . . German nationalism is by no means dead.

Some of my German correspondents offer abundant quotations and even statistics to show that, in the last 1,000 years, Germany has been less warlike than other nations. Bismarck is depicted as a peace-loving man and Wilhelm II as downright timid. It is conceded that Hitler started a war, but with strictly limited objectives.

Now I am willing to admit that Bismarck was perhaps no better and no worse than many of his contemporaries. He waged aggressive war, but so did others. The same holds true for the Kaiser. . . .

Hitler, however, is another matter altogether. To claim that his objectives were limited, one must be utterly blinded by national prejudice and hence disqualified for objective discussion. Hitler's appetite was boundless. . . .

Other letter-writers attempt to exonerate the German Army and generals in World War II and pin all the blame on the politicians. One refers to "the lance corporal Hitler, who was raised to power not by the soldiers but by the masses." He forgets that Hitler was built up by the Army and that he enjoyed the protection of Von Epp and Ludendorff. . . .

This correspondent goes on: "The main body of German generals, in 1939, advised Hitler in the strongest terms against his warlike ideas, but they were altogether overridden by politics." What he fails to say is whether the generals did so because they wanted peace or because they feared that Germany was not yet ready to fight a successful war. . . .

Another correspondent objects to my praise of the generals who organized the July 1944 bomb plot against Hitler. He writes: "The essential thing is the treason to the country. Schlabrendorff writes in his book that Oster and other high-ranking officers betrayed to the enemy the contemplated attacks on Norway and Holland a few days before they were due to begin, and he describes this as a great deed. I believe it was shameful and unpardonable." My answer to this is that the attacks on Norway and Holland were abominable crimes, and the men who "betrayed" them were more honorable than those who carried them out. . . .

The most discouraging comment I received was one on the bombing of Rotterdam. The bombing, writes my correspondent, "was based on military considerations, which was not true of the destruction of Dresden, Potsdam, Würzburg and other cities." Here we have an unprovoked, unannounced invasion of a neutral state, accompanied by an all-out terror bombing which wipes out the heart of one of its principal cities—yet, we are asked to accept a plea of "military necessity" and, furthermore, condemn subsequent attacks on the cities of the aggressor nation! . . .

These letters demonstrate that much remains to be done before the world can feel confidence in a humanistic as opposed to a nationalistic Germany. . . . It was Hitler who destroyed Europe. It was the generals and the professors of Germany who allowed him to destroy Europe. Let us face that squarely so that it does not happen again.

Germany's "Gravy Train"

. . . "KRUPP HAS LEADING ROLE IN GERMAN TRADE DRIVE"—The N. Y. Herald Tribune 9-19-53. The accuracy of this statement is confirmed by many reports appearing in the press both here and abroad. In fact, the tentacles of the Krupp empire are reaching to all corners of the world, including the countries east of the Iron Curtain. If we follow the trail of Herr Krupp and Co. we shall be able to appreciate the significance of the German assault against the commercial interests of the West.

Eastward Bound

According to Business Week (August 22, 1953), Krupp and the Ruhr machinery firm Demag clinched a deal whereby they will build a one hundred fifty million dollar steel mill for India. The Krupps succeeded in outbidding the British for this project which will eventually produce one million tons of steel annually. In addition, Krupp is now helping to construct a cement works 300 miles south of Bombay. According to press reports, the cement works will have a production target of 300 tons a year.

India's next door neighbor Pakistan has also been invaded by Herr Krupp and Co. They will provide consultant engineers for the Pakistan government in order to make "a thorough survey of all production and of the possibilities of building up a sizable steel industry." (Manchester Guardian, October 8, 1953). Moreover, Krupp will build a pilot steel plant for Pakistan which after expansion will cost roughly 85 million dollars. The Krupps will take shares in this enterprise in lieu of monetary payments.

In the Middle East

From Pakistan and India the trail eads to the Middle East. Egypt seems to be one of the main targets in this region. The Manchester Guardian reports that he Krupp directors regard Egypt as their third most important market in he East." As in India and Pakistan, the Krupps will participate in the construcon of a steel plant. Krupp will also lay an important role in the development of the huge project of the Assuan dam. This program is only a forerunner f Krupp's program for Egypt. They ope to swamp Egypt with all kinds of heavy industrial equipment and thereby become a decisive factor in the Egyptian economy.

The Krupps are also very active in Turkey. For example, they are favored to obtain the contract for the building of a bridge that would cross the Bosporus at its narrowest point, thus linking up Europe and Asia. The cost for this job is approximately 71 million dollars.

The Manchester Guardian reports that Syria has also come within the grip of the Krupp interests. "Krupp is actively interested in shipping industrial machinery of all kinds to Syria, probably including equipment for oil refineries. The firm has already picked up some valuable contracts in this country."

Further West we find the Krupps in Greece and in Yugoslavia. As far as Greece is concerned, the Krupps will install a nickel processing plant as part of their plans to utilize the country's considerable nickel ore deposits. According to the N. Y. Herald Tribune (September 19, 1953), "Krupp's interests were previously engaged in nickel development on the Greek peninsula but this activity was interrupted by the collapse of Germany in 1945." Thus, while Hitler's armies were in Greece, Krupp had a free hand. Apparently he is now able to resume where he left off.

Operation "Hispanidad"

The Krupps are virtually up to their necks in Spain. Here under the benevolent eye of Dictator Franco, Krupp is on the threshold of new successes. The Worldover Press (April 1, 1953) reports that the new German Ambassador to Spain, Prince Adalbert of Bavaria, is playing a "key role" in building up a Spanish armament industry. "Adalbert is busy helping the German firm of Krupp under Spanish names, to establish a number of arms factories to turn out, notably, not only small weapons but heavy artillery and tanks." This same report discloses that Germany has already sent thousands of technicians into Spain "and these are to be followed by high precision machinery."

That the German Ambassador will do a good job is to be expected in view of the fact that he is an intimate friend of the Krupp family. Undoubtedly the Krupps are happy over the fact that Adalbert has made a hit with the Spanish. "He received an elaborate welcome complete with Moorish cavalrymen as honor troops, when he presented his credentials to Generalissimo Franco. Deutschland Uber Alles was played publicly in Spain for the first time since World War II." (New York Herald Tribune, Sept. 21, 1953.)

From Spain one of Krupp's trails lead to South America. As early as January, 1953, the publication Venezuela Up-To-Date reported that the Krupps "have offered to participate in financing a Venezuelan steel industry as well as in supplying technicians. The Krupps, together with some Swiss interests, are willing to supply 50% of the capital needed, although the total amount required is estimated at 100 million dollars."

Krupp is also eyeing the abundant resources of Brazil, according to the Manchester Guardian. The Brazilian government has incurred a huge debt with Germany and the government could convert "its debts by giving firms like Krupp shares in new industrial undertakings—particularly in iron ore development schemes. . . ." In this connection, the London Economist (Sept. 26, 1953) reveals that joint German-Brazilian enterprises as well as purely German factories will be set up which of course "will buy their equipment in Germany."

U. S. A.—A Target Too

The enterprising activities of Herr Krupp and Co. are indicative of the general resurgence of Germany's industrial power vis-à-vis the West. In discussing this development, many publications in the U. S. seem to imply that it is strictly a worry for the British and French. The fact of the matter is, however, that the U. S. too is a target for the Krupps and the other industrial war lords of the Ruhr. Thus, the N. Y. Times (August 6, 1953) reported that Germany had supplanted the U. S. in the markets of Turkey.

The Wall Street Journal (October 5, 1953) noted, "the Germans are raising Cain with some U. S. businesses in parts of the South of the Border region too. Early last year the U. S. outsold Germany by over two to one in Argentina. By early this year the Germans had stepped out in front."

The U. S. News and World Report (Oct. 9, 1953) discussing German competition as it affects other countries, including the U. S., admitted that "the Germans are outpacing the rest of the export field."

Business Week (August 29, 1953), observed "German industry will mount a big trade fair in Mexico City next spring. It's well timed: you hear more and more demands from Mexican businessmen to expand the nation's trade with Europe and Asia, break its 'economic dependence on the U. S.'"

The U. S. News and World Report (Oct. 30, 1953) declared, "Germans are running off with trade and influence in the Middle East. U. S. and Britain, once tops, are left behind." The article deals in detail with German penetration in the Middle East, economically, militarily and politically. (See our article "Berlin To Bagdad," No. 41 issue PREVENT WORLD WAR III.) Even in the little region of Yemen in Saudi Arabia, the Germans have just obtained a 90 year concession to prospect for oil. The terms of the deal, according to the U. S. News and World Report, were "a major worry for American and British oil companies." We could go on citing additional evidence proving that the United States is by no means immune to the German trade assault spearheaded by Herr Krupp.

In the British Commonwealth

What is the secret of Krupp's successes as well as the growing challenge of German heavy industry? Incredible as it may seem, the answer to this question may be partially found in the fact that Krupp and other magnates are receiving substantial assistance, both from Britain and the U. S.

Let us take the case of Britain. Several years ago, the British, together with other members of the Commonwealth, launched the so-called Colombo Plan, which in many ways is the counterpart of our own Point 4 program. The plan was designed to assist underdeveloped countries by the combined efforts of the more highly industrialized countries of the British Commonwealth. However, Krupp and his Ruhr friends were not asleep and they are taking full advantage of all of the facilities offered by the Plan, according to a study in the British publication, New Statesman and Nation (Oct. 10, 1953). The Manchester Guardian, mentioned above, has also noted the significance of the Krupp "putsch" in relation to the British Commonwealth and Empire. "Krupps," the Manchester Guardian writes, "seems likely to develop and anchor its interests in the new markets which it is opening by accepting shares in new enterprises. Krupps will, in fact, become part owner of key industries in the British empire as well as elsewhere." Thus the Colombo Plan has become a vehicle through which Krupps and other Ruhr outfits are making rapid headway among the underdeveloped countries.

Behind the Iron Curtain

India, of course, is regarded by Krupps as a focal point for this attack. The Wall Street Journal (Aug. 18, 1953) reports that 90% of the outbound passengers to Asia who ride the Air India Airline are German technicians and commercial men

"West German businessmen, long chafing under restrictions on Red trade, closed their first postwar deal with Russia, using accumulated U. S. dollars and Swiss francs to pay for wheat and oil. The deal, negotiated in East Germany, was sanctioned by West German government."

(N. Y. World-Telegram and Sun, 10-14-53)

STIFFENING COMPETITION

"Besides the fact that less foreign aid cash is being handed out to U. S. customers abroad, there's stiff and growing competition from foreign nations, including West Germany and Japan. . . .

"The Japanese are putting the hex on the export division of one big textile firm. 'With dollars harder to get we can't stop the Japs from coming into our markets abroad—they're hurting us badly.'

"For a Cleveland machine tool producer, the Germans are the bogeymen in the trade picture. 'We've just lost 10 big foreign sales to German companies,' he admits. And the reason wasn't only a shortage of dollars among these buyers. 'We simply couldn't meet the Germans' prices and stay in business.'

"In 1952, West Germany exported the equivalent of about $4 billion worth of products, about twice the value of 1950 sales abroad. Japan exported about $1,272,000,000 worth of goods last year. That's 55 per cent higher than Japanese shipments in 1950. . . ."

traveling to India. "German businessmen report they are receiving a friendly welcome there. 'We are lucky the Indians don't consider us one of the colonial powers,' said one trader."

But India, according to the same report, is not regarded by Krupp and other Ruhr barons as an end in itself. "India," the Wall Street Journal points out, "also could be a jumping off point for anticipated future German trade with China." One does not have to anticipate the future German trade with China because the following month, the Wall Street Journal (Sept. 3, 1953) reported that Red China had ordered 1,200 tons of steel plates from a Ruhr mill.

The New Republic (Nov. 9, 1953) states that Germany regards China "as a long range customer for machinery," etc. In this connection the publication reveals that "a new organization, the Asiatic Club, now sends spokesmen to Chambers of Commerce all over West Germany to expand China trade prospects. German industrialists are determined to exploit their present economic advantage and gain a foothold in Asia, pending the easing of East-West trade barriers."

Point 4 Program Helpful Too

Krupp and his friends have not only been able to ride the gravy train of the Colombo Plan but they are also taking full advantage of our own Point 4 Program and other means by which the U. S. finances projects in undeveloped countries. Thus in the case of India, Krupp expects the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to cover the greater portion of the finances required for the building of the Indian steel mill. As everyone knows, the International Bank is largely dependent on American unds for its own activities. It is not for nothing that German industrialsts "have become ardent advocates of the Point 4 Program" (N. Y. Times, Aug. 15, 1953).

American funds are also helping out he Germans in Greece. We do not know whether Krupp will receive American unds for the development of nickel ore n that country, but some fortunate Ruhr oncern will pick up some easy money or the processing ot bauxite mined in Greece. The N. Y. Times (Nov. 1, 953) reveals that U. S. aid funds will used to extract bauxite from one of e largest mines in Greece. But this im- rtant mineral "will be processed in ermany for defense purposes."

Finally, we come to the case of Spain. According to the authoritative Paris newspaper Le Monde, "the armament factories which Krupp is building in Spain are to be financed by the U. S." If we prefer to regard the Le Monde statement as biased, then we can turn to our own press. Thus, the N. Y. Herald Tribune (Sept. 21, 1953) discloses that Madrid correspondents of West German financial publications are persistently reporting that "Germany will get large orders for cement for use in improving of Spanish harbors and other works, to be launched under the impending pact between the U. S. and Spain for American use of Spanish military and naval bases." This report ties in with our account of the activities of Krupp's Ambassador — excuse us — the West German Ambassador to Spain, Prince Adalbert. Here is the picture for all to see and to wonder. Krupp and his friends have found a new way by which they can rebuild their empires, i.e., at the expense of American and to a lesser extent, British taxpayers.

A Lucky War Criminal

Has any decent human being forgotten that Herr Krupp was convicted as a war criminal on the grounds that he had employed slave labor and participated in the looting of Europe? The properties under his control were supposed to have been confiscated and Krupp was sentenced to 12 years of imprisonment. However, Mr. McCloy, former U. S. High Commissioner, threw all of that out of the window—and Krupp went free. The properties which have yet to be proven to be legally Krupp's, have been turned over to him. More than that, Krupp will receive millions of dollars of compensation for part of these properties, although it still remains to be seen whether he had legal title to them. It is interesting to note that the Chase National Bank, of which Mr. McCloy is now Chairman, loaned Spain 25 million dollars several years ago. Who knows but if Krupp's business concessions in Spain have not profited from this loan? In any event, we are not at all surprised to read the N. Y. Herald Tribune report that "Alfred Krupp is the head of the family and thus is one of the richest men in the world. At present he is building himself a large 2-story, 3-wing villa in modern style on a wooded hillside near Essen."

The facts cited above have not received the publicity that they deserve although the U. S. News and World Report admits that American businessmen as well as British merchants "are howling for help from their governments," in the face of this German commercial blitzkrieg. American businessmen who are seeking protection would be well advised if they at first demand an accounting for the financing of projects which the Germans are enjoying at the expense of our taxpayers.

Behind the German Elections

By JAMES H. SHELDON

The West German elections show primarily a vote of confidence for "a strong man."

Some early commentators on the Bonn returns seemed jubilant over the relatively small vote secured by the official neo-Nazi parties. Any encouragement to be derived from this aspect of the matter, however, is strictly skin-deep.

The facts are that the Pan Germans, neo-Nazis and ultra-nationalists succeeded in invading the parties of the Adenauer coalition to such an appaling extent that they are now much nearer to the control of power in West Germany than before. Whether they are able to fully exert this power in the immediate future depends largely upon a single very weak link: viz. the life expectancy of one 77-year-old man (Dr. Adenauer). Should Adenauer (like the late Mayor Reuter) die while still in office, his party machinery would be inherited by a coalition in which the extreme nationalists can be expected to claim the controlling voice.

An unpublished report of a United States intelligence observer in Bonn to his superiors puts it this way:

"Although the German voters on September 6th have banished the extremist parties of the right and the left from the Bundestag, they now must prepare themselves to seeing the basic democratic constitutional principles endangered by the authoritarian forces which exert their influence inside Adenauer's party . . . There cannot be any doubt that the nationalist, revisionist and authoritarian tendencies at the policy-making level of the CDU-CSU will be strengthened by the very strong increase in votes received by the party from obviously rightist extremist circles . . ."

In other words, what happened in the German elections on September 6th is about the same as what has happened to "reform" parties in scores of American municipal elections where the "corrupt" machine has adopted the cynical philosophy that "the best way to lick 'em is to join 'em."

In June, Dr. Adenauer made a demonstrative visit to the prison in Werl where he shook hands with the worst war criminals who had been sentenced to death and were later commuted to life. He assured them that the Bonn government is doing everything to get the last few war criminals free.

In one of his election speeches, Dr. Adenauer told the German people, in typical nationalist fashion, that they have "a God-given mission to save Christian civilization."

In a mass meeting before the extreme nationalistic expellees (most of whom had once been Nazi 5th Columnists in countries adjoining Hitler's Reich) he told his audience that "the day will not be far off when you will return to your old homelands."

Dr. Adenauer and the political leaders of his CDU Party made an especially jingoistic appeal to the unreconstructed Nazis, to the Waffen SS, and to the ex-Nazi officers and Wehrmacht front fighters. In the 1949 election these elements had boycotted the regular political parties, because, being "licensed" by the occupation authorities, they were labelled as "foreign tools." Now these same elements were exhorted to give their support to Dr. Adenauer and his coalition parties because they had accomplished great successes in resurrecting Germany's strength and in "restoring the honor of the German soldier."

On August 7th one CDU member of the Bundestag, a Col. Hartmann, made a speech as the official representative of the Adenauer Party before a mass meeting of former members of Hitler's Waffen SS. According to a report in the newspaper of the Waffen SS, the WIKINGRUF (Call of the Viking), the speaker condemned the defamation of the Waffen SS, saying that they had been "as an organization, and in their conduct as soldiers, always honorable." The spokesman then stated:

"The CDU stands for giving equal status to the claims of the Waffen SS along with that accorded to other units of the regular German army. Dr. Adenauer's visit to the prison at Werl is intended to make it clear to the whole world that the last of the so-called war criminals must be set free immediately. The Chancellor has made this a prerequisite of his policy, which is aimed at wiping out the Nuremberg concept of collective guilt . . . The Bonn government has done its utmost to gain all advantages from the present situation and the soldiers of the Waffen SS should be appreciative of the fact that the Chancellor, in the formulation and execution of his European policies, is paying close attention to the record of common sacrifice (by the Waffen S. S.) in a great cause."

This nationalistic appeal of the Adenauer Party was well received by Hitler's Waffen SS veterans. The Deutsche Soldaten Zeitung (German Soldier's Gazette) of August 27th reported that one of the principal Waffen SS leaders, General Gille, recommended to all former elite guard members that they give their vote only to those political parties "who have worked constructively in the interest of Germany."

Observers of the German political scene have stated that it was on account of this nationalistic appeal that millions of former Nazis who had not voted in 1949, this time gave a vote of confidence to parties of the Adenauer coalition.

As a result of this strange campaign, we find a "pro-democratic" victory sending to the Bundestag such odd characters as the former Panzer General Hasso von Manteuffel, recently named as a figure in the notorious "Bruderschaft" conspiracy; the former Vice-Admiral Eduard Heye, of the Nazi navy; and Hans Stumpf, once General of the Nazi Luftwaffe.

So long as Adenauer lives, let us hope that he can perform the political miracle of riding wild horses in several directions at once, without catastrophe to general European policy. But let us not deceive ourselves with the thought that the recent election was anything like a bright victory for democracy. Quite to the contrary, it represents the completion of a very thorough infiltration of the "center" parties by ultra-nationalist and Pen-Germanic forces.

Germany's European neighbors seem well aware of the real meaning of these elections. From Switzerland, France, Holland and Belgium come evidence of the deepest alarm.

The Fascist International

I

A German Forerunner of the Fascist International

The Fascist International, so effectively launched by the old Nazis and brazenly revived by the new, is no Hitler patent. It was conceived as far back as seventy years ago, in September 1882, when, on German initiative, the first international antisemitic Congress met at Dresden to establish the International Anti-Jewish Committee, later called "Allgemeine Vereingung zur Bekämpfung des Judenthums (Alliance Antijuive Universelle)."

The plan was reaffirmed seven months later, in April 1883, at a second Congress, held at Chemnitz, which was attended by delegates from six European countries. Its proceedings were printed in the Congress' own journal, Schmeitzner's Internationale Monatsschrift, of which the Wiener Library recently acquired the second volume (1883, 766 pp). It is interesting to examine the early beginnings of a movement which grew, imperceptibly, on its antisemitism until at last it shattered the very foundations of the West.

The internationalists of Dresden and Chemnitz stressed two points which have remained fundamental—(a) that the Jewish Question is not a religious but a social problem, and (b) that this social problem must be solved on a world-wide scale.

When Dr. Otto Glagau opened the second Congress, he described the Jewish Question (p. 256) as "the very core of the Social Question which increases daily in danger and intensity and which may be said to have already undermined the whole of Europe." It was their duty, he explained, to bring home to society and Governments that there could be no solution of the Social Question until the Jewish Question had been "regulated." This was to be done by repealing the Jews' civil emancipation (p. 635) and enforcing their strictest segregation and boycott. One of the chief agents of the Congress movement, Herr Liebermann von Sonnenberg offers (p. 310) a "magic formula": "Isolate the Jew, isolate him socially and in business—by not buying from him, by not selling to him, by denying him all profits and refusing to read his newspapers. . . . Have no intercourse with Jews. Do not join associations which admit Jews. Found clubs which undertake to bar Jews," etc.

Antisemitism to Solve Social Question

This doctrine, being regarded as the heart of the Social Question, is addressed particularly to the lower orders, especially artisans and small traders, also farmers whose distress at the time is felt to offer bright prospects to antisemitic demagoguery (p. 763). . . .

But the doctrine is considered of little consequence unless it be spread beyond the frontiers of any one nation, because the Jews are "an international evil" which can be fought "from a narrow national point of view" no more than could the Colorado beetle (pp. 123, 445, 754). In fact, it is emphasized, this is the only genuine evil besetting nations and causing enmity between nations. "'Le juif, voilà l'ennemi,' this must remain the common international slogan!" (p. 509)....

Britain was entirely outside the movement. The "antisemitic seed" was thought to have been sown there when Court Chaplain Stöcker visited London in November 1883 (p. 705), though the hope was somewhat uncertain.

Altogether the agitation failed to make the progress which its managers expected. At the end of 1883, the editor of Schmeitzner's, C. H. Ritter, resigned though promising to remain a contributor. The fear is felt that the leaders will give up the struggle, "disgusted at the indolence and stupidity of the masses" (p. 640). Fifty years later the indolence had ceased and the stupidity was sufficiently aroused to entrust all power to Hitler.

II

Patriots' Emigration

Under this title the Nazi "net of friendships and connections spread over the whole world" is described in an anonymous article in the July 1953 issue of Nation Europa, organ of the Fascist International. It recalls that "immediately after the occupation of Germany many Germans escaped, often illegally and with false papers, making for the most part for South America and the countries of the Islamic East. . . . A large number fled because they believed that our people's struggle for its freedom could be more effectively conducted from outside, far from the irksome spying by the enemy and the new authorities. . . . Since 1952 another wave of patriots has been leaving Germany both legally and illegally, not only from the Soviet Zone. . . . Not a few leave in order to avoid serving 'sentences' imposed by a political judiciary."

". . . Provided there isn't a shadow of a doubt."— A French view of EDC from the Paris weekly, Le Canard Enchaine.

How, Nation Europa asks, can the "patriots' emigration" advance the Nazi cause which is called "the cause of the Reich"? The Fascist journal finds that "today and as long as the Cold War continues, the only effective service can be rendered by building little bulwarks of unyielding loyalty to the Reich, by launching periodicals and publications that expose the injustice done to our people and carry their message into Germany. . . . Another duty is the denunciation of the injustice in the non-German press, the cultivation of close contacts with intellectual leaders of the new countries and cooperation with local papers. Particularly important is the establishment, hardly possible inside Germany, of cross connections between like-minded groups of other nationalities, e.g., with the strong Fascist group of the Italians outside Italy, with the Croat, Hungarian, patriotic Russian and Vichy-French émigrés. Today all leading members of the patriots' emigrations since 1945 know each other, either personally or through correspondence, and have close contacts with the leaders of Islam and Latin America. . . . A net of friendships and connections is spread över the whole world. . . . There are hardly any dissentients, except perhaps the Polish patriots because of their frontier quarrel with the Germans and the Russian patriots, and to some extent, the Serb supporters of a Yugoslav State, because of the irremediable dispute with the Croats."

Nation Europa's Finance

Some of the inside story of Nation Europa was told in the Naumann documents of which the Wiener Library recently published a summary ("The Naumann Plot: Evidence from the Impounded Documents"). Dr. Werner Naumann, the head of the conspiracy, had shown considerable interest in the journal, whose editor, Arthur Erhardt, received political instructions from him. He also secured the financial basis of that journal, in cooperation with a Fascist group in Paris whose members included Messrs. Maurice Bardeche, Guy Amaudruz, Jean Bauvard, Guy Lemonier and one Albertini, a banker.

Details of these transactions were revealed by one of the arrested (since released), Heinz Siepen, who said that towards the end of 1951 Naumann spoke to him about the financial straits of Nation Europa. . . .

How the money was secured is not clear from the documents. It will be remembered that last March Dr. Adenauer briefly referred to the "not inconsiderable" financial support the Naumann group had received from Fascist bodies in France, Belgium and Britain.

Progress in France and Holland

New French Fascist papers are mentioned in the May 1953 issue of Défense de l'Occident, the monthly journal published by Maurice Bardeche, the French philo-Nazi (see last Bulletin, p. 5) who cooperates with Nation Europa, Coburg. In March the organization "Citadelle" began to publish a monthly called Fidélité which, under the direction of Charles Luca, circulates mainly in the working class districts of Paris. Another organization, "Jeune Nation," is now issuing regularly its paper Peuple de France.

The progress made by some Fascist papers is recorded in the Paris Rivarol, 21-5-53. Its own circulation at the end of 1952 was 47,200 compared with 39,700 in October 1951. Its contemporary Aspects de la France, during the same twelve months, increased from 25,000 to 31,550 while France Réelle sold 14,300 copies.

The French traitor Marcel Deat who is believed to be living in Argentina, has published his diaries from 1940 to 1944 under the title "Combat contre l'Impossible."

In Bruxelles a journal entitled La Quinzaine was started by Ossian Matthieu, who frequently contributed to the notoriour weekly Europe-Amérique there.

A new Dutch Nazi Party was recently founded, according to a Frankfurter Rundschau report from Amsterdam, 23-7-53. Its name is "National European Socialist Movement" ("NESB"), and its chief, Paul van Trienen, a former Waffen-SS officer, who had previously launched an organization called "Werkgemeenschap Europa in Holland." He and two of his Gauleiters, A. N. Kruit and J. Wolthuis, were arrested as there was reason to believe that the "NESB" was a revival of the "NSB," the philo-Nazi organization led by the traitor Mussert. The "NESB" deputy Gauleiter for Amsterdam, M. W. Bredero, protested against the "illegal arrests" and asked for assistance from sister organizations in Italy, Germany, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Flanders, according to Het Parool, Amsterdam, 24-8-53.

Apathy of Italian Anti-Fascists

In the recent Italian General Election, several former leading Fascists were returned, chief amongst them Signor de Marsanich, who once held office under Mussolini and is now secretary of the M. S. I. Party. The Times Rome correspondent, 26-6-53, writes: "It was the apathy shown by the last Parliament in failing to approve a Bill prolonging the constitutional ban on Fascist participation in public offices that enabled these members of the defunct regime to return to public life."

One of the German branches of the Fascist international, which calls itself "German Social Movement within the European Social Movement," has begun to publish a series Die Europäische Nationale, edited by Karl Heinz Priester, chairman of the G. S. M. The first issue is entitled "Germany—East-West Colony, or Equal Partner in a Free Europe?" The claim is made that Europe can be saved from Bolshevism only by those who once fought in Russia, not by those who "once made common cause with Stalin and of their own free will handed large tracts of our Continent to the Soviet Union." It is also argued that Europe required as its Lebensraum the East and Africa. An appendix gives a detailed account of the German Social Movement's organization and activity.

STRANGE DIPLOMACY

From the N. Y. Times 11-19-53:

"The feeling here that the French are under United States and British pressure as they seek to formulate their European policy was illustrated by reports of today's cabinet meeting.

"According to a story told on apparently good authority, President Vincent Auriol complained that he had first learned from newspapers that Sir Winston Churchill had proposed the meeting of the heads of the United States, British and French Governments in Bermuda, Dec. 4.

"M. Auriol was reported to have remarked that Dr. Konrad Adenauer, West German Chancellor, who was not invited was nevertheless officially told of the proposed meeting before the President of the French Republic. . . ."

QUID PRO QUO

From a Dispatch to the N. Y. Times 10-11-53:

"Proposals for further liberalization of trade with the Western world and restoration of Germany's 'traditional trade relations with countries beyond the Iron Curtain' have been presented to the Bonn Government.

"The West German business community, which strongly supported the Government in the September general election, made these proposals and many others. . . ."

"Among the recommendations was the following:

"The anti-cartel regulations of the Allied occupying powers should be replaced 'as soon as possible' by a German law that would not prohibit cartels but only prevent their 'misuse.'. . . ."

BUYERS' MARKET

From a Report by S. Freidin and W. Richardson to the N. Y. Post 10-11-53:

"Bonn: The other day a war decorations committee voted to forbid wearing military decorations encrusted with the swastika. That hasn't ended the case. Veterans' committees, outside of government channels, have attacked the whole idea. Besides, dealers reproducing decorations say that the only way their customers want them is with the original swastika. . . ."

GERMANY AND THE ATOM

(From a Report by Robert S. Allen 9-4-53.)

"Western Germany is all set to spring, almost fully equipped, into the fateful field of atomic energy.

"The Germans have a stockpile of more than 15 tons of uranium, a large staff of gifted scientists and skilled technicians, and considerable laboratory and other essential equipment—all quietly assembled in the last three years. . . ."

HEIL HITLER!

From Mark Alexander in The New Leader 11-2-53:

". . . A most revealing sidelight to all this was a survey made by Egypt's Life-type magazine, Al Mussawar. The magazine asked prominent politicians throughout the Arab world: 'How would you appraise Hitler's activities, eight years after his death? If he should now appear again, what advice would you give him?'

"Anvar el Sadat, head of the Egyptian Air Force and Number 3 man in the ruling junta, answered:

" 'Dear Hitler, I welcome you back with all my heart. You have been defeated, but in fact one should regard you as the real victor: There will be no peace in the world until Germany again takes first place. Your main mistake was in opening too many fronts, but everything has been forgiven, for you are a shining example of belief in one's fatherland and people. You are eternal, and we shall not be surprised if we see you again, or a second Hitler, back in Germany.'

"Dr. Taraf el Din, Egyptian Health Minister said:

" 'You will remain a shining example to the German people. Your great life has been worthy of a great end. The best people will always remember the grandeur of your splendid life, and they will mourn the fact that you have been defeated by the forces of evil. All the lies and calumnies voiced by your despicable enemies cannot lessen your great name.'

"These replies were more or less typical, and they are in deadly earnest. They reflect the prevailing muddleheadedness (to put it mildly) of the Egyptian leaders, who have learned nothing, forgotten little since 1940. It should be noted, moreover, that Hitler's anti-Jewish policy is nt a special attraction for the Egyptian leaders: none of them even mentioned it. Fascism as a whole seems to have an irresistible attraction for the Arab chiefs."

FRIENDLY ENEMIES

From an AP Dispatch 11-1-53:

"Former German Field Marshal Friedrich Paulus, the loser at Stalingrad more than ten years ago, was quoted today as saying in a formal statement before being repatriated to East Germany: 'I came to the Soviet Union as an enemy, but leave as a friend.'. . ."

From the JTA, 11-24-53:

"A German court at Giessen has acquitted a former S.S. Lieutenant, Cuno Guettler, of murder in the shooting of 87 inmates, many of them Jews, against the orders of his superiors. His defense was that he committed the murders while drunk. The court ruled that since the German statute of limitations on drunkenness runs out after five years and the crimes were committed in 1945 the murderer could go free."

INVESTORS' "PARADISE"

From the Manchester Guardian Weekly 9-10-53:

". . . It is argued that Germany is emerging now as one of the safest European investment propositions and if there is anything that might perhaps save Western Europe from a German economic and financial hegemony (even if the military aspect is settled) it is some kind of European arrangement.

"It is an open secret that at least 10 per cent of all French capital is in safe deposits and numbered accounts in Switzerland, and that the Swiss bankers' chief worry is where to invest this capital with a reasonable amount of security. It would indeed be tragicomic if this capital helped to revive German economic might while French parliamentarians dithered about the nature of legal guarantees that would be needed in order to safeguard France's interests. . . ."

THE SPIRIT OF MUNICH

From a Reuters Dispatch 11-6-53:

"Theodor Oberländer, Minister for Refugees in the Adenaure cabinet, has called for a solution of the Sudenten-German question 'in the spirit of the Munich Pact' of 1938. . . .

"In a declaration in the official Government Bulletin published Nov. 6, Herr Oberländer urged a 'strengthening' of German areas bordering on Czechoslovakia 'for a solution of the Sudeten-German question in the spirit of the Munich Pact and for an all-European solution.' . . ."

A GERMAN MEMORIAL

From a JTA Dispatch 7-7-53:

"Protests were made to the Baden-Wuerttemberg Minister of the Interior against the recent dedication at Castle Staufeneck of a memorial stone for the dead of the Military SS. It pointed out that this memorial constitutes 'a provocation for democratic-minded Germans, for victims of Nazism and everyone abroad.'

"A Social Democratic meeting in Stuttgart also adopted a resolution voicing indignation at the 'provocatory attitude" at Castle Staufeneck of former SS officers, 'these unregenerate gravediggers of Germany.'"

PRACTICING AGAIN

From the JTA, 11-19-53:

"The Hesse Bar Association has readmitted to legal practice Dr. Friedrich Krebs, Nazy Mayor of Frankfurt, during whose administration 35,000 Jews were hounded out of the city. The bar's decision overruled an earlier action refusing Krebs permission to practice."

THE CHANCELLOR IS CONSULTED

From a UP Report 9-16-53:

"Chancellor Konrad Adenauer was consulted before the United States announced it would ship atomic artillery to West Germany. Chancellor Adenauer told his parliamentary faction in Bonn today that Roger M. Kyes, United States Defense Secretary, had given advance notice to Theodor Blank, defense minister."

NO COMMENT

From the JTA, 8-11-53:

"The Wiesbaden Court of Assizes yesterday sentenced Dr. Gerhard Peters, a German chemist, to six years' imprisonment following his sixth conviction on charges of supplying a deadly cyanide gas to Nazi concentration camps for the annihilation of 450,000 Jews and other inmates.

"The prosecution had demanded a 16-year sentence. The court allowed half of the six-year sentence to be deducted for time spent in pre-trial custody. The prosecution of Peters began with one of the earliest war crimes trials in 1945 and has been appealed to various courts including the German Supreme Court and the case has always been ordered re-tried because of the leniency of the sentence, which in the past varied between four and one-half years and five years.

"During his trial, Peters admitted being told by an S.S. officer that "Zyklon B" gas, produced by his "German Corporation for Vermin Extermination," was used to exterminate Jews. Yet, he continued to supply huge quantities of the product to the Auschwitz gas chambers. The corporation, an affiliate of the international I. G. Farben cartel, continues to do business in Frankfurt to this day.

"Throughout his various trials, Peters showed that he was an unreconstructed Nazi. Nevertheless, many prominent Germans have signed clemency petitions in his behalf and he was released from prison several years ago after the intervention of Minister-President Zinn, a prominent Social Democrat. Many observers doubt that Peters will ever serve his sentence."

NAZIS AT WORK

From a Report to the N. Y. Times 8-22-53:

"In four raids in Amsterdam and one in the town of Groningen, the Dutch police struck today at centers of Nazi activity and arrested three leaders of an association composed largely of wartime collaborators. . . ."

THE ELECTION RETURNS

From a Dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor 10-28-53:

"More charges of ex-Nazis infiltrating the West German Government appeared certain as Chancellor Konrad Adenauer announced the appointment of Hans Globke as head of his chancellory. Globke has been under fire from the Social Democratic Opposition because he wrote a legal commentary to the notorious Nazi 'Nuremberg racial laws,' which discriminated against Jews and other 'non-Aryans.'"

HIGH HOPES

From a Report to the Christian Science Monitor 9-26-53:

"West Germany hopes to conclude soon a $250,000,000 loan with United States banks to finance reconstruction of war-devastated cities. The money would be used for building houses for millions of refugees and other homeless Germans."

A VETERANS' RALLY

From M. S. Handler to the N. Y. Times 7-23-53:

". . . In Hanover, 15,000 war veterans, including a great number of veterans of the Waffen S. S. (the military branch of the Elite Guards), congregated for a joint rally. Bands played the martial tunes of the old Wehrmacht.

"Herman Ehlers, President of the Bundestag and one of the leaders of Chancellor Adenauer's party, and Franz Bluecher, Vice Chancellor and leader of the Free Democratic Party, shared the platform with a number of former generals and admirals, including Herbert Gille, former general of the Waffen S. S.

"Herr Ehlers and Dr. Bluecher heard Herr Gille extol the virtues of the Waffen S. S. and reiterate a new doctrine that the concept of European integration and unity had been born in the Waffen S. S. Herr Gille's assertion was a variation of a story circulating in Germany that the first European army was the so-called international force of Quisling units that Hitler sent into the Soviet Union—Italians, Rumanians, Spaniards, and so forth.

"Herr Gille's claim of Waffen S. S. authorship for the European integration policy and the presence of government leaders at the Hanover rally brought no reaction from the Allied High Commission, which let the incident pass. . . ."

"German shipbuilders nose the U. S. out of second place among the world's shipbuilding nations. Lloyds Shipping Register shows that at the end of September West Germany had under construction a record 651,527 gross tons of shipping. That compares with 2,190,329 tons abuilding in Britain and a total of 564,822 tons for the United States. Low prices and fast delivery have brought orders by the dozens to shipyards of the former enemy nation. Two years ago the German ranked eighth in shipbuilding tonnage."

"Another bit of evidence that Europe is not as happy about the rearmament of Western Germany as is sometimes presumed on this side of the Atlantic comes out of Bern, Switzerland.

"The Swiss Federal Council, the country's cabinet, has refused to license a $560,000 order for small caliber anti-aircraft guns, shells and accessories placed with a Swiss firm by the German Federal Republic's frontier defense authorities.

"Always ready to turn a new franc, the Swiss reject business only when they are convinced that their neutral status might be endangered. In this case, knowing the temper of Western Europe outside of Germany better than some American politicians, they intend to forego the profit rather than incur the least trace of animosity. There could be no clearer indication that western Europe is not overjoyed at the prospect of German rearmament."

(Editorial in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, 9-19-53)

Monster or Crusader?

In 1946 West Germany poured 2,500,000 tons of steel. In 1949 she poured 9,000,000 tons and equalled French production. In 1951 she turned out 13,500,000 tons, and this year she has been pouring at the rate of 14,500,000 tons, some months surpassing the British. Next year she expects to come close to 18,000,000 tons, and take over as the largest steel producer in Western Europe by a clear margin.

This is the Frankenstein monster which faces the allies. We have created a nation which we cannot yet completely trust and which is out of our control.

That lack of control was demonstrated this week in two different ways. The more apparently dangerous was the return from Communist captivity of Paulus, former German Field Marshal, who spoke out for friendship with Soviet Russia in terms which will fall on some friendly ears.

He implied that Germany, to achieve her dreams, must make peace with the other great land power on the continent—Russia. This has long been a popular thesis of some German political and military leaders.

The other incident was Chancellor Adenauer's sweep of Hamburg, which gives him a clear majority in the government, a bloc large enough to put through any constitutional changes which may be needed for rearmament—or other purposes. Since we have backed Adenauer, we cheer. But we have sober doubts too.

It is only a few years ago that Germany came close to conquering the world—the most successful attempt made by brute force in the history of man.

There is every indication that Germany is united behind Adenauer because he has been able to deal with the allies with astounding success and because he—like all Germans—is dedicated to the return of a strong, unified Germany.

Germany is out of our control now. She says she is dedicated to the cause of the Free World. We hope so, for Germany is already a powerful weapon. But we are not yet sure which way she is pointed. And our lingering doubts are French nightmares.

(An Editorial—Boston Herald)

AN AMERICAN STATESMAN

"I have had an hour's talk with one of them, who has the ear of the President and Secretary of State. He spoke of a recent tour he had made in Western Germany. He was 'alarmed' by the speed of Germany's return to power, and by the danger that neither German nor Continental democracy would prove strong enough—without the U. S. and Britain—to assure that this giant would continue long harnessed to freedom. The rapidly ascending aviation speed records impressed him, too, as proof that the U. S. needed to raise its sights from the European to the Atlantic level if it is to build for the future. May Washington listen to this far-sighted adviser! Then certainly Napoleon will stay safely buried under his golden dome."

Inside Germany

RECONCENTRATION

"... The tendency in the Federal Republic will undoubtedly be towards the re-creation of the old industrial conditions and the reversal of all Allied legislation. This has been fairly clearly shown in the cases of the "Gross-Banken" — the three big banks which virtually control the German financial world. These three—the Deutsche, Dresdner, and Commerz—were split into nine regional banks and the 'trust busters' were thoroughly satisfied.

"Recently the three successor units of the Deutsche Bank issued their separate annual reports. Save for the purely financial statements the reports of the three—the Hamburg, Dusseldorf, and Franfurt branches —were absolutely identical. A common policy had, in fact, been worked out and "reconcentration" could, if it were so decided, be carried out tomorrow."

(The Manchester Guardian Weekly, 11-26-53)

SANCTUARY ON THE NILE

"... a German engineer from Wupperthal, Arnold Schleicher, confirmed the presence of other important Nazi Party leaders in the Middle East. Herr Schleicher, in recent years, worked in Egypt as agent for a West German firm engaged in the construction of a dam on the Nile River. During this period he came in touch with the former Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, in whose company he encountered a considerable number of formerly prominent members of the party, all of whom had been sought by the Allies as war criminals, and who admitted holding Egyptian nationality."

(From the Christian Science Monitor, 11-30-53.)

VETOED

"The French on the Allied Military Security Board for Germany have vetoed nearly $500,000,000 worth of military orders which the United States wanted to place with West German factories. . . .

"The American Government planned to place the orders, through the Mutual Security Administration and military off-shore procurement programs, to get West Germany's defense production under way for the time it joins the European army.

"The French, however, have insisted on their full veto power over German military production until a peace treaty is ratified . . ."

(Art Noyes in N. Y. Daily News 8-5-53.)

NEW ARRIVALS IN GERMANY

"Eleven former German generals released as prisoners or war by the Soviet Union arrived in Germany today asserting that seventy-one more former generals would be free shortly.

"The former generals estimated the Soviet Union was still holding up to 140 former German generals and staff officers. . . ." (N. Y. Times 10-4-53.)

A POINT OF VIEW

"Friedrich Paulus, former field marshal general in command of German troops at Stalingrad, appeared today to be about to enter East German politics. . . .

"In his statement he (General Paulus) said that from his experiences in two world wars he had learned that the German people could not fulfill their destiny through the 'concept of power,' but only through lasting friendship with the Soviet Union and the other 'peace-loving peoples.'

"He thus echoed the old school of thought in the German General Staff that Germany must found its policy on alliance with the other great land power on the European Continent. It is a point of view that lingers in some German military minds. . . ."

DRIVE TO THE WEST

"The Penhoet shipyard at St. Nazaire, France, has placed an order for several thousand tons of heavy ships' plates with a West German rolling mill, the first such order to be given by France since the opening of the joint coal and steel market. It was learned . . . that the German company will ship the steel by waterway, and therefore was able to offer a c.i.f. price more than 10 per cent below that of the French and Saar competitors. French companies are now said to be debating how they can meet this German competition in their coastal areas."

(Journal of Commerce 11-16-53.)

FOR SERVICES RENDERED

"West Germany's heavy industries, which financed the successful general election campaign for Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's Christian Democratic Union and its coalition allies, made known the economic policies they expected the next Adenauer Government to adopt and implement. . . ."

(N. Y. Times 9-12-53.)

A NEW PEAK

"The motor vehicle industry of Western Germany, according to the German Federal Republic 'Bulletin,' reached a production peak last June, when 46,425 vehicles were produced, of which 36,497 were passenger cars. This brought the total for the half year to 222,804 units.

"The June figure surpassed by 4,500 the previous monthly record, set in October, last year.

"Auto production, which has been steadily increasing since the end of the war, is now expected to level off, the 'Bulletin' stated. . . ."

"Of the total 1952 production, 428,393 vehicles, it was reported, almost one-third was exported."

(An ONA dispatch 9-16-53.)

THE GREAT EUROPEANS!

"German industrialists have launched a concerted campaign to block a cherished French project for construction of a Moselle River Canal to give the French steel industry in Lorraine a cheap water link to the Atlantic Ocean....

"The French assert they would be able to save up to 50 or 60 per cent on transportation costs of steel exports, circumventing the costly railway charges over the present routes to the port of Dunkerque, France, and Antwerp, Belgium. Likewise, they say they would make an immense saving in hauling large amounts of Ruhr coal to Lorraine....

"The French point out that the canal would be of direct benefit to the Germans by increasing their hydro-electric power establishment and by building up industry in the Moselle Valley....

"Since the French consortium began to push the plan harder this fall, German industrial circles have begun major attacks on it in the press. This week they presented their objections to Chancellor Konrad Adenauer."

(Gaston Coblentz in the N. Y. Herald Tribune, 11-20-53.)

"A dispute over freedom of international shipping on the River Rhine is threatening to cause bad feeling between Holland and West Germany....

"One of the latest Dutch moves has been officially to accuse West Germany of adopting a 'national' attitude rather than an 'international' one, and of violating a long-standing European treaty.

"The trouble arises from a refusal by the West Germans to permit Dutch and other foreign barges to take on cargoes at German Rhine towns and discharge them at other German towns....

"At the last meeting at Strasbourg of the Central Rhine Commission, a body set up in the last century to administer the Mannheim Acts, the Dutch received the support of the other Rhine states...."

(Gaston Coblentz in the N. Y. Herald Tribune, 11-23-53.)

"WE'LL DO BETTER NEXT TIME"

"Eleven of Hitler's former generals and admirals say he was the big reason Germany lost World War II.

"A 472-page German book by some of the Third Reich's top military and civilian experts, published Dec. 2, gives the Fuhrer's military talents a rough going over. Here are some of the collective views in the book, entitled, "Balance of World War II."

"Hitler started with an under-strength Air Force, a Navy, even worse prepared, and 90 per cent of Germany's business tied up in peacetime production.

"He toyed with an impossible plan for invading England, but let slip an easy chance to seize Africa and the Middle East.

"He outblundered Napoleon by his campaign in the Soviet Union.

"Although German invention perfected jet fighters ahead of the Allies, Hitler passed them up, although they might have wrecked Allied air power...."

RE-EDUCATION

"'Until the German people overcome their intense will to forget the Hitlerian outrages for which they are responsible,' Germany has no right to full equality with other civilized nations, Dr. Norman Salit said.

"Dr. Salit, president of the Synagogue Council of America, returned after a month-long study of Western Germany. . . .

"Salit said, 'I am convinced that the leaders of Germany today recognized that Germany bears great guilt in the matter of the Hitler crimes. . . .

"'The people, however, as distinguished from the leaders, show an intense will to forget. They apparently show no contrition over what tragedy they wrought during the past decade. By and large they do not want to be reminded of Nazi atrocities which they seek to minimize.

"'They appear to be untroubled by the frightful horrors of the concentration camps, seeming to feel that only Jews were involved and to them Jews are not important.'. . .

"Salit said there is no overt anti-Semitism in Germany today, but that German employers will not hire Jews. . . .

"The first national Jewish leader to visit Germany on a government invitation since the rise of Hitler 20 years ago, Salit said he was 'disappointed with the piecemeal way in which West Germany is re-educating its people.'"

A JOLLY EVENING

"Students of Germany, particularly of the Nazi era, must have read with some surprise a Reuter report, printed in the London Times, 8-6-53, of an address delivered by Colonel Geoffrey Fawns, British Resident Officer in Brunswick, to a gathering of former Waffen-SS who (it was stated) gave him warm applause. Colonel Fawns was said to have explained why Britain must keep out of a European political federation, the European army, and similar projects. This was understood to have been the first time that a British official had made a speech to former members of the Waffen-SS...

"...Colonel Fawns' address went unreported in the general German press. Only the 'Deutsche Soldaten Zeitung' made an effort to save it from oblivion. It stated, June 25, 1953, that the Colonel had been asked at the meeting why the Waffen-SS was still regarded as second class humans, and the gallant gentleman had replied: 'I am glad to spend such a jolly evening with second class humans...'

"Colonel Fawns stated further: '...If competent quarters hold the opinion that former members of the Waffen-SS are not eligible for the future European army, then it is up to the Federal Government to change that opinion. Britain would put no obstacles in their way.'"

(From the Wiener Library Bulletin, London, 8-53.)

SALES PROMOTION

"The Communist Hamburger Volkszeitung has claimed that 25 West German industrial concerns in Lower Saxony have formed an association to promote trade with the Soviet zone.

"It said Nov. 12 the association would send representatives to East Berlin shortly to negotiate with Soviet-zone economic officials. Volkszeitung said that the West German companies were of 'small and medium size,' producing machines, electro-technical equipment, optics, boats, and textiles.

CONSULTANT

"A former leader and district governor of the Nazi Party, Albert Forster, is today known to be playing an important role as consultant to the Soviet and East German Communist authorities. Herr Forster, it will be recalled, was the man who became known in the late 1930s as Hitler's chief rabble rouser in Danzig. . . .

"According to some circles it is not unlikely that Herr Forster will in the near future make a political comeback similar to that of Field Marshal von Paulus who has assumed the supreme command over the East German armed forces . . ."

LIKE OLD TIMES

"The General Motors Corporation announced yesterday that it had signed an agreement with Henschel & Sohn G.m.b.H. of Kassel, Germany, for the manufacture of Diesel locomotives. The agreement provides for collaboration in the design, manufacture and marketing of Diesel locomotives of standard types. The locomotives will be built in Henschel & Sohn's Kassel plant. . . ." (N. Y. Times 10-27-53.)

THIRTEEN HOURS WORK A DAY

" 'It is hard to believe that after losing two wars we should be living so well today.'

"The living room in Hans Sauer's home is new, cheerful and shiny clean. The furniture gleams with high polish. Through the window, he can see his garden, blazing with purple and yellow flowers. He said again, 'it is hard to believe.'

"Hans Sauer is a German bricklayer. He is short and hard-muscled. He is 52, and his working day, he says, averages about 13 hours, although he is paid for only the usual eight. . . .

"Yet, today, he says, 'we are living better than we were before the war.' " (AP Dispatch 10-12-53.)

THE TWO DANGERS

"Up to the present the British Governments, both Laborite and Conservative, have been guided in their thinking on Germany by United States policy. . . .

" 'I think we are about at the point at which we must keep the Russian danger in mind without losing sight of the fact that there has been a German danger in the past and may well be one again,' one veteran diplomat observer said."

(Drew Middleton in the N. Y. Times 9-18-53.)

A SYMPOSIUM

"In June, the Protestant Bishop of Lower Saxony, Dr. Hanns Lilje, invited a number of Germans to a four days' symposium on 'Hitler,' to be held in the new Protestant Academy at Loccum near Hanover. The 120 writers and journalists who accepted the invitation included active members of the anti-Hitler resistance, quiet opponents, refugees and Nazi fellow-travellers.

"Dr. Lilje was complimented on his 'courage and bold initiative in making such a risky problem the theme of his conference.' Why risky? one might ask, feeling somewhat uneasy. Is it still, or again, risky to speak the truth about Hitler in Germany? One report gave a glimpse of the post-war German mind by stating the bishop's reasons; he had 'felt alarmed at the anti-democratic resentments growing among the Germans,' which, it was said, were also noticeable in the discussions, when adopting the stratagem successfully used by Hitler's propagandists both inside and, even more, outside Germany, several speakers sought to gloss over the barbarism of Nazidom by stressing its 'social achievements.'

"The meeting dealt with three problems: 'How was it possible for Hitlerism to conquer our nation? Why was any resistance against it unsuccessful? What lessons can we draw from our experience?'

"One of the main speakers was Walter Goerlitz, joint author of a recent Hitler biography tainted by much of that German nationalism which led straight into Nazism . . .

"Professor Gerhard Ritter, editor of 'Hitler's Table Talk,' thought the Nazi success was assured by 'the Germans' impatient longing for national unity, and for overcoming the class war,' also by the burden of reparations . . .

"One Gerhard Günther saw in Hitler 'the liquidator of the 19th Century'; he asserted that 'man wants not to be free but to live in order'—a very German distinction indeed.

"Hans Zehrer, notorious already in the late 1920s when he worked for the nationalist journal Die Tat told the gathering that 'Hitler acquired power by rights because he alone felt a historic mission in which he fanatically believed . . .'

". . . a view very much like Zehrer's was put forward by a theologian, Professor Hentrich, who asserted that 'Hitler was an instrument of God sent for a purpose which we are unable to grasp and understand . . ."

(From the Wiener Library Bulletin, London, 8-53.)

WHAT'S IN A NAME

"The Ludendorff Publishing House (Munich) which puts out some of the most incendiary anti-Semitic propaganda issued in Germany today, has changed its name to the 'Mondial Publishing House.' Observers believe that the shift in nomenclature is due to an effort to forestall measures which the Bavarian Government may have been preparing so as to curb the Jew-baiting excesses of the neo-pagan Ludendorff movement." What Should Be Known About the So-Called European Army

By BERNARD LAVERGNE

(Professor, at the Faculté de Droit de Paris)

The treaty has not yet been ratified by the various States, and Germany is already preparing to break it in a most dangerous manner. I have just learned from a reliable source that everything is ready: cadres, men and material, to form in about three months' time, homogenous Army Corps (and not Divisions) in contempt of the treaty. The United States is in agreement with Germany to violate the proposed treaty. The secret accords of the treaty (any well-informed person knows that they exist, and I myself know two high personalities who have had them in hand) provide that after three years Germany will have not TWELVE, but TWENTY-FOUR Divisions. . . .

If Germany Withdraws

One should know not only what the European Army will do if Russia attacks, but also what the United States and Great Britain will do IF GERMANY ONE DAY SECEDES AND WITHDRAWS HER TROOPS FROM THE EUROPEAN ARMY, OR IF GERMANY SHOULD LAUNCH AN AGGRESSION AGAINST RUSSIA. London and Washington have refused to comment on these crucial points, which compels one to say that while the structure of the European Army is set up, it is not clear by what principles of action it will be guided. . . .

The United States and Europe must rearm moderately. But it is necessary to envisage also the eventuality that a strongly rearmed Germany in five or ten years hence . . . may attack Russia. What will we do in that case? To my knowledge, this problem has never been envisaged by our Government. If, to govern, is to provide against any possible eventuality, we must say that at least on this point our leaders don't govern at all.

Article 2 confirms the "exclusively defensive" character of the European Community and states that any armed aggression directed against any of the members in Europe will be considered an aggression directed against all the members.

Unfortunately, this assertion THAT THE PLAN IN QUESTION WILL HAVE ONLY DEFENSIVE CHARACTER, IS ONLY ACADEMIC; the participation of Germany changes its aspect completely.

Two years have gone by now since Chancellor Adenauer . . . admitted the following: "THE RETURN OF THE LOST PROVINCES BEYOND THE ODER-NEISSE LINE IS THE PRINCIPAL REASON GUIDING THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT TO FAVOR THE INTEGRATION AND ORGANIZATION OF THE EUROPEAN AND ATLANTIC POWERS PACT. The integration of a sovereign Germany in the Western Defense system with permissible military participation is the only sure and rapid means to recover our lost provinces." That is clear! One must be blind not to see that the intended Defense Community, wherein Germany would exercise hegemony, could only be an organization of diplomatic blackmail or of military aggression against the USSR. It is obvious that the Germans adhere to it only with this objective in mind! . . .

The Chancellor's Successors

"The recent meeting held in the auditorium of the New York Times, at which Mr. James Warburg, the eminent American banker who is of German origin, was the principal speaker, has created somewhat of a sensation and brought about, even in Germany itself, an undeniable feeling of uneasiness. Although recognizing the integrity of Dr. Adenauer, Mr. Warburg clearly warned against the successors of the present Chancellor of whom he says that they constitute no guarantee that Germany would not involve the Allies in a war with Russia to reconquer the East-German territories or —and this might be more likely according to the speaker— that she would attempt to arrive at the same result by betraying the Western Powers and making common cause with the Soviet Union."

Will a New German-Soviet Pact Be Consummated?

If the facts in question were not referring to extremely grave events, one could write that the exchange of diplomatic notes between the East and West is a perfect burlesque number. Never before in history have the Chancelleries kept up such a dialogue of deaf men. Since the famous conference at th Palais Rose, Moscow is repeating that the U. S. S. R. will discuss the matter of co-existence only at the time when the project of German Rearmament will have been abandoned. On their side, the Western Powers assert that they made the decision already to examine the possibilities of co-existence after the Rearmament of Germany. As we have stated on several occasions the Allies, in consulting Chancellor ADENAUER each time they send a letter to Moscow, and in authorizing him to modify its contents, are in effect convincing the Kremlin that the Chief of the Bonn Government is in reality "the Strong Man" of the West, and that it becomes evident and expedient that one should negotiate with this arbiter of the rival East-West Powers.

Since all of the diplomatic play in Washington, Paris and London consists in "pleasing ADENAUER," Moscow can easily triumph in this field, since the U. S. S. R. holds the treasure which ADENAUER covets, and that it is possible to give him in exchange for a reversal in alliances.

It is high time that this aspect of the German question be brought into the open, as it identifies itself unpleasantly with the diplomatic maneuvers of Hitler in the years 1937-1938, and which resulted in the German-Soviet Pact, after the "Entente Cordiale" had accepted the ANSCHLUSS, the Sudetenland Affair, the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia, the annexation of MEMEL.

It is true, ADENAUER has not yet come to the question of annexation of territory, but he has diplomatically monopolized the victory of the Allies, since there remains nothing of the Defeat of Germany in 1945.

German Realities—1954

U. S. policy makers contend that a powerful remilitarized Germany would be a reliable and indispensible bulwark against the aggressive forces of Communism led by Soviet Russia. It was with this in mind that the Society submitted to members of Congress, during the spring of 1953, its analysis of the German problem in relationship to Western Europe and Soviet Russia. In the introduction to our analysis it was stated:

". . . However great Germany's economic and military potential may be, it does not follow that Germany's real interests are commensurate with ours or those of our Western allies. A country no matter how strong, cannot be a trustworthy and effective ally if its interests are basically opposed to the other members of the proposed alliance. The effective and enduring strength of any coalition must ultimately rest on a common heritage and a harmony of interests shared by the major participants. Allies must be reckoned in terms of reasonably certain performance—not in terms of wishful thinking.

"A realistic assessment of the qualities of the proposed major ally—in this case Germany—is essential in determining whether Germany will serve the Western alliance or disintegrate the cohesiveness of the West . . ."

The memorandum submitted below provides additional evidence in support of our original appraisal.

I.
GERMAN-SOVIET ECONOMIC RELATIONS

In our analysis we cited facts to show that Germany's "natural economic ties are with Russia and the East." It was further stated that the rapid rebuilding of Germany's industrial potential increased the pressure for the resumption of these economic ties. Additional information has now come to light lending further support to this view:

(a) The Christian Science Monitor (4-17-54) carried a report revealing that three months after the Contractual Agreement with Bonn had been drawn up, a secret conference was held in Copenhagen in August 1952 between authoritative representatives of German business and delegates representing Soviety Deputy Prime Minister Anastas Mikoyan. "The conference was called at West German initiative with the knowledge of the West German Government, presumably Chancellor Adenauer himself." This sensational disclosure was made by Foreign Minister Molotov during the Berlin Conference. As far as we know, Molotov's revelation did not appear in the American press until it was reported in the Christian Science Monitor. According to the C. S. M. correspondent "talks between Moscow and Bonn, or rather Düsseldorf, the economic center of the Ruhr, have been going on for about three years."

In this connection the United Press (10-14-53) reported that West German businessmen had closed their first postwar foreign trade deal with Russia "with the blessings of the West German government at Bonn." The U. P. reported, "West German financial experts insist if the cold war were ended, West German trade with the Soviet bloc would jump up a billion dollars in 12 months."

(b) In an interview with the magazine World (May 1954) West Germany's leading industrialist and convicted war criminal Alfred Krupp said:

"In the long run West Germany cannot continue her economic advancement without being reunited with East Germany, because both parts of Germany must be considered an organic whole. An expansion of trade volume (with East Germany and Soviet-bloc countries) would without doubt contribute considerably to a solution of West Germany's export problems."

(c) Hitler's financial adviser and accused war criminal

Hjalmar Schacht, now a private banker in Düsseldorf, told Fortune Magazine (April 1954): "Germany's future? Trade with the East. Wonderful market, Russia . . ."

(d) There is a close similarity between the views expressed by Krupp and Schacht on the one hand and those of Chancellor Adenauer. Thus, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (7-7-53) reported the Chancellor as stating that it was to Russia's interest to resume friendship with Germany. In this connection he noted:

"Already today the states of the European Schumann Plan have formed a market of 157 million people. Thus, these countries are for the Russian economy a highly interesting trading partner. The German and Russian economies once before complemented each other in a magnificent way. The economy of an integrated Europe including Germany could offer even more. The greater the economic meshing (between Western Europe and Russia), the greater the political security."

(e) The executives of one of Germany's largest shipbuilding companies, the Howaldt Works of Kiel, recently went to Moscow to negotiate with Kremlin authorities for the construction of ships with a total estimated value of 28 million dollars.

(f) The Associated Press (6-2-54) reported that the first West German trade delegation to Russia since the end of the war would leave for Moscow shortly. Representatives from Germany's leading industrial, trade, and banking circles will negotiate with the Russians for the "greatest possible volume of trade."

II.

GERMANY'S ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH COMMUNIST CHINA

Trade with Communist China is regarded as vital to Germany's interests. The importance of the China market is discussed frequently in the German newspapers and financial journals. Thus, according to "Handelsblatt," the leading economic journal in the industrial Ruhr, many German businessmen view the China mainland as "the greatest future market in the world" (New York Herald Tribune 3/21/54). The following newspaper items highlight the growing importance of Germany's trade with Communist China:

(a) The Associated Press (2-5-54) reported that Red China's trade delegation located in East Berlin "was swamped with offers from West German businessmen seeking to trade with China."

(b) The Associated Press (4-2-54) reported that West German exports to Communist China have increased ninefold in the last year. "The main German exports to China are iron goods, machinery, electrical goods, high precision and optical instruments, and pharmaceutical products . . ."

(c) It has been reported that "ten thousand West German firms registered with East German Chamber of Commerce, hoped to do at least 40 million dollars worth of business with China." (New York Post 4-5-54)

(d) During the Geneva Conference, a group of leading German businessmen were scheduled to meet with Lei Jenmin, Communist China's Vice-Minister for Foreign Trade. According to the New York Herald Tribune (June 5, 1954) "the West German group is coming with the knowledge of the Adenauer government . . ."

III.

POLITICAL RELATIONS BETWEEN GERMANY AND THE SOVIET BLOC

The resurgence of Germany's economic dealings with the Communist East has prompted prominent German leaders to suggest closer political ties. It will be recalled that the consummation of the notorious Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939 had been preceded by marked reactivation of trade between Russia and Germany:

(a) While German businessmen were negotiating their first postwar trade agreement with the Soviets in October 1953, Chancellor Adenauer granted an interview to the United Press in which he stated: "If the Soviet Union desires a special one (separate political agreement) with Germany, let them have one."

(b) Karl G. Pfleiderer, a leading member of the conservative Free Democratic Party which is part of Chancellor Adenauer's governmental coalition, has publicly advocated diplomatic ties with the Soviet bloc. In a speech in the Bonn parliament he urged that West Germany end its isolation from the part of the world that extends "from Warsaw, Prague, Budapest, Sophia and Bucharest through Moscow to Peking in the Far East."

(c) This proposal received strong support as reflected in a statement by West Germany's leading conservative newspaper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. This paper stated in part: "It lies in the nature of (West German) 'independence' and 'equal rights' that our Foreign Ministry cannot in the long run be prevented from sending representatives to the Eastern States." (New York Herald Tribune 4-12-54)

The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung was repeating a view which it held as early as April 1, 1950, when it said:

"Germany was always the bridge between the East and the West. . . . The Allies are not able to come to an accord with the Russians. . . . What is then more natural than for us to say in view of the present pressure: If until now, within the framework of world events, the others were not able to make an intelligent agreement, then it is our duty finally to arouse ourselves in order to obtain at least an economic understanding. . . .

"In doing so we will not turn to the little bosses of the Eastern Zone but directly to the big boss in Moscow. There is where decisions are being made."

(d) Chancellor Adenauer himself told the press in Hamburg (A. P. 5-17-53) that diplomatic relations between West Germany and the Soviet Union "might be established in the not too far future." When asked to elaborate he replied, "one should not make an excursion into high politics."

(e) The New York Times (June 5, 6, 1954) reported important speeches by Hans Luther and Heinrich Bruening, former German Chancellors, before the powerful Ruhr industrialists at their exclusive Rhein-Ruhr Club. Both speakers called for the scrapping of the so-called pro-Western policy, a rapprochement with Russia and the restoration of the Stresemann strategy, i.e., the playing off of the East and the West against each other so as to strengthen Germany's world position.

IV.
UNDEMOCRATIC TRENDS IN GERMANY TODAY

In our analysis it was stated that "extreme nationalism and adherence to authoritarian concepts are controlling factors in German public opinion." It was also noted that traditional German political ideology is a much more logical ally of Russian Communism than of Western Democracy. In this connection there has been a general upsurge of extreme nationalism and militaristic propaganda. This ominous development is partially reflected in the widespread campaign to free Germany's war criminals, to absolve Germany's war guilt and to glorify German militarism. Moreover, it has been observed that key figures in Germany's political life have aided and abetted this campaign.

(a) The Associated Press (3-14-54) reported that at the annual convention of the so-called German Soldiers Union representing one hundred thousand former members of Hitler's Wehrmacht, a resolution was unanimously passed demanding freedom for the "still imprisoned innocent German soldiers." The meeting was addressed by leading German figures. Hermann Ehlers, President of the German Bundestag, told his audience: "We German soldiers have the right to be shown the same respect that is given abroad to those who have done their duty like us." Former Admiral Gottfried Hansen denounced the Allies for imprisoning these war criminals. Franz Josef Strauss, a member of Chancellor Adenauer's cabinet, told the cheering audience that there must be "continuity" of tradition between German soldiers of World War II and the German soldiers of the future."

(b) The Christian Science Monitor (3-5-54) reported that the Germans intended "to honor Nazi war criminals." Mention was made of officials of the town of Hamelin in Germany who announced that they would exhume the bodies of 91 executed Nazi war criminals including the leaders of the Belsen concentration camp. The German authorities said that these criminals would be given "a worthy final resting place" in the city cemetery. According to the Christian Science Monitor public sentiment "seems in favor of the transfer." One German newspaper referred to the Nazis as "alleged" war criminals.

(c) The development of extremist sentiment and activities is also indicated by the deliberate campaign to arouse irredentism among the Germans.

(1) Old militaristic songs such as "We March Against England" and "Victoriously We Shall Defeat France" are being sung again at the meeting of German veterans.

(2) Sudeten Germans are encouraged to agitate for the seizure of a part of Czechoslovakia which had been handed over to Hitler on the basis of the Munich Pact. Theodor Oberlaender, Minister for Refugees in the Adenauer cabinet, has insisted on a solution of the so-called Sudeten German question "in the spirit of the. Munich Pact." (Reuters 11-6-53)

(3) Minister President Karl Arnold of the State of North Rhine-Westfalia has demanded the return of territories which are now part of Belgium and the Netherlands. (Associated Press 3-8-54)

(d) German justice has not been uneffected by the abovementioned undemocratic trends.

(1) In December 1953, the West German Supreme Court decided to reject an application from the Dutch for the extradition of a number of Dutch Nazi war criminals who had broken out of a Dutch prison and sought refuge in Germany. The decision of the court was based on a decree issued by Hitler in May 1943 granting German citizenship to foreigners who joined the SS.

(2) The Associated Press (3-31-54) reported that 20 former Nazi policemen who had admitted massacring 110 Jews in the Warsaw ghetto, were acquitted by a German court on the grounds that their "scant formal education" prevented these criminals from realizing "that they committed a misdeed." Some of the defendants are still in the police force in Dortmund and are eligible for promotions and pensions.

(e) The German press has also been adversely affected by these dangerous trends. It is a fact that important sections of the German press today are controlled by the very same elements who gave aid and comfort to Hitler and the Nazis. The following are examples:

(1) Giselher Wirsing, a ranking senior officer in the SS and an old friend of Ribbentrop, has been appointed "political adviser" to the editor of "Die Welt" which until a year ago was under British control. (New York Post, February '54)

(2) The former Nazi editor Zogelman is now chief editor of the German newspaper "Fortschritt" which speaks for big business interests in Düsseldorf.

(f) Propaganda and intrigue against the Western democracies are rising. Such notorious supporters of Hitler as Franz von Papen and Otto Skorzeny maintain close contact with the Nazi geopolitical center in Madrid for the purpose of facilitating the dissemination of anti-American and anti-democratic propaganda throughout the world. Herr Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's financial adviser and accused war criminal, has also been busy in bolstering Germany's interests abroad at the expense of the Western democracies. He has been particularly active in the Middle East where German militarists and businessmen help fan the fires of anti-Western sentiment. Simultaneously with these activities neo-Nazis are working hand-in-glove with Communist propagandists in Germany.

BONN - MOSCOW

(Stuttgarter Nachrichten)

These machinations were exposed at length in the Reporter magazine (4-13-54) under the title, "Germany: Where Fascism and Communism Meet."

(g) Anti-Allied sentiment within Germany is by no means confined to the "lunatic fringe" of the extreme right or extreme left. Thus, the leader of the Socialist-Democratic Party, Erich Ollenhauer, attacked the Allied High Commissioners alleging that they had made it "coldly and brutally clear to us that we have not such sovereignty as entitled us to decide upon such constitutional amendments." Dr. Thomas Dehler, chairman of the Free Democratic Party (part of the Adenauer coalition) declared, "every German must be pained at the thought that changes in our constitution still depend upon the will of the Allies." (Christian Science Monitor 4-26-54)

V.

FORMER NAZIS AND HITLER SUPPORTERS IN THE BOON GOVERMENT

There has been a marked influx of former Nazis in leading positions in the German government.

(a) Members of Chancellor Adenauer's cabinet who were Hitler supporters and Nazis are: Waldemar Kraft, Minister without Portfolio; Theodor Oberlaender, Minister for Refugees and Expellees; Gerhard Schroeder, Minister of Interior; Victor Emanuel Preusker, Housing Minister. The Nazi background of these persons was reported in the New York Times (4-17-54).

(b) The head of Dr. Adenauer's Chancellery is Hans Globke who was legal adviser to the Nazi minister of the interior in the Hitler regime. Dr. Globke helped write the official commentary on the Nuremberg racial laws.

(c) The counselor of the Bonn Ministry of Justice is Dr. Franz Massfeller who wrote the official commentary to the Hitlerite laws "for the protection of German blood and honor." He participated in the Wannsee Conference which was concerned among other things with the question of instituting compulsory sterilization.

(d) Former Nazis are infiltrating government departments to an alarming degree. A case in point is the Bonn Foreign Office where 66 per cent of its leading personnel, according to Chancellor Adenauer, are former Nazis and Ribbentrop diplomats.

VI.

GERMAN MILITARISM AND THE E. D. C.

It has been stated that a military contribution by Germany through the European Defense Community (EDC) is essential to the defense of the West against Communist aggression. However, in our 1953 analysis it was pointed out that the EDC would not be legally binding for a united Germany. Hence, in the event of German unification, the West will be confronted with a remilitarized, united Germany which can make alliances on its own terms and conditions. Certain aspects with regard to the proposal to remilitarize Germany deserve to be examined here:

(a) It has been publicly stated by leading German officials including Chancellor Adenauer, that the major costs for the rearming of Germany must be borne by the United States (statements by Chancellor Adenauer, Associated Press 12-6-52; U. S. News & World Report 12-26-53). On the other hand, the German finance minister has recently proposed a drastic reduction of the tax burden. For example, he has suggested that corporate taxes on undistributed income should be cut from a rate of 60 per cent to 45 per cent (Business Week 3-20-53). Commenting on these tax proposals, the financial editor of the New York Journal-American exclaimed: "Who won the war?", and further pointed out that taxes on U. S. business will top those obtaining in Germany (3-12-54).

(b) On June 22, 1953, the New York Times reported that Chancellor Adenauer "was giving serious consideration" to a proposal that former high officers of Hitler's Waffen SS or Elite Guard be permitted to serve in the proposed German army. This in spite of the fact that the Waffen SS was declared to be a criminal organization by the International Tribunal at Nuremberg. In reply to an inquiry relative to the employment of Nazis and members of Hitler's Waffen SS in the proposed German army, the U. S. State Department did not indicate opposition to the employment of such individuals per se.

(c) The granting of respectability to war criminals may be seen by the fact that a calendar distributed by the Deutsche Soldaten Zeitung (a newspaper published by German militarists), carried an article contributed by the Blank Office which is responsible for the rearming of Germany. This very same calendar had as its frontispiece "a flattering page portrait of the former Grand Admiral Erich Raeder, now serving a lifeterm in the Spandau prison at Berlin as one of the major military associates to Adolf Hitler. (New York Herald Tribune 12-9-54).

(d) The chief military adviser to Chancellor Adenauer, General Heusinger, has publicly eulogized the war criminal General Jodl hanged at Nuremberg. The State Department has not requested Heusinger's removal because it is satisfied that he is "reliable."

(e) The war criminal, former Fieldmarshal Albert Kesselring who was responsible for the massacre of Italians when he commanded the Nazi troops in Italy, was granted permission to tour an American airforce base in Germany. Kesselring is the head of the revived militaristic organization, the Stahlhelm, which actively collaborated with the Nazis before the war. (Associated Press 2-7-54)

> "For more than a year the United States has been exerting pressure for the ratification of EDC—and where has it led to? To an ever more ominous deterioration of the relations between France and Germany . . .
> ". . . If West Germany is rearmed in this climate of bad feeling which is now developing, the foundations of the Bonn government will be weakened severely. Americans must not deceive themselves as to the durability of the Adenauer regime . . . There is no clear certainty about the future of the coalition which supports Adenauer, or about the succession to that truly great man.
> "A German army—with Germany at odds with France and with offers from the Soviet Union—could not be relied upon to maintain Germany as a democratic republic or as an ally of the West. For the temptations would be tremendous."
> (Walter Lippmann in the Chicago Sun-Times, 4-1-54)

(f) The efforts to accord unwarranted lenient treatment to German war criminals is indicated by their premature release by clemency boards in which the Germans themselves participate. Though the release of these war criminals is a matter of great public concern, the Allied authorities decided to cease publication of the names and the reasons for granting clemency. The Allies, prodded on by Chancellor Adenauer, have sought reconsideration of the status of the major war criminals located in the Spandau prison in Berlin. The New York Times (4-6-54) commenting on this action, stated:

". . . The decision to reconsider the status of these men culminates a long series of actions by the western powers to ameliorate the condition of German war criminals. The moves have been made in response to German pleas for clemency and to clear the way for West German participation in the European Defence Community."

VII.

RECARTELIZATION IN GERMANY

It is a matter of record that the German cartels and trusts played a notorious role in undermining normal commercial relationships among the nations and in helping Germany to secretly rearm after World War I. Today, in spite of Allied laws and regulations, the German cartels and trusts are reviving.

(a) Wall Street Journal (8-27-53) carried a special report declaring that German trade and industry "are returning to their traditional prewar patterns of cartels and trusts."

(b) German heavy industry is in the forefront of the movement to revive the prewar steel and coal cartels of Europe. By dominating these cartels prior to World War II, the Germans were able to exercise a decisive influence on the economies of her future victims.

(c) The New York Times (4-13-54) reported that the Ruhr coal and steel industrialists are campaigning "to scuttle" the Schuman Plan organization. The German industrialists are beginning to fear that the Schuman Plan organization may thwart their efforts to dominate Western Europe. As reported by the New York Herald Tribune (4-9-54), the Germans regard themselves as "being dominant among the partners in industrial power but as having only a limited ability to influence the group's (Schuman Plan organization) policies." The German cartelists' resentment toward the Schuman Plan organization as a roadblock to their ambitions was also reported in the U. S. News & World Report (4-30-54) and in the New York Times (5-4-54).

(d) Though the Allies adopted policies which were designed to break up the cartels and giant monopolies, effective implementation has not been achieved in many important cases. Now the responsibility has been turned over to the Germans and they are in the process of passing phony legislation on the subject.

VIII.

CONSEQUENCES OF GERMANY'S RESURGENT POWER

(a) The authoritarian and aggressive spirit is on the march again. Postwar moods of defeatism and ingratiation, often mistaken as signs of progress toward democracy, have been replaced by bluster and arrogance. Important sections of the German press reflect this ominous trend. Thus, there have been frequent warnings in German newspapers to the effect that unless Germany has its way, it will not collaborate with the West.

The Hamburger Anzeiger demands that the Bonn government "make it clear to the western powers much more energetically than before, that the intensity of our friendship for them will depend on the intensity of their efforts to solve the German problem." (Quoted in Paris edition of the New York Herald Tribune 3-1-54)

The Rheinische Post (12-8-53) which is a mouthpiece of Chancellor Adenauer's party, warned the West that unless the French become more tractable, Germany may support the Tauroggen policy. Tauroggen refers to the time when the Germans, in a sudden turnabout, allied themselves with the Russians to defeat Napoleon.

Under these circumstances it is a source of wonderment that German technicians have been permitted to work on "the U. S. Army's new top secret 200 mm atomic cannon in West Germany." (Associated Press 2-28-54)

(b) It is no coincidence that the opposition to European unity marked by divisions among the Western Allies and domestic strife, has grown in direct proportion to the increasing efforts of the U. S. policy makers to place Germany on the pedestal of power. European unity is being destroyed on the rock of Germany's resurgence. Yet, our policy makers persist in expending time, effort, and money trying to reconcile the irreconcilable.

Conclusion

Never before in our history has the United States based so much of its policy in Europe on a people who have time and again demonstrated their unreliability and untrustworthiness. The challenge of Communist expansion can be overcome through the coalition of freedom loving peoples who share common interests and purposes. That such a coalition is practical and necessary goes without saying, but the present policy of expediency can only end in disaster.

Dulles: "Hop in, Marianne, Dr. Adenauer's getting impatient."

European Unity or German Hegemony?

Strasbourg — 1944

Believing that Germany could not win the war, influential German industrialists met secretly at Strasbourg on August 10, 1944, to devise postwar strategy. Representatives of such powerful interests as Krupp, Roechling and Brown-Boveri who attended, were told that "contacts and alliances with foreign firms" must be established as rapidly as possible. The Nazi Government promised to "allocate large sums to the industrialists so that each could establish a secure postwar foundation in foreign countries." It was further decided that "existing financial reserves in foreign countries must be placed at the disposal of the Party so that a strong German Empire can be created after the defeat."

Strasbourg — 1952

Eight years following this meeting another conference took place in Strasbourg under the auspices of the Council of Europe. This was not strictly a German get-together. On the contrary, there were representatives from most of the major Western European countries. However, the Germans led by Johannes Semmler, played a very prominent role in the working out of another "Strasbourg Plan" which could very well be employed to further the objectives of the 1944 Strasbourg meeting.

In this connection the background of Johannes Semmler is significant. He was well known to the Allied authorities during the early days of the occupation, chiefly because he had violently attacked the Western Allies for alleged looting of the German economy and urged his compatriots to oppose the occupation. Semmler denounced the United States as having deliberately attempted to starve the Germans. He declared that the German iron industry was "a hundred percent British institution." He added that the Germans "will have to get the British out of the habit of pilfering the German economy after having done so for three years. . . ." The French did not escape Herr Semmler's notice and they too were accused of "robbing" the Germans.

Allied authorities immediately retorted to Semmler's blasts and described him as an "unmitigated liar." The New York Times (2-3-48) reported that Semmler's speech "might have been written in Belgrade by the Communist Information Bureau, so clearly did it follow the Communist line." Yet, it should be noted that Semmler is an influential member of Chancellor Adenauer's party.

Regarding Semmler's activities during the Nazi regime, the New York Times (1-28-49) reported that his record was one of the closest collaboration with the Nazis and that he worked "at high financial levels in the 'trusteeship' of properties seized by the Nazis in Upper Silesia, France and Austria." Besides his important contributions on behalf of the Nazi cause, Semmler was a "heavy investor of Brown-Boveri." (New York Times 1-15-48) Thus, the interests of Brown-Boveri were not only represented in the secret Strasbourg meeting of August 1944, but were also present at Strasbourg in 1952.

Germany's Role in the Strasbourg Plan

The Strasbourg Plan, prepared with the influential assistance of Herr Semmler, is in essence an attempt to create a Third Power Bloc. It could, therefore, fit in very nicely with the ideas of the geopolitical master minds who believe that Germany must create and control a Third Force which would dominate Europe and be utilized if necessary, against the interests and security of the United States.

In the introduction to the plan it is stated that the chief "problem is to what extent can Europe and the countries connected with it form a third economic group standing midway between the Communist and the dollar areas and be able, by closer economic co-operation and combined effort, to maintain a balanced trade with them."

The "European Review" (February '54) which speaks for the Strasbourg Plan, is more candid. "The real question is how this inevitable discrimination against dollar goods by the non-dollar world is to be achieved." To further implement this objective, the Plan advocates the creation of preferential tariffs between Western Europe and the British Commonwealth which would, in the last analysis, work toward isolating the United States economically.

With regard to investments, the Plan states that attention should be drawn "to those European countries who have no overseas political responsibilities and examine what contributions they can make to the development of Africa. . . .

"A country like Germany would seem in a special position to contribute in kind. It is well known that the pattern of its export trade is based on capital goods such as tractors, cranes, bridges, dredges, machine tools, etc., which are particularly needed for the development of new countries. It can even be said that the discovery of markets for its capital goods' industries is an absolute necessity for Germany, and, if we leave out of account political considerations which are not within our province, it should be stressed here that this equipment of new countries overseas is the only possible alternative which German industry possesses to the equipment of countries in the Soviet sphere of influence, which were in the past an important market for German industry. . . ."

There is no question that its authors contemplate that every consideration and advantage be afforded the Germans to penetrate the territories and possessions of other Western European countries. Failure to give the Germans Carte Blanche in this respect would force them to turn to the Russians. That this is sheer blackmail is self evident despite the rather colorless language employed by the planners.

Africa

In elaborating on the plan, Herr Semmler once again emphasizes "the economic potential of the area under consideration" which is not "inferior to the economic power of the United States or the Soviet Bloc." In this connection, of major concern to Herr Semmler is the importance of exploiting the African continent. Without identifying the Western European countries which have no colonies, Mr. Semmler alleged that they could be of great help in developing that region. He spoke about the scientists and technical resources as well as surplus population that could be sent to this region. Mr. Semmler said that the Germans were willing to help but this could only come about if "restrictions" with respect to Germany's activities in this area were abolished.

One region in Africa which was very dear to the heart of Herr Semmler, is the Belgian Congo. Last year, SS Colonel Skorzeny, one of Hitler's trusted henchmen, paid a visit to the Congo where he surveyed the possibilities of German investments. About the same time, the German Minister of Economics Erhard conferred with the Belgian Minister of Colonies, M. Dequae, concerning a detailed plan for German-Belgian cooperation in the Congo. This German plan contemplates the sending of German equipment and technicians to develop the natural resources in the region. There is a great need for capital as well as technicians to further develop the resources of the Congo and the Germans hope to take advantage of this situation. Dr. Semmler has played a most important role in this project. Moreover, he was behind Dr. Erhard's efforts to obtain the Belgian Government's cooperation.

The German bait may be summed up as follows: "We don't want to acquire any shares in your companies (Belgian). All we want is to sell you our technicians, knowledge and ability."

It appears that the ringleader of the Belgian syndicate is the Société Générale. This organization, which controls the most important mining companies in the Congo, collaborated with the Germans during World War II. Consequently, it may be expected to work hard for the acceptance of the German plan. In this connection, it has been said that M. Dequae himself is extremely pro-German.

Herr Semmler's remarks on Africa impressed many who attended the conference. One member quoted approvingly Anton Zischka who has been a leading spokesman for German imperialism in Africa for many years. Another German, Herr Birkelbach, said, "Why not discuss the possibility of having the German contribution to the defense of the West not in the shape of armed forces but, as an act of European solidarity, toward undeveloped territories." Then he spelled out what the Germans could do. "Through the agency of a European Investment Bank, and without receiving any direct property rights in the respective areas, Germany, instead of arming divisions, could put part of its productive capacity at the disposal of the defence of the West in this broader sense. . . . I propose that Germany should take a share in the armament burden by means of an overseas development program in the form of action by the European Community which would be administered by a European Investment Bank."

It follows from this rather quaint proposition that, if the Germans get their way, their objectives may be attained within the framework of the Strasbourg Plan.

Just about the time that the Strasbourg Plan was published, the press carried reports of increasing German penetration in North Africa. The New York Herald Tribune (9-7-52) observed "that this newest German move into North Africa constitutes a serious threat to United States exports as well as the American investors." In the forefront of this German drive, according to the Herald Tribune, is a "top German expert on North Africa," Johannes Semmler.

The Meeting At Westminster

The Strasbourg Plan has fired the imagination of many well intentioned persons in Western Europe. It has raised the hopes of European unity which in itself is, of course, an excellent idea. But many of these people seem to forget that the German idea of unity is not exactly similar to the one held by their neighbors. Yet, the skillful handling of the Strasbourg Plan by Herr Semmler created a most favorable impression. As a result, 200 representatives from various countries convened at Westminster in February of this year to re-affirm the basic purposes of the Plan.

The London Economist noted, however, that of the eight massive reports submitted for preliminary reading at the Westminster Conference, none were written by representatives of Commonwealth countries. Furthermore, out of 218 delegates only 15 (excluding the U. K.) were members of the Commonwealth. In short, the representation as well as much of the action came from European countries. The German representatives appeared to have played the leading part. Once again Herr Semmler was prominent in the deliberations, particularly with respect to the drawing up of investment proposals based on the original Strasbourg Plan. The United States was singled out as "a grave source of general instability." This led to the conclusion that "Europe and the Commonwealth compose a market large enough and stable enough to have a world influence comparable to that of the United States and the U. S. S. R." It was not even necessary to read between the lines to conclude that the prime target at Westminster was the United States and that the German delegation orchestrated all of the moves.

The Looters Made Respectable

Symbolic of the implications of the meeting was the fact that its chairman was Hermann J. Abs. Herr Abs should be known to readers of PREVENT WORLD WAR III. He was one of Hitler's chief paymasters and, as head of the Deutsche Bank, directed the looting of German occupied Europe. For his criminal activities U. S. authorities had recommended that he be apprehended and prosecuted. He escaped punishment. However, when he launched on a "good will" mission to the United States in 1951, he was publicly exposed by Senator Gillette and had to return prematurely to the Fatherland.

Other members of the German delegation at Westminster read like a list from Rogues Gallery: among them, Heinrich Kost, Karl Albrecht, Hans Gunther Sohl, Dr. Gunther Henle. These men were also instrumental in providing the sinews for Hitler's war making power. Yet, the "European Review" (February 1954) reported, "All were impressed by the able and charming chairmanship of Herr Hermann Abs. Men like him are helping to build a better Germany and a finer Europe." If a "finer Europe" and a "better Germany" are going to be created by the likes of an Abs, a Semmler, or a Kost, then why in heaven's name was it necessary to oppose Hitler in the first place? Is there any essential difference between the aims of Abs and of Hitler? As mentioned above, European Unity is a wonderful objective and we have no doubt that the majority of non-German delegates at Westminster are striving to secure the welfare of Europe. But they must be made aware of the German Trojan Horse. They must be made aware of the Pan-German dream which did not die with Hitler. Ten years ago the Abs, the Semmlers, etc., paid Hitler to carry out the hopes of Pan-Germanism. He failed. Today they pay lipservice to the European Movement.

Echoes of Pan-German Propaganda

Generally speaking it appears that the Germans were disappointed as to the outcome of the Berlin Conference last February. Yet, they must have derived much satisfaction from the breast beating spectacle put on by the chief protagonists Messrs. Dulles and Molotov who vied heatedly for their favor.

The Dulles-Molotov Theory

It seems that in each successive East-West Conference this rivalry becomes more desperate—and more unprincipled. Thus, at Berlin Dulles and Molotov tried to atone for "sins" committed against Germany. The greatest "transgression" of all was to impose upon a "helpless" people the "iniquitous" Treaty of Versailles. For this, the Allies are officially branded as having sowed the seeds of World War II. In Mr. Molotov's words:

". . . The insolvency and shortsightedness of the authors of the Versailles Treaty soon became apparent. Far from guaranteeing the security of Europe, the Versailles Treaty was one of the basic contributing factors to the second world war. That was largely due to the fact that it was an oppressive treaty as far as Germany was concerned, that it was detested by the German people and was, therefore, doomed to inevitable and ignominious failure."

Secretary Dulles was just as vehement in his denunciation of the Treaty.

"War," he stated, "has constantly bred war because with rare exceptions the victors of war have been so animated by a spirit of vengeance and hatred that they have been blinded and have themselves unwittingly become the cause of new war."

The Nazis Said It, Too

Following this generalization, our Secretary of State declared that the Treaty of Versailles was marked by a spirit of "vengeance and hatred" and that Germany was the victim of "humiliating discriminations" and "restrictions." He further stated that the "system of Versailles was "bankrupt" and had "bred war."

To the Germans, the Dulles-Molotov version of history is nothing new. Indeed, Hitler and the Nazis rode to power on the very same theme. Even on the eve of World War II the Nazis continued their diatribes against this Treaty. Speaking on the Day of the Luftwaffe (3-1-38) Marshal Goering shouted:

". . . The chains of Versailles and the cowardly parliamentary system had destroyed the last remnants of Germany's fighting spirit and buried every hope of Germany's ever again becoming a strong power in the world."

Approximately one year later Goering's Luftwaffe was raining its bombs on Poland and Holland.

Goering's fulminations against Versailles, supported by Germans of all political colorations, has now been given the stamp of respectability. Who knows, but at the next conference, the chief negotiators may propose that an official apology be extended to the Germans for the Nuremberg war crimes trials!

The Issues Involved

We do not wish to imply that the Versailles Treaty was a perfect instrument. However, the attacks against it have been a favorite propaganda weapon of German militarists, Pan-Germans and assorted totalitarian elements within Germany.

That the Soviet propaganda machine is unscrupulous goes without saying. That it will, if need be, echo the line of German militarism can be expected. We were perplexed and disturbed, however, that our Secretary of State should join Mr. Molotov in this dubious project. Believing that the best kind of propaganda must rest on facts and not the distortion of facts, we wrote to the Secretary of State a detailed letter wherein we challenged, point by point, his interpretation of the causes leading to World War II. Unfortunately, Mr. Dulles did not reply. Yet, the issues involved can be crucial. In a very real sense, the character of a future peace treaty for Germany will be influenced by the Western Allies' views on the nature of the treatment of Germany after World War I. To set the record clear in this respect may help us in avoiding the illusions and errors of the past. It is in this connection, therefore, that we publish below the main points we made in our letter to Secretary Dulles:

Vengeance and Hatred?

Was the Treaty of Versailles really marked with the spirit of vengeance and hatred?

Professor James T. Shotwell, one of the foremost authorities on this subject, writes in his book "What Germany Forgot," 1940:

"An examination of how the Treaty was actually made shows what a travesty of history it is to picture those who made it as a set of vindictive men intent only upon the ruin of the German people." (Page 84)

German Propaganda At Work

Dealing with German propaganda concerning the Treaty of Versailles, Professor Shotwell writes:

"In all the history of propaganda nothing outrivals the success of the German effort against the Treaty of Versailles." (Page 82)

In this connection Professor Shotwell further states:

"Germany, however, neither knew nor cared to know how the Treaty of Versailles came to be what it was. The easiest explanation was that the Allied statesmen, although nominally under Wilson's leadership, had been carried along by Clemenceau to a policy of postwar reprisal, the sole purpose of which was the destruction of Germany. This interpretation of what had happened was unquestioned by all Germans, and was taught in the schools to the coming generation who were to translate this belief into a denial of democracy and all that it stood for." (Page 89)

It is a notorious fact that this propaganda against the Versailles Treaty was not only used by all the Germans from the Communists to the Nazis for their own nefarious aims, but it was also employed by the international Communist movement seeking to discredit the Democratic West. According to Professor Shotwell, this cunning propaganda had a significant result:

". . . The Treaty of Versailles became by an almost miraculous paradox the instrument for saving German militarism by blinding the nation to the true nature of war when fought under the conditions of modern history and applied science. Everything could be blamed upon the peace terms." (Pages 3, 4)

Even many of our most astute students of international affairs were taken in by the German propaganda against the Treaty of Versailles. Writing in his column on May 16, 1944, Mr. Walter Lippmann admitted that he too had been a victim of "popular fables, quite contrary to the historic record about how the last war ended."

The German Economy Under Versailles

Implicit in Secretary Dulles' strictures against the Treaty of Versailles is the charge that Germany's economic life had been gutted by the Treaty. However, Professor Shotwell writes:

"Whatever we think of the financial and economic clauses of the Treaty of Versailles, by the end of the first decade after the war, in 1928, Germany was apparently relatively about as well off as its former enemies." (Page 106)

Statistical evidence shows a tremendous upsurge of German production:

National Index Number of Industrial Production

Year	Great Britain	United States	Germany
1925	100	100	100
1929	113	114	122

Compared with 1923, the production of steel ingots had risen in 1929 as follows:

Germany	Great Britain	France
158%	13%	83%

The tremendous industrial plant which Germany built up while she was "burdened" by the "Diktat of Versailles" was characterized by Fritz Thyssen in his book "I Paid Hitler" as follows:

". . . Germany after 1918 was overindustrialized. This was the logical consequence of the development which had taken place since 1870 . . ." (Page 63)

By 1928, according to the German economist K. F. Bieligk, the productive capacity of the main branches of German industry was between 30-40 per cent greater than in 1913. He further observes that the "enormous investments of capital enabled German industrialists to build up the most modern productive apparatus in the world."

The industrial strength of Germany was reflected in the upsurge of her export:

Percentage Shares in World Exports

Year	Germany	Great Britain	United States	France
1925	7.3	12.3	15.9	7.3
1931	12.1	9.4	12.6	6.3

The enormous increase in her exports under the so-called bankrupt Versailles system was reflected in Germany's National Income and Gold Reserves: In 1924 the National Income was 45,700 million marks; by 1929 it had risen to 76,098 million marks. Gold Reserves of the Reichsbank by the end of 1924 were 818.7 million marks, by 1930 it had risen to 2,281.7 million marks.

The Reparations Fraud

It has been alleged that the Reparation Clauses of the Treaty of Versailles had a deleterious effect on Germany. However, it has been estimated that from November 1924 to June 1932 Germany paid about 10,000 million marks in reparations. In the same period her national income totalled about 564,260 million marks. Therefore, reparation payments amounted to approximately 1.7 per cent of her income over this period.

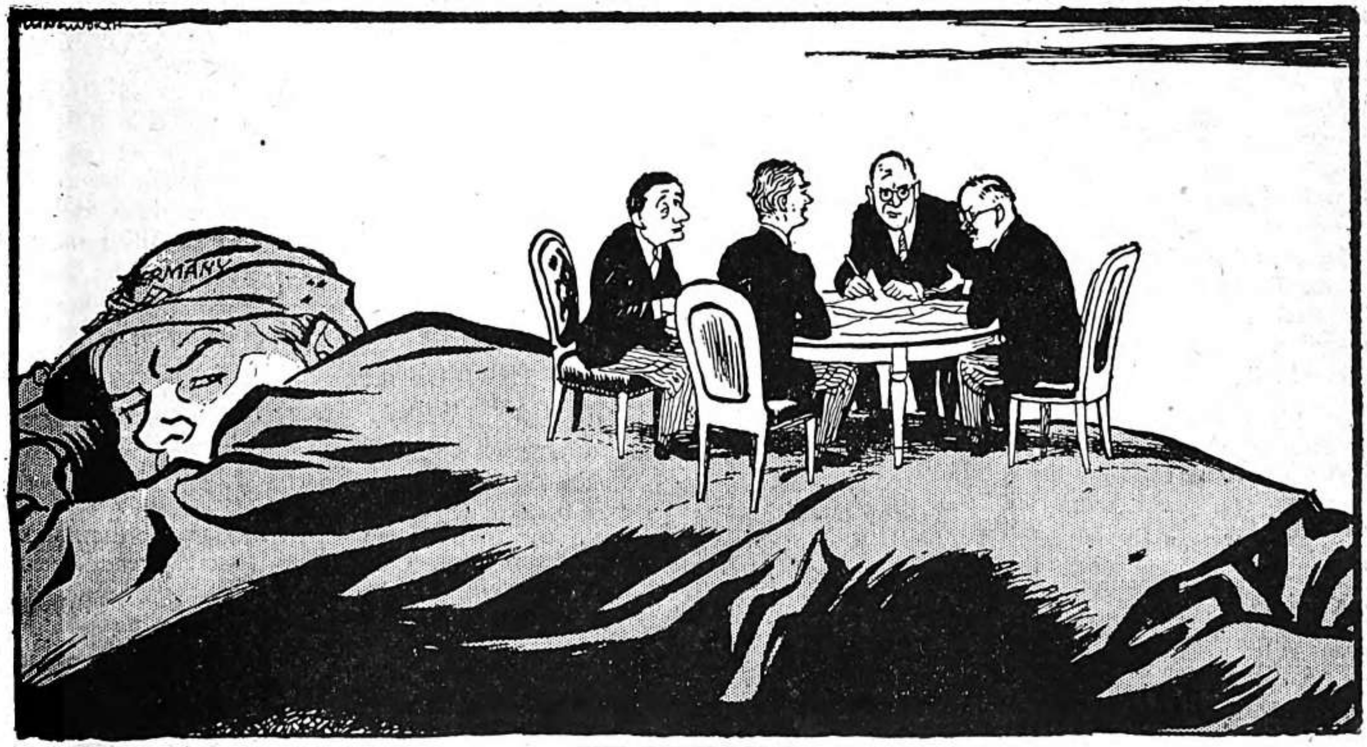
The economist Carl T. Schmidt, discussing German reparations in his book "German Business Cycles 1924-32," writes:

"The reparations burden was a special factor making for productive expansion . . ."

Thus, the reparations obligations acted as a spur to German industrial expansion. It is also a well known fact that Germany received much more from the Allies than she was supposed to pay to them. C. R. S. Harris in a report published by the Royal Institute of International Affairs, estimates that Germany borrowed from abroad three times as much as she paid in reparations.

Another Farce

The demilitarization clauses of the Versailles Treaty turned out to be a farce.



THE FIFTH MAN

Mr. Lippmann in his article mentioned above, states:

The Allies "did not even attempt to destroy German militarism. What they did was to take away part of the German army's obsolescent weapons and to demobilize it partially. But the core of the army which was the caste of the professional officers and non-coms, was left undisturbed. It was they who created the present German army and prepared the plans of mobilization and the strategy of this war."

This is confirmed by General John H. Morgan who served on the Interallied Control Commission in Germany after World War I. In his book "Assize of Arms" he describes in detail how the demilitarization clauses of the Versailles Treaty were in effect scrapped:

". . . This momentous decision of ours was never made public," Morgan continues, "and the world was left to imagine that this vital article of the disarmament section of the Treaty had been enforced and that Germany had been 'totally disarmed.' She never was. But the price exacted for signature of the ill-fated 'Pact' of Locarno (1925) was not only the withdrawal of the Control Commission and the evacuation of the Rhineland, whereby we surrendered the keys to the fortress. The moment we had made that surrender, she raised her price. She demanded silence. She got it."

"The fable of Germany's 'total disarmament' became an article of faith with the English pacifists and England was reproached by Mr. Lloyd George and others with not having laid down her arms and taken Germany to her bosom . . . It was the forebearance of the French and British Government, in dispensing with the execution of Articles 169 and 168 of the Treaty of Versailles, that was largely responsible for the swift and amazing renaissance of Germany's military power . . ."

Colonies

It has been stated that Germany suffered considerably by having been deprived of colonies under the Treaty of Versailles. Professor Shotwell in his book states:

"It is a deep-seated conviction of Nazi Germany that the recovery of the colonies is necessary for its economic life; yet, Germany's trade with its colonies in 1913 was less than one-half of one per cent of its total foreign trade. The colonies were yielding little, and their yield could not be materially increased without a vastly larger capital outlay than post-war Germany could have put into them. As for their supplying the raw materials which Germany needed, it might at least occur to some of the most vehement opponents of that section of the Treaty that one can get raw materials only where they exist and that Germany's colonies lacked most of its essential needs. Moreover, those Germans who have waged the strongest battle for the return of the colonies have done so on the theory that they should become closed preserves for Germany itself and be treated as tributary sources of supply mainly for military purposes. That the choice lay between that kind of an extension of military economics over the seven seas and a mandate system set up by the Treaty of Versailles is too often forgotten by those who would tear up the provisions of the Versailles Treaty in this regard." (Pages 109-110)

It has been stated that Germany was humiliated by those clauses in the Treaty of Versailles which alluded to her war guilt. However, the provisions calling for the prosecution of German war criminals were, for all intents and purposes, emasculated and rendered ineffective with the concurrence of the Allies.

The Cause of World War II

Was the Treaty of Versailles the cause of World War II?

Acceptance of this thesis would absolve the Nazis and German militarists of their aggressive actions including their treacherous deal with the Soviets in 1939. In this connection the role of the Western Allies is summed up by Mr. Sumner Welles in his book, "Seven Decisions That Shaped History":

". . . Over the same French opposition that we see today, Great Britain then not only permitted but actually connived at German rearmament. We Americans poured hundreds of millions of dollars into Germany in the form of loans. It was these policies which were directly responsible for the second world war." (Page 214)

A Hollow Ring

German propaganda against the Treaty of Versailles was a hollow ring in view of the fact that its major provisions were either ignored or rendered ineffective. In other words, the Treaty was never really put to the test. Moreover, it is not true that Germany's power was permanently weakened even where provisions of the Treaty were implemented.

On the contrary, by 1936 Germany was already on the road to building the world's most formidable war machine. The alleged burdens imposed by the Treaty of Versailles were not a deterrent, but the propaganda against the Versailles Treaty served as an effective smoke screen for a resurgent, aggressive Germany.

A Guide to Peace

In the light of these facts we are at loss to understand why Secretary Dulles saw fit to make the blanket charges against the Treaty as though it were the real cause of World War II thereby, in effect, absolving the aggressive actions of Germany.

On April 16, 1919, Woodrow Wilson told the American people:

"Justice, therefore, is the only possible basis for the settlement of the accounts of this terrible war. Justice is what the German Delegation asks for, and says that Germany has been promised. Justice is what Germany shall have. But it must be justice for the dead and wounded, and for those, who have been orphaned and bereaved that Europe might be freed from Prussian despotism. There must be justice for the people who now stagger under war debts which exceed £30,000,000,000 that liberty might be saved. There must be justice for those millions whose homes and land, ships and property, German savagery has destroyed.

". . . Somebody must suffer for the consequences of the war. Is it to be Germany or only the people she has wronged? Not to do justice to all concerned would only leave the world open to fresh calamaties. The Allied and Associated Powers therefore believe that the peace they have proposed is fundamentally a peace of justice. They are no less certain that it is a peace of right fulfilling the terms agreed upon at the time of the Armistice. . . . The Treaty is frankly not based upon a general condonation of the events of 1914-18. It would not be a peace of justice if it were. But it represents a sincere and deliberate attempt to establish 'that reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed, and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind,' which was the agreed basis of peace."

What Woodrow Wilson said then should be our guide in making peace with Germany today.

Editorials

"WE MUST FIND THE WAY"

While world attention has been focused on the crisis in Indo-China, there is a portentous stirring in Germany which may turn the Indo-China affair into a sideshow. On the surface, it all started when a prominent leader of Chancellor Adenauer's coalition government, Karl Pfleiderer, urged that West Germany establish political and diplomatic ties with that part of the world extending "from Warsaw, Prague, Budapest, Sophia, and Bucharest through Moscow to Peking in the Far East." (New York Herald Tribune 4-11-54)

The response to Herr Pfleiderer's sweeping proposal was decidedly favorable. In this connection Germany's leading conservative newspaper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, said:

"We should not deceive ourselves about the fact that the idea of diplomatic ties between Bonn and Moscow will be met with discomfort by the Western occupying powers. But we must find the way. It lies in the nature of (West German) 'independence' and 'equal rights' that our Foreign Ministry cannot in the long run be prevented from sending representatives to the eastern states. . . .

"Thus, Dr. Pfleiderer's demands points to a goal that is one of the most important tasks of German foreign policy." (N. Y. Herald Tribune, 4-12-54)

A few weeks following Pfleiderer's statement Chancellor Adenauer told the press that diplomatic relations between West Germany and the Soviet Union "might be established in the not too far future" (A. P. 5-7-53). As was to be expected, Dr. Adenauer's voice gave added vitality to the ground swell of opinion in Germany supporting such ties. However, when it seemed clear that the Allies were becoming perturbed, he sought to assuage their ruffled feeling with his usual finesse. Through his press service statements were issued that were intended to give the impression that the Chancellor would have nothing to do with the Pfleiderer plan.

Judging from the way this incident was reported in the American press, it appeared that Adenauer had single-handedly staved off the mounting pressure for close ties with the Communist bloc—another triumph for America's "staunchest friend." This is precisely what he had desired the American people to believe. Yet, the fact of the matter is that Adenauer has toyed with this idea for some time. Indeed, it is implicit in his plan to create a Third Force in Europe to be dominated by Germany. In October 1953 Adenauer told the United Press that "if the Soviet Union desires a special (separate political) agreement with Germany, let them have one." Therefore, we cannot go along with the theory that Adenauer is the West's uncompromising hero rejecting the blandishments from the Communist East. What appears to be "differences" between Adenauer and Pfleiderer is in our judgment a division of labor. Both politicians are working toward the same goal and it would be far more accurate to describe Herr Pfleiderer's proposition as a trial balloon not without the covert blessings of Herr Adenauer.

It would be a dangerous illusion to believe that Pfleiderer's views do not represent important political and economic forces in Germany. The fact of the matter is that powerful interests are reassessing Germany's position vis-à-vis Soviet Russia. This new development is reflected in the speeches of Hans Luther, and Heinrich Bruening, former German Chancellors, before the powerful Ruhr industrialists at their exclusive Rhein-Ruhr Club in Düsseldorf. According to the New York Times (June 5, 6, 1954) both speakers called for the scrapping of the so-called pro-Western policy, the return to the Rapallo policy of "understanding" with Russia and the restoration of the Stresemann strategy, i.e. the playing off of the East and West against each other so as to strengthen Germany's world position.

It is significant that Adenauer did not specifically and categorically condemn the substance of the speeches made by the former Chancellors. He merely stated that it was regrettable that "men of such excellent reputations" should make public views which could create "a certain distrust in Germany's reliability."

Adenauer's thinking with respect to relations with the Communist East was clearly defined in one of his rare moments of frankness. In July of last year he declared that it was Russia's interest to resume friendship with Germany. He then stated:

"Already today the states of the European Schuman Plan have formed a market of 157 million people. Thus, these countries are for the Russian economy a highly interesting trading partner. The German and Russian economies once before complemented each other in a magnificent way. The economy of an integrated Europe including Germany could offer even more. The greater the economic meshing (between Western Europe and Russia), the greater the political security." (7-7-53)

It is generally accepted by students of international politics that economic ties help pave the way toward closer political relations between states. This is how the U. S.-German Chamber of Commerce (Monthly Bulletin, February 1954) put it:

"Political allliances presuppose commercial relationships. The more intensive and effective the economic connections, the easier is political integration."

Indeed, the prewar history of Russo-German relations show that it was the resumption of economic ties between Russia and Germany that created the pre-conditions for the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939. That this economic factor is becoming more prominent was admitted by Adenauer himself when, in explaining his proposal to renew diplomatic ties with the Soviet Union, he said: "Our trade with the Soviets has been intensified lately." In this connection let us not forget that three months following the approval of the Contractual Agreement, leading German industrialists, with the knowledge of Dr. Adenauer, were holding secret negotiations with top members of the Kremlin in Copenhagen. Similarly, in the 1920s German diplomats and industrialists operated along the same lines so that for every important agreement made with the West there was a corresponding understanding with the Russians.

It is no longer a secret that the Germans are making an especially strong bid to regain the markets in the East. The New York Times (5-15-54) reported that the so-called East Committee consisting of powerful German industrialists under the sponsorship of the Adenauer Government, had sent delegates to Moscow to negotiate a trade agreement valued at $60 million. Describing the attitude of Germany's industrialists, the Industrie Kurier, organ of German Big Business, wrote:

"The decisive factors in judging the future possibilities should not be political arguments and propagandistic wishful thinking, but the economic realities."

These developments have apparently disturbed the New York Times especially since "one key objective in the Allied program for postwar Germany has been to create conditions that would make impossible a new German-Soviet alliance at some future date" (5-16-54). Unfortunately, however, the postwar program for Germany has been in direct contradiction to our avowed objective. The more we press for the realization of that program, the remoter becomes the possibilities of attaining our goal. Indeed, it appears that we are unconsciously helping to create the opposite effect, namely the conditions for German-Soviet cooperation leading eventually to an alliance.

By resurrecting Germany's industrial potential far in excess of peacetime requirements; by tolerating the resurgence of German militarism and chauvinism; by undoing the original denazification and decartelization programs; by granting unwarranted leniency to German war criminals we have laid the groundwork for the restoration of the old Germany. In short, the very same forces which bred authoritarianism in Germany and demonstrated more affinity with the totalitarian East than with the democratic West are more and more resuming the direction of Germany's destiny. By the same taken, the revival of the old Germany imbued with the spirit of Pan-Germanism is dealing shattering blows to the cause of European unity and thereby opening the gates toward further Communist expansion in the West. It is no coincidence that the breakdown of European unity marked by divisions among the Western Allies and domestic strife, has grown in direct proportion to the increasing efforts of the United States to place Germany on the pedestal of power. European unity is being destroyed on the rock of Germany's resurgence and remilitarization. Yet, our policy makers persist in expending time, effort and money trying to reconcile the irreconcilable.

The U. S. program in Germany has strengthened every factor that would impel the Germans to strike out on their own as they did in the past. This was the central thesis of the sensational book published last year, "Germany Plots With the Kremlin" by T. H. Tetens. The author cited facts supported by documentation, which showed that it is precisely the policies pursued by the United States which are making it possible for Germany to turn to the East again. Those policies have hardly been aired in public. They are treated as though they were part of the Sacred Scripture, never to be questioned, always to be obeyed.

Our policy makers have been so immersed in the idea that we must not "lose" Germany to the Russians, that they apparently have been willing to sacrifice our most reliable friends in the process.

FAITHFUL FRIENDS

"Chancellor Konrad Adenauer told his Cabinet today that it would be intolerable for West Germany to wait indefinitely for its sovereignty.

A grant of sovereignty also might put a brake on the trend that is developing among West German politicians and industrialists to reassure the Federal Government's foreign policy in the sense of establishing diplomatic relations with Moscow or of adopting a policy of neutrality between the East and the West."

(M. S. Handler, The New York Times, 6-16-54)

DEUTSCHLAND UEBER "ALLIES"—OR ELSE!

Of late, the main theme of the German propaganda machine may be summed up in the metaphorical expression "Don't rock the boat." It is an appeal which carries ominous undertones and is directed to U. S. public opinion with particular force. The line runs something like this: "We are trying to behave, but this will require more billions from the USA, the rebuilding of our armed forces, adequate markets for our goods, colonies, the return of our 'lost' territories both in the East and West, and a voice in European and world affairs consonant with our strength." In substance, this means that unless the Western Allies "come across—and fast," there is no guarantay that democratic, anti-Soviet West Germany will stay that way.

Perhaps, the origin of this shakedown racket can be traced to the Ruhr industrialists who let it be known to the American press three years ago that they had to have a billion dollars per year from U. S. taxpayers—or else! Regardless of where it was first conceived, it has now become the favorite propaganda weapon of Germany's political leaders, including Chancellor Adenauer. The Chancellor has been particularly annoyed at the French for their faliure to ratify the EDC and their obstinacy with respect to recognizing Germany's "rights" in the Saar. He has intimated that if France maintained a "non-cooperative" attitude, there was no telling how the Germans would react. He pointed up this threat indirectly when he told a press conference on July 31, 1953: "Within this defense community, the so-called 'military dynamic' of the Germans will be limited and kept on the right line." As one reporter put it, Chancellor Adenauer knows very well that Germany's "military dynamic" is much more than a quotable phrase.

In the Adenauer story which was featured in Time Magazine (1-4-54), the Chancellor expressed his fears that, if "Europe collapes," the revival of German militarism is possible.

"I never minimize this possibility if Europe fails," Dr. Adenauer told the Time reporter. "If France refuses to accept reconciliation with her former enemy, how we would accept the effect of such a reversal, I do not know. . . . The whole population would be affected. We cannot say what would happen, but we have had experience in the past."

The "collapse" of Europe, in Dr. Adenauer's view, is equated with the continued demilitarization of Germany and the preservation of policies which were intended to prevent Germany from dominating her neighbors. Naturally, his forebodings concerning the imminence of Europe's collapse are intended for American consumption.

On April 6, 1954, the New York Times reported that the Chancellor had "sounded the alarm" to the "dangers" besetting his government. If the Allies continued to stall with respect to the granting of full sovereignty to Germany, the Chancellor declared, then no one could predict the dire consequences.

Dr. Adenauer returned to this general theme in his statement to Life Magazine (5-10-54). Germany, he averred, stands in the forefront of resistance to Communism. If Germany does not "resist every pressure," he said, "there will be no halting the Communist flood." Germany's "historic task" is to build up the resistance to Communism. The Chancellor then hinted that, if any European country denied Germany her "rights," there could be no effective opposition to Communism. The meaning of this veiled threat was clarified by Chancellor Adenauer's Rheinische Post (12-8-53). The paper declared that unless the Allies gave the Federal Republic "full sovereignty" in all fields including the military, then the Germans may return to the Tauroggen policy, i.e., the German-Russo alliance which resulted in the defeat of Napoleon.

On the basis of Adenauer's statements especially attuned to American ears, as well as of other German leaders and important sections of the German press, it is clear that the Germans are trying to confront the Western democracies with "either—or" propositions. The Germans will condescend to defend the West against Communism, but if the West does not accede to every Germand demand, then the Allies must face the prospect of a Russo-German tie-up. In any event, the responsibility rests with the Allies. Thus, the Hamburger Anzeiger states that it is necessary for Germany "to make it clear to the Western powers much more energetically than before that the intensity of our friendship for them will depend on the intensity of their efforts to solve the German problem."

"French public opinion? I thought we had exterminated it . . .

This "new" line has found its echo in the United States. It has been repeated by leading policy makers as well as by newspaper correspondents and alleged experts on the German problem. Here are some examples chosen at random:

(1) "If we do not want a revival of German militarism and excesses of nationalism, we must ourselves admit the natural and proper desire of the German people to be equals in the family of nations. . . . Our problem consists, most of all, in finding a worthy outlet for the great energy and the vitality of the German people. . . ."

(John Foster Dulles, 2-3-54)

(2) ". . . A collapse of this policy through the refusal of the French National Assembly to ratify the agreements would force the West German political parties into a position where they would have to "reappraise" West Germany's foreign relations.

"Such a reappraisal could only produce the alternative of a nationalized rather than an international orientation of this country's foreign policy. . . ."

(M. S. Handler, N. Y. Times, 4-1-54)

(3) "In Europe, France is so bemused by the improbable prospect of a settlement of the Indochina war at the forthcoming Geneva conference that it may not ratify the European Defense Community before the Germans finally lose patience and blow the whole project of European unity into the air by seizing the independence of action which it is well within German capacity now to seize."

(Joseph C. Harsch, Christian Science Monitor, 3-6-54)

(4) "Collapse of EDC, if France failed to ratify it, will widen the breach between West Germany and France. A West German Army, if a national force outside EDC, may revive the old German spirit of nationalism. West German leaders, in that atmosphere, are not likely to be as pro-Western as Adenauer.

"Adenauer's policies are in some danger of going out with Adenauer.

"The West, in that case, will have to start all over again wooing Germany."

(U. S. News & World Report, 4-16-54)

(5) ". . . A suggestion of the arrogance of old is rising correspondingly. The Ruhr industrialists complain of the restrictions put upon them by their participation in the European coal and steel pool. . . .

"Adenauer now has wide support throughout Germany, but if Europe is not united, if the dream is frustrated, then no one can say what the resurgence of Germany will mean. That is why so much turns on the days and weeks just ahead."

(Marquis Childs, Chicago Sun-Times, 3-11-54)

(6) ". . . Today's Western opposition to German participation in EDC and other natural German desires recalls the first act of the past tragedy. If the Germans are made to feel unwanted again, it should surprise nobody if they again turn from the path they now follow under Adenauer. . . . Today, true enough, there is practically no evidence of a German turn away from the West; but, in the years ahead, such a turn would become more possible in proportion as the West denies Germany just and equal partnership."

(Norbert Muhlen, The New Leader, 4-12-54)

(7) ". . . If EDC dies, Moscow is going to benefit from the resultant anger in Washington and confusion in the capitals of free Europe. Above all, there will be frustration in Bonn. Chancellor Konrad Adenauer . . . admits to mistrust of the instincts of his moody fellow Germans if they are rebuffed and isolated. And if Dr. Adenauer is replaced before the Federal Republic's diplomatic future is committed on a long-range basis, new and embarrassing trends might well develop."

(C. L. Sulzberger, New York Times, 4-4-54)

(8) ". . . If France does not ratify the EDC Treaty, the entire issue of German-French pacification will be in doubt. It would defeat in Germany the forces which, under Adenauer's leadership, believe that peaceful cooperation with France will guarantee security and prosperity in Europe. . . ."

(Karl Brandt, Associate Director, Food Research Institute, Stanford University, 12-23-53)

The above statements are so similar in content and even in phraseology that one would almost be tempted to believe that they received their original inspiration from one source. In any event, the fact remains that the Germans are working overtime to frighten literally the Western Allies, particularly the United States, into submitting to their demands.

The employment of scare tactics is an old habit with German leaders. The Kaiser and Hitler were masters at this game and it now seems as if the leaders of the Federal Republic are resorting to the same stratagem.

In an article published in the Reporter Magazine (2-16-54), Charles W. Thayer writes that a foreigner who knows the Germans well, said: "They remind me of a schoolboy who has just won a good race and is looking around for his prize. He has lots of applause but no medals and he's getting just a little bit frustrated and angry." Inquiring how serious this alleged frustration is, Mr. Thayer reported the comment of a high American official: "We are heading toward a crisis in the next few months. It is either ratification of the treaties soon, or chaos." This is precisely what the Germans would have us believe, namely that "chaos" or renewed ties with the Russians may be the final consequence of the "faltering" policies of the West.

One does not have to give special praise to a child with a decent character to insure that he continues to behave. The foreigner mentioned by Mr. Thayer, seems to imply that if the Germans are bribed with all kinds of concessions, they will stay on the "straight and narrow path." We are not that optimistic. On the contrary, the more we give, the greater will be their appetite. Certainly, this is one of the lessons of history.

By stressing this new propaganda line, the Germans have inadvertently proved how dangerous it would be to let them have guns. It seems that they cannot face difficult problems without resorting to threats or to extreme measures. Thus, while many other major states maintained democratic government even when they were confronted with the grave problems arising out of the depression of the 1930s, the German turned to dictatorship. Judging from this "new" line it appears that the Germans would not hesitate to re-awaken the spirit of militarism and totalitarianism if it suited their purposes. Can we rely on such a people as a sincere and stable ally of the Western democracies?

THE CHICKENS COME HOME TO ROOST

During his recent trip to Washington the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, Dr. James Conant, gave a glowing report about Germany's economic power to a group of senators at a private meeting. According to the noted Washington columnist, Robert S. Allen, Senator Styles Bridges sought Dr. Conant's view with regard to reports that the West German Government was subsidizing German firms to compete with American companies. "Conant," writes Mr. Allen, "said he knew nothing about that." (5-11-54)

The U. S. High Commissioner's reply will come as a surprise to many American businessmen. They know from first hand experience that the Bonn Government has been up to its neck in promoting German exports at all costs—leaning heavily on subsidies of one kind or another to do the trick.

Numerous articles have appeared in U. S. newspapers and magazines dealing with this subject. Unfortunately, space does not permit us to refer to all of the evidence which we have before us. However, in view of Dr. Conant's denial we think it is important to cite a few concrete examples of how German competition operates on the world market.

The Wall Street Journal (12-15-53) carried a lengthy report on this subject entitled "Ruhr Speeds Invasion Of Foreign Markets, Pinching U. S., Britain." It was stated that a check with American manufacturers of heavy industrial equipment, electrical equipment and machine tools "shows that many of them are feeling the squeeze of German competition." In Pittsburgh, the sales vice president of a leading heavy equipment producer complained: "The U. S. gives a grant to the German government for rehabilitation, then the German government goes to the manufacturers in Germany and says, 'We want the turbine business in South America.' So the companies go into South America and offer ten-year credit terms because they have a guarantee by the German government that any losses will be taken care of. The American companies can't meet these long terms on their own. They don't have government guarantees against loss. It's just ruining American foreign business."

Business Week (1-23-54) discussed the resurgence of the German shipping industry. This development has had an adverse effect on Western European competitors and on the position of American ship builders.

What is the secret of Germany's success?

"A big factor behind this progress has been the Bonn government's tax policy. That, at present, exempts shipbuilding investments from taxation if the proceeds are plowed back into the industry. Since 1950, this state encouragement has produced 40% of the total investment in German shipbuilding. Backstopping the tax aid is a direct government subsidy to the tune of 70 million marks yearly."

Reporting from Mexico, a correspondent for the Christian

Science Monitor (4-20-54) revealed that the Germans were looming as a direct threat to American commercial interests in that country. A U. S. steel goods sales representative discussed this question and admitted that "U. S. industry can't meet the competition of German government subsidies." He elaborated on this point as follows: "To get back on its feet in the foreign trade market, the West German government is in effect subsidizing sales of German goods abroad at cost. With high wages, high taxes and no government subsidy, U. S. manufacturers can't meet the prices or offer the same liberal payment terms."

It is true, the German industry through its cartels and trusts has constantly pushed German exports in a way that has undercut the competitive position of other countries including the United States. Nevertheless, the Bonn government has played the decisive role in these operations. "The Federal Government, by granting subsidies . . . has been instrumental in financing . . . the shipbuilding boom, which last year put the country in the world's second place with nearly 700,000 tons; and the huge increase in exports, from $2 billion in 1950 to $4.4 billion in 1953." (Wall Street Journal 5-25-54)

In this connection, the Federal Republic's Finance Minister, Fritz Schaeffer, admitted to the Wall Street Journal correspondent that exports have been "artificially stimulated" through the use of government funds.

While Dr. Conant's denial first drew our attention, we were also intrigued by the fact that it was Senator Bridges who broached the subject. We assume that he did so because he must be concerned with the impact that German competition is having on American industry. Four years ago things were different. In the Summer 1950 issue of Prevent World War III we ran a piece entitled "German Dumping On The March." In that article it was stated that there "is a group of individuals in the United States who believe that German economic power, world security and American prosperity are all one word." It was noted that several Senators had complained that the limitations on Germany's industrial potential "was a pro-British conspiracy which fitted in with the world wide revolutionary plans of the Communists." One of the Senators was identified by name—Styles Bridges of New Hampshire.

Commenting on Senator Bridges' allegations we stated that he like all other Senators, "is elected by his constituents to safeguard the American people and the institutions of free enterprise which have made this great nation of ours." We then predicted that Senator Bridges' brimming-over enthusiasm for the revival of Germany's economic power "may one day place him in a very embarassing position in the eyes of our businessmen and the unemployed workers who will have to suffer so that Germany gets a more exclusive place in the sun." There is nothing that we would wish to add at this time.

GERMAN RE-ARMAMENT AND DEFENSE OF EUROPE

When, shortly after the outbreak of war in Korea, France proposed the integration into a European Defense Community of her armed forces with those of Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg, the proposal was seen as more than a limited response to immediate fear of Soviet Military power. It was that, but it was more; it gave positive promise of a European renaissance, a leap into the future—away from the frustrations of ruinous European nationalisms.

The US cannot be accused of failing to wish the new project well. If there is fault, it lies perhaps in the largeness of American enthusiasm; for in recent months resistance to ratification of the EDC has increased in proportion to US pressure on its behalf.

Resistance there is—from Left to Right; and no amount of angry impatience will lessen it. In the last analysis any workable European Community must have not merely parliamentary ratification but active support of the peoples concerned.

Additional US military assurances to the French, who are weakened by war in Indo-China and worried both by cracks in their African empire and the resurgence of their traditional foe, Germany, might be required if France is to join the EDC.

But if EDC ratification must await firmer US military pledges (under which resistance to aggression would not occur only when we chose, or at places of our choosing), could the present Congress be counted on to approve binding advance commitments of such a nature?

There are different views toward rearmament of Germany, inside or outside an EDC framework. Yet, they share certain common assumptions:

(1) any supranational arangement such as EDC must come to terms with deeply rooted national prides; (2) some form of collective defense is still needed in Western Europe; (3) if the US persists in demanding adoption of the present EDC formula, European resentment is likely to stiffen further; and (4) preoccupation with the present Communist threat should not blind us to the possibility of Germany's again endangering the peace of the world. . . .

". . . A lot of things about the German people disturb me. One is their resistance to change, and their stubborn belief that only Germany can judge what is good for Germany . . . Another is their great national pride, which they think they have partly overcome with their superficial acceptance of EDC and their compulsory experiment with occupational internationalism. But they still laugh at the French, still lament the Italians, and look upon their own position as unchallengeable . . .

"The Germans admire America for its production and wealth. I think they pity us for our political ineptitude—and I wonder how they arrive at this feeling, for certainly the German record is nothing that gives them the right to judge . . ."

The Unrepentant German

by

TERENCE PRITTIE

Some people who know Germany well believe that the Germans experience extreme difficulty in being honest with themselves. Wars, revolutions, and Nazi dictatorship have left them with a rooted aversion to admitting that they have ever been in the wrong and an unhappy doubt as to whether they were ever in the right. Germany, by inference, is one of the last countries in the world where one should expect a straight answer. Questions are usually answered obliquely, with cross-references to what So-and-so has said on the subject and what the official angle may be. The individual German too often divests himself on the responsibility of even having an opinion of his own. Instead, when cornered, he will argue. An interesting result of this attitude of mind is that no authentic German history has been written, since the First World War, by a German. The period remains unexplained, save by tendentious and woolly memoirs which evade the facts with the self-effacing agility of a lizard.

That is why Ernst von Salomon's book "The Answers" is so significant as well as fascinating a document. This book was published two years ago in the original German text, under the title of "Der Fragebogen"—referring to the questionnaire which members of the Nazi party and other Germans had to fill in under Allied direction. The book had a mixed reception and some critics admitted frankly that they did not know what to make of it. "Der Fragebogen" dealt, in autobiographical form, with twenty-five years of the author's life up to his release from an American internment camp in 1946. Each question of the 131 in the "Fragebogen" was answered, sometimes in a word or sentence, sometimes with a long and occasionally disjointed account of a part of von Salomon's life.

The book was full of wit and hatred, uncanny perception and violent prejudice, enlightenment and muddle-headedness. That was not what made the critics' task so difficult. But the book was a deliberate effort of a clever man to write th truth. Naturally, the critics were embarrassed.

Who, first of all, is Ernst von Salomon? He was born in 1902. his "von" indicates his family's social standing. He became a member of the Prussian Cadet Corps, was too young to serve in the First World War, but joined the irregulars who fought pitched battles along Germany's eastern frontiers long after the Armistice. He became an officer and acquired a taste for the lawlessness and violence which were hallowed in most German minds by the ideal of the inviolability of "the Fatherland." The end of the "unofficial" war in Silesia left men like von Salomon with nothing to do. Like others of his kind he matriculated from guerilla warfare to civil murder.

In 1922 he helped to kill Walter Rathenau, quite simply because he did not approve of his policy of "Erfüllung" or fulfillment of the Treaty of Versailles to which Germany was a signatory. He was sentenced to five years' imprisonment, and when he came out he wrote several books (one of them, "The Outlaws," was almost a best-seller), dabbled in journalism, rusticated near Biarritz, worked for the Rowohet publishing house, and wrote film scripts up to and during the Second World War. Finally, as the murderer of Rathenau he was arrested by the Americans and imprisoned for eighteen months.

Von Salomon's decision to write the true story of these years of alternating indolence and activity had all sorts of unforeseen results. It seriously upset those Germans who wanted their country to "settle down." Von Salomon made a mockery of democracy—which, whatever its shortcomings, was the only creed available to 50,000,000 West Germans.

The word "democracy" is one that I have only very rarely, and with great reluctance employed. I do not know what it is and I have never yet met anyone who could explain its meaning to me. . . . But I fear that Hitler's assertion—that his ideological concept was the democratic concept—will prove a hard one to refute.

It is so easy to thumb one's nose at something which one does not want to understand! Contempt for individual freedom and for the rule of law were the basic teachings of that Nazi party which von Salomon—mainly for reasons of social and intellectual snobbery—did not join.

Glorying in being a Prussian—"which I would have become if I had not been born one"—von Salomon treats democracy in the same way as certain apes advertise their distaste —by turning their posteriors towards the subject of it. The spectatcle in both cases is unedifying.

Von Salomon was an early convert to German "dynamism." A contented and "simple" Germany was for him "unthinkable." It would merely mean that the Germans were "forgetting their past history" (which they have never learnt!) and have presupposed that the world would not "intrude its problems on the Germans" (which the world has been most disinclined to do, until the Germans have first obtruded theirs on viciously aggressive neighbors like Luxemburg and Denmark). Dynamism presupposed action. What kind of action? "It was pure chance that I took part in the murder of Rathenau: it happened quite automatically because I had become attached to Kern. . . . In fact Rathenau was the only Jew whom we murdered," or "The only course open was to eliminate every Erfüllungs politician. To eliminate in that context is, of course, to kill. What other means were there at our disposal?" To that type of mind the answer is "none," and murder may well be "automatic." Murder is such an excellent substitute for democracy anyway.

Salomon would have one believe that the bloody Kapp Putsch was an "attempt to serve the State." He depicts Henlein as a Sudeten patriot trying to save his people from nazism at a time when Henlein was conniving with Hitler to provoke a Czech crisis.

He heartily subscribes to the ideals of the Austrian Nazis —not because they were Nazis but because they wanted the Anschluss. He applauds the breaking of the Versailles Treaty and he national plot not to limit the armed forces to 100,000 men. Law and order meant nothing to such a man, yet Salomon tries to show that he was a genuine and representative Prussian. The horror of his book is that he seems to prove his case.

After the "elimination" of six million people in the concentration camps it has been widely accepted that the Germans are cruel. The word is badly chosen. They are callous, for they are less inclined to encourage deliberate brutality than to be perfectly indifferent to it. Let me quote von Salomon to show what I mean.

Of the S.S. leaders two were outstanding. . . . One of them, a Standartenführer, has been finally sent to Hungary by Himmler to solve the Jewish question. He solved it in the most drastic fashion, which proves that with a certain amount of skill even tasks of this sort can be mastered in a way which will make the morally self-assured and presumptuous Americans express their profound admiration.

What irony! What verbal felicity! Only—just 200,000 Hungarian Jews were "eliminated" by the Nazis and one word, just one word, of regret would not have been out of place. Von Salomon claims to have been shockingly treated by the Americans, but they did not "eliminate" him. He was only a self-confessed murderer. The Hungarian Jews committed no crimes, and were ruthlessly slaughtered.

Von Salomon remains an unregenerate nationalist who never became a Nazi. That is what makes his book so important. For it has been assumed that the end of nazism must mean the beginning of a new German democracy, that—by inference—the only threat to the latter is a Nazi revival. Von Salomon suggests an alternative, and no one need be fooled by his cynicism.

This is the book of a clever German who chooses over his wounded self-esteem. It is a reminder that German nationalism is a more potent enemy than nazism.

It is a warning to all those who blandly assume that because you put a different uniform on a German he turns into a different person. Europeans may be grateful for this warning. Germans will think otherwise for, as they may see it, von Salomon has lifted the grating at the end of the gutter and exposed too much to the prying eye of the outside world.

"The potentially most dangerous elements in Germany are 40,000 Nazis who have gone underground and the thousands of veterans who have emerged to fight democracy in Germany . . .

"Yet 40,000 have chosen to remain hidden under their aliases. And among them are some 8,000 who were prominent in the Hitler era. Many of them, under these aliases, again are active in the economic and public life of Western Germany."

OPERATION SECRECY

While secrecy in government is today being defended on grounds of national security, we find it difficult to imagine any legitimate basis for the decision of the United States High Commission in Germany to release top-ranking Nazi war criminals before their sentences have expired without revealing their names. If there are good reasons why some war criminals should be pardoned or their sentences commuted, there should be no hesitation in identifying them. If no such grounds exists, the criminals should not be released.

The commutation of the sentences of Nazi war criminals has been one of the most shameful aspects of American and Allied occupation policy in Germany. The Germans have made release of war criminals one of their most insistent demands. They are determined to discredit the Nuremberg trials, to wipe out German guilt for the horrors of Nazism, and to undermine the concepts of crimes against humanity. The Allies—our own government foremost among them—have continually yielded to these pressures in order to court German favor and goodwill. As a result, Nazis found guilty of and sentenced for some of the most brutal of crimes have been released long before they had served their sentences. They have been welcomed as heroes and martyrs by large sections of the German populace and they have been functioning freely and openly within Germany. Each time there has been some protest, almost invariably from outside Germany, with little appreciable result. Today a new and much more far-reaching measure of appeasement through the further release of war criminals seems to be in the offing. And the U. S. High Commission evidently regards the potential reaction as so explosive that it is going to keep the names of those released a secret.

This policy is a disgraceful and frightening one, and calls for immediate investigation. It can mean only that the rehabilitation of the worst of the Nazi war criminals is to be accelerated even beyond the present indecent pace. Whatever the short-term benefits of such appeasement may be, its long-range consequences are certain to be disastrous. The most reactionary elements in Germany are being strengthened and encouraged. They are being given leadership with American halos replacing their Nazi helmets. . . .

Secrecy as to the identity of the war criminals being released will only serve to confirm the growing suspicion that the much advertised democratic character of the new Germany is little more than public relations veneer and that beneath the surface, reaction is daily gaining in strength and influence.

". . . In general, the people are either passively or positively antagonistic to a revival of the old Wehrmacht, either the Prussian or the Hitlerite model (though the masses might swing over if the bands began to play) . . . in the background of Dr. Adenauer's right-wing coalition partners are generals who believe that the Nazi New European Order and the Viking Division of the Waffen SS were the models for the anti-Communist Europe of tomorrow . . ."

The Diplomacy of Leadership

LIONEL GELBER

Mr. Gelber is a recognized authority on international affairs. He taught at the University of Toronto and served with the RCAF during the war. His earlier books, "Peace By Power" (1942), "Reprieve From War" (1950) were acclaimed by scholars. His most recent book, "The American Anarchy" (1953) is a brilliant analysis of the American scene and requires careful study and thought.

. . . Europe has been railing against Americanization since the 1920's. But this hitherto was visualized as American influence on folkways and popular culture—from the movies to the consumption of Coca-Cola. In the epoch of Senator McCarthy a more serious note is struck. For Europeans either overestimate his grip on the liberties of the country or underestimate that pro-Society conspiracy out of which—liberals having pooh-poohed it—he made capital. McCarthyism has an impact which confirms, as it heightens, a concept of America that antedates Senator McCarthy and may outlast him. At rock bottom, in reacting against Americanization, Europeans have been fleeing from realities which are inherent in the twentieth century itself. The United States is the chief exemplar of mass production; to retain its freedom in the modern contest of large-scale entities, Western Europe may have to transform its economy on the American model. And since they prefer old traditions to new exigencies, West Europeans decry that symbol of bigness which is America.

But the problem is not solely one of Western Europeans accepting with good grace the social consequences of large-scale organization. They are tied, for their own safety, to the might of the American colossus. Yet they are loath sometimes to adopt measures urged upon them by the United States. And while these may be rejected on their merits, such reluctance also springs from the manner in which they are put forward. As she leads the Grand Coalition of the free, the United States must perceive that conventional diplomacy is not enough; that the diplomacy of leadership calls for qualities of tact and insight as unprecedented as the conditions to which they must be suited.

Mr. Clement Attlee, as leader of Her Majesty's Opposition in Britain, is, among responsible allied statesmen, the one who has been most outspoken in expressing doubts over the conduct of American foreign policy. But it is a Cambridge don, D. W. Brogan, who, in a brilliant essay, has come nearest to explaining the American temper. He traces it to the illusion of American omnipotence—the belief, when matters abroad go amiss, that it is not their intractibility which is to blame but, since nothing is beyond the capacity of the United States, treason or knavery at home. It is from this angle that Americans look upon the fall of China to Mao tse-Tung. It is submitted here, however, that Mr. Brogan's illuminating analysis is, as it stands, somewhat incomplete; he has, as it were, told only half the story. For there are two illusions of the same species involved; and the second, which derives from the first, is the illusion of American omniscience. By the former the potentialities of American control over hostile forces are exaggerated; by the latter it is the susceptibilities of America's own friends and allies which may, at awkward moments, be ignored.

If the sagacity of the United States in foreign affairs matched her strength, the illusion of American omniscience would be no illusion. But does it? That she can do more than her partners is true; that she knows better than they what should be done ain't, as the song goes, necessarily so. And her assumption is of very recent vintage. It takes for granted that good judgment dawned overnight with primacy. The United States rose to world power under McKinley; but from the days of the first Roosevelt to those of the second, the American people, except for the interlude of World War I, would not recognize the extent of their own stake in the preservation of our free world order. If membership in the United Nations, if the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan, NATO and mutual aid, security pacts with Pacific and Latin American countries have been a valid contemporary approach, then, by their mere existence, they condemn a previous generation which spurned such undertakings. These, moreover, are all co-operative endeavors and it is as such that they must be handled. The paymaster as he pays the piper may feel that he ought to call the tune. But for harmony in his own camp he should not be tone-deaf.

That the fault is a bipartisan one might be illustrated by episodes which have occurred under Democrats and Republicans alike. Nor has it been confined to the Executive branch of the American government. Senator Knowland as Republican floor leader is spokesman in the Senate for the present Administration. And it backfires on America's own national interest when a public figure holding so important a post demands that, if China's seat passes from the Formosan to the Peking regime, the United States resign from the United Nations. For he does not intimidate the foes of America thereby; he simply tells her friends that the United States will play the game according to her own rules or not at all. Nor do the Democrats exhibit the diplomacy of leadership when their Senate leader, Senator Lyndon Johnson, declares that he will not vote again for foreign aid (and at least one more year of this is envisaged) if Atlantic allies still hesitate to commit their destinies to the European Defence Community. It is, in other words, presumed by American politicians that they not only command a range of intricate questions which affect the well-being of close and honored associates. They suggest that every partner of America, if it would cherish the partnership, must bow low before an omniscience acquired, as it were, at one swoop and with scant preliminary evidence.

Public utterances which show little respect for the spirit of coalition diplomacy will not enhance respect for America herself. And when American membership in the United Nations, when the future of the United Nations itself, would hinge on China's seat, that is letting a lesser issue—whatever its rights or wrongs—determine a greater. To throw out the baby with the bath water is to take, in the name of morality, a course that is not even sound morally. Nor is there a consistency on moral issues among American politicians which will impress non-Americans. If China is an aggressor—and she is—is Franco Spain innocent of official crime? Yet the United States may enter into an agreement with the latter while striving to debar the former, after hostilities cease, from the international body. Such alternations of principle debase principle. They imply, moreover, that whatever the United States does is right because she does it. And a mood of that kind, when she deals with partners who are as morally aware as herself, could ruin any coalition.

But it is not only Senators, with their potent voice in working out American foreign policy, who may put up the backs of America's allies. The Executive branch have also been impelled by the illusion of American omniscience; have, under Democrats and Republicans alike, been headstrong in trying to impose their will on their own associates. Under both parties the American government has, since World War II, been too intent upon international co-operation for it to threaten a reversal of major trends when these cannot always be accelerated at the speed or in the manner desired—even though Mr. Dulles, on his first visit to Europe after taking over the State Department, appeared to be on the verge of doing just this. "We know," he himself later asserted before the eighth General Assembly of the United Nations, "that we have no monopoly of wisdom or virtue." But how well is that known? For the significant thing about this remark was that the Secretary of State addressed it to the allies rather than the foes of the United States, that American coalition diplomacy in Europe and Asia had reached a pass in which such a statement could be delayed no longer.

Nor did this deter Senator McCarthy who, in his quest for conformity on trade with China, would resort to economic coercion within the camp of the West itself. Talk of that kind the White House and the State Department were bound to repudiate. Yet unless the European Defence Community is ratified, Mr. Dulles himself now warns, there will be "an agonizing reappraisal" of Washington's European course. The military implications of so grave an intra-allied threat may not be clear. As Atlantic coalition diplomacy it was but another example of gaucheries which undo with one hand the good done by the United States with the other.

The French, to go back a few years, have, for instance, never quite recovered from the shock inflicted by Mr. Acheson in the autumn of 1950 when, without prior notice, he demanded the rearmament of the new West German Republic. Unison with Britain and France in German affairs had hitherto been the ABC of American postwar policy. It was they and not the United States who were twice maimed in one lifetime by Teutonic aggressions. The principal allies of the United States are neither suppliants nor satellites. Morally they enjoy a perfect right to be consulted by the leader of the Western coalition before any major departure in their joint efforts is broached. Intellectually their national experience must equip them with a comprehension of the German problem which surpasses that of Americans who have, on the highest levels, dealt with it. Potsdam, through a series of improvisations evoked by Soviet ill-will, had been undermined. The West European allies of the United States realized that Mr. Acheson's insistence was a logical conclusion to the establishment of the Bonn Republic and to the revival of the Ruhr's heavy industry—that bedrock of German intransigence in aims and arms. Yet here was omniscience taking it upon itself to force the pace, to know best complexities and subtleties for which it was prepared by nothing in the American record or the American situation.

At a time when West Germans are lacking in militancy and have voted in large numbers for a Western orientation under Chancellor Adenauer it is, nevertheless, American self-assurance rather than Gallic forebodings which seem to have been vindicated. But Stresemann was not immortal and neither is Adenauer. The material foundations of German power have been restored; used in accordance with one tendency today, they can be used in accordance with another tomorrow. Perhaps the West German Republic should be rearmed. It may be that a Slavonic onslaught cannot be countered locally without twelve German divisions; it is possible that in a European Army these divisions would not betray their trust . . .

Most of what the Germans want for the fulfilment of ultimate national ambitions lies beyond the grasp of the West and within the orbit of the Soviet Union. And this is a brute fact which American policy makers have side-stepped. What the United States had to give the Bonn Republic has virtually been given; soon the West Germans can be wholly on their own. Soon, too, the heirs of Adenauer, thanks to assistance thus received, will be able to negotiate with Russia from strength; no Balkan puppets, they could be more independent than Mao tse-Tung. Washington and Bonn may hope otherwise. But as long as the Communist regime is on top in Russia it will not ever really abandon Eastern Europe; in an era of East-West deadlock, it is therefore only by linking up with the Soviet Union that the West Germans may repossess land, brethren and trading opportunities which would return to them again their place in the sun.

The German Right, in tune with rooted tradition, has always been aware of this. When the Social Democrats oppose the entry of the Bonn Republic into the European Defence Community, they keep open the way for German unity on Russian terms. Can so dire a contingency be prevented by any federalizing device which would recast the politics and productive forces of Western Europe? It is one of those risks that are more incalculable than calculated. In the eyes of Washington the French might be unduly apprehensive; but in the eyes of Paris the Americans, for all their vaunted realism, have not yet grappled with the inmost European realities. As expedients to canalize that Germanic dynamism which Mr. Acheson was so eager to release, the French invented both the Schuman Plan and the European Defence Community; but while expending blood and treasure in Indo-China and while holding North Africa for NATO, they may, on second thoughts, have wished the West European coal-steel pool to succeed before plunging ahead with a European Army which entails German rearmament. Nor, in this context, did the uprising of East Germans against Russian overlords on June 17, 1953, prove that all Germans will march inevitably with the West. It may only have demonstrated that against a foreign yoke—as from Jena to the 1920's—Germans always rebel.

French misgivings over the contents of American policy in Germany have thus been accentuated by the rush in which it was pushed through. Nor is it only the aggrandizement of West Germany itself which causes worry. West Europeans suspect that the United States may inadvertently facilitate German mastery by leaving them to face it alone. Even if there were no more Bismarcks, no more Rapallos, no more Nazi-Soviet pacts, even if a resurgent Germany could be counted on to cling loyally to a European Defence Community, such a project may presage a weakening rather than a strengthening of the West. For its underlying postulate might turn out, from the American standpoint, to be a neo-isolationist one.

Omniscient about what others should do, Americans themselves are still far from clear about the scope and duration of their own permanent responsibilities. Germany in two world wars demolished irretrievably the European balance of power; peace is maintained in the global arena by an American-Soviet equilibrium. European allies of the United States and Canada may, if steadily underpinned, be a very substantial regional adjunct of this new global equipoise. Yet the risk of a remilitarized Germany is to be taken on three hypotheses, resting on continental rather than transatlantic power, which are either obsolete, naive, or ominous. Of these the first would presuppose that that Humpty-Dumpty, Europe's own balance of power, can somehow be set up by itself once more. The second is the premise that within it a nationally resurrected Germany will observe with fidelity the restraints of a European Defence Community. And the third is that, as a result of all this, the United States may be able to disengage her own land forces from Western Europe, from the most vital sector of the world front. Such a European policy might contrast with that pursued in Korea, or ineed elsewhere on the Pacific, where the United States has been undertaking fresh obligations; in the light of other British and French commitments it would be tantamount to putting on Germany the onus of European defence. What nourishes it, in brief, is the conviction that the historically uncontrollable can, on the mere American say-so, yet be controlled. And it is anxieties thus stirred up which predispose West Europeans to look with less skepticism than Americans on conciliatory gestures by Moscow.

The British now agree with the United States on the role of Germany in the defence of the West and are willing to go as far as other interests allow to reassure the French. Nevertheless when the British balked at joining the Schuman Plan, American censure revealed Washington again exhorting others to take steps of whose full consequence it had small inkling. What the European Defence Community is expected to accomplish in its sphere, the Schuman Plan had been designed to do in the realm of basic resources: to absorb German energies, as fostered by the United States, in some larger grouping. And taken together all such ideas (excellent in themselves) point to a European federal union—whether it be founded on a coal-steel pool, a West European Army, a West European Parliament (as distinguished from the Council of Europe) or some blend of the three. The difficulty is, however, that as a counterweight to its domination by Germany, Britain would also have to belong to it. But this means that the United Kingdom must merge its ancient sovereignty in an over-all West European one. As a component of a federal union, Britain would have to sever direct overseas ties with her own dependencies, with equal partners of the Commonwealth, with the United States herself.

The United States, that is, instead of knowing all the answers, has been advocating objectives which are incompatible one with the other. It is to her national interest to favor a strong Britain in a strong Commonwealth. But neither can be strong, and the United Kingdom itself could not adequately reinforce Western Europe, if it were cut off from the worldwide sources of its regional power. Britain has for centuries had one foot planted in Europe and one outstretched across the seas; entry into a supranational union would require of her not so much a shift in stance as the amputation of a limb —and a corresponding loss in total vitality. Americans themselves should, as federalists, have been quick to see what the integral character of such a project would entail; as practitioners of a world policy they will have to think in global rather than continental terms. For here is a dilemma to which a solution on the American pattern could only defeat the American purpose. . . .

"At the Berlin Conference last January no serious attempt was made to explore the possibility of creating a safely neutralized Germany. Mr. Molotov was never forced to answer the question:

" 'Will Russia permit truly free, all-German elections if the Western Powers forego a German military participation in Western defense?' . . .

"From month to month our bargaining position grows weaker—and not only vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. If Mr. Dulles' long-delayed reappraisal results in nothing better than a decision to jettison France and to place American reliance upon a rearmed West Germany, the Germans will soon be dictating to us the kind of settlement they will accept; this will certainly not provide adequate guarantees against either betrayal or renewed aggression. Moreover, the decision to rearm West Germany outside of the European Defense Community means the breakup of the whole NATO alliance, creating a military vacuum behind the rearmed West Germany upon which we shall then depend.

"There remains only one alternative: not a rearmed, neutral Germany which can play East against West, but a disarmed, reunited Germany neutralized under adequate safeguards . . ."

Japan—A Reliable Ally?

"South Korea informally charged yesterday that, once 'the treacherous Japanese' have been rearmed, they might join the Communists . . .

"The attack on Japan, Korea's traditional enemy, was contained in a statement issued by the Republic of Korea's Govment's Office of Public Information . . .

" 'The Korean theory is that if the United States insists upon rearming the treacherous Japanese, she (the United States) should insure herself and other free peoples from another program of conquest by the Japanese when they think the time is ripe . . .'

"Yesterday's Seoul statement said the Japanese expected and deserved punishment for the Pearl Harbor sneak attack; were surprised by American application of the Golden Rule and accepted the humane treatment while convinced 'Americans were foolish.'

" 'Gullible, foolish Americans who a decade ago were hated with a burning fury, the Korean statement went on, today fondly believe the smiling, beady-eyed, low-bowing Emper worshippers are sincere in their protestations of repentance for their misdeeds—or rather the misdeeds of their wartime leaders. Part of their line to to convey the impression that the average Japanese opposed the war but had no choice than to follow the leader.

" 'The Japanese and their Western hirelings would have America build up Japan as the bastion of democracy, as the fortress that should stand between Soviet Russia and North America to protect the very people the Japanese sought to subjugate and humiliate, dominate and enslave.

" '. . . the Japanese know they have not fooled everybody. Enslaved nations see through (Japan's) policies all too clearly. Such countries as Australia and New Zealand are alert to future dangers. But the United States attributes to other peoples the same high ideals and honorable motives that guide her international relations.' "

"Japanese ultranationalists are emerging from a nine-year hibernation.

"For the first time since Japan's defeat militarists, exterrorists, peasant leaders, and rightwing intellectuals have banded together in a Council for the National Salvation Movement, whose twin aims are the restoration of Emperor worship and of Japan's former hegemony in east Asia.

"The council has a star-studded cast of leaders of attempted putsches during the chauvinistic 1930's, including the assassins of two Premiers. . . .

"Observers believe, however, that the ultranationalists expect their influence on the expanding Army to grow in a more basic and subtle way. Already they are receiving substantial support from 'patriotic' industrialists. Already some members have infiltrated the ranks of the officers. But the major influence exerted by the ultranationalists on the Army is expected to come, as formerly, through the peasant recruits which will form the backbone."

(Takashi Oka in The Christian Science Monitor, 4-19-54)

"Japan is rapidly turning back toward systems of behavior outlawed or frowned upon during the long post-war Allied occupation, according to mounting indications here. . . .

"The most recent indication of a would-be return by the Japanese to systems that predated not only the Pacific war but also the nation's military totalitarian era is seen in a growing trend toward Governmental centralization and abdication of much of the local autonomy on which the Allied command insisted as the basis for a western-style democracy. . . .

"The swing away from Western innovations is somewhat more difficult to trace in the social conduct of the Japanese, but there are at least some indications that the same trend to the older systems is at work. One is the growing revival of the Shinto religion, which, with its worship of imperial and national ancestors, was one means the militarists used to work up nationalist feeling among the Japanese masses. Shinto was separated in the early days of occupation from Government support.

"The official subsidies have not been restored. It is now made known, however, that the Government spent some 200,000,000 yen ($55,000,000) last year to support the shrines as 'national monuments' and 7,000,000 Japanese engaged in raising more than treble that amount for the reconstruction of grand shrines at Ise. . . ."

"Since the end of the Occupation there has been a marked growth of nationalist groups in Japan. Some of the old prewar patriotic groups have been revived, and new groups have been formed. The trend has not as yet reached important proportions, but a nationalist reaction is bound to come in Japan. It may be a new nationalism based on Japan's culture; or nationalism may be captured by the militarist-minded and the chauvinist. The revival of reaction may become a troublesome problem for the Japanese. . . .

It is not impossible that the ultranationalists and the Communists might join forces, and such a union would produce a real danger to democracy in Japan."

("The New Japan," by Royden Dangerfield, Foreign Policy Association, December, 1953)

"In Germany the combines and cartels are returning; in Japan the great economic monsters, the zaibatsu, broken up by General MacArthur during the occupation, are re-forming. So much for the good intentions of the Allies in trying to save the occupied countries from great concentrations of economic power and to re-establish 'free enterprise.' As soon as independence is regained the old forms reassert themselves. . . . The industrial giants are reviving, with all that that means in the exercise of economic power over Government and people."

(The Manchester Guardian Weekly, 12-24-53)

"Masanobu Tsuji, one of Japan's most brilliant military strategists in World Warf II, has warned the United States to pull its troops out of Japan as soon as possible or 'the day will come when she will regret it.'

"He also warned 'a strong anti-American feeling prevails and is increasing in this country.' . . .

"Mr. Tsuji devised the strategy behind Japan's lightning invasion of Malaya and the capture of Singapore in late 1941 and 1942.

"He was listed as a war criminal by the Allied command, but was never captured. He has become a national figure since the end of the occupation. . . .

"An influential member of Japan's lower house, he said he has sent a letter to Vice-President Richard M. Nixon warning against American policy toward Japan.

"Mr. Tsuji said he made four points:

"1. The United States should withdraw its troops from Japan and not compel this country to rearm.

"2. The United States should admit the war crimes trials were a mistake.

"3. The United States should say what it expects to gain by Mutual Security Administration aid to Japan.

"4. The United States should reconsider and revise its policy toward Asian countries. . . ."

(Associated Press, 12-22-53)

"Academic freedom in Japan is facing its greatest postwar challenge. . . .

"The new laws would make it a criminal offense for a teacher in a public primary or middle school to advocate the cause of a particular political party, either within or without the classroom. . . .

"The chief proponent of this legislation has been Education Minister Shigeo Odachi, whole-heartedly backed by Premier Shigeru Yoshida and the majority Liberal (conservative) Party. . . .

"Mr. Odachi directed the wartime national police network as Home Minister. Before this he was prominent in the puppet governments in Manchukuo and Occupied China, and served as Mayor of Singapore under the Japanese occupation.

"His Vice-Minister, Yoshio Tanaka, former thought police chief in Nagasaki, also served as chief of the Thought Section of the Education Ministry and as a high official of the Manchukuo government.

"Finally, the chief of the Primary and Middle School Bureau, Shinichi Ogata, another former thought police chief in several prefectures, served under Mr. Odachi in occupied Singapore. Thus these gentlemen at some time or another, all participated in the notorious pre-surrender system of thought control, and for this reason were purged from public office during the American occupation of Japan.

"Since taking office last May, Mr. Odachi has pressed, not only for restrictions on teachers, but for revision of the social studies courses to place more emphasis on Japanese history and geography. A textbook describing the Japanese conquest of Manchuria as an aggression was disapproved, and a plan is afoot to revive the prewar system whereby the Education Ministry, instead of independent publishers, would compile all primary and middle school textbooks. . . ."

(Takashi Oka in The Christian Science Monitor, 4-2-54)

"Japanese war criminals convicted of wartime atrocities and international crimes against the Allied powers, who have been held in prison here, are dwindling rapidly in number due to extensive paroles, releases, amnesties, and completions of sentence.

"The prospect is that most of those convicted of crimes against the United States will gain their freedom in a few more years.

"The Japanese, moreover, feel strongly that all remaining war criminals should be released as soon as possible. . . .

"At first the war criminals were considered a powerful object lesson to the Japanese nation and they were roundly condemned by Japanese. This may have been mingled with relief that these few were bearing punishment for many others never brought to trial.

"Now, however, the lesson is wearing thin, and the imprisoned men gradually are coming to be regarded as special martyrs—the violence of their wartime activities long since forgotten. . . .

"It is clear, moreover, the Japanese do not regard the men in Sugamo as ordinary criminals. This is evidenced by the fact they are given virtual hotel treatment by Japanese standards, are permitted to vote in national elections, and even are visited by campaigning politicians. . . ."

(Henry S. Hayward in the Christian Science Monitor, 3-17-54)

"Japan is in trouble. Unlike Britain and Germany, it hasn't used the last five or six years in a really determined effort to rebuild its economic strength. . . .

"This harsh reality has jolted Prime Minister Yoshida's government into launching an austerity program—a salvage operation based on restriction rather than expansion. . . .

"Others think the drastic kind of reforms needed by Japan won't come until after a serious financial crisis. . . .

"Leadership in Japan might then be taken over by a radical militarist like ex-Colonel Masanobu Tsuji or a devotee of state capitalism like Shinsuke Kishikishi, who was once top economic planner for Manchukuo. Both would tend to favor the state controls and cartel policies that were used in Japan during the expansionist period of the 1930s. . . .

"An influential sector of the industrial and trading community is eager to expand trade with Red China—not only for the sake of the trade itself, but also as a sort of bargaining level with which to pry better economic treatment out of the West.

"What's more, a neutralist element is gaining strength fast in Japan. . . .

"Both the industrial group and the neutralist group see the Red Chinese market as the major escape route for the Japanese economy. They see Japan as the 'factory of the Orient,' the 'Switzerland of Asia.' "

(Business Week, 2-13-54)

"Japan is moving progressively away from the free enterprise system proclaimed here after the advent of Premier Shigero Yoshida's conservative government in 1948. . . .

"Instead there is being established a 'guided economy' with the government again proposing or imposing controls over the importation and marketing of many key commodities. . . ."

How Dead is Hitler?

by
SEFTON DELMER

A most sacrosanct dogma of U. S. foreign policy is the assumption that present-day Germany is a reliable and increasingly democratic bulwark against totalitarianism. Unfortunately, the American press in general tends to believe in the infallibility of this notion. As a result, full reporting on the pros and cons of this crucial problem is not always available to the American people.

A recent case in point is the absence of any reference in the press with respect to the sensational articles written for the London Daily Express by Sefton Delmer, its chief foreign affairs reporter and one of Europe's leading journalists.

Mr. Delmer has a world wide reputation. He was among the first newspapermen to report the disturbing symptoms in the 1920s which gave rise to Hitler. His present exposé created an uproar in Germany.It was the cause of bitter debates in the British House of Commons. Yet, none of Mr. Delmer's findings were reported in the American press. Because we believe that an informed public opinion can best help shape a sound foreign policy, we deem it our duty to reprint below the full text of Mr. Delmer's startling exposé.

A general was the first to make the request. "Please don't mention my name," he said to me. "If you do I shall be on the boycott list.

"Industrial firms will refuse to have anything to do with me if my views become known. Government agencies will give me no orders. My business will be ruined."

That does not sound very courageous I agree—particularly from a holder of the Knight's Cross and one of the most distinguished younger officers of Hitler's General Staff.

But it is a sentiment that I have had to hear with amazing frequency from Germans.

They are afraid of the new clandestine discipline that the German militarist machine is once more beginning to impose, even before its revival has been officially authorized by the Allies.

Yes, here I am, barely nine years after Hitler's suicide and militarist Germany's catastrophic collapse. And I am finding many of the same disturbing symptoms and portents I had to report before Hitler took power.

Under the Mantle of Innocence

Under the mantle of innocent Chancellor Adenauer, many of the same tendencies appear to be developing which, in the pre-war days of the equally innocent Foreign Minister Stresemann and, later, Chancellor Bruening, foreshadowed the coming of Hitler.

Look at the patriotic hue and cry now launched to throw out the "traitors and collaborators" from the Civil Service, from the newspapers and news agencies and radio.

Who are these traitors and collaborators? Opportunists who fawned on Hitler in the days of his power and helped him to reduce Germany and half Europe to ruins? No.

On the contrary. They are the anti-Nazis.

First and foremost among them are the emigrés—Germans who had escaped abroad before or during the war.

These men joined in the fight against Hitler during the war and won the confidence of the Allies. When VE Day came we brought them back to Germany and installed them as key men in the new democratic machine that was being built up.

The New Purge

Our intention was that they should be a guarantee against the revival of Hitlerism and militarism. Now all kinds of pretexts are being put forward for their removal. Anything goes, from inefficiency to alleged membership of the Communist underground.*

Also due for removal in this new purge are men with a genuine record of anti-Hitler resistance during the July 20 bomb conspiracy of 1944—and men who gave unfavorable evidence against German war criminals at their trials.

Former German officials dismissed or imprisoned by Hitler for anti-Nazi activities are by law entitled to rehabilitation, compensation, and reinstatement.

But every possible trick of official red tape is being used to delay indefinitely the decision on as many such claims for reinstatement as possible.

Unhealthy Symptoms

I have part of the confidential dossier concerning a former Prussian police officer who was imprisoned by Hitler, and then, after his release, went abroad as an instructor for the Chinese Army.

"By helping the Chinese to fight the Japanese," says the confidential report of a German general who sits on the reinstatement committee, "this man kept the Japanese from attacking Soviet Russia and helping the German Army in its struggle. As a soldier I deplore his conduct of contributing to the country's disaster."

Don't tell me that these cases, of which I could give so many more examples, are merely a healthy symptom of reviving Germany's national self-confidence, essential if this great soldier-nation is to help the West put up an effective barrier to Soviet imperialism.

I say they are a sign that:

(1) The rush to rearm Germany, prompted by the war in Korea, has already given back enormous clandestine power to the same militarists' and industrialists' clan that was behind the disastrous wars of aggression of Bismarck, the Kaiser, and Hitler.

(2) These men, despite their smooth protestations of "Europeanism" and devotion to the Western ideals of democracy, are out for themselves and their clique only.

They mean to oust from their positions of importance everyone whom they suspect might not be implicitly obedient to their orders.

(3) They regret nothing of the past but their defeat and the mistakes in leadership which caused it.

There can be no more sensational mark of the power of the rising militarists than the open defiance of the Potsdam Pact (which the Allies signed in 1945) by the public appearance of ex-Servicemen's associations in Western Germany.

These ex-soldiers associations were rightly forbidden by the Allies under this pact because of the immense share the associations had in the rise of Hitler and the growth of militarism.

* ALLEGED membership of an anti-Hitler Communist organization called "The Red Chapel" is the charge being trumped up for the removal from the North-West German radio of its controller, Professor Adolf Grimme, and one of his leading officials, Alexander Maass. Both of these men were appointed under British auspices.

And here they are again flagrantly in power. They meet in vast public assemblies, are addressed by Ministers of the Adenauer Government in fiery speeches containing all the dangerous chauvinistic ingredients beloved of military propagandists here from the Kaiser's day to Hitler.

Militarism on the March

The army has its special ex-Servicemen's regimental associations; so have the air force and the navy. Even the S.S. has its own associations.

They are openly allowed to bear Nazi names like "Parachutist Army Corps Hermann Goering," "Destroyer Squadron Horst Wessel," "Fuehrer Grenadier Division," and even "Fuehrer Bodyguard Division."

More outstanding still is that Chancellor Adenaur, who claims to have repudiated Hitler and militarism completely, should have permitted the formation of the so-called Steel-helmet Association. It looks to me remarkably like a revamping of the old Nazi Stormtroops, even to the jackboots, breeches, and shirts its members wear at political rallies.

As their president they have Field-Marshal Kesselring, pardoned war criminal, who publicly proclaims that he still preserves his full loyalty to Hitler and Goering.

Kesselring is now at work trying to have "war sport training" organized for the younger and more militant age groups among his Steelhelmets.

Ostensible reason, of course, for permitting the reappearance of these ex-Servicemen's associations is the help that they can give in recruiting and collecting members for the new German armed forces at such time as they are to be set up.

As significant almost as these new military and ex-soldiers' associations is the flood of military newspapers and periodicals which have burst all over Western Germany.

These newspapers and periodicals, of which there are more even than in the time of Hitler, are many of them subsidized and guided by the new Adenauer "War Ministry" of Herr Theodor Blank.

Many of their propaganda lines are reminiscent of Goebbels. "In Stalingrad our troops defended not only Germany but Europe," they preach. The restoration of the great Germany of the Hitler era is demanded by them.

They claim that Germany is entitled to the leadership of Europe, and promise that she will obtain it with her armies.

Echoing the Nazis

But then, what is surprising is such language from newspapers when the Cabinet itself contains men like Communications Minister Herr Seebohm, recently in London? He has publicly proclaimed such Nazi militarist views as:—

1. "The German East . . . not only includes the Elbe and the Oder, but also Bohemia and all territories in which Germans once were settled."

2. "In 1945 only the German Army, but not the Germany people, capitulated."

Jobs for the Gestapo Boys

A judge dealing with a case of alleged espionage by former German S.S. men discovered, in the course of the trial, that key men of the old Gestapo are creeping back into power in Western Germany. It so shook him that he caught the next train from Karlsruhe, where the Federal Court was sitting, to Bonn and asked for guidance from the Ministry of Justice.

Was he praised for his action? He was not.

Instead it is now being said of him in Bonn that "Old so-and-so is not the right judge for a case of this kind."

I cannot say I blame those Germans who are frightened of the growing power of the secret camarilla among them.

For it is growing. It came out at the Karlsruhe trial that inquiries had been made not by the Federal Republic's official agencies—neither police nor counter-espionage—but by agents of the unofficial and very secret service led by the top mystery man of Germany today—Major-General Reinhart Gehlen.

Until Germany's capitulation General Gehlen was head of Hitler's anti-Soviet espionage services. He is occuping the same position today unofficially on contract to the American occupation forces in Germany.

Gehlen and Globke

Just to baffle the judge a bit more it turned out that the four main witnesses for the prosecution—Gehlen men all of them—were S.S. men themselves.

"Perfectly logical to set an S.S. man to catch an S.S. man," some would say. "Let's get the most efficient men for the job regardless of the past." On the same assumption I suppose we ought to accept without a qualm that the Gehlen man in charge of this investigation was a former security service chief who had won the highest approval of Himmler for the ruthlessness with which he rounded up the conspirators of the 1944 plot against Hitler.

Well, it had the judge worried. I will confess I did not like it very much either.

And I still do not like it, not even after running into General Gehlen himself and finding him a most agreeable, clear-headed, very intelligent staff officer in the best Prussian tradition.

He was calling at the office of Dr. Hans Globke, Permanent Secretary of State to Chancellor Adenaur, just as I was leaving it and we had a little chat.

Dr. Hans Globke is a tall, bland man with the smoothest of smooth manners, a pair of very shrewd eyes behind rimless glasses. He is generally held to be the most influential backstage wire-puller in Adenauer's Germany.

He certainly has his fingers in the Gehlen pie. With alacrity he told me so himself.

"As soon as the treaties are ratified and we are entitled to have a secret espionage service once more," he said, "the general and his organization will pass officially under the control of the German Government.

"I do not say we shall take his staff over man for man. We shall want to have a say about the staffing. But in principle the Gehlen group will become the official German State organization."

Secret Operations

The doctor smiled mysteriously. "Until then," he said, "we must continue the present camouflage arrangement by which the Gehlen organization is under American control and paid for by the Americans, but under the closest contact with me."

Well, you could not wish for anything clearer and less ambiguous than that.

As for suspicions that the Gehlen crowd is a dangerous body likely to restore the secret rule of militarism in Germany, why, Dr. Globke assured me that he had personally investigated the Gehlen organization. So have a couple of parliamentary deputies. And all three of them had come to the same conclusion: there was nothing Nazi about them.

Furthermore, General Gehlen's activities were strictly confined to espionage and counter-espionage.

Now, of course, I admit that I am not as expert on matters of secret police as the doctor. For many years he was one of the top permanent officials in Hitler's Ministry of the Interior. He had plenty of contact with Gestapo matters then.

But I canont help feeling that he is misinformed about the staff of the Gehlen organization. Perhaps the general himself is not fully aware of the extent to which his group has been penetrated by former S.S. and security men.

Many Germans that I come across who have connections with such things have given me striking instances of this penetration. In the Hamburg branch, for instance, I am told, there are five well-known security service men working.

Misgivings

So I cannot help sharing the misgivings of another German general—who, as I mentioned yesterday, was most anxious that I should keep his identity secret for fear of reprisals against him if it came out that he had talked.

This officer believes that Gehlen is using his influence to see that it is the Nazi type of officer who gains control of the new German Army when it is formed, and not the anti-Hitler "traitors" of 1944.

For my part I think the rearming of Germany at this early stage is bound to have this effect whether Gehlen is active or not.

I am confirmed in that view by all I have seen of the incipient rebirth among the Germans of the old terroristic herd discipline, a hush-hush secrecy in which the germs of democratic freedom are already being extinguished even before the new machine is born.

Diplomatic Blackmail

I wonder whether our Mr. Eden and Washington's Mr. Dulles would preserve their blithe confidence in the usefulness of German rearmament if they could see a memorandum I have in front of me now.

It is a memorandum of Germany's post-Berlin foreign policy prepared by a former S.S. captain and ex-Ribbentrop diplomat, Dr. G. A. Sonnenhol.

The doctor is today the right-hand man of Vice-Chancellor Blucher.

This document has been the basis of a serious discussion of Germany's foreign policy by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Free Democratic Party.

This party is financed by the Rhine and Saar industrialists, numbers many ex-staff officers among its deputies.

Main point of the memorandum is that the cold war between East and West must be kept going by the Germans so that they can play off one lot against the other, reunify Germany, and assert and increase the power of the Fatherland.

It demands the formation of a big German Army "capable of fully exploiting German manpower reserves."

The thinking I find revoltingly reminiscent of that in Himmler's now famous address to the gauleiters at Poznan in August 1944.

On that occasion Himmler held out the possibility of an end to Germany's troubles by a truce with the Allies.

The Germans, he said, would play the Russians off against the West and then intervene triumphantly in the inevitable war, with a German people's army retrained, reequipped, and S.S.ified.

Take a glance at these extracts and you will get the idea.

After arguing that the tension between the victors of 1945 has already been exploited so successfullly that Germany is strong enough to abandon her policy of absolute reliance on the West and blind obedience to its orders, Dr. Sonnenhol says:—

"Our war potential has now become so great once more that such a policy (or subservience) is no longer permissible. . . . Germany's war potential, inconsiderable in comparison with the two opposing Powers, would become decisive if added to one side or the other. . . .

"Fears in the West of a German-Soviet understanding, coupled with the intransigence shown by the Russians at the Berlin conference, give a strong negotiating position to the Government which it can and must exploit."

German Aims

The memorandum formulates a number of immediate requirements for the Government.

The Government must declare immediately its refusal to tolerate any further delay in the formation of German defence forces.

Germany's security must be assured either by the creation of a national German Army, failing a European one, or, as an interim measure, by an increase in the members and equipment of the West German police to three times the strength of the police force in the Soviet zone. (This would give West Germany 36 divisions.)

Next, the Bonn treaty must be revised so as to remove the last restriction imposed on German sovereignty. In particular, all control of German arms production by the security board must be removed.

The restraints forbidding German industry to form trusts and cartels must be abolished. The Western Powers must return to Germans their foreign assets which were confiscated abroad. They must contribute also some financial assistance to help the West Germans relieve the distress in the German Soviet zone.

German trade and industry must be relieved by a special exemption from the restraints imposed on Western nations by the embargo on trade with Eastern bloc countries.

Germany should be given special permission to trade with China and the Soviet world.

Cold-War Profiteers

What is the argument with which all these demands are to be pressed on us? Quite simply: Blackmail.

"We must use the thesis in our discussions with the Western Powers," says Dr. Sonnenhol, "that Germany and the Soviet zone in particular are today suffering as martyrs for the Western peoples.

"Germany renounces the kind of reunification offered her by the Russians for the sake of the other Western countries.

"But Germany cannot be treated as a former enemy if one does not want to run the risk of the German potential one day being placed at the disposal of the Russians."

And just to ram that point home, the memorandum proposes that the West German Government should establish official trade representations in the Soviet Union, China, and the Iron Curtain satellite States. And also, of course, get into direct contact with the Soviet German Government in Berlin.

It is a telling document this, isn't it? And believe me, it is as close as can be to what the foreign policy will be which the Germans are in fact going to follow.

It is not too late yet. We can still veto Adenauer's conscription Bill. We can stop German rearmament dead. That would shatter these monstrous projects of Bonn's would-be cold-war profiteers.

Adenauer's Colleagues

Lord Pakenham wants me kept out of Germany.

My reports from that country, he tells the House of Lords, are "poisonous" and "puerile."

"No fair-minded person," he says, "who" (like himself) "has recently visited Germany could go there now and meet people of all sorts and then come away and say the generals were back or the Nazis were getting into the saddle."

If that is what Lord Pakenham thinks, let him look at these three names in Dr. Adenauer's Cabinet list:—

(1) Professor Theodore Oberlaender, Minister for Refugees, joined the Nazi Party in 1933. He occupied the rank of Stormtroop Chief in the Gauleiter's office for East Prussia.

(2) Herr Waldemar Kraft, Minister for Special Assignments, was a colonel in the S.S. and from 1943 onwards an official of Himmler's notorious Secret Police Service. His S.S. membership number is 347148.

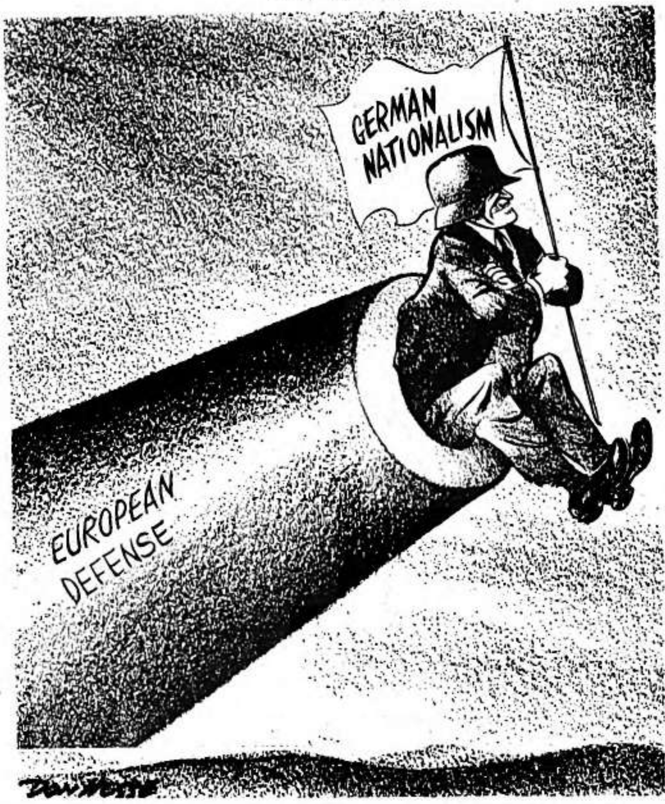
(3) Herr Victor Preusker, the Minister for Housing, joined the S.S. in 1933. For his part in "liberating the German economy from the Jewish yoke" Herr Preusker was presented with a special certificate of honor by Adolf Hitler.

And of course all these Nazi big shots in Adenauer's Cabinet have filled their Ministries with little Nazis.

All the same, I can understand Lord Pakenham's anxiety.

For he himself during his tenure of office as a Socialist Minister was responsible, among other things, for the denazification and re-eductaion of post-Hitler Germany.

THE PLUG



Hesse in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

It is bitter for him to have to admit that his work has failed. I for my part would readily acquit him of personal responsibility for this failure. The most brilliantly conceived policy was bound to collapse. For to achieve success it had to be implemented over a long term.

Only six years, however, after the fall of Hitler the Allies rushed in to rearm Germany for the defence of the West.

As the inevitable consequence Nazis and militarists alike today proclaim that this rearmament of Germany is a posthumous justification of Hitler as the champion of the West against Bolshevism—an ever-recurrent German propaganda line during the war.

The Misguided Lord

But I have another reason for sympathizing with Lord Pakenham in his distress. His visits to Germany are conducted tours. He meets the people the Germans want him to meet, hears the things they want him to hear.

His last trip was under the auspices of the Anglo-German Society. It invited Pakenham to lecture to members in Düsseldorf and Bonn on Anglo-German relations.

I wonder what would have happened if Lord Paenham had visited Germany under similar auspices in the pre-Hitler era say in 1929 or even 1931 or 1932.

Would he not too have denounced me as poisonous and puerile for reporting, as I did then, that the German Reich was breaking the disarmament clauses of the Versailles Treaty, that real power in Germany had once more become vested in the German generals, that despite the denials of the "pacifist and progressive" Foreign Minister Dr. Stresemann, a German air force was being secretly trained in Soviet Russia?

I rather fancy that Lord Pakenham, like so many other wishful thinkers of those days, would have pooh-poohed the warning I gave after my first interview with Hitler in March 1931 that "Germany is marching with giant strides to join the Fascist nations of Europe." Believe me, I am no German hater. I have sympathy for the average German.

But I know too well how easily he falls a prey to the jingoist hallucinations of military grandeur, as opposed to the sober, democratic rule of law.

I have seen his indoctrination. As a small English boy at school in Germany, in the Kaiser's time, I went twice a week to "war classes" where the master pumped into us hate of Germany's neighbors and arrogant pride in Germany's past military achievements.

Together with my fellows, I stood to attention when our moon-faced master with the duel slashes on his cheeks entered the classroom and roared: "I want to see soldiers, not lousy civilians!"

Later, I accompanied Hitler on his election tours, watched him pouring his own fanaticism and aggressiveness into the same simple Germans.

The Price

I realize the danger to Western Europe from Soviet Russia and its satellites, but to bring all this nationalist militarism back under Allied auspices is a price that I consider too heavy.

Particularly in view of the certain German attempt to exploit their position between the two blocs to "hot up" the cold war and blackmail us with potential desertion to the East.

That is why I have taken the trouble to report the new danger symptoms to be found in Germany today.

Germans with Guns Can't Be Trusted

by
J. F. GOLAY

J. F. Golay is former head of the U. S. Secretariat of the Allied High Commission in Germany and is now working on a study of the Federal German Republic at Oxford University.

The American public, preoccupied with the menace of Soviet power, has become accustomed to regarding the European Defense Community as the magic solution to the defense problem in Europe and to forget that there are serious risks in rearming the Western part of a divided Germany. EDC was devised by the French in response to an American desire for the rearmament of Western Germany in the days after the beginning of the Korean War, when any addition to the strength of the West seemed worth considerable risk. The pressures of those days have abated and many of the French, for whom Germany is a problem of first priority, are reconsidering their position. We also would do well to think again.

The rearmament of Western Germany will almost certainly mean the end of any chance of reunifying Germany by four-power agreement; but it will not be the end of the problem of German reunification. It cannot be supposed that once the means of conducting a German policy are in their hands (i.e., German divisions exist to support their diplomacy), the Western German government and people will be content passively to submit to the division of their country indefinitely. They will surely embark upon a policy aimed at bringing about reunification and the recovery of the Polish-administered territories. Indeed, the program may not stop there.

There are signs here and there in the Western German press and the pronouncements of politicians that the Germans will not be satisfied with the 1937 frontiers. For instance, Rudolf Lodgman von Auen, writing in the December issue of Aussenpolitik, Western Germany's equivalent of Foreign Affairs, of which Professor Wilhelm Grewe, Chancellor Adenauer's adviser on international affairs and special representative at the Berlin Conference, is an editor, outlines a "German and European Eastern program," to be realized within the framework of an American "roll-back" policy in Europe, the next phase of which, he says, will be aimed at the "restoration of a genuine balance between East and West."

In the course of the article he maintains that a future German government would be well within its rights under international law to re-open with Czechoslovakia its re-occupation of the Sudeten region in 1945. Where all this will lead, no one can say, but having regard to the past, it seems safest to assume the worst. The present leaders of the Federal Republic may genuinely believe that the promotion of a reunification policy could be kept within the limits of peaceful action. But every lesson of history and of our own experience teaches that in matters of this kind there will, sooner or later, be a resort to force. It is well to remember that since the peace of Westphalia in 1648 finally set the seal on the disintegration of the old Reich, there have been nearly 20 wars in Central Europe arising out of the territorial disorganization of Germany and the territorial ambitions of Germany and her neighbors.

Chancellor Adenauer has more than once said that the establishment of the EDC does not mean closing the door to reunification, but, on the contrary, that it provides the best means for reunifying Germany.

The American High Commissioner, Dr. James B. Conant, has recently echoed this view. It is difficult to see what it could mean unless it is contemplated that force, or diplomacy based upon the threat of force, is to be used at some stage to compel the Soviets to hand over the Eastern Zone—and perhaps other areas. But even if, in the future, the Western German government conducts its policy with circumspection and the fullest regard for its obligation to its European partners, there would still exist in the situation where Eastern and Western German troops faced each other across a frontier the danger that incidents, arising from tension between the pro- and anti-Communist factions, could not be isolated and might lead to general war.

An ancillary cause for concern over West German rearmament (within either the EDC or NATO frameworks) is the fact that, although the German voters decisively rejected the extremist parties in elections last autumn, there are now reports that, as plans and preparations for rearmament go forward in Western Germany, members of the militarist, industrialist and Nazi cliques are finding their way back into places of power and influence, while democratic-minded Germans —those who resisted the Nazis and many of whom were installed in posts of authority by the Allied governments— are being ousted or sidetracked on one pretext or another.

Is it really worth exposing ourselves to these risks for the sake of 12 German divisions? Although the SHAPE generals have assured us that a German contribution is vital to Western security, it is, with due respect to expert opinion, difficult to see how this could be. If the present British and American forces are to remain in Western Europe, then of course 12 German divisions must be counted an addition to strength. But whether they could make a vital difference to the power of the West to resist an invasion in force, where the aggressor was able to dispose of forces three or four times the size of those of the West, seems doubtful.

The main deterrent to Soviet aggression lies in another form of strength. The function of ground forces in Western Germany would appear to be limited to that of discouraging attempts from the East to assimilate the Western Zones of Germany by political and economic penetration, and perhaps by use of Eastern German forces, where in the absence of Western defense troops an ambiguous situation might develop. But if Allied forces are to remain on the continent for this purpose, Western German contingents seem superfluous. On the other hand, if Western German troops are eventually to replace Allied forces, as seems likely since neither the United States nor Britain is prepared to give categorical guarantees on this point, then there loom all the dangers of rearming a Western Germany which, without the counterpoise of American and British forces, would be in a position, as the strongest member of EDC, to dominate its partners.

It seems more sensible to leave things the way they are in Western Germany for the present. Objections may be raised as to the cost to the American taxpayer of maintaining these forces in Germany indefinitely. There is no reason why the Western Germans should not make an increased contribution toward the cost. They are well able to do so. They are now paying at the rate of 7.2 billion Deutsche Marks toward the support of Allied forces in Germany, whereas experts some time ago estimated that a fair German contribution toward Western defense should be substantially greater. Furthermore, if the Western Germans had to raise and equip their own forces without outside aid, it would certainly cost them much more than DM 16 billion for many years to come. This arangement would no doubt be unpopular with the Western Germans, who would not care about paying more for troops which are not their own, but after two disastrous world wars, we do not owe the Germans an army, and if maintenance of the peace requires that their protection be provided by Allied forces, the Germans should meet a fair share of the costs. Properly regarded, it is no detraction from its dignity or prestige that the German Federal Republic does not have armed forces of its own. Except for security matters, it has had the practical exercise of all the important attributes of national sovereignty for more than two years. This could now be made a de jure sovereignty by putting into effect all except the security provisions of the Bonn Conventions.

In the long run, of course, another solution for Germany must be found. At the Four Power Berlin Conference last February, neither the Western Foreign Ministers nor Molotov was prepared to propose or explore solutions which would meet the preoccupations of both sides and which might therefore have had some chance of leading to an agreement. Mr. Molotov's European security plan, which, it appeared, would leave no one secure except the Soviet Union, was matched by the Western Ministers' invitation to Mr. Molotov to agree both to free elections in all of Germany and to the right of a reunited Germany to rearm and ally herself with whom she pleases—a proposal which, in prevailing circumstances, amounts to asking the Soviet Union to agree to the installation of German, American and other Western defense forces on the Oder-Neisse line.

What alternative solutions might have been put forward? It might have been suggested that the stationing of Allied occupation troops should be continued for a definite period, say five years, at the end of which security arrangements and the future status of Allied troops in Germany would be reviewed. In the interval, the reunification of Germany, the formation of a freely elected German government, and the negotiation of the provisions of a peace treaty, except those dealing with security, might have produced conditions making it easier to resolve this problem. In a variant of this proposal, the occupation forces would be withdrawn from the central area of Germany—the Russian forces east of the Oder-Neisse rivers and the US, British and French troops west of the Rhine.

Another alternative which might have been canvassed is the admission of a Germany, reunited on the basis of free elections, to the United Nations and the establishment of a United Nations' defense force for Germany. Such a defense force could be composed as to one-third of contingents recruited from Germany, and as to the other two-thirds, in equal part of contingents of the present occupation powers (say, 100,000 German troops and British, French, American and Russian contingents of 50,000 each). The command of the force could be for a specified period and could devolve in turn upon a national of each of the countries participating, beginning, perhaps, with a Russian and concluding with a German commander. There would be an integrated international command staff. In time the contingents of other member countries of the United Nations might replace some or all of those supplied by the present occupation powers. Such a scheme would make it possible for Germany to be neutralized as a military force in Europe without leaving a vacuum. At the same time, it would enable the German people to play their rightful part in the protection of their independence and homeland. It would look to the day when the occupation powers could be relieved of the burden of maintaining troops in Germany. It would not disturb the present relationship of forces between the power blocs, but would provide a transition to a genuinely international solution of the problem of European security. Finally, it should strengthen the prestige and authority of the United Nations, no small desideratum in itself.

It is easy to find objections to this or any formula of which one might think, for any road to a settlement of the German problem will be beset with difficulties. But if the four powers have the will for a settlement, a solution will be found. The important thing is to keep the way open until the will exists. We cannot do better for the present than to stand where we are in our relations with Western Germany. This is no time for bold moves and "dynamic" policies, which can only have the effect of deepening the division between East and West, creating fresh causes of tension, and closing more of the avenues by which agreement might ultimately be reached. To be sure, the Soviets started the whole thing and were the first to re-establish armed German forces. But is the West compelled to make the same mistakes? Going the Soviets one better is not a policy; it is a one-way ticket to disaster. The Western powers must be strong, but they must also be wise —wise enough for themselves and, if necessary, for the Germans and Soviets as well.

". . . It is being gradually realized that it is extremely difficult for the United States to meet the power of unfriendly dictatorships by trying to rush democracy in the under-privileged areas of the world.

"Even top American diplomatic sources have admitted privately there is not much chance of maintaining democracy in Germany over any length of time . . ."

Friedrich Wilhelm Foerster—85th Birthday

On June 1, 1954, the Carnegie Endowment International Center was the scene of the celebration of Professor Friedrich Wilhelm Foerster's 85th birthday. The co-chairmen of this important event were two outstanding American scholars—James T. Shotwell, the President Emeritus of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, and Alvin Johnson, the President Emeritus of the New School for Social Research.

Those who paid homage to Professor Foerster on this occasion, experienced the thrill of listening to the great tributes rendered to this world renowned philosopher, historian and humanist by such outstanding intellectual leaders as Albert Einstein and Lewis Mumford. Together with the speeches made by Professors Shotwell and Johnson, these laudatory remarks reveal the profound influence that Dr. Foerster has exercised during the course of his 60 years as a courageous fighter for peace, truth and freedom.

Professor Foerster was born on June 2, 1869, in the very heart of the State of Prussia. Thus, his life and experiences extend from the days of his childhood under the severe Prussian atmosphere of Kaiser Wilhelm I, to the apocalyptic era of two world wars. From the very beginning Professor Foerster recognized the reasons for the moral decay of the German nation and the danger to world peace inherent in the aggravating Prussianization of Germany. "In official Prussia," he once wrote, "I always felt a native of an area occupied by the enemy."

The struggle against German militarism and Pan-Germanism is intimately linked with the name of Foerster. The intensity of the persecution launched against him was itself proof that he was one of the few leading Germans who had been able to perceive the real nature of German policy, whether it was the empire or cloaked by republican institutions.

Writing in his magazine "Die Menschheit," July 8, 1927, he warned the world as well as his people, "This much should at last be clear to us: The masters of Germany today need peace and want peace, but only in order to prepare for war and to be armed upon a date which will be decided by the weakness of her neighbors. The date will fall anywhere between 1933 and 1938."

Foerster's ability to make such a prophecy was based on his historical perspective enriched by his many years of living in Germany as a German. It was his masterful comprehension of German history, his profound understanding of the German people—their psychology, traditions, political and economic interests—which made him a genuine authority on the German problem.

Following World War II, the Western Allies had a choice and an unprecedented opportunity. They could have followed the sage advice of Professor Foerster with respect to the postwar treatment of Germany, or they could have turned to the same personalities and policies which helped make Germany the breeding ground of two world wars. They took the latter course and now they face the blind alley of disaster.

Professor Foerster knew that the Western Allies were tempted to "solve" the German problem as they did after World War I. He appealed to the Western Allies, "Don't let us be fooled again." Through his writings Professor Foerster endeavored to establish guideposts that would enable our policy makers to develop a realistic approach to the solution of the German problem. He was aware of the fact that some of our statesmen believed that the German people were capable, by themselves, of exterminating Nazism. Foerster's reply was unequivocal as it was full of meaning: "If the overwhelming majority of the German people were not still national-socialist, then their armies would not fight as they are fighting. Nor would the extermination of National Socialism, which is merely the most recent manifestation of the Pan-German disease, really hit the root of the trouble. The deep-lying root is the Prusso-Teutonic megalomania that admits no self-examination. It refuses to recognize any right other than might. When others prove stronger, however, it lays claims shamelessly to the principles of the Atlantic Charter. The protection of the Atlantic Charter will then be utilized to facilitate a new attack against the moral basis of humanity."

Professor Foerster knew that there were voices in the Allied camp that were trying to separate the vast majority of the German people from their Nazi leaders. He realized that if the Allies accepted this distorted picture of the situation in Germany, their policies would turn out to be ineffective as they would be based on false premises. Therefore, he spared no effort to expose the myth and illusions which were rapidly built up by pro-German propagandists. In analyzing the allegation that World War II had been caused by Hitler, Foerster wrote:

This is a dangerous untruth. World War I and World War II are the logical result of the power-madness and megalomania which has smouldered in the German educated classes for more than 100 years. It means therefore deceiving oneself and deceiving the world, if one spreads the illusion that after this war the victors will be greeted by a people anxious to be liberated from tyranny. The tyranny was the evil passion in which they almost all shared and which was bound to bring about the final eruption. So we have to face after this war an unconverted majority which will wait and see whether or not the victors can be deceived once more. This spirit will find its revival, unless all illusions are finally brought to an end and, unless a people that is politically on the level of 12 year old boys, is brought under a long-term tutorship."

As an educator of great repute, Professor Foerster stressed the importance of a realistic approach to the problem of German re-education: "Certainly, re-education of the German people cannot be effected by foreign teachers and educators. It can only come through a radical political re-orientation of the German people itself. This re-orientation will be possible only if Germany—in the East and West—is ruled and watched by such overwhelming power that she will come to the inevitable conclusion: The Potsdam Era is finished in German history.

"People cannot be formed by so-called 'education' but only by encountering stern realities. Such a stern lesson was lacking after the last war. If it is not brought home to them now, then everything will be lost, and all sacrifices of blood will have been in vain."

We have no doubt that, had the Allies accepted these principles as the basis of their own re-educational program, they would have been far more successful in developing the spirit of democracy in Germany.

In spite of the great difficulties which Professor Foerster has encountered in his long but dauntless battle for justice and peace, he remains a confirmed optimist. His speech on his birthday celebration reflected his confidence in the ultimate victory of righteousness. It is with great pride that the Board of Directors, the Advisory Council, members and staff of the Society extend to Professor Foerster, one of the founders of our organization, their warm felicitations on his 85th birthday.

LAUGHTER IN THE HOUSE

[There was laughter in the House when the Foreign Under-Secretary "hoped" the bombing of Vickers' and Miles Aircraft by British-trained Luftwaffe pilots "would not occur again."—News item.]

Hear the Commons' hearty laughter
Silencing the sceptic's voice;
Now, when Goering's men return,
Will they British secrets learn?
Do they train, to bomb us after?
Hear the Commons' hearty laughter!

Germany has made her choice.
Trust the German's good intentions,
Reap the harvest of goodwill;
If Bonn's pilots Britain trains,
Germany will buy our planes.
Profit by the Bonn Conventions,

Trust the German's good intentions,
Give the German good for ill.
Build up Civil Aviation,
Welcome the Luftwaffe Band!
Let war-aces pass the test,
Eager to defend the West,

Greet them without reservation,
Build up Civil Aviation,
Strengthen Nato's Air Command!
All-forgetting, all-forgiving,
German confidence is won!
Can such contacts, freely made,

Vital for defence, and trade,
Wrong the dead, insult the living?
No! Forgetting and forgiving
Gives offense to none!
Welcome Goering's men with gladness,
Let them Britain's trust enjoy!

Mighty they be our foes hereafter?
Hear the Commons ring with laughter!
Welcome Goering's men with gladness . . . .
Laughing gods afflict with madness
Those they would destroy.

MARK THIS WARNING

". . . I do not think that E. D. C. itself is a satisfactory organization. It seems to me to be a politician's nightmare, and some quite well known military men consider it to be a military nonsense. Where are these Germans going to be when placed in E. D. C.? I presume they are not going to be sent to France or Italy, but will be used in Germany. There they will be facing their brothers in the East, while all around them businessmen, professors bound on cultural relations, traders, every sort of person will be moving into East Germany to make their ties and contacts.

"But across the line West German troops will be facing East German troops. It seems to be nonsense. What about the German reserves and staff? We cannot have German troops without reserve and staff . . .

"Will they glare at the East Germans, and make ready to fight them? If not, will they fraternize with them? Why not? Their very families may be moving across the frontier. Cultural relations may be established between them, and they may cross the frontier for their holidays. If they do fraternize, how shall we prevent a secret order of battle being written? How are we to prevent a secret network of communications being arranged between East and West to by-pass E. D. C. altogether? When the West Germans are ready, and the communications barriers to the East have been removed, they may very well rip the whole thing out of the framework of E. D. C. and join up with the military formations in the East. Then, with the bickering and disagreement between ourselves and Russia—the Suzerain Powers who won the war and who cannot continue in friendship now—the Germans will be well away. They will say, 'We are back to 1939,' and the whole thing will begin again . . ."

(Viscount Hinchingbrooke in the House of Commons, 2-25-54)

"A second false estimate of great consequence has been in the working assumption of our German policy. Officially we have failed to appreciate the paramount importance of German reunification ocer the so-called integration of a partitioned Germany in our Western military coalition.

"We are now witnessing the breakdown of this policy which has been founded on a false estimate of the German national interest—on the naive notion that Germany, or any other virile nation, could be expected once rearmed, not to insist upon achieving its own reunification and liberation either by fighting or negotiating with the Soviet Union."

Voices of The "Fatherland"

by

T. H. TETENS

Two years ago a highly respected Catholic priest, Father H. A. Reinhold of Seattle, Washington, traveled through Germany where he visited his relatives and had long intimate talks with many acquaintances and friends of bygone days. Father Reinhold's return to his native land was, as he admitted, a "disheartening experience." Among the things which shocked him in particular was the attitude displayed by the Germans when he introduced himself as an American and explained that "citizenship papers imply loyalty to the adopted country." They did not take it seriously. On the contrary, they assumed that Father Reinhold was "just pretending." It did not occur to them that it was possible for a man born in Germany, to become "a real American."

Father Reinhold reported his unique experience in the new Germany in a remarkable article which appeared in the Catholic magazine "Commonweal" in January 1953. His general impression was that there is again an "ineradicable superiority feeling" in Germany and that "the average German today has a sovereign contempt for America." According to Father Reinhold, the Germans told Americans all kinds of soap stories in order to cover up their old sins, but as soon as they think they are among themselves or talk to a trusted "co-racial," they divulge their true feelings and convictions.

Perhaps this German attitude would not be so serious, were it confined to Germany proper. It so happens that the idea of eternal loyalty to the Fatherland is propagated in communities of the Western Hemisphere wherever persons of German ancestry reside. In this connection, certain German-American organizations and sections of the German language press in the USA are utilized as transmission belts.

The Record

During Warld War I, a thorough investigation by the U. S. Senate and the Justice Department established that millions of German-Americans were organized in the National Bund (German National League) which was an effective propaganda arm for imperial Germany, and that some German-American groups operated as sabotage and espionage centers. The National Bund was dissolved in 1918 by Congressional order, but the German-American leaders soon afterwards proceeded to set up a front organization, the Steuben Society, which subsequently became the main political pressure group for the Pan-German element in the U. S.

After World War I the Steuben Society, in close collaboration with the New York Staats-Zeitung and dozens of other German language papers, organized an effective whining campaign for the revival of the defeated Fatherland. For many years the German-American press has faithfully served Pan-Germanism. Long before World War I, the German press attaché in Washington, Emil Witte, referred to the New York Staats-Zeitung as "the powerful instrument for molding American opinion in favor of the policies of the German Reich."

The German-American Press

For decades the New York Staats-Zeitung has been regarded as the policy making publication for the entire German-American press which, at one time, numbered about 350 papers and periodicals. During World War I all the German papers took a determined pro-German stand. In 1917, the editor-in-chief of the Staats-Zeitung, Georg von Skal, was exposed as a paid agent of the German Reich.

When in 1933, Hitler ascended to power, the German-American press rushed solidly to the support of the Nazi regime. In those days, the Steuben Society and the Nazi Bund rallied the large German-American "Volksgruppe" behind the Swastika and pledged loyalty to the Fuehrer. Hitler's agents Colin Ross, Fritz Kuhn and hundreds of others, preached the gospel of "Unser Amerika"—a Germanized America. It was the time when Nazi indoctrinated Germans swelled the ranks of "America First." It was the time when certain U. S. Senators delivered speeches which were ghost written by the agent George Sylvester Viereck who was paid by the Nazi government.

It is worthwhile to remember that in those years the German language press in the U. S. hailed enthusiastically every act of German aggression: the "Anschluss" of Austria, the annexation of Czechoslovakia, the conclusion of the Hitler-Stalin Pact, and the ruthless attacks on Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland and Belgium.

The details of the far-flung Pan-German conspiracy here in the United States were disclosed in the sensational libel suit brought by Professor Friedrich W. Foerster against Victor Ridder, the publisher of the New York Staats-Zeitung. During the three weeks trial before the New York Supreme Court in 1945, every single point of Professor Foerster's charges was confirmed by documentary evidence. It was established that thousands of German organizations in the United States had been put into the propaganda service of the Fatherland, that the German language press had acted as a propaganda vehicle in the expectation that every German-American would work as an agent for the interests of the Reich.

Pan-Germanism Triumphant

Due to generous American help after World War I, Germany made a fabulous comeback during the Twenties. It is now generally recognized that the Germans again have scored a great political success in the United States: They have changed defeat into victory. This constitutes a startling repeat performance: twice within a generation defeated Germany was rescued by the economic and political help which she received from the United States.

During both world wars the American public became acquainted with what has become known as the Pan-German propaganda apparatus in the U. S. During World War II, when our statesmen and politicians admitted past mistakes, the Western Allies, particularly the Americans, resolved that this time the victors must not fall again for the German scheme of sweet double talk and deception. However, the best intentions evaporated into thin air as soon as the impact of the war lessened and the memories of the Nazi atrocities faded. At that moment, the Pan-German propaganda came to life again. Again, as after 1918, the call reached German-Americans that the Vaterland must be bailed out from total defeat through the political influence of the German Volksgruppe in the U. S. Thanks to skillful propaganda the U. S. accepted a second time the thesis that Germany was destined to function as "bulwark against Bolshevism." Thus it was reasoned, Germany must be reconstructed as a powerful economic, political and military factor. In close relation with this political doctrine, the idea was developed that Germany must grow into a greater Lebensraum of a "United Europe" which naturally shall be dominated by the Germans as the economic, political and military masters.

The German language press in the U. S. played a significant and sinister part in helping Germany regain a role in world power politics. During the first few years of Germany's occupation, when all political activities and newspapers were under strict control, the German language press in America kept the German political thought alive. In those years thousands of copies of German newspapers from the New York Staats-Zeitung down to the smallest paper in California were sent to Germany week after week. They kindled the hope that a new powerful Germany would some day be re-created. In 1945-46 the German press in the U. S. carried on an effective whining campaign and demanded quick help for their suffering "co-racials." Soon afterwards they initiated the propaganda line designed to absolve the German people from the guilt of World War II. In 1947, they demanded that the dismantling of German war plants be halted; an end to denazification and the termination of the war crimes trials. In 1948, the tactic shifted. A noisy campaign to prevent the execution of the war crimes sentences was launched.

The American authorities yielded to German pressure on every point. Millions of Nazis went free under a special amnesty. We poured billions of dollars into Germany. Powerful German monopolies were revived and the evil elements of Nazis and militarists found their way back into the political parties. Since 1949 the German press in America has clamored for German remilitarization, for more economic help and financial loans, for the return of German assets, and for the creation of a German-American alliance.

The "Shakedown"

The latter suggestion has to be taken with a grain of salt. Behind this idea is another ruse to squeeze from Uncle Sam far reaching economic and political concessions. As shrewd manipulators, the Germans are eager to exploit our anxieties, but would they ever fight for us in case of a showdown with the East? There is ample evidence to prove that the German-American press never propagated the idea of Germany as a bulwark against the East in good faith. From the beginning they used this scheme as a bait to gain advantages and concessions so that the defeated Vaterland could become again the queen on the chessboard of world politics. Exactly as in the Twenties, the German-Americans pressured both major parties, the Democrats and the Republicans, as well as the Washington Administration, to build up Germany as America's main ally. The record shows that they succeeded in forcing both parties into a competition to give preferential treatment to the "Fatherland" or expect unpleasant reactions from the well organized German voting bloc.

Steuben Society in Action

Let us look at the record and see how the Pan-German pressure group has operated in recent years. In the "Steuben News" of May 1953 we find an illuminating survey about the "legislative work" of the Steuben Society for the period of 1945-1952. We read that the ill reputed McCarran-Walter Immigration Act was "the result of three years hard work" by the Steuben Society:

". . . Our Legislative Committee set down, section by section, our ideas and submitted them to Senator McCarran—in particular a provision that no German national should be excluded from immigration to this country who only involuntarily had joined the Nazi Party or the German Army."

The Steuben Society organized a large scale pressure campaign to admit wholesale immigration of former Nazis under the harmless term of "Expellees." They also "appealed to all Senators and Congressmen, to reject the Humphrey-Lehman bill." The Steuben Society "arranged for telegrams to be sent to the members of the Senate (and) many units followed this up, also other large German-American organizations."

In the fall of 1945 the Steuben Society started a pressure campaign for "German Relief." Hundreds of millions of dollars were spent out of the U. S. Army budget during the early days of occupation. In July 1948 the Steuben Society scored "a signal victory" when Congress approved nearly $500 million "for feeding the starving German people." This was only "the breaking of the ice," because "in 1949 and thereafter we did not experience any opposition in making a continuing reappropriation through Congress."

". . . A prominent West German politician, Reinhold Maier, addressing a student audience at Stuttgart on March 5, painted a bitter picture of the situation in West Germany. Maier is a bourgeois democrat of conservative tendencies, but he is opposed to Adenauer. He said: 'The general political aspect of West Germany is alarming. Parliament has already slipped down a stage. Ruler number 1 is the Adenauer government. Ruler number 2 is the high bureaucracy. Parliament has been deprived of its power, and the army will be Ruler number 3. But the army will not be satisfied with third place for long: it will soon move forward to first place.'

"Neo-Nazism will not come to power in West Germany, however many ex-Nazi officials strut the political stage. Nazi Germany will not return, but the militarist, imperialist Germany of 1914 and 1938 is rapidly coming back. The generals and industrial barons who led Germany into two world wars are gaining more and more power, and remilitarization will put them in the saddle."

(Carolus in The Nation, 4-17-54)

In March 1948 the Steuben Society initiated a bill in Congress "providing for the discontinuance of further plant dismantling in Germany."

We could fill a few columns with examples showing the German-American pressure combine at work in Washington. We mention here only the Bricker Amendment to curb the treaty making power of the President; new bills for increased immigration of Nazi "Expellees" and for the return of German property; a bill opposing U. S. participation in the United Nations; and numerous petitions and protests in behalf of the Fatherland.

It may seem unbelievable that an almost unknown organization like the Steuben Society can operate as a most effective pressure group in Washington. This Pan-German lobby has influenced and determined to a large extent vital phases of of our postwar policy. What makes the Steuben Society tick? The "Steuben News" boast proudly: "Yes, we have many good friends and numerous members among senators, congressmen, mayors, governors, and other persons in public life." The Society works in "concerted action" on the principle: "Party affiliation is and must be of secondary importance to us."

History Upsidedown

A main objective of the German-American press is the "rewriting," rather falsification, of recent history. In a new version of World War II, Hitler is exonerated and as the real villains appear Roosevelt and Churchill:

". . . there is no doubt any more that Churchill and former President Roosevelt worked hand in hand to create that war against Germany which it was so hard to start, because much-maligned Hitler did everything in his power to avert it.

"So now it is clear, that England and America are responsible for world war two . . ." (Editorial in the Chicago Bürger-Zeitung, 4-28-54)

If the war guilt rests with the British and the Americans, the Bürger-Zeitung comes to the conclusion, that "the damage which was done to Germany by bombing her cities (must) be made good." Thus, some day Germany may be expected to come forward with a claim for huge war reparations from the Western Allies!

Speaking about the "war guilt" of Churchill and Roosevelt, the Chicago Bürger-Zeitung of April 22, 1954, declares:

"Both men will stay before the bar of history as the guilty ones who have brought more misery over tortured mankind than anybody else."

In the Philadelphia weekly "Nord-Amerika" of June 3, 1954, the American born Professor Austin J. App, a fanatical pro-German propagandist, calls the Allies "ruthless enemies" and says that a "probably insane Roosevelt forced the insane policy of unconditional surrender on Germany." Dr. App has constantly demanded that Congress should officially repudiate the "international crime" committed in Yalta and Potsdam, "to which America became a partner only because of Soviet traitors and German-hating non-Christians in our midst." (Nord-Amerika, December 3, 1953)

According to Dr. App, the "British, the Jews and the Roosevelt Administration" are the real villains because "those three groups got America into the war (and) they betrayed half of Europe and half of Asia into the Soviet tyranny." (Nord-Amerika, February 25, 1954)

The California Staats-Zeitung of April 24, 1954, stated:

"During the early years of his administration, Roosevelt served the interests of Great Britain; in later years when his Communist leanings became more and more predominant, he adjusted his policies toward the Soviet Union. Thus, he succeeded in betraying the West and selling out half of the world to Moscow."

On the question of war crimes, Germany is absolved in every respect. The Fatherland was forced by war necessities to act harshly whereas the Allies committed deliberately thousands of unspeakable crimes. The Steuben News of November 1953 reported that a German publisher in Buenos Aires issues a book with "almost two thousand sworn statements by German officers and soldiers charging Allied forces violated rules of war." Out of these two thousand crimes, the American forces "were accused of 1,094 crimes, the Russians 528, France 171, Great Britain 57." The balance went to the smaller nations like Poland, Yugoslavia, Norway, Holland, Denmark.

The Chicago Bürger-Zeitung of April 22, 1954, enumerates the following crimes committed by the Western Allies in prisoner-of-war and internment camps:

"Mistreatment and severe beatings of cripples and destruction of their crutches and braces; . . . branding by using burning cigarettes on faces, necks and breasts; kicking out teeth and braces and stealing of gold caps and fillings; mistreatment of helpless women and children behind barbed wires; . . . shooting of defenseless prisoners of war; using internees as shooting targets; attempts to kill and bury internees alive; . . . thievery, robbery and blackmail . . ."

Smearing Our Allies

For many years, the German-American papers have carried on a systematic campaign of smear and hatred against Great Britain and France. The aim is simply to picture these powers as "unreliable" and to convince Washington that it might be better to give the lion share of foreign aid to Germany.

The Chicago Bürger-Zeitung called the French "the eternal trouble makers in Europe" and Nazi Germany was "fully justified when she gave France the licking it fully deserved." The British are constantly pictured as warmongerers who are motivated by trade rivalry. The disintegration of the British Empire is strongly applauded: "For no country has brought more trouble, death and destruction into the world, for the reason, that British merchants were enabled to make more money than England." (Chicago Bürger-Zeitung, 10-29-53)

In an editorial in the "Deutsche Wochenschrift" of St. Louis of October 1, 1953, it is argued that the United States should drop its friendship with the British, for "Great Britain is not a dependable Ally." The same paper charged on February 4, 1954, that there was a conspiracy between the British, the French and the "wire pullers around Bernard Baruch" who have exerted their influence in Washington to keep Germany forever divided. It is charged that the Berlin Conference was manipulated as a "deliberate betrayal."

Smearing U. S. Leadership

Is the United States immune from such vituperations and filthy attacks? By no means! It will be recalled that two years ago the German SS General Ramcke made a speech before a cheering officers meeting in which he accused the USA of being the real war criminal, a charge frantically applauded.

The German language papers often charged that General Eisenhower, during World War II, furthered Soviet imperialistic designs by his publicly expressed anti-German attitude. In an article of September 25, 1952, the weekly Nord-Amerika stated:

"Eisenhower's action as victorious general should never be forgotten. Let us refrain from mentioning details. Suffice it to recall his sympathy for the Russians and the turning over of German prisoners of war as slave laborers to France, England and the Soviets."

The same article depicts Eisenhower as part of a conspiracy between the "unholy trinity (of) Free Masons—Moscow—Wall Street" and asked whether Eisenhower knows that he is continuing "to play the game of Hiss-Roosevelt."

Similar attacks were made in other German language papers which hold Eisenhower "responsible for the terrible catastrophe that has befallen Germany." On August 28, 1952, the Bürger Zeitung in Chicago reported a mass meeting of twenty thousand German-Americans where it was stated that "German-Americans will have no part of the General."

"Let no German-American be so forgetful of the land of his birth, and of his forefathers, that he send to the White House a man who in the past has so shockingly proved his utter disregard of Germany, and of a defeated, fallen enemy's human rights. Let no one here dishonor his German ancestry by voting for the man who permitted the unchristian hordes of Russia to occupy that fair capital of Germany."

On November 26, 1953, Dr. App denounced Eisenhower for having backed the policy of a severe peace for Germany and that he did not have "as keen an eye for Soviet crimes as he had for Nazi crimes."

With the exception of the New York Staats-Zeitung which has to consider Jewish subscribers and advertisers, most German-American papers have expressed more or less anti-semitism and a strong backing of Senator McCarthy. The weekly "Nord-Amerika," wrote on July 30, 1953, under the headline "Yalta and McCarthy":

"What McCarthy represents and does is only the expression and last result of the thorough self-criticism of the American policy of the last few months of the war and the first few years of the postwar period. This is the practical effect of the revisionism, i.e. the examination of the political developments resulting from Teheran and Yalta. . . .

Today there are no influential Americans who would dare to defend the policy of Unconditional Surrender, the partition of Germany or the inhuman expulsion of Germans from their homeland. The efforts to find out those responsible for the policy of revenge and to take away from them forever the possibility of influencing future U. S. policy is the essential background for Senator McCarthy's activities. . . . Today all efforts center around the elimination of the consequences of Yalta and Potsdam. The ousting of all persons responsible for Yalta (Morgenthau boys) is a prerequisite to carry on a peaceful revision."

It is an alarming sign that the Pan-German propaganda endeavors again to indoctrinate German-Americans. Statements have appeared in the German language press that German-Americans must "fight for the interests of the old homeland" or, that a "united front of German-Americans is necessary in order to undo all injustice committed towards Germany under the shameless agreements of Yalta and Potsdam." (Bürger Zeitung, 1-7-53.)

The old leaders of German-American societies who once pledged allegiance to Hitler, are active again. According to the New York Staats-Zeitung of May 28, 1954, the Foreign Institute in Stuttgart has also taken up its world wide operation under the experienced hand of the old time Nazi Dr. Franz Thierfelder. The Foreign Institute was dissolved and outlawed by the Allies after 1945 for having served as the headquarters of the Pan-German conspiracy. Now it is back again, giving advice and guidance to the German "Volksgruppe" in the United States.

". . . In fact, France's policy toward the Saar since the end of the war has been based mainly on its economic claims. It should be remembered that France's share in reparations was substantially reduced when Britain and the United States agreed to the economic union in 1947-48. Moreover, the economic interdependence of the Saar and Lorraine is so close that the French have been able to produce a confidential Nazi memorandum which emphasizes this even more strongly than their own experts. France is the best customer of the Saar coalmines, and the Saar blast furnaces get practically all their iron ore from nearby Lorraine, on which they are much more dependent than on Ruhr coking coal. Moreover, the secondary industries which have sprung up since the war find their best market in France, and it is generally believed that reunion with Germany would wipe them out since they could not stand up to German competition. The Saarlanders' larder can be filled much more easily with French than with German food. The setting up of the European coal and steel pool has increased rather than reduced French insistence on having the Saar coal and steel production added to their own because, if it were restored to Germany, it would make German preponderance in the pool quite overwhelming . . ."

". . . It is now realized that London and Washington can only win the confidence of Western Germany if Britain and America cease to treat the leaders of the Wehrmacht as war criminals. To win the confidence of those who now rule Bonn, it is not sufficient merely to sign a treaty which ends the Occupation. The concept of German war crimes must be expunged from the historical records. Since Bolshevism is now recognized as the enemy of Western civilization, the slur must be removed from the honor of the German army which was prematurely anti-Bolshevik in 1941.

Hands up all those in favour of a rearmed Germany!

"...The former Wehrmacht generals, who are awaiting better days, are busily writing books and the aim of these books is fairly clear . . .

"The aim of this avalanche of military writing is to remove the taint on the record of the Nazi Wehrmacht by recording with seeming impartiality its deeds in the last war. The proper moment for its release is well chosen. If faith in the competence and moral reliability of the military leaders is to be secured in Germany and abroad, it is essential that the officer corps be exonerated from Hitler's misdeeds. This is being done with skill and determination. The effect, in German eyes at any rate, must be that Germany's military leaders are not only blameless for the Second World War, but that they are also the best men available for the job now at hand. Not only are they reliable, but their advice should be listened to and heeded . . ."

"There was no mourning in France when the recent Berlin conference seemed to doom Germany to partition for an indefinite period. If that suited Moscow, it also suited the French, who share with Moscow a deep fear of the Germans.

German Trade Unionism and Free Enterprise

In the Summer 1951 issue of Prevent World War III we published an editorial on the German trade unions where it was stated "that a vigorous trade union movement in Germany, democratically organized and run, can, together with other elements of society, be of value in fashioning a democratic structure both industrially and politically." It is a matter of record that official U. S. policy was also predicated on this supposition. Nevertheless, both U. S. officials and American trade unionists shared misgivings lest the German trade unions fall prey to the paternalistic traditions of the past.

The tendency to sacrifice independence became apparent with the introduction of the "co-determination" which provided for trade union participation in the determination of policy in private industry. From its very inception Allied officials suspected that this institution would induce the trade unions to support many undemocratic features in the German economy including the cartels and trusts. As reported by the London Economist (2-10-51) this turned out to be the case: "The union leaders support cartels and vertical trusts in the Ruhr."

It was our contention that if the German trade unions embraced the bankrupt and backward past, they would contribute toward the weakening of democracy in Germany and help undermine the workings of a competitive economy which is the basis of a free society. Have the German trade unions in the last two years been effective in helping to democratize the social and economic order in Germany? In other words, have they lived up to the expectations of the Allies who regarded them as an essential bulwark against the pernicious traditions of authoritarianism in Germany? Perhaps this cannot be answered completely at this time but there are trends which are particularly significant and deserve to be noted.

On December 12, 1953, Business Week ran a special article entitled "The New Germany: Nucleus of a New European Economy?" In describing the upsurge of German economic power, Business Week noted: ". . . it would be a mistake to think of Germany today as a freewheeling economy on the American pattern. There are still some government controls, and a fairly heavy dose of welfare-statism. What's more, the old cartel philosophy and a "feudal" type of management is coming back in German industry." It had been assumed by Allied observers that the reversion to the old ways would be opposed by the German trade unions. However, according to Business Week, current developments are by no means encouraging: "The position of trade unions in Germany is in sharp contrast to the union position in the U. S. Instead of concentrating on the fight for higher wages and better working conditions, German unions have put most of their postwar effort into achieving 'codetermination' . . . But codetermination hasn't really increased labor's power." Thus, the trade unions appear to be falling back on old patterns, albeit under new forms, such as co-determination.

In a similar vein, Fortune Magazine (April 1954) notes that "the German drive to work is both reinforced and made rigid by a tradition of obedience. . . . The devotion to the prerogatives of authority stems partly from a tradition of state and industrial paternalism and partly from the lack of a tradition of civil and personal liberty of the kind that flourished so long in Britain and was then exported to North America . . ."

Discussing the position of the German labor movement with respect to this paralizing paternalism which breeds political despotism and economic authoritarianism, Fortune (May 1954) declares: "One looks in vain to German labor for any relief from this rigidity."

The present role of the German trade unions was the subject of a report to the New York Times (2-26-54): "The West German trade union movement, resurrected after World War II with the design of becoming one of the main pillars of the new democratic order, is causing keen disappointment among some of its United States Sponsors." The report mentioned that there had been a serious decline in union membership which was attributed "to the timid quality of the trade union leadership, the abhorrence of any militant action to raise the wages and living standards of workers and finally the relapse into the traditional pattern of thinking, that places a welfare society emanating from the fountainhead of government above trade union action."

The apparent failure of the German trade unions to fully exploit the opportunities which were presented to them following the end of the war, has had its repercussions with respect to living standards in Germany. In the early part of this year, the German trade unions launched a drive for higher wage scales but toward the end of April the situation had changed. The New York Times (4-25-54) reported that the executive board of the German Trade Union Federation agreed to urge all member unions to desist from further demands for wage increases and "to accept the status quo in the interest of internal stability." According to the Times, this decision meant that the German trade union leadership had submitted to the terms of the German industrialists. Just as they had consented to abide by the wishes of the industrialists with respect to wages, so, the New York Times noted, "have they also bought the policy of the petitive market for industry . . ." German trade union leaders seem to be so captivated by the alluring promises of the co-determination policy that they have neglected the immediate requirements of German labor. In practice this has meant that the standard of living of the average German is lower than that which obtains in other major industrial countries. To quote Fortune: "When management and labor go to bed together, it is usually the consumer who gets raped."

Walter Freitag, Chairman of the German Trade Union Federation, admitted that the average German works longer and gets lower pay than laborers in other highly industrialized nations. (New York Times 5-10-54)

Time (2-15-54) reports that the West German standard of living is about 15 per cent below that of Britain and France. It has been estimated that while German steel workers receive an average wage of $25 for a 40 hour week, the comparable figure for an American worker is $91. The low standard of living in Germany is in sharp contrast to the booming German economy and the rapid growth of the productivity of the average German worker. Thus, the gross hourly wage of industrial workers increased 2.6 per cent between 1952 and the end of 1953, while the productivity per man/day increased 15 per cent and overall production 20 per cent. In spite of the increasing productivity of German workers the domestic national market is relatively narrow. In the case of automobiles, for example, the greater portions are shipped abroad because they are out of range of German pocketbooks. Thus, the famous Volkswagen which at one time was supposed to be Hitler's gift to the working men, finds its major markets abroad rather than at home. Of the 20,000 employees of this automobile concern, only 412 can afford the cars they make.

In this connection the authoritative London publication The Banker (March 1954) notes: "German surplus with Europe is sometimes attributed to Germany's internal economic policy which is said to have held down German consumption by deflationary fiscal measures and by income redistribution in favor of the rich."

Harold Stassen, Chief of U. S. Foreign Operations, has stated that "nations with highly favorable balances of payment should lead the way to raise internal consumption . . . "In making this observation Mr. Stassen had Germany in mind. However, the powers that be in Germany have other ideas. They are out to undermine the trade position not only of England and France but of the United States as well. Here is the way Time Magazine put it: "West Germany today is out to conquer the conquerors in the field of trade." The "cooperation" of the German trade union leaders has been essential for this purpose and they have come through with flying colors. The policy of the German trade union leadership was succinctly defined by Dr. Strohmengler, a union official and labor director of the Oberhausen steel works: "Unless our industry can compete successfully with other nations we will have unemployment. That means postponing wage increases until our plants are fully rebuilt and modernized." (Wall Street Journal 8-31-53)

In the United States and in Britain union leaders have always insisted that the essential function of unions is to raise living standards of their members; but the leadership of the German trade unions has another approach the consequence of which are described by the New York Times (4-25-54): "The preservation of the low wage levels, the guranatee against labor troubles and the elimintion of all worries concerning the internal market are some of the trump cards West German industrialists hold in their coming struggle for foreign markets. . . ."

In concrete terms the position taken by German trade unions is enabling German industrialists to gain unfair advantages on the world markets. The impact has been very serious with respect to the competitive position of recartelizing of West German industry. In effect, this means the indefinite continuation of a closed non-com- U. S. merchants abroad. Like British and French colleagues, they too are now experiencing the assault of the German industrialists whose power is buttressed by cheap

"Alfred Von Krupp, whose huge munitions works supplied arms to Hitler even before he took over Germany, and who was sentenced to twelve years imprisonment as a Nazi war criminal, has left Essen, Germany, for Nassau and Mexico City.

"In the latter country he is slated to confer with President Ruiz-Cortines and Mexican officials about the financing of the new factories, dams, mines or power plants under conditions calculated to cut the ground out from under the U. S. A.

"The conditions are:

"(1) A price of 20 per cent down, and the balance to be paid four years after the completion of the factory, dam or project.

"(2) Krupp will do this without seeking part-German ownership in the enterprise.

"(3) He will accept payment in any currency, hard or soft, or is even prepared to accept payment in kind.

"Krupp's proposals and his tour of Latin America have caused a lot of eyebrow raising among the Latin-American diplomats friendly to the United States and even inside the State Department.

" 'Krupp,' remarked one diplomat, 'happens to be the product of the Dulles policy of building up Western Germany. Now that Mr. Dulles has helped wash the blood of Mr. Krupp's hands, he lets him go down to Latin America to take our trade away.'

"Note—Krupp already has $160,000,000 in contracts for steel mills in India . . ."

labor. These industrialists are supremely confident that in spite of military defeat they can overtake their adversaries. Thus, in the field of airplane manufacturing which up to now has been prohibited in Germany, a leading industrialist, Hermann Kastner, boasted: "But once our aviation industry gets going, we will be a tough competition. After all, a German will work for two marks (46 cents) an hour while an American wants at least $2. So we cannot undercut American plane producers in the world markets. We will be one of the leading nations in plane production, along with America and Britain five years after we start." (N. Y. Times 6-7-53)

The Germans are not only blitzing the world markets but threaten to seize strategic sectors of the U. S. market as well. For this purpose they are using as their battering ram their cheap labor led by a docile leadership. A spokesman for the National Electrical Manufacturers Association representing 546 domestic electrical equipment makers, declared that German products are entering the U. S. in increasing quantities. The principal expense involved in the manufacturing of these items is labor; "that's where the Europeans have the advantage and Germany most of all." (Wall Street Journal 12-15-53)

In our previous article on the subject of the German trade unions we described how the leadership in the 1929s "displayed servility to the German monopolies and cartels" at the expense of fostering a truly free society. We expressed the hope that they would throw off the tradition of the past and assume a posture of independence, but from the foregoing can it be said that they are facing up to these responsibilities?

After Germany's defeat in the first World War the German trade union leaders believed that the restoration of the huge monopolies and cartels was synonymous with the development of a healthy economy. Therefore, instead of working toward the creation of a competitive system which would include an independent trade union movement, they went along with the old crowd dominated by the Ruhr barons. For their collaboration and their success in curbing the demands of their members, they received a pat on the back. In a speech of gratitude on behalf of one prominent union leader, Carl Ligien, the Ruhr industrialist Hugo Stinnes told his fellow tycoons: "Gentlemen, this was a great action of wise self-restraint. At that time Carl Ligien was one of those who saved the life of our nation." This dubious tribute to the role of the leadership of the German trade unions should be a warning to the present leaders. In the course of exercising "self-restraint" they may be sacrificing the great opportunities which the German trade unions have had since the end of the war to join with other sections of the population in building a free democratic society.

EXCHANGE STUDENT MAKES GOOD!

". . . In Washington and other free-world capitals, Chancellor Adenauer and the new German Foreign Office operate with tact and quiet dignity . . . most of the diplomats in the Bonn Foreign Service who served under Ribbentrop —34 per cent of the total—were wisely kept at home.

"It now seems, however, that these former Nazi officials are longing to see the world again. Some of them seem to feel it is high time that Americans, like most Germans, learned to accept the idea that they served Hitler only 'nominally' and that their membership in the Nazi party must no longer be considered a social disgrace . . .

"These same people . . . also feel it is time for Germany to blow her horn a little louder. As Germany begins to conduct her own foreign policy and diplomacy, she must have her own propaganda set-up . . .

One of the authors of this plan is one Georg von Lilienfeld, who gained some experience in German propaganda in the U. S. as an exchange student during the early Hitler years. He later distinguished himself as an aide to Ambassador Rudolf Rahn, Hitler's personal envoy to Mussolini's North Italian strongheld during the last stages of the war. Denazified with the aid of his American-born wife and some connections with Allen W. Dulles' wartime OSS in Switzerland, Lilienfeld now heads the Amerika Abteilung in Bonn's Federal Press Office . . ."

WHY?

"McCarran's specialty is State Department papers. And his purpose is to get preferred treatment for German contractors in the construction of $400,000,000 worth of U. S. air and naval bases in Spain.

"For months, McCarran has been carrying on a one-man crusade to force the State and Defense Departments to change the American agreement with Spain so the Germans can be cut in on these juicy contracts. The treaty with Spain limits contractors to Spaniards and Americans. McCarran, in his furious backstage operations, has gone to the length of personally negotiating with Spanish officials and forcing the State Department to summon Major General August Kissner, head of the U. S. Military Mission, to Washington to be grilled by McCarran . . ."

"TOO BLATANT"

"A resolution opposing the rearmament of West Germany was approved unanimously by the National Executive Committee of Britain's second largest union today.

"The action by the leaders of the Amalgamated Engineering Union was another indication of the strength in the labor movement of the opposition to arms for the West Germans . . .

"The reasons given for approving the resolution were that there was a 'revival of nazism too blatant to be concealed' in West Germany, that rearmament would increase international tension and lead to a third world war and that there still was a chance to establish a peaceful, united and democratic Germany."

MOVING BACK

"Teheran, Iran.—While Uncle Sam is opening his wallet to help Iran stay out of the Communist clutch, the Germans are moving back into this country . . .

"The only country ahead of the Germans as a source of supplies is the United States. Much of what Uncle Sam ships here is a handout under the $23,000,000 foreign aid program, while the Germans get paid for what they send . . .

"An American with experience here added 'The Iranians admire the Germans,' he said, 'because the Germans are firm . . .'

"One of West Germany's first plans is to start sending in propagandists to tell the German story to the Iranians in their own language. They will pick up the operation started by Hitler and dropped only when the British shipped out Shah Reza Pahlevi."

ACQUITTED

"The entire German press, with the exception of the local Dortmund newspapers, ignored the trial and acquittal yesterday of 20 members of the Dortmund police force on charges of murdering numerous Jews in the Nazi Warsaw Ghetto.

"The local press reported that witnesses had testified that the policemen, members of a special guard battalion in the ghetto, shot Jews as a sport and tallied the number of their kills on mess hall doors and walls. Several of the defendants had actually confessed before the trial . . .

"One of the major points of the indictment was that these 20 had executed 100 male and 10 female Jews as hostages for the 'murder' of one Nazi, a 'murder' which it was proved never occurred. It was also noted that the commander of the unit had instructed the men always to shoot to kill when firing at Jews, else it 'did not pay to use gasoline' as they rode through the ghetto . . ."

"The Nemesis of Power"

by
JOHN WHEELER-BENNETT

Reviewed by Frederick Wallach

Part I

A favorite quip making the rounds in Europe runs like this: "Geneal Clay was a success. He succeeded in rehabilitating the Nazis. Former U. S. High Commissianer John J. McCloy was a success. He succeeded in rehabilitating Krupp and other Nazi industrialists and war criminals. Only present U. S. High Commissioner Dr. James B. Conant is a failure: he did not succeed in rehabilitating the German militarists."

Back in "Business"

Unfortunately, as every newspaper reader knows, the "rehabilitation" of the German militarists has not resulted in failure. It is a fact that the German generals are back in the business of power and politics. Refusing to avoid the follies of the Weimar Republic, the Bonn Government has allowed the military to retain gifts of land and money with which their Führer used to bribe them. Indeed, the Bonn Government has added to their comfort by presenting them with generous pensions. This performance is the more remarkable as the few surviving Jewish civil servants who were fired by Hitler, are still awaiting their pensions.

The Generalität (the German "Big Brass") is again a power in the Bundestag, in industry, and in the civil service. It commands the blind obedience of that large political potential consisting of veterans organizations which were formed with Allied approval—although these outfits are illegal under present Allied laws.

The militarists are busy writing their tawdry memoirs in which they glorify their "victories" and blame their defeat (if they are still Nazis) on other generals who had participated in the abortive putsch of July 20th, 1944. On the other hand, they may blame Hitler in the event their Nazi colors have faded, for the present at least. Nevertheless, both groups remain united in upholding the myth of a new "Dolchstosslegende" namely, that the 'invincible" Generalität had been robbed of victory by a "madman," "traitors" and "Soviet spies."

Other generals are now in command of the Civil Defense, the "labor service units," the "border police" and other police formations all of which take on more and more the appearance of units of the former Wehrmacht.

Chief of the Military Intelligence is the notorious Nazi General Gehlen who commands a secret service which is just as inept as that which obtained during World War II. Other Nazi generals are "on loan" all over the world, intriguing especially in Spain, the Arab world, and other trouble spots which are presenting great problems for the Western Allies.

The "Boost"

However, the Nazi generals received their greatest boost when former Secretary of State Acheson derailed American foreign policy by hitching our national interests onto that freakish engine, the EDC. For nearly 4 years this strange contraption has been puffing smoke which has blacked the earth but has failed to generate steam. The net result of this switch has been the restoration of hundreds of Nazi generals to power, influence and wealth. They have been made respectable, introduced into Allied councils and allowed to reorganize their beloved "Wehrmacht," at least on paper.

It is now considered a source of pride to have been a Nazi general and many delightful hours are spent in arguing whether Nazi decorations should be worn with or without the Swastika. At other times the German veterans assemble to listen to the harangues of Nazi generals denouncing Allied "crimes." It was at one of these gatherings that President Eisenhower was vilified with the epithet "Schweinehund" (pigdog). Another current delight for the Nazi generals is the hounding of those few of their colleagues who had survived the putch of July 20th, 1944. They are branded as "traitors."

All this, of course, could not have happened had the State Department demonstrated genuine determination to uproot the forces of German militarism. As a matter of fact, the State Department has declared quite frankly that it is not opposed to the use of "individual" Nazis and SS officers providing they are "reliable"—whatever that may mean.

As to the use of convicted war criminals, the State Department intimates that this bridge will be crossed at the appropriate time. It appears that the bridge has been crossed already. The war criminal Field Marshall Kesselring (released from prison because of "cancer") is now in command of the important veteran organization Stahlhelm which united with Hitler in the "Harzburg Front" to overthrow the Weimar Republic in 1933. Recently he inspected U. S. air installations as "guest of honor" of U. S. officers.

When Adenauer's chief military adviser, General Heusinger, holder of the rare "July 20th" medal which was bestowed for loyalty to Hitler, praised the executed war criminal General Jodl as a "decent chap" and when the German "Defense" Ministry contributed to a "soldier's calendar" which displayed a full-page photo of the war criminal Admiral Raeder (still in prison), the State Department continued its silence.

The Price of "Realpolitik"

It may very well be that Messrs. Acheson and Dulles feel proud of these "successes." To be sure 300,000 Americans had died in upholding the principles of the Atlantic Charter. Point 8 of the Charter expressed the view of the signatories:

"They believe all of the nations of the world, for realistic as well as spiritual reasons, must come to the abandonment of the use of force. Since no future peace can be maintained if land, sea or air armaments continue to be employed by nations which threaten, or may threaten, aggressions outside of their frontiers, they believe . . . that the disarmament of such nations is essential . . ."

To be sure the Germans were supposed to be disarmed in accordance with the Four Powers Agreement of September 20, 1945, and subsequent laws and regulations of the Allied Control Council. Indeed, this policy was sanctioned by Dr. Adenauer's signature to the Petersberg Protocols (1949). To be sure, special care had been taken to insert in the Bonn

Constitution Article 139 which reads:

"The legal provisions enacted for the liberation of the German people from National Socialism and militarism shall not be affected by the provisions of this Basic Law."

But was it not true that pragmatism, meaning that only the results count, guided the thinking of our policy-makers? Is it not true that we are in a struggle for survival against Russian Communism? Is it not true, as Princeton's Eric F. Goldman has stated in his brilliant "Rendezvous with Destiny" that we had become "Reform Darwinists"—sworn to the belief that every means is justified in the struggle for survival? Is is not true that George Kennan, one of the architects of our foreign policy, has stated that we should forego moral and legal scruples and base our policies on the necessities of Realpolitik? Consequently, have our diplomats committed a "wrong" when they extended their hand to Chief of Staff Guderian, to the war criminal Alfred Krupp, or to the 3 Nazi Ministers in Chancellor Adenauer's cabinet?

Perhaps those who support the remilitarization of Germany, believe that nothing is lost but moral scruples. Really nothing? What if the Germans should decide to team up with the Russians à la Tauroggen? Or embroil the West in a war for the "liberation" of the Eastern territories? Can we be sure that all of the risks were worthwhile and that German rearmament will contribute decisively to a situation of Allied strength which, as is devoutedly hoped for in Bonn, Washington and London, will drive the Russians headlong to the Urals.

Facts to Consider

The truth of the matter is that no Allied general will dare to stake his reputation on the claim that 12 German divisions submerged in an unworkable and top-heavy European army package, will tip the balance of strength against Russia. Thus, the American public has been fed balderdash. It does not matter as to whether or not 12 German divisions can seriously stop Russian aggression. Only one thing matters according to one unnamed German official: "We (Germans) must prove . . . to be willing to pay the highest sacrifice for freedom." ("Life," May 10th, 1954) "Life" has another recipe for those unwilling to discuss defense in "spiritual" terms. "With (12 German divisions) Western defense could make impossible a successful Soviet ground attack without direct reenforcement from the USSR—demanding use of the 5 key rail lines that cross the Vistula and make easy targets for western air power."

The optimism of "Life" is not shared by General Guderian who has had first-hand experience with respect to the capabilities of the Soviet armed forces. In his recent work "Can Europe be Defended" he declared that Allied plans for the defense of western Europe are "doomed to failure" and that "an eastern aggressor could reach the Atlantic coast before effective help from overseas could reach the continent." (N. Y. Times, May 17th, 1954)

It is not only a question of the strength of the Russian army. The fact is that our policy-makers have overlooked one simple think; you cannot cover up the blood-stained hands of German militarism. Perhaps the average European is not too concerned with regard to the growth of Nazism within Germany or the re-emergence of war criminals to positions of power and influence. But all of Europe pricks its ears when it hears talk of rearming the Germans.

The reasons are plain. Europe has suffered too much at the hands of the Germans. The millions of dead and maimed are not yet forgotten. Cities are still in ruins. The marks of the concentration camp have not been erased. Lidice, Oradour, Warsaw, Rotterdam, Coventry, Dachau, Belsen, Buchenwald are not forgotten. Nor can Kesselring's massacre of Italian hostages be forgotten, even if an American general's wife should link arms with him in a gesture of friendship. (N. Y. Times, June 4th, 1954)

The victims of the Nazis are still seeking restitution and compensation denied to them by a German civil service crawling with Nazis. The victims of the inhuman experiments of the German medical profession are not amused when they read in their papers that their torturers are freed.

A Word of Advice

The writer of these lines is not a Monday morning quarterback. Together with other persons interested in the German problem he has consistently warned, both in articles and in letters to the press, that Germany's neighbors would not accept the rearmament of Germany. This task has not been pleasant particularly since the build-up of a strong and powerful Germany has become an article of faith which no one is supposed to question. Our weak voices have not been heard.

I hope and pray that our policy-makers will now accept this piece of advice: stop badgering the French to ratify EDC. Nothing is impossible in this world and you may succeed in ramming through this program. What of it? You will gain nothing. It will cost you the loyalty of millions of the democratic masses of Europe for they will have no part of the militarization of Germany. The net result will be a hopelessly divided Europe which can fall prey to the blandishments of totalitarian forces.

The "Nemesis of Power"

There are many outstanding books dealing with the dishonorable role played by the Generalität in the Hitler era. They are all unanimous in placing the blame squarely where it belongs. "It was (the generals') blind loyalty and obedience, their mystical chauvinism and reverence for authority, their philosophy which put the State above man, their 'code of honor' which led in the end only to dishonor that combined to produce moral disintegration and national catastrophe." (Hanson W. Baldwin, N. Y. Times, April 19th, 1953)

Among the outstanding books in this field are "Sword and Swastika" by General Telford Taylor, "The German General Staff" by Walter Goerlitz and "In the Nazi Era" by Sir Lewis Namier.

In this field we now welcome a newcomer, J. W. Wheeler-Bennett's "The Nemesis of Power. The German Army in Politics 1918-1945."

There is no single work from which our pragmatic policy-makers and generals —indeed the people as a whole—could profit more. Honest scholarship, gifted language and a keen insight have combined in creating a masterpiece of first rank. The reader, after having gone through its more than 800 pages, will have attained new horizons, and blurred visions will become clear. Wheeler-Bennett tells the story how the German army survived defeat in 1918 and having survived, succeeded in dominating the political life of the Weimar Republic. He describes how the army, by withdrawing from the active political arena but secretly collaborating with Soviet Russia, furthered its power and influence within the Republic. He shows how the army led Germany down the road to military, political and spiritual disaster when the army relinquished its remote control and entered the field of active politics.

Wheeler-Bennett reveals the German army's responsibility for bringing the Nazis into power; for tolerating Hitler's infamies and for not having taken the measures to remove the criminal Nazi regime from power.

From the pages of Wheeler-Bennett's work emerges the black picture of the Generalität, damning in its "moral cowardice" (Reinhold Niebuhr, The New Leader, March 10th, 1954); guilty of accessorship to Nazi crimes; servile, stupid and dissolute.

The reader is in for a shock. Wheeler-Bennett after having documented painstakingly his (and the world's) case against the Generalität, demolishes it in his introduction which apparently was written years after the book had been finished.

Calling his book a "moral tale" he refuses to draw the moral from it and comes out for German rearmament although the documentation contained in the book proves how suicidal it would be for the West to go through with German rearmament. What has happened? Is history in Shakespeare's words "a tale told by an idiot, all sound and fury, signifying nothing?"

Was Wheeler-Bennett seeking the favors of Churchill or his Oxfordian partisans? We don't know. We can only marvel at the phenomenon of a genius destroying his work and hope that he will recant.

But the reader cannot be spared another detail. Wheeler-Bennett, in his introduction, starts correctly by quoting Mirabeau's famous observation (1788): "La Prusse n'est pas un pays qui a une armée, c'est une armée qui a un pays." And he added, "La guerre est l'industrie nationale de la Prusse." Wheeler-Bennett writes then in the same introduction, that Mirabeau's forebodings well may be stilled now that Prussia has disappeared from the map. Is this again "cant"? If Prussia is her Army, then Prussia is recreated as soon as there is again, with Wheeler-Bennett's blessings, a German Army.

We shall try to forget the dismal introduction and will point out the highlights of the main work which are unassailable and brilliant.

The Political Testament of General v. Seeckt

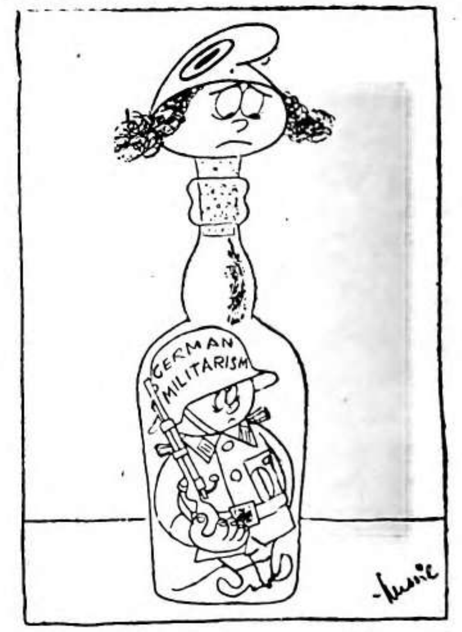
Wheeler-Bennett shows that it was not Walter Rathenau and Joseph Wirth who were the fathers of the Treaty of Rapallo (April 17th, 1922), by which the diplomatic and commercial relations between Germany and Russia were resumed. Rather was it Gen. v. Seeckt, organizer of the "Reichswehr," who sired the Treaty as an instrument for overcoming the military disaster of 1918. We are indebted to Wheeler-Bennett for having printed Seeckt's political treatment which is contained in his memorandum of September 11th, 1922, "Germany's Attitude to The Russian Problem." Since this memorandum is the key to the "riddle" of German current foreign policy, whose aim it is to overcome defeat, its salient parts are reproduced:

"Germany must pursue a policy of action . . . For carrying it out it is essential to assess one's own strength correctly and at the same time to understand the methods and aims of the other Powers . . . The main point about the treaty (of Rapallo) is not its economic value . . . but its political achievement . . . Its strength lies in the fact that the economic rapprochement is preparing the way for the possibility of a political and thus also military association . . . There is no danger of countermeasures on the part of our western enemies. We are not confronted with the question whether we should face East or West . . . We will follow at all times a German policy, that is, to examine . . . how the (egotistic) interests of the other (nations) can be exploited for the benefit of our people for tomorrow and the future . . . France follows a policy of (German) annihilation pure and simple, which she must follow in pursuance of the unshakable principles of her policy . . . The whole policy of reconciliation and appeasement towards France . . . is hopeless in as far as it aims at political success. The question of orientation towards the West, as far as France is concerned, is ruled out. France . . . is not indifferent as to whether we ally ourselves with Russia or not, for its aim to destroy Germany . . . would be more difficult to achieve if Germany were supported by Russia . . . (As for Britain) the moment is coming, and must come, when Britain will be looking around for allies on the continent. When that moment arrives she will prefer the mercenary who is growing in strength, and will even have to make him stronger.

A rapprochement between Germany and Russia would not have a decisive influence on Britain's attitude . . . Germany's attitude towards Russia cannot and need not be influenced by consideration of Britain . . . It can scarcely be maintained that America would be unfavorably influenced against Germany were the latter to join in an association with Russia. She is interested, though not decisively so, in the economic development of Germany. . . . In political life it is an old . . . device to exaggerate the other side's intentions into absurdity and then to attack them as such. Who, then, has concluded a written military agreement, binding us unilaterally, or who intends to do so? Certainly not the responsible military authorities. Where then is this dreaded exposure of ourselves? That the Treaty of Rapallo has brought upon us the suspicion that we could have achieved this increase of power without binding ourselves is the main advantage, scarcely to be overestimated, of this Agreement.

What then is our aim? What do we want from, in, and with Russia? Firstly, a strong Russia . . . and thus indirectly a stronger Germany inasfar as we would be strengthening a possibly ally.

We also want, cautiously and tentatively at first, a direct increase of strength for ourselves . . . In the initial phase (of rearmament) participation and even



The Aufba

Can France keep the 'Genie' bottled?

official recognition by the German Government would be absolutely out of the question. The detailed negotiations could only be conducted by the mlitary authorities. . . . It is true there is a . . . need for peace among the German people. But in spite of everything, the German people will follow the leader in the struggle for their existence. Our task is to prepare for this struggle, for we shall not be spared. If it comes to war . . . it will not be the duty of our leading statesmen to keep Germany out of war—that would be either impossible or suicidal—but to come in on the right side with all possible strength."

Same Policy — Same Method

The reader now knows the secret of German foreign policy following defeat and loss of a war. It is not a military alliance with Russia as amateur historians have pretended whose well-meaning tracts were providing the smokescreen the Germans needed. It is psychological warfare pure and simple, to let intentionally other nations suspect that there might be such an alliance. Of course, there was never one in the 20th century.

Von Seeckt's memorandum has become the political testament of Germany. The versatile general even invented the method for carrying out this policy. This method consists of three stages. First "Abmachungen" (cooperation) by the military, then rapprochement by economic treaties, then entente by a neutrality and non-aggression pact—never an alliance. Wheeler-Bennett shows that the same policy and the same method was used by Germany and Russia even after Rapallo, i.e. in the model Berlin Treaty of 1926, in 1931, in 1933, and in 1939. It never mattered who the chancellor was. Wirth, Luther, Brüning, Hitler—they all used the same policy and the same method. And Adenauer?

FOR THE RECORD

"Before the congress of the Deutsche Reichspartei the German General Andrae declared, 'German youth will not participate in the strengthening of the culture of a half-Europe. An army deprived of its old ideals derived from the nation itself, will not fight in case of conflict. Only men like Ramcke or Rudel, men of action and of brilliance with aims clearly defined, could undertake such a struggle. It is, therefore, necessary to renounce the stupid slogans such as "citizens in uniform" and "regional regrouping" and to cease defaming the Prussian spirit. Either the old spirit will imbue the soldier so that we shall have elite troops or we shall have no army at all.'"

THE TRANSITION

On September 25 and 26, 1953, a secret meeting took place in Sieburg, near Bonn. Those attending were high officers in Hitler's Wehrmacht. The Bonn Government was represented by a least a dozen generals as well as the Minister for German Defense, Theodor Blank. In the course of this meeting which was supposedly dedicated to the fundamental principles of the education of the German soldier, the ex-Nazi General Dethleffson declared "the supranational community—the EDC—is only a transitory solution for a German army in the old sense of the word."

The German hosts received badges of the Falange which is Franco's Fascist organization. Attending the reception given by the Jungdemokraten, was Dr. Erich Mende, a bigwig in the FDP who achieved notoriety for his defense of German war criminals and his advocacy of the re-creation of Prussia and the Prussian spirit. WHO DESTROYED EUROPE?

"Certainly America has made many mistakes. America is still inexperienced in higher politics, while Europe is only too experienced and therefore, when left to itself, is too skeptical and has too 'Hamlet-like' an attitude. The West German press accused Dr. Lenz last year of being the author of a plan to establish a super information ministry, patterned on the old propaganda ministries, to restore some form of control over media of public information."

(M. S. Handler, The N. Y. Times, 6-13-54)

"The danger of world war is now much less that either the United States or the Soviet Union will deliberately provoke it, than there will occur somewhere an incident in which one or other will feel its prestige to be inextricably involved. There are enough danger-points for such incidents without our going out of our way to create more, as we shall necessarily do if we put arms into the hands of the Germans. I know it is argued that we cannot hope to create a land army capable of defending Western Europe without German divisions, and that the purpose in view is purely defensive. But will the outcome be purely defensive? I fear not; and I desperately fear the power to involve their allies in their projects of revanche which rearmament will put into the Germans' hands . . ."

(G. D. H. Cole, The New Statesman and Nation, 3-6-54)

". . . As a defensive bulwark for West Germany's new found democratic political order the trade unions are no longer rated high. Conformity, the fear of creating any sort of disturbance, and the failure to break with management concepts of profit, loss and wages have again transformed the trade union movement into a potential collaborator of any regime that will promise full employment, social security and a welfare state that will take care of a citizen from the cradle to the grave.

"The 'coordination' of the trade unions is now being followed with an almost frenetic recartelization of big business and industry under the noses of an Allied Authority which has fallen asleep at the switch. While Economics Minister Ludwig Erhard campaigns for an anti-cartel law in fulfillment of a commitment to the Allies, industrialists and business men are facing the 'realities' of the West German economic situation and are making their own arrangements with or without the consent of the occupying authorities . . ."

FARBEN DOES IT AGAIN

". . . Imports of organic chemicals from West Germany alone climbed from virtually nothing in 1947 to more than 10 million pounds in 1953 . . .

"The danger, according to Vice President Francis J. Curtis, Monsanto's spokesman on the tariff controversy, lies in the trend rather than the amounts presently imported . . .

"Like Bausch & Lomb and Homer Laughlin, what Monsanto worries about most is its ability to compete with low foreign wages. The average West German chemical worker gets less than one-fifth of the $2.03 an hour the average Monsanto worker is paid . . .

"Curtis also charges that the old I. G. Farben cartel has been revived and is subsidizing exports below cost in an effort to destroy the U. S. chemical industry . . ."

(Fortune, April, 1954)

"As might have been expected, the most effective artisan of the new European geopolitics is a German. While the French have been talking about the past, Konrad Adenauer has been in effect traveling to the future. In the context of European political dynamics, few more important trips have been made by a statesman since the end of the war than his to Athens, Ankara and Rome. Whereas he went to Washington and, in a measure, to Paris as a suppliant, he was received in the three Southern capitals as a mentor and guide. And to the last of the peninsulas there was no need to go; a Madrid-Bonn axis is already explicit.

"In Ankara, in particular, Adenauer was received with open arms. For nearly 100 years Turkish foreign policy has been dominated by the idea that Germany's military power could counterbalance Russia's threat to Turkey. This idea produced pro-German policies during the reigns of the last Sultans and the period of the Young Turks. Now, after a brief interval, the new Turkey has come to a similar conclusion. The French have lost their foot-hold in the Near East. The Americans who are replacing the British in that area are not feared by the Turks as were the British. So Germany's road through the Balkans to the East is once again opening . . ."

(Frank Gorrell in the New Republic, 4-12-54)

". . . In Japan, as in Germany, it is possible that such old tyrannies may creep back—perhaps in new guises and most probably in connection with the revival of armed power. But they need not. The most important determining factor may be the degree to which the United States is able to preserve its own democratic institutions and aims under the terrific burden of its military needs. For if Americans should lose their heads as they face the challenge of the cold war, it would be all too easy for them to strengthen the hands of the wrong people in Germany and Japan.

"It may be necessary to rearm yesterday's enemies, but not at the expense of losing tomorrow's friends."

(The Christian Science Monitor, 3-11-54)

". . . The Continent's coal mines are likewise cartelized, and producers and unions are now becoming much more vociferous in defending this policy—which is hailed in the German Ruhr as a policy of "gleichmässige Beschäftigung' (spreading the work).

"Visit the Walsum Mine, one of the biggest and most modern in the Ruhr, for an insight into how thoroughly these monopolies already control the coal market.

"Hitler ordered Walsum to join the Ruhr sales cartel in 1941. After the war, the Allies split the the cartel into six regional sales agencies—but the six agencies soon reunited in a single organization which today again acts as a cartel. . ."

We Are Determined to Carry On

AT the close of World War II the Society observed ominous trends in international political relations which threatened the future of the peace. This was particularly apparent with respect to the situation in Germany. Thus, we stated, "So long as Germany remains a potential asset to one or more of the allied nations, she will be used for ulterior, selfish, political, military and economic purposes, and so long will the world remain insecure. So long as Germany is available for one of these marriages, she will be in a good position to recapture her military strength. Only when we have conclusive proof supported by acts, that the big powers will not establish any liaison with Germany to use her as an eventual ally in any extra-national activity, will there be a reasonable chance of destroying mutual suspicions and of establishing a genuine world collaboration for peace" (Prevent World War III, No. 14, April-May 1946).

It remained for the victors to provide "conclusive proof supported by acts" that they were determined to lay the foundation of a durable peace in Europe.

Would they eliminate Germany's war potential and encourage genuine peace-time industry?

Would they break up the predatory trust and cartels?

Would they prevent Pan-Germans, militarists, Nazis and war criminals from regaining positions of power and influence in Germany's political and social life?

Would they provide Germany's victims with adequate reparations derived from German industry and external assets?

Would they encourage the decentralization of German political institutions, thereby avoiding the re-creation of a new Reich?

Would they develop a realistic educational program to infuse the spirit of democracy among the masses of the German people?

The Society fought persistently for this program without compromise. On the other hand, our policy makers were ensnared into the trap of wishful thinking under the influence of those having financial or sentimental ties with Germany.

Through the realization of the above mentioned objectives a peace-loving Germany could have been constructed. Such a Germany would not have been attractive to countries pursuing the dangerous game of power politics, nor would such a Germany have been in a position to play one side off against the other in order to regain her dominant power.

However, the Western Allies, in their justified effort to check Communist expansionism were "sold" on the idea of a "German bulwark," just as they were "sold" on the same fallacy after World War I, with its tragic consequences. They deliberately refused to admit that the Russians could also "make friends" with the Germans as easily as they had fought them. The upshot of this bidding and counterbidding for the hand of the former enemy was the scrapping of virtually every important measure designed to render Germany harmless and to engender democracy.

Thus, despite the superficial signs of progress, the evil forces which controlled Germany's destinies for generations, are growing with renewed vigor. More and more, they are assuming a decisive role in the political and economic life of the country. The proof of their power lies in the fact that even the so-called democratic leaders cater to Pan-German and neo-Nazi slogans. The forces of Pan-Germanism are on the march again. (See "German Realities 1954," Prevent World War III, No. 44.)

Having escaped the consequences of their aggressions, there is no inner conviction of repentance among the vast masses of the Germans. A people who yearn for the glories of "Deutschland Ueber Alles" cannot be won over to "our side" by heaping concessions upon them. Indeed, every concession becomes a weapon in their hands against us, and the granting of sovereignty and a new Wehrmacht fall within that category.

"Rehabilitated" with billions of dollars (and more to come), Germany will once again become a menace to the security and welfare of the U. S. and her allies.

In the name of the "democratic process," the German totalitarians will ride to power on a new wave of militarism and chauvinism.

In the name of "free enterprise," the German cartelists will undermine the position of American and western businessmen in the world markets.

In the name of a "united Europe," the Germans will stop at nothing to destroy the independence and cultural heritage of her neighbors.

In the name of "co-existence," the Germans will make common cause with the East to isolate the U. S.

In the name of "world collaboration," the Germans will drive for world domination.

The American people have been told that the London and Paris Agreements will usher in a new chapter in our relations with Germany. Whatever can be said about these Agreements, the fact remains that the German problem is more acute than ever before. (See the article "The Failure of Diplomacy," p. 3 in this issue). Thus, the Society's educational work takes on a more significant meaning in terms of American security.

The Society may be a small voice in the wilderness of confusion and illusion which goes under the heading of policy. However, is it not the essence of patriotism to speak the truth as it relates to the welfare of our country, rather than to join the silence of despair or the cheers of those who like to make believe? Yes, we are determined to carry on as the forsaken conscience of those who gloss over the crimes of the devil and sup at his table.

All the issues of "Prevent World War III" are living documents attesting to our painstaking efforts to enlighten the people and to maintain the vigilance of our Government. With a deep sense of responsibility to our members and the American people we reaffirm our resolution to continue exposing the conspiracies of those forces, inside and outside the United States, who would subvert our security and our international friendships in the cause of Germandom. We shall, as in the past, work for a realistic solution of the German problem as the key to world peace.

"Let the peoples extend the hand of friendship and forgiveness to each other" —Sir Winston Churchill

The Failure of Diplomacy

The acid test of successful diplomacy lies in its positive contributions toward enhancing national security. On the other hand, a diplomacy which alienates reliable friends, provides potential enemies with greater opportunities for maneuvering, and increases the chances of a new world holocaust, saps the foundations of security. It is by these standards that we must judge the results of the London and Paris meetings.

We are cognizant of the fact that the decisions to remilitarize Germany and grant her sovereignty have been hailed as historic triumphs. Following the meeting in London, Secretary Dulles said that it was "one of the greatest conferences of all times."

With all due respect to his high office, we cannot share Mr. Dulles' exuberance. We are mindful of Mr. Dulles' wealth of experience in international affairs. However, his record in calling the shots accurately is by no means perfect. Thus, his estimation of the intentions of the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis turned out to be wide of the mark. In March, 1939, he told a meeting of the Economic Club in New York "only hysteria entertains the idea that Germany, Italy or Japan contemplates war upon us."

If it is unfair to rake up the past then we are prepared to challenge Mr. Dulles' estimation of the London and Paris meetings in the light of the standards which, in our opinion, define the art of successful diplomacy.

I

Ten years ago the political and moral prestige of the United States in Europe was unrivaled. We were respected and liked for our broad understanding of the problems besetting the nations ravaged by German militarism. In that spirit we contributed generously toward the rehabilitation of our distressed friends. Even our worst enemies cannot deny this proud chapter in our post-war international relations.

Times have changed. One of our most respected experts on foreign affairs, William Philip Simms (long-time foreign editor of the Scripps-Howard newspapers) reported, "The United States is about as popular in Europe today as Hitler's Germany was in 1938-1939." (New York World Telegram and Sun, 8-23-54)

Mr. Simm's observation may be challenged as an exaggeration. Yet, it is a fact, like it or not, that we are no longer regarded with the trust and friendly admiration—which had made such a profound impression on that great American, Wendell Willkie.

Undoubtedly, the Kremlin and its "busybees" in Europe have helped to bring about this change. Yet, in the last analysis, this tragedy is of our own making. When we discarded our original post-war policies for a program that treated the German enemy as a long-lost friend, the die was cast. The Communists merely capitalized on our monumental blunders.

Thus, several years following the end of hostilities, the guiding star of all our major diplomatic moves in Europe was Germany. The rebuilding of a powerful Germany began to take priority over every other program which meant, in effect, that all other projects would have to be neglected to a smaller or larger degree. Of course, this basic change in the orientation of American diplomacy was justified in the name of developing a mighty bulwark against the Communist menace. But how did this drastic shift work out in practice? As Germany's power multiplied, it brought about a decline in the relative strength of her western neighbors. As for the Soviet bloc, the resurgence of Germany has had no damaging effects whatsoever to its military capabilities and economic power. In short, the real sufferers of the "Germany First" policy were our Western Allies.

When the French buried EDC it appeared, at least for a moment, that we were going to be saved at the eleventh hour from the consequences of our own follies. Here was the great opportunity for a genuine soul-searching re-examination of our German policy—a policy which had been regarded as sacred and untouchable ever since it was conceived. But no, our policy makers would not have it that way. They insisted on agreement no matter what the price.

Pressure grew to unheard of proportions. The French Government was attacked and insulted in the press. Needless to say, the Germans caught on quickly. Chancellor Adenauer with an arrogance typical of the German diplomat, hurled innuendoes at the French and their leaders. He went so far as to state that unless Germany got her way, she would "look" to the Soviet Union (London Times, 9-4-54). Indeed, matters reached such a pitch that one newspaper (New York Journal American, 9-25-54) prominently displayed a statement by the German war criminal, Colonel General Alexander von Falkenhausen, that France should be occupied until she was ready to submit!

The pressures and the threats worked. An agreement was reached. Europe will once again be confronted with a strong, sovereign Germany, free to act as it sees fit. To believe that the peoples of Europe will move closer to the U.S. when they behold the rhythmic marching of a new Wehrmacht, is to expect a miracle.

II

Restoring Germany's war power and uniting Western Europe simultaneously are irreconcileable concepts. The net result of combining these policies may be compared to the fruitless labors of Sisyphus. As this fundamental contradiction deepens, the opportunities for Soviet machinations increase. Witness, for example, the skill and effectiveness of Soviet propaganda as it exploits these incompatible policies. In Western Europe this propaganda raises the ominous specter of German militarism, while in Germany it revives the spirit of Tauroggen and Rapallo—symbols of Russo-German collaboration.

Soviet diplomacy is also scoring. Thus, the series of notes proposing a conference on European "security" and Germany have achieved at least several objectives: (a) The U.S. has been put on the defensive. (b) The confidence of the Western European peoples has been shaken. (c) Flirtations between the Germans and the Soviets are on the upgrade.

The London and Paris agreements create more possibilities for Soviet maneuvering. All of the factors—ideological, economical, political—which have drawn Germany and Russia together in the past, have received a fresh impetus. Under the guidance of the German General Staff, backed by an assortment of totalitarian and reactionary groupings, the way will be cleared for constructing the bridge to the East.

The role of these forces was noted in a State Department booklet published in 1951 ("Confuse and Control"): "The business world of Western Germany has several weak points of different origin. One is the prewar habit of Eastern trade to balance manufactured goods with food supplies. Another is the fear of what might happen if the Communists should come and the Western Powers should fail to stop them. Still another is the remains of the old habit of authoritarian control, which has more affinity for Eastern than for Western forms of government. . . .

"Those Germans who are still at heart in favor of Nazism, of the orthodox militarist tradition, or of the extreme rightist position in big business, are a source of weakness, and are peculiarly susceptible to communist influence. . . .

"Hitler made much of Germany's position as the defender of Europe against the barbarians from the East. But ever since Napoleon had conquered Germany and attacked Russia, there had been much in common between the upper military and social classes in Germany and in Russia. The Tsar was closely related to the Kaiser. Bismarck's policy was always to cooperate with Russia. Now that Russia has a new ruling class as dictatorial as the old aristocracy, some of the old feeling of kinship is still to be found among extreme conservatives in Germany, from the Junkers to the ex-Nazis. . . .

"There is some feeling among the aristocrats that they might make terms with the Soviet aristocracy and because of their experience and ability might become indispensable and powerful members of the Soviet ruling class. . . ."

The State Department analysis concludes, "The tendency for the extreme right to play with treason must be listed as a definite weak point in the democratic cause."

Certainly very few Germans will accept this rather naive description of the role of these forces in German life. These powerful groupings are not alien to the German body politic. On the contrary, German policy—past and present—is deeply rooted in the Weltanschauung (world outlook) of these forces.

The London and Paris agreements were intended, so we are told, to "return" Germany to a western orientation—as though Germany was at one time firmly attached to the West. A study of modern German history shows that at no time was Germany wedded permanently to the West or the East. Indeed, for every olive branch to the West, the Germans extended one to the East.

The real German position, unembroidered by the smooth talk of some German politicians, was revealed in the sensational Madrid circular letter prepared by Germany's top geopoliticians and published in "Germany Plots with the Kremlin" by T. H. Tetens (1953). "Our present policy must be to overcome the consequences of our previous mistakes. An emasculated Germany should never allow itself to be used as a spearhead in an attack against the Russian colossus. This would be an insane act ('Wahnsinns experiment') and would spell our final doom, whereas Germany as the exponent of European neutrality could gain far reaching concessions from the Soviets. . . . We must not let ourselves become befogged by Washington's stupid and meaningless slogans about the 'Struggle of Democracy versus Communism.' The so-called American democracy does not deserve the sacrifice of the bones of even a single German soldier. . . . What Germany needs in the future is not democracy but a system of statecraft similar to that of the Soviet dictatorship which would enable the political and military elite in Germany to organize the industrial capacity of Europe and the military qualities of the German people for the revival of the German race and the re-establishment of Europe as the power center of the world."

A more recent expression of this position, although heavily disguised, may be found in an open letter to President Eisenhower by the extreme rightist and Pan-German organization "The Steuben Society of America": "As far as Germany is concerned—Adenauer or no Adenauer, BRUTO or no BRUTO—sooner or later she must be permitted to follow her historic role of forming the bridge between west and east—by way of neutralization or by having her own national forces. . . . Let us get out of the Fool's Paradise, in which we have lived all too long. . . ." (The Steuben News, Nov. 1954)

In the light of German history, and given a sovereign and rearmed Germany as contemplated under the London and Paris agreements, the so-called Western orientation of Germany is bound to be short lived.

III

At the Berlin Conference (2-2-54) Secretary Dulles stated: "The Soviet Union proposes that Germany should be allowed to have defensive strength on a national basis. But if Germany had national forces strong enough to defend itself from external attack, it would be so strong that it would threaten all of Western Europe." However, a careful examination of the implications of the London and Paris agreements show that what Mr. Dulles professed to object to will come to pass. The revival of the German General Staff supported by a national army of 500,000 men (with another 500,000 reservists) and equipped with the most modern weapons of warfare, bears no resemblance to the usual idyllic description of a German "defense" force.

Mr. Dulles' statement is also significant in that it recognizes that a rearmed Germany unlike one of our rearmed Western Allies, is a very risky proposition. Moreover, it is an admission that such a Germany would, in the first place, constitute a threat to the security of the West.

One can speculate as to when and where German guns will point, but there is no room for doubt as to the meaning of German rearmament. It is a long step toward World War III.

Thus, on all three counts it is our considered judgment that the London and Paris agreements do not enhance our security but, on the contrary, create new dangers.

Editorials

"WE"

The Germans have coined a word to describe the main ingredient in their foreign policies—"Realpolitik." It is a concept of conduct bereft of principle, honor or moral consideration. Essentially, it demands total allegiance to the cause of Pan-Germanism. The means are irrelevant except insofar as they help to achieve the ultimate goal. Unfortunately, the Western Democracies have been inclined to judge Germany by their own standards of morality and conduct. The net result has been that the Allies have been fooled time and again in evaluating Germany's real intentions.

Today, for example, public opinion in the West has been encouraged to believe that Germany has at last "returned" to the Western Fold. But while the cheers grow louder, Realpolitik continues to operate inexorably within the framework of German policy.

German Realpolitik has always been active on the American scene. In his book "Germany Plots With The Kremlin" (1933) T. H. Tetens describes the influence of Realpolitik among the most important sections of the German language press in the USA. High on the list is the "Bürger Zeitung" of Chicago which has advocated a Russo-German tie-up for some years. In 1949 this paper featured on its front page an "Open Letter To Stalin" (See "Prevent World War III," No. 33) which proposed a Russo-German alliance against. the Anglo-Saxon bloc. The author of the letter, Bruno Fricke, has had a checkered career including membership in the Nazi party. One thing is certain: Regardless of how often he changed colors, he is Pan-German to the bone.

Herr Fricke appealed to the late Soviet dictator to join hands with the Germans. "We are actually predestined," he wrote Stalin, "for an alliance with Moscow, all the more so since mutual cooperation with the integrated bloc of the Soviet states has attracted millions of Germans educated under strict discipline. Who could resist us if both our Reichs were united? What Napoleon did not succeed in doing. Truman will not succeed in either: the subjugation of the earth!" (our Italics)

Perhaps some of our readers will say: "Well, what of it? The "Bürger Zeitung" is a small paper and therefore unimportant." Unfortunately, this is not the case. The Bürger Zeitung boasts that it is the mouth piece for the sentiments of 500 thousand German-Americans in the Chicago area. Now, whether this is true or not, the fact remains that the Bürger Zeitung is an important publication for at least two reasons: (a) it is a reliable indicator of Pan-German thinking not only in the U.S.A. but in Germany itself; (b) its editorial opinions have proved to be of great influence among leading English language newspapers in the Midwest.

Mr. Tetens points out that the "Bürger Zeitung" "has its place on the extreme right politically." It has been a consistent supporter of our most fervent anti-Communist crusaders. Yet, it was this paper which carried an open appeal for a Russo-German alliance! This apparent contradiction can only be explained by the decisive influence of German Realpolitik which in the last analysis motivated the Nazis to make common cause with the Communists in 1939.

Mr. Stalin is around no longer, but the Bürger Zeitung has not given up its campaign. The October 14, 1954, issue carried a lengthy article which can be regarded as the latest version of the open letter to Stalin. This time the message is directed to Mr. Molotov, one of Stalin's chief lieutenants. The writer of this piece is a character who goes under the pen name "Politicus." Ordinarily his columns are dull. They read like an old broken record repeating the stale accusations of pro-Nazis and their

"The myth of Germany's superiority over other European nations is alive. The remarkable German economic recovery since 1948, the political restoration of a truncated Germany in the form of a federal republic, the assiduous courtship of this republic by the United States and many other powers—all stimulated the myth.

"The reluctant West Germans took slowly to the idea of their indispensability to the defense of our free world. But after two years of exposure to this concept they came to believe at the same time that in a nuclear war they would be pulverized. The United States idea raised their ego, which had been ground into the dust in World War II.

"This doctrine of indispensability has encouraged the latent nationalists to try their wings again, with the result that politicians have emerged from their cocoons to recommend negotiations with the Soviet Government for a German settlement.

"The Western Allies' courtship of the Federal Republic, the economic recovery and the doctrine of indispensability were the foundations on which West German nationalists of various hues reconstructed the theory, which they would like to put into practice, of a reunited Germany playing off the West against the East—as did Bismarck and the Weimar Republic.

"The doctrine of indispensability is the handmaiden of the idea of a Germany powerful enough to play the moderator in a balance-of-power game in Europe."

(M. S. Handler, N.Y. Times, 8-28-54)

friends, that the Allies were the real war criminals and that the Germans were the victims of an unholy conspiracy. However, his column of October 14th struck a different note. It is lively and more than that, it is a revelation. By force of habit he intersperses the theme of his article with vile attacks against the French. It is not his snide references to the French which deserve comment, but rather his unambiguous declaration that the latest Molotov proposals for the "unification of Germany" should be seriously considered by the Germans. He expresses his doubts as to the efficacy of Chancellor Adenauer's present policy because it will not achieve the unity of Germany which is "the greatest and most important problem for Germany . . ." How can Dr. Adenauer, Politicus asks, achieve German unification "if we are the Allies of a Western combine."

Before proceeding to a further examination of Politicus' "letter" to Molotov the reader should note the word "we." This is not a slip of the tongue. The "we" is the quintessence of the real meaning of Pan-Germanism for no matter where and under what circumstances the Pan-German lives and operates, it is always "we." The same "we" is found in Bruno Fricke's letter to Stalin. Just imagine the uproar if the Daily Worker ran a column by a Communist leader employing the word "we" in speaking of the Russians as Politicus uses the term with respect to the Germans!

Returning to the remainder of the article, we note that Politicus insists that "the only way to get it (unification) will be to deal with Russia in a friendly way. Joining a combine of powers antagonistic to Russia is not the way." But this is not all. Politicus seems fully confident that the question of unity can be settled between the Russians and the Germans while the Western Democracies sit at the doorsteps awaiting the consummation of the deal. Politicus is emphatic on this point. "The statesmen of Germany," he declares, "should at least grip this hand and try to get through conversations . . ." with the Russians.

Ironically, he justifies his proposition on the basis of the very policy which is now pursued by the United States vis-à-vis Germany. "America has shown the way" to German-Russian negotiations when the U.S. "found out that it made a mistake in fighting Germany." Politicus refers to President Eisenhower's well known statement "let bygones be bygones." Therefore, according to Politicus, "why cannot German statesmen at least follow such an example to get on a good footing with Russia which Germany attacked, not to forget." Thus Politicus shows how American policy can turn into advantage for the future of Russo-German relations. The United States is hoisted, so to speak, by its own petard.

If past experience is an indicator of how our policy makers will respond to this latest expression of German Realpolitik, we predict that more billions will be turned over to that "great bulwark" against Soviet Communism.

PRES. HEUSS' SLIP OF THE TONGUE

During the past decade the moral climate surrounding significant aspects of international affairs has undergone a radical change. The transformation is particularly marked with respect to the treatment of the former enemy Germany. This was brought into sharp relief when the four occupying powers freed one of the major war criminals, Baron Konstantin von Neurath. It was done in spite of the fact that he had only completed 8 years of his full sentence.

The background of this event was formed by the widespread campaign in Germany to engender sympathy for all of the war criminals. The Allies, prodded on by the Chancellor himself, have sought reconsideration of the status of the major war criminals located in Spandau prison in Berlin. In this connection the New York Times (4-6-54) stated: ". . . The decision to reconsider the status of these men culminates a long series of actions by the Western Powers to ameliorate the condition of German war criminals. The moves have been made in response to German pleas for clemency and to clear the way for West German participation in the European Defense Community." Thus, on the initiative of US policy makers who seldom refuse the Chancellor a favor, the Russians were approached by the three Western Allies. However, the Russians seemed to show disinterest and, therefore, the question was shelved temporarily.

Undoubtedly, some of our own experts thought that the appeal had put the Russians on the spot and thus increased the standing of the Western Allies in the eyes of the Germans. They apparently forgot—or perhaps never had learned—that when it comes to warming up to German totalitarians regardless of color or breed, the Russians will not be outdone. Hence, in their characteristic fashion of "stealing the show," the Soviets suddenly popped the proposition to free von Neurath. The New York Herald Tribune (11-4-54) reported that "the Russian move will probably make a considerable impression on the people of Germany." Needless to say, the Allies found themselves on the short end. Nevertheless they quickly consented to the Russian recommendation. (Apparently, the only kind of agreement made these days between the Russians and the Western Allies deals with ways and means of making life more pleasant for German war criminals.)

The public was told that von Neurath's release was due to his age and ill health. We recall that when Field-marshal von Kesselring was released from prison, the papers announced that he was freed because he was suffering from cancer. Today this same von Kesselring, "victim of cancer," is among the top leaders of revived German militarism and the chief of the military organization called "Stahlhelm." We will not make any predictions with regard to von Neurath's future activities. However, his past is a matter of record.

Von Neurath was condemned by the International Military Tribunal on all four counts for having been an accomplice to the Nazis' crimes against peace and against humanity. On March 18, 1939, the Baron was appointed by Hitler as Reich Protector for Bohemia and Moravia. In that capacity he was responsible for the destruction of democratic institutions and for the ruthless exploitation of Czechoslovakian industry to further the Nazi war effort. He was responsible for the widespread antisemitic persecution that followed the enslavement of Czechoslovakia. Von Neurath was one of the authors of the Germanization program that was to be applied in Czechoslovakia. This goal was to be achieved through the liquidation of the Czech intelligentsia and other groups who might dare to resist Germanization. Under his rule a network of concentration camps was set up and thousands of Czech civilians perished. As Minister of Foreign Affairs prior to von Ribbentrop's appointment, von Neurath was one of the architects of the Nazi preparation for aggression and conquest.

This is the man who is freed to the applause of the German people. Chancellor Adenauer sent a wire of congratulations declaring how "delighted" he was and extended to the Baron his "best wishes." The President of the Bonn Republic, Theodor Heuss, summed up the feelings of the Germans perhaps better than any other leader. In a message to von Neurath he exclaimed:

> "With pleased satisfaction, on returning from a short journey, I read the report this morning that the news of the last few days has been followed by speedy fulfilment, and the martyrdom of these years has come to an end for you."

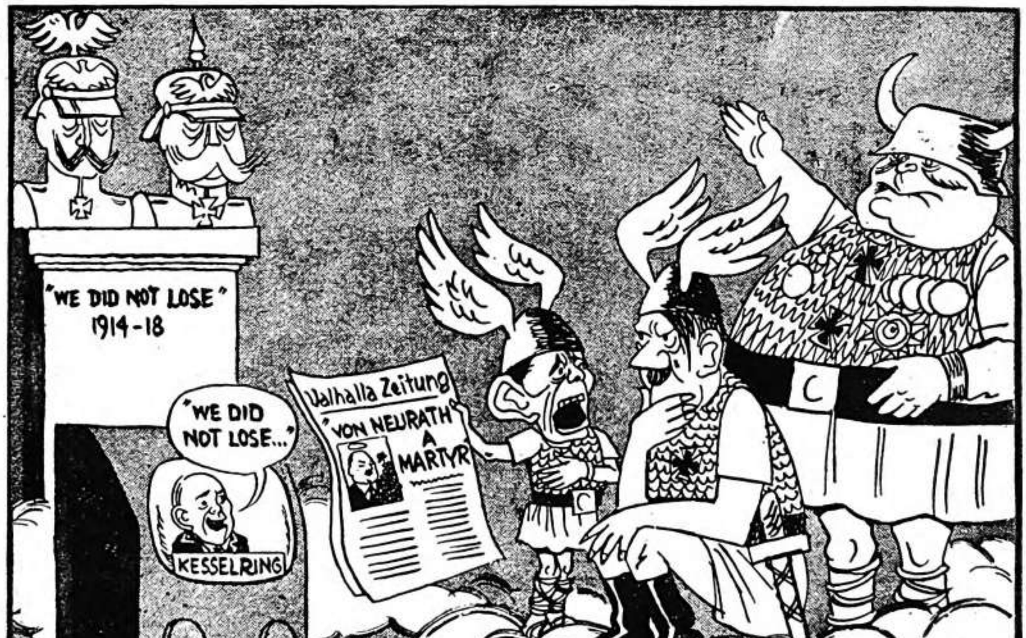
Here in a nutshell is the most reliable indicator of the degree to which democracy has taken root in Germany. If von Neurath suffered martyrdom, does it not follow that his crimes were not crimes? To those who ignore the significance of the Heuss message on the excuse that the Germans—no matter what the cost—must be "on our side" against the Communist menace, let them ponder the words of the Bible, "for what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul."



'I always did think we were premature to commit suicide, mein Fuhrer'

How Stupid Can We Be?

Among the highlights of Chancellor Adenauer's latest visit to the U.S. was his talk before the National Press Club in Washington. It is quite apparent that the Chancellor's speech was carefully planned for his U.S. audience. For example, a good portion of his address was devoted to a description of the anti-Communist attitude of the Germans. Actually, this is an old story which goes back to the days of Hitler's Third Reich. That the Chancellor should choose to reiterate this well known fact may, in all probability, be ascribed to two reasons: (a) his efforts to portray Germany as the great bulwark against Communism (which has been paying off handsomely); (b) to discredit France and Britain, where a substantial portion of the electorate seems to accept the proposition of "coexistence" with the Communist world.

Be it as it may, there is another aspect to Adenauer's speech which in our opinion is of even greater moment. After describing the "Red Terror" and how the Germans of all classes are fleeing from it in the tens of thousands, he suddenly switches his line. Let us, he pleads, "normalize" relations with the "Red Terror." To achieve this objective, the Chancellor proposes that the Communist bloc be offered a non-aggression pact.

Here is a classical illustration of Realpolitik acrobatics. Apparently only the Germans can perform this stunt and get away with it. We recall how Winston Churchill and General De Gaulle were smeared and abused by the German propaganda machine when they dared to suggest the "possibility" of "considering" the "practicability" of top level negotiations with the Kremlin. More recently, Premier Mendès-France has also come under the withering fire of the Germans and their apologists for failing to exclude the possibility of talks with the Russians. Even the New York Times which, for unknown reasons, often seems to bear a grudge against the French when it comes to matters German, has also raised a cloud of suspicion regarding Mendès-France's attitude toward Russia. (See, for example, New York Times editorial 10-29-54)

Now, when Chancellor Adenauer comes up with the bright idea of a pact with the Russians and says so publicly in the Nation's capital, the newspapers bill his remarks as though he were the great sage at whose feet we all sit waiting for his signal to act or not to act. It is even possible that sooner or later our own diplomats will fall over each other in praise of this great European for his latest display of "vision and statesmanship." In this connection the Washington Post ran an editorial (10-31-54) which said that it was "a privilege to have the thinking of this great European statesman, and the German-American treaty of friendship which he takes back with him is testimony to the esteem in which his vision is held."

This is not to imply that the Chancellor has publicly worked the Kremlin angle for the first time. We can cite a number of instances during the last two years when the Chancellor has declared his sympathy for the issue of coming to an understanding with the "Red Terror." On July 7, 1953, he told the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung that the German and Russian economies "once before complemented each other in a magnificent way." He expressed the hope that the future of Russo-German relations would be as promising as they were in the good old days.

In the same month the Chancellor wrote Secretary Dulles suggesting the development of an arrangement with the Soviet Union. In September 1953, Adenauer again raised the subject in a speech to the Bundestag and in May 1954, the Chancellor again returned to this theme at a press conference in Hamburg.

The Chancellor has never been alone with respect to the desire to "normalize" relations with the "Red Terror." It is no exaggeration to state that the most important sections of the German press as well as Germany's leading politicians have at one time or another called for an arrangement with Russia. (We shall be glad to supply pertinent data on this subject if desired.)

Some years ago the Chancellor used to harp on the theme that negotiations with the Russians was his supreme "nightmare." In one sense the nightmare still haunts the Chancellor. It is not negotiations with the Russians per se, which makes the Chancellor tremble with fear. What he dreads above all is a conference of the Big Four to the exclusion of the Germans. To prevent such a meeting at all cost was the acid test of Chancellor Adenauer's statesmanship. His success in influencing American policy toward the realization of his objectives raised his stature among the Germans. According to the Deutsche Zeitung (9-19-53) a popular quip has been making the rounds in Germany: "Who makes Washington's European policy?—Konrad Adenauer in Bonn."

From the moment that Chancellor Adenauer's views were given special consideration by our policy makers, the subject of negotiations with the Russians became taboo in the U.S. and remained so until the great medicine man of the West lifted the spell. Now it becomes permissable to talk about this forbidden subject, because Germany is no longer a pariah among nations. On the contrary, it is now being primed as the great defender of Western civilization against the Communist hordes. Its economic power has begun to dominate Western Europe. Hence, the Germans are no longer afraid of negotiations with the Russians. Indeed, they will now insist upon it and we can be sure that they who worship the very ground on which the Chancellor walks, will do everything in their power to revise American policy accordingly.

Already we note a certain fatalistic attitude concerning the inevitability of negotiations with the Russians. This was the sense of an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann in his column of October 15, 1954. Another leading journalist, Joseph C. Harsh, speculating on the consequences of the Paris accords, accepts the probability of talks with the Russians but adds: "The emerging task for Western diplomats will be to see to it that West Germany negotiates as a partner of the West, not as an independent political force."

The New Republic (11-1-54) dwells on the same subjust in an article entitled "Germany as an Ally." "A sovereign West German Government," the New Republic observed, "is bound to enter into discussions with the Kremlin. A rigid doctrine that equates negotiation with appeasement, can drive the discussions into a secret illegitimate frame. The safeguard for the United States and NATO is to accept the inevitability of negotiation and accommodation with Russia and thereby prevent the negotiations from developing along bilateral and anti-Western lines."

Perhaps negotiations with the Russians are inevitable. But some of the sophisticated commentators display a naiveté which is most perplexing. If they believe that the Germans will only deal with the Russians as part of the Western team, then these people have forgotten the lessons of history. Of course, the Germans have no such intentions whatsoever! Their press has expressed confidence that the Germans are well equipped to deal with the Russians and need not be chaperoned by the Western Allies. As early as October 3, 1953, Germany's leading paper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, suggested in an editorial "direct talks between the Bonn Republic and the Soviets." "Only Chancellor Adenauer," the editorial declared, "can convince the Kremlin of the honesty and general usefulness of Germany's policy."

It was not the first time that this authoritative mouthpiece of German foreign policy sounded off in that vein. On April 1, 1950, this newspaper wrote: "Germany was always the bridge between the East and the West . . . The Allies are not able to come to an accord with the Russians . . . What is then more natural than for us to say, in view of the present pressure: If until now, within the framework of world events, the others were not able to make

". . . With East and West bidding against each other for the loyalty of the Germans, the outcome is unpredictable.

"There can be little doubt about who benefits the most from this situation. Nine years ago the armies of the East and West entered Germany as conquerors. It has taken the Germans just nine years to become the most wooed people of the world. In fact, if not in theory, they can choose between the rival offers. For that very reason the offers become steadily more favorable to the Germans.

"The London contract was more favorable for them than was EDC. What Moscow offers today is more favorable to the Germans than what Moscow offered last week.

"In retrospect, one can more easily sympathize with the French statesmen who have done their utmost to delay the events of the week, for the settlement of one problem only leads to the disclosure of a new problem just as dangerous and just as difficult to solve. . . ."

(Joseph C. Harsch, The Christian Science Monitor, 10-9-54)

". . . As for the potential dangers in German rearmament, it would be idle to suppose that none exist. . . .

"That (German national) army will not be free of international controls, it is true. But such controls can really control a sovereign armed state only so long as it chooses to be controlled. We may hope and believe that the new West Germany will stay with the West, but we have not guaranteed it; we would be foolish to forget that West Germany will be subject to powerful forces to lure it elsewhere. . . " an intelligent agreement, then it is our duty finally to arouse ourselves in order to obtain at least an economic understanding . . .

"In doing so we will not turn to the little bosses of the Eastern Zone but directly to the big boss in Moscow. There is where decisions are being made."

In a recent article this same German newspaper made the following significant comment: "Reunification must be the first goal of Germany's Eastern policy. It is in this connection that the question of restoring diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union must be seen. Diplomatic relations have nothing to do with the evaluation of another state. It is rather a question of the fact that Germany can no longer be forbidden to do what other states do regularly—that is, conduct conversations with the Eastern nation." (New York Herald Tribune 10-5-54)

Thomas Dehler, the Leader of the F. D. P. which is part of Adenauer's Coalition Government, has also advocated Russo-German talks and has proposed his willingness to go himself to the Kremlin. He told the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (10-5-54) that for years the project of a journey to Moscow had stirred him more than a trip to Washington "because what is going on, what is planned and worked out in Moscow is more important than what goes on in the Western world." Concluding his remarks he declared his opposition to any anti-Soviet politics. "Russia," he averred, "is a realistic political power, it is necessary that we discuss and come together in a peaceful manner." A couple of weeks later Herr Dehler returned to this theme with greater emphasis and clarity. According to the New York Herald Tribune (10-19-54) Dehler said that it was "simply a matter of course that we Germans will some day enter into conversations with the Russians on unification." He added that experts (unidentified) in these matters believe that the Germans were more able to conduct such conversations than the Americans.

No one, so far as we know, will denounce Dehler as a crypto-Communist. On the contrary, when leading German newspapers and top politicians propose negotiations with the Russians, there is silence among our policy makers—a silence which becomes even more pronounced when the Germans advocate negotiations with the Russians to the exclusion of the Western powers.

The pattern of "excepting Germany" seems to be characteristic of our dealings with the Communist danger since the end of the war. It was the British and French who were the targets of great indignation because they had traded in strategic materials with the Communist bloc. In the case of Germany not a peep was heard although it is a matter of government record that the Germans have shipped hundreds of millions of dollars worth of strategic materials to the Communist East.

The French have been regarded as unreliable because Communists form a substantial block in parliament and the French Government is supposed to be shot through with Communist spies. But the Germans—hardly a word of criticism of the fact that Adenauer's Government is crawling with former Nazis. The defenders of our German policy have never thought of asking Dr. Adenauer why he prefers four former Hitler supporters in his cabinet to four anti-Nazis. Nor was the reliability and stability of the Bonn Government questioned following the defection of Dr. John and Herr Schmidt-Wittmack who turned up in the Eastern zone with important state secrets. And now, when this same Germany speaking through its Chancellor, calmly talks about a non-aggression pact with Russia—of course, the West will be informed about the progress—more silence.

The foregoing calls to mind a very pertinent question which was the title of a critique of American foreign policy written by James P. Warburg: "German Rearmament—How Stupid Can We Be?"

"Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's concern about the political and psychological loyalties of the projected West German army emphasizes the intangible problems and hidden dangers that will confront Bonn and the West as the Federal Republic takes up arms.

"There always have been dual problems and dual dangers inherent in West German armament. . . .

"John W. Wheeler-Bennett in "The Nemesis of Power," says the German army 'dominated the Weimar Republic from the moment of its birth . . . first supported, and then condoned, the overthrow of the Republic and . . . made a major contribution to Hitler's coming to power.'

"Dr. Adenauer's problem, and the world's problem—to paraphrase Mirabeau—is whether or not West Germany is to be a country that has an army or an army that has a country."

(Hanson W. Baldwin, The N. Y. Times, 11-10-54)

". . . For sheer justice's sake, the Allies acknowledge a pressing necessity to grant pro-West German Chancellor Adenauer some 'dividends' for his consistent friendship the past five years. So say Paris sources.

"The obvious 'dividend' is German sovereignty. But there're some very sticky burrs usually overlooked in such a deal, observe attachés dealing with German affairs.

"THE FIRST is: The German DID lose World War II—and they must not be allowed to forget it.

"THE SECOND: Given the German record of breaking pledges, how far can you trust Germans voluntarily to restrain their traditional military expansionism—once rearmed."

(John P. Leacacos, Cleveland Plain Dealer, 9-14-54)

Observations on the German Problem

by

R. H. S. CROSSMAN

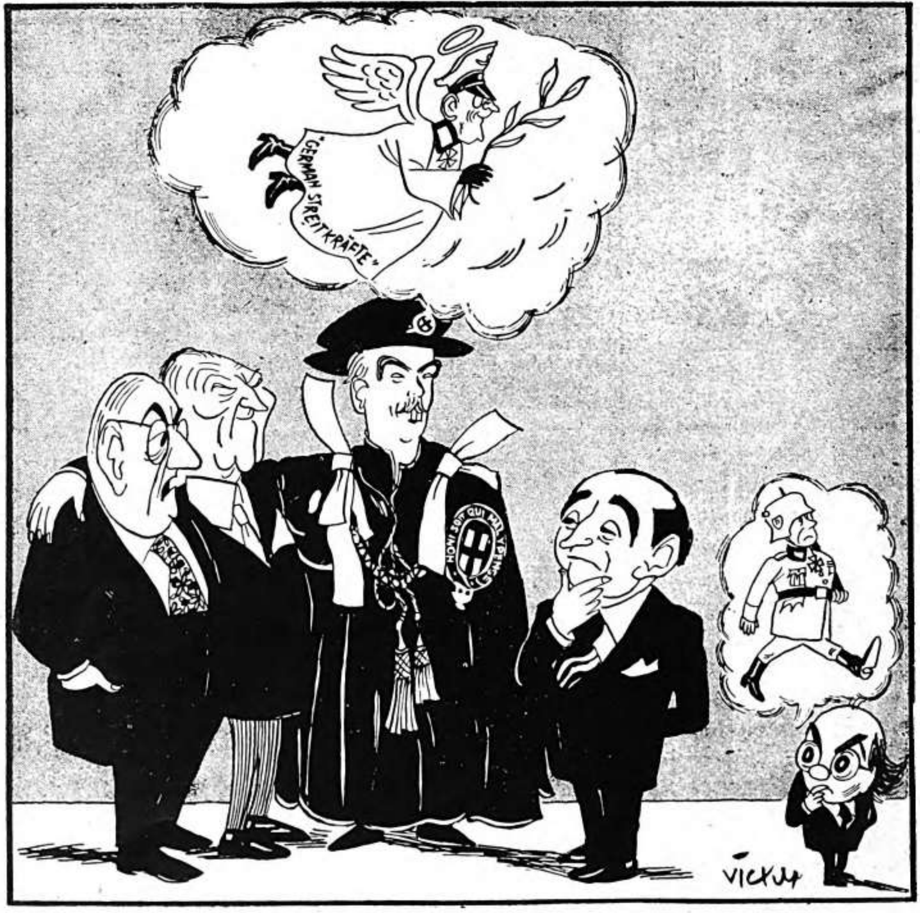
"The collapse of E.D.C.," we are told, "is the greatest Russian victory since 1945." It certainly is. But how many of the gloomy pundits go on to point out that it is a victory for which the Kremline can take none of the credit? That is shared between Mr. Acheson and Mr. Dulles, Mr. Morrison and Mr. Eden. It is they who since September, 1950, have disintegrated the Western alliance by trying to strengthen it with twelve German divisions. All the Kremlin has done is to sit tight and profit by their folly.

No one, least of all an Englishman or an American, has the right to blame the French Assembly for delivering the deathblow which finally disposed of E.D.C. This was not a legislative murder, but killing in sheer self-defense. For two whole years an indecent attempt has been made to force France into a monstrous supra-national contraption, which neither Britain nor America was prepared to enter. At the last moment the French people have rebelled against this Anglo-American demand that they should commit national suicide in order to suit our convenience—and that of Dr. Konrad Adenauer. M. Herriot was speaking for the overwhelming majority of his countrymen when he refused to put his country alongside Western Germany inside the cage of E.D.C. Then he issued a solemn warning that the final result of this policy would be to leave the Germans free to walk out of the cage into the arms of the Russians, leaving France locked inside. . . .

But what next? The European Defense Community was perhaps the least dangerous method of rearming Germany, since its cumbrous supra-national machinery would have delayed, for a few years at any rate, the emergence of a sovereign German state. Any framework for German rearmament which is hastily contrived to replace it will not only make far greater demands on Britain (this time Sir Winston will be unable to cheer the French on from outside), but will contain even fewer safeguards against the emergence of a German national army. Yet apparently it is the intention of London and Washington to create this new framework; and even M. Mendès-France has apparently turned his face against the alternative policy of neutralization. . . .

But now that the realists have made such a mess of their policy, it is surely time to ask ourselves whether neutralization may not be at least as practicable and at least advantageous to the West as the present feverish attempts to integrate a rearmed Western Germany into Nato.

Let us first clear our minds about the definition of neutralization. It is not the same as German neutrality, though of course the neutrality of a reunified Germany guaranteed by both East and West would be one possible way of achieving it. Neutralization means nothing more than a plan to ensure that German military strength is added neither to the Eastern nor to the Western alliance; and it is worth remembering that nearly all those who now dismiss this policy as totally unrealistic strongly favored it as late as 1948. In September, 1946, Mr.



HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE
(Evil be to him who evil thinks)

Byrnes, then Mr. Truman's Secretary of State, made a speech at Stuttgart offering the Russians to neutralize a unified Germany for 25 years; and as far as we know, this offer remained official American policy at least until the Russian blockade of Berlin. In this speech Mr. Byrnes further proposed that the cession of Koenigsberg to Russia and of the Saar to France should be confirmed, and that the Oder-Neisse line should be ratified in the Peace Treaty. He went on to outline a plan for a central German administration, supported by a National Council composed of the Minister-Presidents of the Provinces in all four Zones; and he summed up his plan in these words:

"In proposing that the four major Powers should jointly undertake to see that Germany is kept disarmed and demilitarized for a generation, the U.S. was not unmindful of the responsibility resting upon it and its allies to maintain and enforce peace under law. Freedom from militarization will give the German people the opportunity, if they will but seize it, to apply their great energies and abilities to the works of peace."

At that time, this American plan for German neutralization was contemptuously dismissed by Stalin, who was still playing for higher stakes. Now something strangely similar is proposed by Mr. Molotov, and the West implacably turns it down.

The reason for this complete reversal of positions is clear. So long as the Soviet Union was hoping to profit by American isolationalism and to bring Western Germany, and indeed all Western Europe, within its orbit, neutralization was too moderate a policy to satisfy its ambitions. Since the formation of Nato—and, even more, since America rearmed and decided to wage the Cold War—it is the West which has conceived the ambition to win the whole of Germany, and ultimately the whole of Eastern Europe, to its side. Driven on the defensive, the Russians have correspondingly moderated their aims—and now favor a neutral Germany with a very small army of her own.

The real objection in Washington and Bonn to neutralization, therefore, is not that it would "favor Russia" but that it would create a powerful obstacle to the eventual liberation of Eastern Europe, including, of course, the lost German provinces beyond the Oder-Neisse line. This was made quite clear in the course of the Berlin Conference, where the three Western Powers made it clear that they would consider no plan for German unification which did not permit the new central German government (i) to join Nato and (ii) to demand a revision of the Oder-Neisse line.

The first question we have to ask ourselves, therefore, is whether the West has been wise to discard the modest aims proclaimed in 1946 and to set itself the grandiose goal of integrating Western Germany into the Atlantic alliance, then adding the Eastern Zone of Germany to that alliance, and finally liberating Eastern Europe. Would it really benefit either the U.S. or France or Britain if a Greater German Reich were once again created?

And furthermore, if we give the West Germans sovereignty and encourage them to revive their national ambitions, can we be sure they will remain our faithful partners when they realize, as some of them are already realizing, that the Russians have far more to offer them than we do? At the very least it must be admitted that the effort to add German military strength to the Western alliance is fraught with danger. By attempting it since 1950, we have not only excluded a peaceful settlement with the Russians but imperilled Western unity as well. Now, if E.D.C. Mark II is successful, we shall re-create a Germany able once again to exploit its balancing position between East and West.

These dangers would not be denied, at least, by Mr. Eden and M. Mendès-France. But they would probably say, "How can we turn back now that we have gone so far down this admittedly dangerous road? The Bonn Government cannot be put back where it was in 1949, and if we tried to do so, we should throw the Germans into the arms of the Russians." This assertion flies in the face of every known fact about the state of public opinion in Western Germany. It is simply not true that the average German is enthusiastic for E.D.C. and for rearmament. On the contrary, every public opinion poll has made it clear that enthusiam for E.D.C. is confined to relatively small circles of Catholics and European Federalists.

Both the Nationalists on the Right and the Socialists on the Left desire to avoid any irrevocable commitments to the West; and even such sober observers as Dr. Heinrich Brüning have recently shown themselves critical of any agreement with the Atlantic Powers which could hamper later negotiations with Russia. In fact, as Dr. Adenauer knows only to well, German opinion is becoming more neutralist with every month that passes. If Britain and America were now to agree to another Four-Power conference and there propose the postponement of West German rearmament in return for Russian concessions on the issue of free elections, they would certainly finish off Dr. Adenauer, but they would also meet with overwhelming approval from German public opinion. . . .

The beginning of sanity is to realize that for four years (ever since the Acheson-Bevin-Schuman conference of September, 1950) we have been marching down a cul-de-sac. Now we must either let the Germans break down the wall at the end of the road, or retrace our steps and resume the policy which we abruptly abandoned in the panic mood of the Korean war. In France this decision would transform pessimism and defeatism into jubilant self-confidence overnight. In Western Germany few tears would be shed outside Dr. Adenauer's personal entourage.

Mr. Churchill would do well to sit down and re-read the Stuttgart speech in the light of his own proposal for a "Locarno arrangement" to guarantee Russia against aggression. Many of the details of the Byrnes plans have been outdated, but the main framework is as sensible today as it was when he first published it. It is for those who dismiss neutralization today and explain exactly what has happened between 1946 and 1954 to make them change their minds just when Mr. Molotov seems to be coming round to their view and to be willing to consider practical plans for peaceful co-existence in Europe. . . .

If Britain and America continue their effort to win Germany to their side instead of neutralizing her military strength, the disruption of Nato will continue; the West will inflict on itself defeat after defeat, and the Russians will sit on the sideline enjoying the spectacle.

The Giveaway Deal

There are few success stories that can match the brilliance of German achievements since the end of the war. Unquestionably, U.S. policy toward Germany has been of great help. In our legitimate concern over the Communist danger we have gone to unprecedented extremes "to keep the Germans on our side." Naturally, the Germans have taken full advantage. In this connection Drew Pearson quotes an American attorney familiar with the German frame of mind: "The Germans seem to think they can get anything out of the United States just because we need them to oppose the Russians." (8-11-54)

The German Lobby

However, there is another side to this unusual success story which does not appear to be as obvious. We refer to the outstanding work of the German lobby in the United States. Since the end of the war the Germans have built up a powerful organization operating on all levels of American life and supported by what appears to be an inexhaustible "kitty." This lobby has proven to be a very great asset to the Germans and has netted them substantial gains. For example, it was no mean feat to succeed in convincing our policy makers that they should erase $2 billion of postwar debts owed by Germany to the American taxpayers. This was one of Germany's solid accomplishments since the end of the war thanks to the smooth public relations job performed by the German lobby.

The Germans have had ample experience in this kind of work going back to the days following the end of World War I. Like today they sent their emissaries to the United States "to lecture" and "to persuade." One of their best propagandists was the fabulous German sea pirate Count Luckner who later bragged how he had succeeded in squeezing "tears from the ladies' eyes and dollars from the capitalists' pockets."

The "Deal"

The German lobby today is just as brazen and perhaps even more effective. They have even dared to foist upon the U.S. a deal which would discredit the moral leadership and good faith of our country in the eyes of millions of our friends abroad. We speak of their attempt to regain former enemy assets valued at upwards of $500 million.

Following the end of World War II, the U. S. Government accepted the responsibility of compensating tens of thousands of American G.I. prisoners of war who had endured the awful sufferings of enemy prisoner of war camps. Congress passed legislation confiscating German assets in this country, and the revenues therefrom were to be turned over to the War Claims Commission to take care of these GIs or their survivors.

German Plans

While the welfare of our American POWs was of immediate concern, the official record shows that the U. S. Government desired to prevent German assets in the U. S. from being used for ulterior motives by the Germans or their dummies.

Thus on March 30, 1945, the State Department publicly announced that the German Government had developed "well arranged postwar plans for the perpetuation of Nazi doctrines and domination." The State Department went on to say: "Nazi Party members, German industrialists and the German military, realizing that victory can no longer be attained, are now developing postwar commercial projects, are endeavoring to renew and cement friendships in foreign commercial circles and are planning for renewals of prewar cartel agreements. An appeal to the courts of various countries will be made early in the postwar period through dummies for 'unlawful' seizure of industrial plants and other properties taken over by Allied governments at the outbreak of war. In cases where this method fails, German repurchase will be attempted through 'cloaks' who meet the necessary citizenship requirements. The object in every instance will be to reestablish German control at the earliest possible date . . ."

In describing the German strategy, the State Department said: "Unless these plans are checked, they will present a constant menace to postwar peace and security."

That American public opinion in general supported a realistic policy with respect to the disposition of German assets is beyond question. Elder statesman Bernard Baruch testifying before the U.S. Senate Committee on Military Affairs in June, 1945, laid particular emphasis on the need of confiscating German assets abroad. "German business abroad," he warned, "has traditionally been an instrument of economic and propagandistic war. These assets and organizations should be rooted out and taken over—everywhere. No hokus pocus, no falling for 'dummy' contrivances . . . Enemy assets in every country should be used to make restitution to nationals of that country for properties lost or damaged in enemy countries."

To sum up, it can be said that our Government and the Congress approved of the confiscation of enemy assets in the United States for two basic reasons, (a) to strengthen American and Allied security; (b) to undo Germany's economic penetration in the U. S. and to utilize the revenues of these assets to compensate American victims of Nazism.

"Bargaining"

For obvious reasons the Germans were silent on this question during the first years following the end of hostilities. However, when their "indispensability" began to hypnotize our policy makers, they decided that the moment was opportune to turn loose their lobby and their public relations salesmen.

During the negotiations on Germany's postwar debts to the U.S. Germany's chief delegate Herman J. Abs (one of Hitler's paymasters) hinted that unless these former assets were returned, Germany might not be able "to carry out her bargain." Apparently even the $2 billion bargain which the Germans received, did not satisfy the insatiable appetite of Herr Abs.

Chancellor Adenauer put the matter in even blunter terms.

In the early part of 1954, the Chancellor publicly demanded the return of the former German assets alleging that they had belonged to Germans who "were always the traditional promoters of friendship between the two nations. They should be put into a position to resume that role." While the Chancellor was talking about the need for the return of these properties to foster good will and as a token of appreciation for Germany's brave role in the struggle against Communism, West German direct exports to Red China were soaring to record heights.

Traditional "Friends"

Dr. Adenauer was not specific as to whom he referred when he spoke about those Germans who were the traditional friends of the USA. It is not known whether he had in mind the I.G. Farben interests which had formerly owned the General Aniline and Film Chemical Corporation located in the USA. Nevertheless, I.G. Farben is working overtime to regain General Aniline and Film the value of which has risen from $25 million to over $100 million under American management. The New York Times of February 7, 1954, reported that "if all German assets blocked in the United States were released, no conceivable justification would remain for withholding General Aniline and Film Corporation stock from Interhandel . . ." On March 28, 1954, the New York Times correspondent writing from Switzerland, repeated the same thought. Certain interests in Switzerland (unnamed), according to the Times writer, prefer "to exert all their influence to approach the American Government directly, proposing rapid settlement by compromise out of court." Their efforts have been in vain because all of the authentic evidence which is in the possession of the U.S. Government, proved that GAF was a creature of I.G. Farben, even though this relationship has been disguised by dummy corporations set up in Switzerland.

Widows and Orphans

The German lobby in the United States has been a model of discretion with respect to the role of the Farben interests. They know that the name Farben is synonymous with the concentration camps of Auschwitz and Buchenwald. They are fully aware of the fact that without the criminal support of I.G. Farben, Hitler could never have launche dhis wars of aggression. Therefore, the public relations boys employed by the German lobby, stay away from the odious name. Instead they dwell on "the little man" in Germany who is allegedly injured by the confiscation of the former enemy assets. The "widow and orphan" line is supposed to squeeze dollars out of the American taxpayers' pockets just as Von Luckner's sentimental spiels in the 1920s brought on a rain of American dollars to rebuild Germany's industrial war potential.

Though they try to hide behind the "widows and orphans," they do make clumsy mistakes which are a revelation. For example, the attorney for the Swiss dummy of I.G. Farben is Ray Jenkins (not to be confused with Mr. Jenkins of the Army-McCarthy hearings). One of the occupants of his office is John W. Nairn who is counsel for the supposedly impartial Senate Subcommittee investigating former enemy assets in the United States. According to Drew Pearson (August 6, 1954) lawyers Jenkins and Nairn "swap their secretary, Miss Anette H. Day. Efficient Miss Day has been working for Jenkins, attorney for the Swiss German combine. Now she works for the Senate Committee investigating the possible return of the German property."

Another Aspect

There is another aspect to the question of German external assets which involves the U.S. relations with our western allies. The United States was a party to important agreements which sanctioned the confiscation of German assets abroad and many of our war time allies are categorically opposed to any plan that would scuttle those agreements and pledges. Our allies have depended upon these former enemy assets to help rehabilitate their war torn economies. The New York Times, August 4, 1954, reported that the Dutch Government would regard the return of former German assets as a "repudiation by the U. S. of an agreement it had made with its allies."

The German lobby, however, is not concerned with the sacredness of agreements (a characteristic of German diplomacy). These lobbyists harp on the principle of private property rights—as though they have always defended that principle. Of course, the whole world knows that the Germans have been among the worst offenders of private property rights when they looted Europe on a scale unprecedented in history. Yet, when a New York Times correspondent (4-5-54) confronted West German officials with the fact that the Nazis had looted 40 tons of gold from the Netherlands, these same German officials retorted, "We are allies today; how can you use the argument of a conqueror at this stage!" So, when they invoke the principle of private property rights, let us not forget that even the devil can quote Scripture.

The bill sponsored by Senator Dirksen to abrogate the present legislation is a monstrous insult to American taxpayers. They would be obliged to underwrite "a $500 million windfall payment of Treasury funds principally to German industrialists who supported Hitler" (Francis C. Brown, head of Schering Chemical Corporation). Were these the people Chancellor Adenauer had in mind when he spoke about Germans who had always promoted friendship with the USA?

Parenthetically, it should be noted that the Bonn Government had officially agreed to recognize the validity of the confiscations. Article 3, Chapter 6 of the Convention with Germany stipulates in effect that German external assets which have not been created in the postwar years, do not legally exist (Manchester Guardian 11-10-53). The reader should judge for himself how easy it is for the Germans to go back on their own signed agreements—a point which should be borne in mind for future reference.

The Opposition

Fortunately, the Dirksen bill found rough sledding in Congress in spite of the fact that the present Secretary of State (an old hand in representing German interests) argued for it. The Attorney General's Office opposed the bill; so did many groups and individuals including the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

The Washington Post, March 23, 1954, called the Dirksen deal "a give away." In a leading editorial this newspaper noted that "in the peace treaty which Secretary Dulles negotiated with Japan, confiscation of Japanese private property in the U. S. was recognized and accepted. There is no good reason to deal with the Germans differently. . . ."

The New York Post denounced the Dirksen deal in no uncertain terms: "If German industrialists and their U.S. lobbyists win this round, they will give Germany a weighty club to extort similar concessions from small European nations plundered by the Nazis." The New York Post's observation had a prophetic quality for after the U.S. Congress failed to consider the Dirksen bill, the New York Herald Tribune of August 11, 1954, reported: ". . . the West Germans will undoubtedly continue to bring the external asset issue into trade negotiations with other smaller nations in the future. They are expected to bring as much pressure on their trading partners as the current power of West German industry will permit."

Within Congress itself, the opposition grew as the facts of the conspiracy were laid bare for all to see and to ponder. Senator Hendricksen, Republican from New Jersey, refused to agree to the Dirksen recommendations. He was joined by Senator Kefauver, Democrat from Tennessee who quoted from a report adopted by the American Bar Association (House of Delegates, December 20, 1954): "The United Nations are now establishing a method of suppressing aggressor nations, by use of sanction and threat of armed force. If the people of a potential aggressor nation, who have investments abroad, know that, if defeated, they will lose that property, the knowledge will serve as a definite deterrent to aggression. On the contrary, if they may plant property abroad on the assurance that if their aggression fails, that property, carefully preserved for them, will be returned to them by the nations they have attacked, one check on aggressors is lost. Under modern conditions international public interest and peace will be served if private property of the citizens of any aggressor nation is subject to application to that Nation's obligation to pay for the damage it inflicts on the people of the nations it assails."

As a result of the opposition, the Dirksen deal fell through—at least temporarily. Needless to say, the Germans were besides themselves. The I.G. Chemie stock listed on the Swiss stock exchange, dropped 13 per cent within several days following Dirksen's defeat. German reaction was immediate. One prominent German industrialist, unnamed, but claiming to express the general feelings of most of his colleagues, said: "If private property in the West is not inviolable, there is no essential difference between the democratic and authoritarian principles. Consequently, we must look elsewhere" (N.Y. Times, 8-16-53). Does this German industrialist imply that the Germans play on democratic principles when it is profitable but will not hesitate to turn elsewhere when the payoff is not forthcoming?

While the Dirksen deal has been temporarily checked, there is no doubt that the powerful German lobby will be ringing doorbells during the next session of Congress. The money will flow and their paid mouthpieces will write objective newspaper columns on this subject. They will have all kinds of allies ranging from neo-Nazi sympathizers to American cartelists. They will have their slick lawyers cooking up new pseudo-legal arguments while their publicists flood the country with tear jerking propaganda.

The October issue of the U.S.-German Chamber of Commerce Bulletin runs a plea from Gordon Michler (Standard Oil) for funds to assure that the Dirksen deal is "given prompt and adequate consideration when Congress meets." All checks, Mr. Michler advises, should be sent to the Treasurer of the "Committee for the Return of Former Enemy Assets" located in Wall Street. In the face of this projected assault by the German cartel interests and their counterpart in the U.S., it would be well for the American people to redouble their vigilance. The issues involved are moral as well as fundamental to the security and good relations of this country with her western allies. The Dirksen deal is in effect a multimillion-dollar subsidy for Germany's aggressions which would come out of the pockets of the American taxpayers. On the other hand, if the American people and their patriotic organizations show the same determination as they did in the summer of 1954, it is certain that the German lobby will again meet deserved defeat.

THE GERMAN "MIRACLE"

". . . Despite all the signs of progress and activity, some reservations have to be made. There is a very obvious undercurrent curiously blended of self-pity and self-satisfaction; an air of complete detachment from the recent past, which nobody ever mentions and nobody seems to regret or repent. There is a certain cynical and speculative streak in the firm belief of most Germans that the Americans will do anything for them, since they need them. And, finally, there is a certain light-hearted approach to business obligations and responsibilities. Were it not for such things as these, the German economic achievement of recent years would be far more impressive and would command far greater respect than it does. It all looks a little bit too 'jerry-built'; a little too much too soon and not quite genuine. . . ."

A Letter to the President

On September 21, 1954, the Society for the Prevention of World War III, Inc., wrote to President Eisenhower urging a complete re-examination of the present policy toward Germany before granting her full sovereignty and the right to remilitarize. The Society warned that the present policy toward Germany inevitably deepens the disunity which already exists in Western Europe and, therefore, plays into the hands of Communist Russia. The President was told that a sovereign and remilitarized Germany will be in the position to strike a new bargain with Russia at the expense of Western security. The letter further stated that the present German leadership is surrounded by key advisers who are former Nazis and, therefore, cannot be trusted.

Text of the letter signed by the Secretary of the Society, Albert Simard, is furnished below:

September 21, 1954

The President of the United States
Dwight D. Eisenhower
The White House Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. President:

It is the Society's considered judgment that the steady deterioration of our position of leadership in Europe is primarily due to our German policy. That policy has had the effect of creating a resurgent Germany which is employing its power to blackmail the West while laying the groundwork for rapprochement with the Communist East. This ominous situation has created fear among our friends and allies, has provided grist for the Communist propaganda mills and has stimulated disunity in Europe where such unity is essential for American security.

The logic of that policy brought about the fateful decision of the Secretary of State to bypass France in his recent visit to Europe. This unprecedented act of ignoring our historical ally without whom there cannot be any sound and safe solution of the German problem, will inevitably deepen the disunity already existing in Western Europe.

An examination of German diplomacy since the end of the first world war will clearly show that Germany was able to revive her power for predatory purposes and to make deals with Soviet Russia only after she had succeeded in splitting the West. If we grant the Germans full sovereignty and enable her to regain military power, the conditions will be created that will make it possible for Germany to strike a new bargain with Russia at the expense of Western security.

According to the Christian Science Monitor (June 30, 1954), a large segment of influential German opinion believes that "the situation calls for German sovereignty without restrictions as well as the right to regulate for themselves their relations with the East." The impact of full sovereignty on Germany's future decisions regarding whether or not she will make a defense contribution to the West was described by Felix von Eckardt, West Germany's press chief (A.P. 9-2-54): "We must have sovereignty first—and only then can we consider (our emphasis) giving some of it up, to international organizations."

Once West Germany obtains full sovereignty, all prior commitments made by West German politicians become subject to abrogation. That Germany, if her interests so dictate, will repudiate the pledges of the present Chancellor, or that he himself may do so, must be expected in the light of Germany's notorious record on that score.

To unbiased students of German politics, the blind confidence reposed in the present German leadership by our Government could place the United States in an untenable position. Is it not shortsighted to pursue a policy the success of which depends on the continued good health and popularity of an aged German politician? Is it not dangerous to trust Adenauer's leadership when among his chief advisers is Hans Globke, head of the Chancellery and a former Nazi functionary who helped prepare the official Commentary on the Nuremberg race laws?

The Globke case is not exceptional. The fact is that the Chancellor is surrounded by other key advisers who are former Nazis, including some members of his cabinet. We cite as examples:

(1) Theodor Oberlaender, Minister for Expellees, joined the Nazi Party in 1933. He also became Reichsfuehrer of the Federation of the German East. The Federation was later classified by the Allies as a Nazi Organization.

(2) Waldemar Kraft, Minister without Portfolio in the Adenauer Cabinet, is a former major of Hitler's SS. Kraft worked closely with the Gestapo, the Nazi secret police.

(3) Gerhard Schroeder, Minister of Interior, joined the Nazi Party in 1933.

(4) Victor Emanuel Preusker, Housing Minister, became a Nazi Storm-Trooper in 1933 and joined the black shirted SS which originated as Hitler's personal guard.

Does this not indicate the futility of our German policy when Chancellor Adenauer apparently cannot find more reliable and less Nazi tainted elements for key positions in his government?

It is our conviction that any firm and lasting defense against possible aggression from the Communist East must first and foremost be based on a complete understanding and solidarity among the three major democratic powers, i.e. England, France and the United States. Our present German policy undermines that solidarity and, therefore, contributes to the strengthening of the Communist position in Europe. We, therefore, urge that our Government re-examine the policy in its entirety before taking any further action in the way of remilitarizing Germany and granting her full sovereignty.

Respectfully submitted,
Society for the Prevention of World War III, Inc.
Albert Simard, Secretary.

Certainly, it would surprise no informed person if Russia announced that East Germany was going to build up an East German armed force to counterbalance the military establishment of the Bonn Government.

But, hand in hand with that it is expected that Moscow will quickly adjust itself to the new status of Bonn and, in all probability, embark upon a calculated policy designed to lead to normal diplomatic and trade relations between Russia and West Germany.

JUSTICE ROBERT H. JACKSON

The untimely death of Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson at the age of 62 creates a great gap in the ranks of democracy. The New York Times (10-11-54) describes Justice Jackson as one who will be remembered, among other things, "for the vigor, incisiveness and the clarity of his thinking as a judge. . . ." The Times noted further, "when basic human rights were, as he saw it, at stake, he rose superbly to the occasion." This is a fitting tribute to a great American and outstanding jurist.

The brilliance of Justice Jackson's career is not only due to his distinguished work in the Supreme Court. In has capacity as the Chief American Prosecutor at the Nuremberg War Crime Trials, Justice Jackson also made a decisive contribution toward the enrichment of international law and morality. In this respect he helped to strengthen the fabric of Western Culture against the challenge of 20th century barbarism.

From the days of Grotius, statesmen and lawyers have talked about the necessity of creating a body of international law that could help curb would-be aggressors. Yet, all of the talk and all of the efforts—no matter how worthwhile—did not succeed in nailing down once and for all the principle that international robbers and murderers are no more sacrosanct than the petty thief and assassin. Thanks to the vision and courage of Justice Jackson, this principle was crystallized at Nuremberg.

When Justice Jackson described in detail the diabolical plot of the German leaders to destroy and enslave in the name of "Lebensraum," he was providingt he basis for a great leap forward in the sphere of international law. Justice Jackson was not oblivious to the criticisms from certain quarters which deplored the prosecution of the German leaders for the crimes they committed. With great eloquence and irrefutable logic he replied to these critics in the very opening words of his address before the International Military Tribunal: "The privilege of opening the first trial in history for crimes against the peace of the world imposes a grave responsibility. The wrongs which we seek to condemn and punish have been so calculated, so malignant and so devastating, that civilization cannot tolerate their being ignored because it cannot survive their being repeated. That four great nations, flushed with victory and stung with injury stay the hand of vengeance and voluntarily submit their captive enemies to the judgment of the law is one of the most significant tributes that Power ever has paid to Reason."

In this same address he met the charge that the War Crimes Trials were "unfair" because the prosecutors and the Tribunal itself represented the victors while the accused were the vanquished: "Unfortunately, the nature of these crimes is such that both prosecution and judgment must be by victor nations over vanquished foes. The worldwide scope of the aggressions carried out by these men has left but few real neutrals. Either the victors must judge the vanquished or we must leave the defeated to judge themselves. After the First World War, we learned the futility of the latter course. The former high station of these defendants, the notoriety of their acts, and the adaptability of their conduct to provoke retaliation make it hard to distinguish between the demand for just and measured retribution, and the unthinking cry for vengeance which arises from the anguish of war. It is our task, so far as humanly possible, to draw the line between the two. We must never forget that the record on which we judge these defendants today is the record on which history will judge us tomorrow. To pass these defendants a poisoned chalice is to put it to our own lips as well. We must summon such detachment and intellectual integrity to our task that this trial will commend itself to posterity as fulfilling humanity's aspirations to do justice."

In his concluding remarks he set down in clarity the principle upon which he rested the American case against the German leaders: "But the ultimate step in avoiding periodic wars, which are inevitable in a system of international lawlessness, is to make statesmen responsible to law. And let me make clear that while this law is first applied against German aggressors, the law includes, and if it is to serve a useful purpose it must condemn aggression by any other nations, including those which sit here now in judgment. We are able to do away with domestic tyranny and violence and aggression by those in power against the rights of their own people only when we make all men answerable to the law. This trial represents mankind's desperate effort to apply the discipline of the law to statesmen who have used their powers of state to attack the foundations of the world's peace and to commit aggressions against the rights of their neighbors."

In recent years a veritable torrent of abuse has been heaped upon Justice Jackson, his associates at Nuremberg and what they achieved. We can judge the significance of these scurrilous attacks when it is noted that they come from the very same elements who gave aid and comfort to the German effort to conquer the world. These sinister forces are still working overtime to turn history on its head. The war criminals become the martyrs and those who courageously beat back the aggressors are branded. The unpunished and the unrepentant are frustrated and restless for they know that as long as the principles of Nuremberg live on they dare not repeat their devilish deeds without invoking the wrath and just retribution of an outraged humanity. No matter how many dupes they may find in the legal profession to apologize for their crimes, the verdict of history will remain untarnished and inviolable. Freedom loving people will ever be grateful to Justice Jackson for his historic role in working out enlightened principles of justice for the defense of their dignity, liberty and peace.

"I cannot let pass the death of Associate Justice Robert H. Jackson of the United States Supreme Court without paying to him tribute which he deserved on many counts.

". . . His service to humanity and to international justice through his successful prosecution of the Nazi criminals in the Nuremberg trials alone will give him a place in both legal and world history. To him we owe a large debt in the establishement of the judicial determination of genocide. He sustained the idea of a moral basis for international as well as national law of major historic importance. . . ."

Democracy Faces Test in Germany

by

ERNEST S. PISKO

To draw a balance sheet of prevailing public opinion in West Germany as of this moment is not difficult. But to draw a conclusion from it and forecast the eventual direction of German thinking is virtually impossible.

Up to now, West Germany has been like a passenger in an overcrowded rush-hour streetcar. It swayed somewhat when the car bumped, but it was so hemmed in that it could neither fall nor move. It was held upright by the pressures bearing down on it from all directions.

But now the situation is changing radically. With the occupation lifted, the streetcar grows emptier, and if the ride does not get smoother—which seems rather improbable—German stability soon will be put to a grueling test.

Will it stand the test?

Democracy is threatened in West Germany from two directions—the world political constellation and the Nazi past. The political problem cannot be solved by the Germans alone; but the problem of their Nazi past can be solved only by the Germans.

One may safely assume that there will be a West German army soon and, some day, reunification of East and West Germany. What remains to be seen is whether the new army will be democratic in character and limited in size and armament; also whether any West German government can stay in power that does not press for early reunification regardless of the risks.

Regarding the Nazi past, the Germans have been reluctant to repudiate it openly. The longer they wait, the more difficult will such a step become—and the more unlikely. At the same time, pressure in the opposite direction will grow all the stronger.

All those who have a personal stake in a rehabilitation of naziism will try to persuade their fellow countrymen that the Hitler years were a period of national glory, that Hitler's political concepts were correct, and that talk about Nazi crimes is slander.

A German Nazi follower recently wrote in a letter to a United States senator that, if Hitler had not lived, Germany would have experienced a civil war in 1933, and the Soviets would have occupied all of Europe, including Great Britain and Ireland.

These are the same falsehoods for which the Germans fell by the millions 20 years ago and may fall again. Too few of them have realized that in 1933 the only threat of a civil war came from the Nazis and that the Soviets would not be in Central Europe today, had Hitler not first made a pact with them and later engaged them in a war which he lost.

Next to these attempts to rewrite history are the efforts to make the Nazis respectable.

The change in the popular attitude toward former Nazis was reviewed critically in the independent Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, Sept. 13. In an article, written by August Dresbach, it was pointed out that at the time of the denazification procedure—between 1947 and 1950—the defendants were asked in court why they had joined the party. If they said they had not joined until after Hitler's seizure of power and only under economic pressure, the court usually exonerated them.

But now, the author said, it has become customary to ask people "why they had not been in the party." Lack of membership is taken as evidence that the person was either "not sufficiently Aryan" or married to someone racially suspect, or that he was "too black" (Roman Catholic) or "too red."

Former party membership appears to have become almost a prerequisite to obtaining one of the better jobs. This explains the warning issued by the trade union leader Adolf Kummernus, recently, that as to the number of former Nazis holding official posts, "the situation is already as bad now as just before Hitler came to power."

And Heinrich Böll, one of West Germany's most talented younger authors, wrote in the weekly magazine Aufwärts, last August, that it now is fashionable to put the terms "Nazi" and "war criminal" between quotation marks to intimate that they are used in a plainly ironical sense.

These are disturbing entries in the debit side of the ledger. They are not meant, however, as evidence that democracy has lost out in West Germany, but rather as a warning not to believe it has won or is sure to win in the near future. . . .

"Any realistic survey of the German's attitude to the economics of rearmament must begin with their plans for large-scale tax reductions. This is odd, for what other country has prepared for rearmament by cutting taxes? . . . There is a widespread feeling in Germany that Americans must bear whatever extra costs may be involved in rearmament. Some optimism on this score is justified, for the first stage at least, as the Americans will supply the heavy equipment necessary for the initial German divisions, though it has not been stated whether it will be a gift. Certainly German hopes tend in that direction. Similarly, industrialists take the view that an American loan should be provided if factories have to be re-converted to arms production. . . ."

The Scourge of the Swastika

by

LORD RUSSELL OF LIVERPOOL

The author of this terrifying record was the former deputy Judge Advocate General of the British army of the Rhine. The dust cover informs us that he resigned because the British government objected to the publication of this volume, presumably because it would complicate relations with Germany.

Actually the Germans could not object to such a factual record, though they must be ashamed, together with all of us, that the inhumanities recorded in the book should have occurred. At one or two points the author allows himself speculative judgment on how much or how little the German people knew about the atrocities committed by the Nazis. These are the only portions of the book which one might challenge, not because they are not true but because the truth is not as well established as the record of the atrocities.

The record will, of course, not be news to any reader who followed the papers and the history of the war crime trials from Nurnberg on. But the record has a cumulative effect of terrifying proportions. The Nazi crimes on the high seas, the forced labor, the abuse of prisoners of war, the concentration camps, the extermination of the Jews in the gas chambers, the atrocities against conquered peoples; medical experiments upon prisoners; every part of the consistent inhumanity which the Nazis achieved is included.

Naturally such a book does not make pleasant reading. The question is whether it is worth reading. We had atrocity stories after the first world war and then a reaction against them because many of them were proved to be false. It is rather ironic that the public was disposed to incredulity because of the surfeit of atrocity stories after the first world war and then in the second the atrocities were so monstrous that they caused an unjustified incredulity. That is why a report from actual records is important for history.

Lord Russell's report establishes the implication of the German generals in the atrocities, however much they have tried to create the impression that they abhorred that part of the Nazi program. It also gives a picture of unrelieved wickedness including women nurses, etc.

The wickedness is, in fact, so unrelieved that it raises some very interesting questions about human nature. Could it be true that, when the general standards of human decency are outraged, men fall into a bottomless pit of evil? These Nazi crimes, for instance, can only partly be prompted by the Nazi creed, which recognizes no human rights superior to the "survival" needs of the German nation. But the cruelties consistently extend beyond the requirements of policy and degenerate into pure sadism.

One could wish that the photos had been eliminiated, particularly those of corpses. They do not add anything to the indictment and spoil the book.

Herbert Hoover

WHEN WAS HE RIGHT? WHEN WAS HE WRONG?

During his many years of service in public life ex-President Herbert Hoover has displayed a marked interest in German affairs. He has been regarded by the Germans as one of their tried and trusted friends. Indeed, when he visited Germany recently he was hailed as their "savior." Since the end of World War II, Mr. Hoover has played a leading part in the formulation of U.S. policy toward Germany. Of late, he has been quite definite in his views with regard to the future role of Germany. "I have always said that Western civilization cannot survive without a unified Germany . . ." (New York Times, 10-31-54). Mr. Hoover has stated that German nationalism is not a bad thing per se and that Germany can be depended upon to act as the great defender of democracy. "My prayer is that Germany may be given the unity and full freedom which will restore her to that mission in the world" (N. Y. Herald Tribune, 11-25-54).

Mr. Hoover did not always believe in Germany's mission to save Western civilization. In this connection we cite two examples:

EXHIBIT "A"

In 1918 a book was published entitled "The Iron Circle, The Future of German Industrial Exports, etc." by S. Herzog. Mr. Hoover signed the Introduction, excerpts of which we publish herewith:

"'If there is anything to be gained by being honest, let us be honest; if it is necessary to deceive, let us deceive.' Thus wrote Frederick the Great in the middle of the 18th Century —the man who laid the foundation of Pan-Germanism, which this world war was expected to achieve. Not content with dominion by force of arms, we find Germany plotting for commercial supremacy with that insolent disregard of the rights of others and that resort to deception that has characterized all her policies since Frederick the Great's reign. . . .

"For forty years the Germans have been plotting to realize their dream of Pan-Germanism—eventual world conquest and dominion. For two generations they have been thinking in terms unknown or little understood by an innocent and unsuspecting world. The Prussian philosophy that might makes right, that the State is supreme, has completely possessed the ruling and upper classes of Germany, both military and commercial, until deception and fraud form the background of their most important international relations and undertakings. They have made Germany an inherently dishonest nation. . . .

"German rule means the breaking-down of all order, the exchange of personal liberty and national freedom for force, of right for might, of justice for the mailed fist.

"The world should have been forewarned. Books were written, maps constructed, by well-known German authorities for the enlightenment of the German people, and these books reached the outside world, but civilization, accustomed to the pursuits of peace, turned a deaf ear, and is now paying the penalty for refusing to see and hear.

"Now another conception comes out of the heart of Germany, that threatens the commercial interests of unsuspecting nations—carefully thought out, with characteristic German thoroughness, openly advocating the breaking down of all business ethics, relying upon trickery and circumvention to gain their end. This promises to stop at nothing, from national dumping of goods to crush competition to false labels and disguise of the origin and the breaking of contracts that prove disadvantageous to the German.

"Let the manufacturing and banking interests and the laboring and professional classes of all nations be warned in time to devise antidotes and counter-attacks to the Machiavellian devices of a class gone mad with lust for conquest, deliberately plotting to fatten itself upon the life blood of other peoples even after the war. Let us consider in making peace what protection we can give to the commercial existence of the freed nations."

EXHIBIT "B"

On the eve of the San Francisco Conference (1945) which created the United Nations, Mr. Hoover wrote a special piece for the North American Newspaper Alliance. Here are excerpts of this article:

"My fourth proposal for the San Francisco Conference is that agreement upon continued and total disarmament of the enemy nations must be entered into either as part of the United Nations Charter or as a separate agreement. In any event it will have to be enforced by the Security Council. And it profoundly affects the whole question of peace.

"Three years ago Mr. Gibson [Hugh Gibson, American diplomat] and I proposed that the enemy states must be completely disarmed for an entire generation. We pointed out one of the great errors of the Treaty of Versailles in which Germany was permitted to retain a professional army of 100,000 men, supposedly for the purposes of maintaining internal order. She was permitted to have a navy limited only in tonnage and type of ships. We stated that this leeway perpetuated her professional armies and navies. It perpetuated the warrior caste and all its traditions. It afforded a skeleton army and navy of skilled men ready for quick expansion. It insured the continuity of the General Staff with its military skill, brains, and ambitions. It perpetuated their know-how to make war.

"Repeated experience with the warrior caste of these nations in their intimidations, aggressions, blitzes, and attacks without even declarations of war should be enough for the world in this particular. We must make a better job of it this time. . . . We should prohibit the manufacture of arms of any kind [by these countries]."

Why Germans Go East

by

PAUL WOHL

(The defection to the East of Dr. Otto John, former security chief in the Bonn Government, and Karl Schmidt-Wittmack, member of the West German Parliament and prominent leader in Chancellor Adenauer's Christian Democratic Party, created a sensation both here and abroad. There has been much speculation concerning their motives. Perhaps the truth will not be known for a long time. Certain factors which provide the background for these defections were analyzed by Paul Wohl, outstanding expert on the Soviets for the Christian Science Monitor and a long time student of German affairs. We publish below a condensation of Mr. Wohl's article which appeared in The New Leader.)

The flight to the East of Otto John, former West German security chief, and Karl Schmidt-Wittmack, a member of the Bonn Parliament and leader of Chancellor Adenauer's Christian Democratic party in Hamburg, has been a major propaganda victory for Moscow. Bonn contends that the two men were emotionally unstable or else secret Communists or double agents who feared that the jig was up.

Propaganda-wise, this line of reasoning was not very effective. John and Schmidt-Wittmack are not only the West Germans who have sought to collaborate with the East. Among those who have done so are men whose integrity is beyond question. We may not agree with their way of thinking, but today in Europe, and especially in Germany, logical reasoning frequently carries less weight than evidence of personal integrity and idealism. Even if it could be established that Schmidt-Wittmack's trucking firm carried unlicensed goods to the East (who in the German business community can throw the first stone?) or that Dr. John was a double agent, this would not necessarily discredit them in the eyes of their countrymen . . . For most Germans, the John and Schmidt-Wittmack affairs transcend personal motivations. They have become a signal for stock-taking. And because this is understood by Soviet propaganda, while Western spokesmen try to avoid the basic issue, the two cases have acquired much greater political significance than the defection of two British diplomats in 1951, of atomic scientist Bruno Pontecorvo or of Hungary's cosmic-ray expert Janossy—all of whom, like John and Schmidt-Wittmack, held highly respected and well-paid positions in the West . . .

Politically, there is the idea of German unity and power through neutrality between East and West. This has long been advocated by a former Chancellor of the Weimar Republic, Joseph Wirth, and was recently endorsed by two other former Chancellors, Heinrich Brüning and Hans Luther. It is older and more deeply entrenched than Konrad Adenauer's idea of a Western European community. In Prussian North Germany, it has always come to the fore in times of stress. According to the late Walter G. Krivitsky, conservative Prussian patriots were prepared to arrest Hitler in 1937, provided they could announce to the German people that friendly relations with Russia had been restored. It was Stalin who decided against the plan. Stalin's successors, far more than the late dictator in his last years, have gone out of their way to honor East German officials and to cultivate the spokesmen for West German interests who occasionally hold clandestine meetings with Eastern representatives.

Paradoxically, German protagonists of neutrality feel stronger today than in 1937 because (1) on-the-spot observations during and after the war have convinced them of the general backwardness of the USSR, which makes it unlikely that the Kremlin will take the offensive in a major war; (2) they sense that the Soviets have lost momentum since Stalin's death and believe that Moscow will agree to creation of a neutral Germany; (3) West Germany's spectacular industrial comeback, plus a certain amount of technical progress in East Germany, have convinced them that, in ten years at the latest, they may be able to hold their own as a major world power between East and West. Some of West Germany's leading experts on Russia go even farther. In private conversations, they predict a long period of internal convulsion in the Soviet Union which, under certain circumstances, might enable a Germany organized along state-socialist (or state-capitalist) lines to become the nerve center of an enormous Eurasian empire extending from the North Sea to the Gulf of Tonking.

This line of thought has gained ground as a result of the difficulties encountered by Western European unity efforts, and the Communists have maneuvered skilfully to sell it to German right-wing patriots . . .

Ideologically, the East also has certain attractions for West Germany. First of all, there is the totalitarian resemblance to the Nazi system. But there are other reasons:

- The East appeals to the average German's love of parades, of hero worship and collective self-aggrandizement.
- The East's sweatshop methods appeal to some German businessmen and members of the old officialdom as reminiscent of Prussia's legendary Spartan virtues.
- Some impoverished members of the middle class look with envy at West Germany's prosperous new businessmen and have fallen back into Nazism's anti-capitalist mood or rediscover with Oswald Spengler a close relationship between the Prussian spirit and socialism.
- The European idea now appears petty to these people. "A united Europe would have been a great thing twenty or thirty years ago," wrote one of my correspondents. "Adenauer's 'Little Europe' is a political anachronism in the day of the supersonic guided missile." Such views are encouraged by East German invitations to visit China and by world youth festivals.
- A few German intellectuals have returned disillusioned from America. One university professor, who had toured this country under Marshall Plan auspices and later came back as an immigrant, was forced to do unskilled work in a small plant. Writing about his experiences, he referred to the fine factories he had visited while an official guest as "the American Potemkin's villages"—a false front comparable to those set up by Soviet propaganda.

Economically, too, East Germany does not appear altogether dark and hopeless to some West Germans. Certain rationed foods are cheaper than in the West and are smuggled into the Western Sector of Berlin. Although market prices are still very high, there have been eleven successive price reductions. Last August, moreover, nominal wages were raised as much as 20 per cent and taxes cut. For engineers, skilled workers, natural scientists and the like, conditions are improving. During the first six months of this year, alone among the Soviet satellites, East Germany maintained last year's tempo of industrial expansion, which is far greater than in the West. As in other Communist countries, unemployment does not exist. Several rows of impressive houses along East Berlin's Stalin-Allee show that the East Germans can build if given the opportunity to do so. East Germany has also begun to gain a foothold in some Western European and overseas markets, and it is through East Berlin that most commercial deals with China and other Soviet-bloc countries are made.

Yet, economic opportunities are the least important prospect that East Germany has to offer. Its principal attraction for West Germans at the present stage seems to lie in the conviction that, without a war, German unity can come only through reconciliation with the East. "Germans stay in East Germany or go there," one old-timer recalled, "in the same way that Frenchmen after 1871 stayed in Alsace-Lorraine or returned there despite Berlin's policy of cultural oppression." All this may appear incongruous to Americans, but it is well to remember that Germans, and especially German intellectuals, think politically in a strange, circuitous Teutonic way that is very different from the most rational approach of the freedom-loving West.

Shall We Cheer?

by

MAX LERNER

. . . We are told that it is the German arms treaty which is Dulles' high historic achievement. As if to underscore this claim Chancellor Adenauer has been brought here during the week before election for high-level talks on arms and diplomacy that will cement the new alliance.

I have nothing against Adenauer, who is probably a better Chancellor than anyone Germany is likely to have as his successor. He is a guest of our government and he deserves courtesy at our hands.

But with the memory of the greatest mass-extermination in history not wholly withered in our minds, is there real cause for jubilation at the "victory" we have achieved in rearming the nation responsible for the crematoria and the human furnaces? . . .

But it is one thing to say reluctantly that we had to do it, and quite another thing to make it ground for jubilation. What is there to be so happy about? The fact that there will soon be a half million German soldiers under arms and an equal number in the reserves?

The meaning of political events lies often less in the events themselves than in the moral framework in which they are placed. I have waited to hear from Dulles or President Eisenhower or any of the men around them a single word about the pain this decision caused them, about the sorrow and sadness that must mark it in the perspective of history.

They have said nothing. There has been only a barren, stony silence.

The conference at London and the signing of the treaty at Paris had a double purpose. One was to bring Germany back into the fellowship of nations, with rearming as a symbol of its sovereignty. The other was to set up a system of controls to make sure its armed power would not again cast a shadow over Europe.

The two purposes were necessarily intertwined. Without the system of controls, the rearming would be at once cynical and dangerous.

Yet the big fact about Dulles' role at London—like his role in all the diplomatic maneuvers preceding London—was that he concentrated on the rearming and allowed others to fight for the controls.

The championing of controls—and the insistence on them—was left to Mendes-France, although Eden helped. I think a detailed analysis of the day-to-day maneuvers at London and before London would show without question that Dulles threw his weight toward the minimum of controls and toward a dilution of the arms pool. Whenever there was a showdown on these crucial questions, Dulles always stood with Adenauer.

If this is why Eisenhower described Dulles' role in so glowing terms, we ought to know whether he understands its full meaning. The best features of the London agreement—the effort to control the rearming—came despite Dulles and not because of him. It was the rearming itself on which he most firmly set his will. If this is the returning hero we are supposed to cheer, I stand mute while the parade goes by.

Dachau . . .

. . . They are weeding dandelions from the blood trench at Dachau.

Roses and evergreens mark the graves of unknown thousands. German gardeners neatly clip the grass in the trench by the wall where elite guard officers once shot starving prisoners in the back.

Dachau was the first of Adolf Hitler's great prison camps, and the worst. Its record of murder and torture surpassed all others, for 300,000 persons died there, many while serving as unwilling guinea pigs for Gestapo Chief Heinrich Himmler's "scientific" experiments.

There were typhus, typhoid, dysentery and starvation. There was torture unparalleled, and an utter misery and breaking of human spirit. Jews, Poles, Hungarians, Belgians, Russians, Italians and Germans died there.

It is little more than a 15-minute drive north from Munich to Dachau, where smoke used to curl from the crematorium chimneys 24 hours a day. The elite guards did their grisly work thoroughly—in one month alone, 6000 human beings were stuffed into Dachau's long, brick ovens.

Under United States occupation, Dachau has become a memorial. The people who live there are refugees from the Soviet East Zone.

Dachau is in the middle of a big plain, and many new houses have sprung up outside the camp since the war. In 1949, a grave containing the bones of 15,000 persons was unearthed by a bull-dozer excavating for a basement. The grave is now a memorial.

Just inside the gates of Dachau's extermination area is an old pine tree, its trunk and first two limbs stripped of bark. The tree stands stark, with low-growing evergreens and a small path around it. At the foot of the tree is a small marble slab that says, in English, "hanging tree."

Nazis used to tie prisoners' hands behind them, then hang them from a limb of the tree for hours at a time. After unendurable pain, a blessed unconsciousness would follow.

Down the path a little way is the blood trench, about 22 inches deep and 15 feet long. It is marked with another small marble slab.

Farther along the path is a three-foot square of ground marked off with roses. In the middle is a slab that says, "This is the grave of unknown thousands."

It probably was there that 92 Russian officers, divided into batches of 15, were stripped, forced to kneel and shot in the back.

Still farther along the path is a three-foot square of ground bordered by roses and evergreens. In the middle is another slab that says "This is the grave of unknown thousands."

Continue along the path and there is another square, exactly like the first, only much larger. This is another grave of unknown thousands, discovered more than five years after the war's end.

Then you come to the crematoriums, two of them, with six furnaces. The furnaces are made of brick, and are more than long enough to accommodate an emaciated, tortured human body.

Victims were stuffed into the fires with long iron poles, now worn smooth at the ends. Some were burned alive.

Rafters over the crematoriums in one low wooden building are scorched black and burned partly through by the intense heat.

Fingernail scratches, made in desperation by doomed prisoners, still cover the walls of the "undressing room" and the gas chamber. Mingled with the scratches are other scratches, the marks of former Dachau prisoners who have revisited the camp, and the names of tourists.

In the last days before the United States Seventh Army arrived at Dachau, there were 112 to 135 deaths daily. Nazis were dumping prisoners into ice water until unconscious in alleged "scientific" experiments.

"Bone crusher," so-called by the prisoners, was Sgt. Kurt Moeller, whose physical strength was so great he could break arms and legs with his bare hands. Other Dachau guards used prisoners for pistol practice.

Dachau's horror came to an end when American troops arrived on April 30, 1945, but its misery did not. Advanced starvation and diseases took the lives of 60 to 100 a day at Dachau for weeks after the war ended.

Outside the camp, our troops found 50 boxcars loaded with bodies of humans who had been starved to death, or shot to death, bodies livid with bruises.

Two rooms in the crematorium were piled to the ceiling with emaciated bodies. Even Dachau could not keep up with the death pattern it had set.

"We have fought two wars in this century to prevent German hegemony in Europe, and it is still our national interest to prevent such a development at all costs. A dominant Germany, once men like Adenauer are gone, could all too easily revert to the policy of Bismarck, the Weimar Republic and Hitler—a deal with Russia which would imperil the West.

The policy of basing a European policy on Germany rather than France has a fatal appeal for some British and American policymakers. A pro-German Anglo-American foreign policy, carried through in the Twenties and early Thirties, made the Second World War almost inevitable. It could have the same result again. A pro-German policy would turn the Continent—including our faithful friends in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Rumania—into disillusioned and depressed neutralists. It would destroy the political appeal of the European idea, which would become not the dynamic rallying point of future hopes in Europe, but an abiding threat of renewed occupation by goose-stepping armies in field-gray."

What Have We Learned?

by

JOSIAH E. DU BOIS, JR.

(The article published below by Josiah E. Du Bois, Jr., is a review of "Tyranny On Trial" by Whitney R. Harris, published by Southern Methodist University Press, Dallas. Mr. Du Bois was Chief Prosecutor of the I.G. Farben case during the 1947-48 War Crime Trials at Nuremberg. He has served in important posts in the Government. He was Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury under both Morgenthau and Vinson; General Counsel to the War Refugee Board; and Counsel and Financial Advisor to the Representative of the President on Japanese Reparations. He is the author of "The Devil's Chemists, a definitive study of the I.G. Farben war criminals.)

World leaders as well as legal scholars have differed greatly in their views concerning the wisdom of the Nuremberg trials and the effect of said trials in the field of international law.

According to Judge Samuel Rosenman, who represented President Roosevelt in connection with the preparation for the trials, the British officials including Prime Minister Churchill, "wanted to take the top Nazi criminals out and shoot them without warning one morning and announce to the world that they were dead."

Secretary Hull's memoirs recite "If I had my way, I would take Hitler and Mussolini and Tojo and their arch-accomplices and bring them before a drumhead court-martial. And at sunrise on the following day there would occur an historic incident."

In writing about "the power of the victor over the vanquished," Chief Justice Stone said "It would not disturb me greatly if that power were openly and frankly used to punish the German leaders for being a bad lot, but it disturbs me some to have it dressed up in the habiliments of the common law and the Constitutional safeguards to those charged with crime."

On the other side, the late Justice Robert H. Jackson, Chief Prosecutor at the major Nuremberg trial, states in his introduction to TYRANNY ON TRIAL, "The only course, in my view, was for the victors to behave as civilized victors and take the responsibilities implicit in demanding and accepting capitulation of the whole German state and population. Unless history was to lay the war guilt and the guilt for organized programs of atrocities upon the whole German people, some process must identify those individuals who were in fact responsible and make an authentic record of their deeds."

And Justice Jackson reports that: "President Roosevelt had steadily and insistently favored a speedy but fair trial for these men, fearful that if they were punished without public proof of their crimes and opportunity to defend themselves there would always remain a doubt of their guilt that might raise a myth of martyrdom."

Despite these divergent views concerning the trial and the legal efficacy of the trials, no responsible person has attempted to defend the morality of the almost unbelievable acts of barbarism and cruelty committed by the Nazi leaders; and no responsible person has been heard to say that the nature of the punishment meted out to the arch criminals of the Nazi era was unjust.

Perhaps the most important contribution of the Nuremberg trials is the fact that they made an unchallengeable record of the incredible events of one of the most blackest periods in the history of mankind. The taking of Austria by telephone; the rape of Czechoslovakia; the subjugation of Poland; the conquest of Denmark and Norway in deliberate violation of solemn covenants; the liquidation of the three little countries of Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg; the overrunning of Yugoslavia; the invasion of France; the attempt to destroy the Soviet Union; the massacre of prisoners of war; the enslavement of millions of human beings; the persecution and deliberate murder of the Jews and other minority groups; the so-called "Germanization" of the Eastern countries of Europe, including drastic restrictions upon the education and cultural life of those unfit to be "Germanized" and the sterilization of "inferior women"; the plunder of the industries of every country of Europe invaded by the Nazi armies; the looting of treasures of art; and such incomprehensible acts like the wicked experiments conducted upon human beings for testing the effectiveness of poisoned bullets, medical experiments to test untried drugs, the collection of skulls of human beings of "all races and peoples at our disposal," the gassings of millions of human beings and the burning of their bodies, the extraction of gold from their teeth and the making of soap from their fat; these events and many more were recorded for all time at the Nuremberg trials.

> ". . . How are we to explain Germany's Untergang from civilization—not to 'barbarism' (an insult to all barbarians), but to nihilistic criminality on the part of its élite and to frenzied sadism and self-immolation on the part of its people? 'Tyranny' or 'totalitarianism' will scarcely serve as clues. . . . In any case, it is a fact . . . that the German community of our time somehow managed to attain lower depths of evil than any known to man in any of his past or present experiments in social life. . . ."
> (Frederick L. Schumann, The Nation, 9-18-54)

Yet, world power politics being what it is, history also records the fact that as early as September 1944, while our GIs were still being killed by the Nazi war machine, there was circulated within the United States government, at a high level, a memorandum contending, in effect, that as soon as the war was over we should rebuild German power as quickly as possible.

As a member of the American delegation to the Potsdam Conference in July 1945, I saw this government formally endorse a program designed to insure that Germany would no longer be the dominant power in Europe. That was the program the world heard. But there was secretly circulated among the top leaders of the British and American delegations a memorandum, prepared by certain top officials in the United States government, saying in effect that this whole approach was wrong and that our real interest lay in rebuilding Germany as quickly as possible "as a bulwark against Communism."

And, finally, we have recently heard the Prime Minister of Great Britain announce at a party celebrating his 80th birthday that "Even before the war ended, and while the Germans were surrendering by hundreds and thousands, I telegraphed Lord Montgomery directing him to be careful in collecting German arms and to stack them so that they could easily be issued again to the German soldiers with whom we should have to work if the Soviet advance into Western Europe continued."

Many of the industrial, military and diplomatic leaders of the Nazi era who were convicted at the Nuremberg trials which followed the major trial are free today and back in positions of great power in Germany.

Anyone who reads TYRANNY ON TRIAL and then ponders the state of the world today must ask himself "What have we learned?"

"THE OTHER SIDE"

Speaking to the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg of Nazi atrocities in the occupied territories, Sir Hartley Shawcross said: ". . . on the lowest computation twelve million men, women and children were done to death. Not in battle, not in passion, but in the cold, calculated, deliberate attempt to destroy nations and races, to disintegrate the traditions, the institutions and the very existence of free and ancient States. Twelve million murders! Murders conducted like some mass production industry. . . ."

This book, by Lord Russell of Liverpool who, when Deputy Judge Advocate General, British Army of the Rhine, was legal adviser to the Commander-in-Chief in respect of all trials of German War Criminals in the British Zone of occupation, gives a factual account of the appalling crimes committed and of the monstrous organization behind them. It is a formidable indictment of German barbarity, which has been fully comprehended by few people outside the occupied couutries. How many in Britain realize that, of the 3,000,000 Jews living in Poland in September, 1939, not more than 50,000 could be traced in 1946 as a result of the German policy of mass extermination? How many know that 3,000,000 prisoners were killed at the Auschwitz Camp alone; that at one time 10,000 people a day were put into its gas chambers? Since the war there have been many books by German officers defending the Nazi war machine. It is as well to read the other side of the story.

How Dead Are the German Cartels?

The New York Times (10-24-54) published a letter by Sidney H. Willner dealing with the question of German cartels and monopolies. Mr. Willner's qualifications to speak on this subject cannot be challenged in view of the fact that he was formerly Chief of the Decartelization and Deconcentration Division of the U.S. High Commission for Germany.

In his letter Mr. Willner questions the accuracy of a Times report (10-12-54) indicating that all the fundamental Allied legislation concerned with the deconcentration and decartelization "will be discarded because there are no means of enforcing that legislation after the liquidation of the occupation regime." According to Mr. Willner, the Allied deconcentration program has been in the main accomplished and it is "inconceivable that there is an intention to abandon what has already so largely been achieved." In the case of Allied anti-cartel laws Mr. Willner expresses the hope that this legislation will not be discarded. One can easily get the impression that this anti-cartel legislation has been effectively enforced without fear or favor. Mr. Willner declares rightly that the scrapping of these vital Allied laws could very well result in "regression to economic feudalism" in Germany.

Judging from reports coming out of Germany over the past few years, regression to economic feudalism is no longer a hypothetical question. On the contrary, the resurgence of the trusts and cartels has been proceeding in rapid pace. Indeed, we will go further—the regression which Mr. Willner fears has not merely returned German industry to the status quo ante, but has increased the power of the monopolies and cartels to unprecedented heights.

Unquestionably this is partially due to the fact that the German cartelists have left no stone unturned to hamper and discredit the Allied decartelization and deconcentration program. But that is not the whole story. It is a fact, too, that Allied officials responsible for the carrying out of this policy, sabotaged it. This is one of the major findings of the Ferguson Committee appointed by former Secretary of the Army Kenneth C. Royall, to investigate the situation in the early part of 1949. The Committee took testimony from the leading American officials associated with the decartelization and deconcentration program. On the basis of this testimony, the Ferguson Committee reported that a perfectly practical program for the elimination of the trusts and cartels was emasculated and undermined by a clique of American officials operating under General Clay.

These officials admitted that they were unsympathetic with the policy which they were pledged and obliged to carry out. It was the program of the President of the United States who had received his mandate from the American people. Yet, these officials, on their own authority, succeeded in blocking the implementation of this program. They put forth the view that the rehabilitation of Germany's economic power was the sine qua non for the economic welfare of Europe. Having set up this specious proposition, they felt themselves justified in crippling the deconcentration and decartelization programs alleging that this was the only way to preserve Germany's industrial power. This stereotype rationale for defending their sabotage of the U. S. Government's policy was thoroughly refuted by the Ferguson Committee's report.

The Ferguson Committee noted that officials were trying to sell the idea that the German economy could not be fully productive unless it is one that is based on excessive concentrations of industry. In answer to this allegation the report stated: "The experience in the United States is just to the contrary. Nor is there any justification for saying that Germany could not afford the waste of competition that a rich country like the U.S. can afford. In those instances, since the occupation of Germany, in which there has been deconcentration, namely, I.G. Farben, the Banks and the Ruhr, there is evidence that, rather than interfere with German production or the recovery of Germany, such deconcentration has increased production and strengthened the Germany economy.

"General Clay told your Committee that the operation of the I.G. Farben plants as separate individual units resulted in a vigorous come-back spurred by competition and that some of the units were producing in greater volume than ever in their history in spite of the many handicaps facing German recovery.

"The decentralization of the German banks has, according to General Clay and his Finance Adviser, aided in the economic recovery of Germany."

The basic criticisms of the Ferguson Committee report were never refuted nor was remedial action taken. On the contrary, the report was filed away to gather dust while Allied officials continued to wink at the German cartelists.

In the Summer issue 1953 of Prevent World War III we published an article entitled "The Cartel Comeback—A U.S. Failure." The article contained the latest information up to that time with respect to the status of the Allied anti-cartel program. Detailed facts were presented showing that the situation had not improved since the criticisms of the Ferguson Committee, but had worsened. We concluded our analysis in these words: "It is clear that when the Allies defaulted on their own obligations to deconcentrate and decartelize German industry, it became possible for the Germans to fully exploit this failure by devising plans that not only helped to 'reform' the trusts and cartels but to give them respectability under German law. . . ."

As if to support our charges, the New York Times of November 8, 1953, quoted Professor H. Schwenk, Chairman of the Association of German Iron and Steel Mills, to the effect that the U.S. Government, through one of its agencies, was working on plans for the restoration of the Ruhr iron and steel combines. . . ." Several days following Herr Schwenk's sensational disclosure, U.S. officials issued a denial intimating that Schwenk's allegations might be a reflection of the "wishful thinking" of the Ruhr industrialists. Was it only wishful thinking? Is it not true that ten days following this denial, the Allied authorities consented to maintain intact the steel trading combine of the former Vereinigte Stahlwerke although it was to be "broken up by Allied anti-cartel legislation"? (New York Times 11-22-53) Some may regard this as an exceptional case. In order to dispel such illusions we shall cite the most up-to-date information on the cartel problem derived from reliable sources, and let the reader judge for himself:

(1) On November 17, 1953, the English publication The Manchester Guardian carried a report from its correspondent in Germany under the caption "Reforming Industrial Trusts in West Germany." The Guardian correspondent described what he called "the growing campaign to recreate the old German industrial trusts. . . ." In this connection he noted that the tendency in the Federal Republic was toward "the reversal of all Allied legislation" prohibiting the cartels and trusts. He reported the view of an American spokesman that the occupying power "cannot stop such regrouping."

(2) The December 10, 1953, issue of the Manchester Guardian carried a more detailed article on this problem by the well known expert on Germany, Terence Prittie, which was entitled "The Cartels Return in Western Germany." Among the facts cited by Mr. Prittie was that "the big German banks have already begun to frame a common policy which expresses itself in identical reports." He might have added that the very same persons who were responsible for the looting perpetuated by the big three German banks (Deutsche Bank, Dresdner Bank, Commerz Bank) were once again in the same positions of power. Mr. Prittie's conclusion is significant: "The Germans, it is sure, want a disciplined and cohesive economy. They believe that cartels will play their own part in that and that Allied action in destroying the trusts was no more 'final' than that of the child who knocks down his bricks—only to build them up again tomorrow."

(3) A report to the Christian Science Monitor (12-31-53) noted that British and American officials in contrast to the French, were inclined to compromise relative to cartel and anti-trust legislation.

(4) The New Republic (1-11-54) disclosed that the German businessman was "reconstructing his prewar cartel system and, in the name of free enterprise, demanding that the Bonn Government hand over vast state-owned industries built up over the decades." The New Republic report confirmed the reports mentioned above with regard to the resurgence of the three major banks which had dominated Hitler's Germany. It further mentioned that "the Ruhr and steel magnates dream of transforming the organization (the European Coal and Steel Community) into the logical continuation of the International Steel Cartel of 1926." In this connection it should be noted that as early as September 21, 1953 the authoritative financial weekly Barron's declared, "The Coal-Steel Community now functions as a massive steel and coal cartel."

The tendency of the European Coal and Steel Community to adopt cartel practices was noted by a number of countries at the recent conference of the "General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs (GATT)" at Geneva (New York Herald Tribune 11-12-54). (The record shows that the old iron and steel cartel was dominated by the Germans and served as an effective instrument for the building up of Germany's war potential.) The New Republic report also referred to the appearance of the "old

". . . To the Adenauer clique things looked darkest, of course, when E.D.C. died. Once it appeared there were to be no new German divisions, the Krupps and Kesselrings declared that all possibility of a Franco-German understanding was at an end. The scapegoat? The French Premier, naturally. 'Mendes-France must go,' said Adenauer, as if he were a French opposition deputy. In an interview with the London Times he even threatened to fling the Bonn republic into the arms of the Russians.

"But after the stormy summer came the sunny autumn. Not the Martians but the Archangel Michael, in the person of John Foster Dulles, descended on London, Bonn, and Paris. E.D.C. is dead, long live E.D.C.! proclaimed the London conference. Amen! said the statesmen at Paris. . . . The German industrialists and generals are smiling . . . the twelve divisions and prosperity are around the corner. The Bonn government is already distributing arms contracts, and German industrial stocks are skyrocketing. . . ."

"Meanwhile, what the American public doesn't realize is that German businessmen are descending on Latin America in increasing numbers, offering long-term credit and cheap prices. Thus, while the USA spends money building up Germany, Germany is indirectly using that money to unbuild American trade in Latin America."

powerful trade associations" and observed that the future airplane industry in Germany was rapidly falling into the clutches of a tightly knit group.

(5) Business Week (3-13-54) ran a full length article entitled "German Cartels Try for a Comeback." "It is the view of some American observers in Germany," Business Week reported, "that by one means or another most German industry will emerge in a cartelized form within a few years at most." This magazine summed up the effectiveness of Allied anti-cartel legislation in the words of a businessman: "Why do we need cartels legalized when all we need is a telephone to make our arrangements?"

(6) During March 1954 the New York Times carried several reports from Germany indicating that there was a bright future for the return of the German trusts and cartels. One dispatch (3-23-54) quoted the President of the German Federation of Industry Fritz Berg to the effect that the U. S. could never bring about the economic integration of Europe without industrial cartels.

(7) The Wall Street Journal (7-16-54) carried a detailed dispatch from Germany entitled "Farben's Return." This refers, of course, to the re-emergence of Germany's chemical trust. I.G. Farben which was probably the most important economic prop for the Nazi regime. Here is the way the Wall Street Journal describes the return of Farben: "A ghost is stalking through some of America's big foreign chemical markets these days. Its name is I.G. Farben." The Wall Street Journal's report notes that under Allied orders Farben has been built up into three individual firms which must remain in that state until 1956 but also reports that pressures are growing and the Farben crowd is becoming "impatient." Whether they will wait for 1956 is an open question. Indeed, many of the preliminaries for the merging of the so-called independent companies have been accomplished. By the time 1956 rolls around, whatever needs to be done in that direction will be anti-climax. Thus, the New York Times (7-26-54) states: "Decartelization restrictions imposed by the Allies expire in 1956. Immediately afterwards a new I.G. Farben is expected to emerge. . . ."

(8) The Manchester Guardian (8-26-54) returned to the question of cartels in Western Germany. Here is the way the Guardian's correspondent begins his report: "The Allied High Commission is unlikely to offer any objection to the regrouping of the German steel industry which is reported to be fully under way. This regrouping will result in an exact reversal of Allied policy in the Federal Republic, which was based on the intention to break up 'undue concentration of economic power'." Interlocking directorates have become a common practice among the major Ruhr steel concerns. Vertical trusts are once again developing. Mergers are reoccurring in such a way that "the process of reconcentration may leave fewer than a dozen firms in a dominant position in the German steel industry." In other words, the reconcentration of heavy industry is developing with such intensity that by 1956 the world will probably witness a cartelized, trustified Germany on a scale which could very well make the monopolies of the Hitler era seem puny.

(9) The Wall Street Journal (10-5-54) published an article from Bonn which reported that, when West Germany is granted full sovereignty, "one of the casualties will be the American decartelization crusade." It noted that the so-called crusade "has been going badly almost since it formally began. . . ." The Wall Street correspondent predicts that the retreat may well become a rout by the time the Germans obtain their sovereignty. He further states that the Germans "do not believe free competition would work for Germany. . . ."

(10) The New York Herald Tribune (10-21-54) carried an article by its Bonn correspondent revealing that the German cartels have succeeded in perverting the objectives of Allied anti-cartel legislation. For all practical purposes Germany's industrial war lords will have a clear field ahead because the Bonn Government is cooperating. "The industrialists of West Germany who backed Chancellor Konrad Adenauer in the national elections a year ago, exercise a strong influence. . . ."

(11) A dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune (10-31-54) announces that West Germany's bankers "are expected to revive the big three banks of prewar Germany" after the Paris accords are ratified. The Tribune correspondent writes that the German financial world welcomed the deliberate deletion from the new agreements of an earlier Allied-German provision calling for the continued deconcentration of the German banking system. "The nation's financial press is already discussing the problem of when and where — not whether — the great banking institutions of the past will be restored." How quickly it is forgotten that the big three banks had originally been split up precisely because they were the backbone of Hitler's aggressions resulting in the ruthless looting of German occupied Europe.

Does this brief chronology of the status of the German trusts and cartels give cause for optimism? Can we truthfully talk as though they have not emerged as yet? What does this all mean to the average person, be he an American or a European? They have heard of or experienced the unspeakable crimes perpetuated by the Nazis. But do most of them know that without the decisive help of I.G. Farben, Krupp, Mannesmann, the big three banks, etc., there would have been no concentration camps, no gas chambers and no World War II? That is why the subject of cartels and trusts is not merely the concern of the historian or the economist. It is a matter of life and death to every person who cherishes liberty and peace.

In 1945 the U.S. adopted a program which had as one of its primary objectives the smashing of German cartels and trusts "to prevent Germany from endangering the safety of her neighbors and again constituting a threat to international peace" and to "destroy Germany's economic potential to wage war." The U.S. program was prepared on the basis of careful investigations by hundreds of specialists who uncovered the influence of these forces of war and economic aggression. U.S. investigators had learned that only a few years after the end of World War I, Germany's industrial war lords, yes, even under the much advertised democratic Weimar Republic, had begun to seize the military power of Europe. Colonel William Taylor, the Paris agent for Dupont, wrote his company in 1924: "The European monopoly in military material (is) passing slowly into German hands."

It is a fact that from the very first day of peace after World War I to the moment of Hitler's accession to power, Germany was being carefully prepared for World War II through the unmatched resources and planning of a comparatively small group of trusts, monopolies and cartels with their principal location in the Ruhr. Their sinister activities had a definite impact on American security. The U.S. Government agency, The Office of Facts and Figures, in its first "Report to the Nation," issued January 14, 1942, stated: "(The enemy) has worked for many years to weaken our military potential. Through patent controls and cartel agreements he succeeded in limiting American production and export of many vital materials. He kept the prices of these materials up and the output down. He was waging war, and he did his work well, decoying important American companies into agreements, the purpose of which they did not sense. Our businessmen were peaceful traders. The enemy's businessmen were and are all over the world agents of aggression.

"The list of materials affected is long—beryllium, optical instruments, magnesium, tungsten carbide, pharmaceuticals, hormones, dyes, and many more. When you match each product with its military use, the significance of the attack becomes clear. Beryllium is a vital element for alloys that make shell springs; magnesium makes airplanes and incendiary bombs; tungsten carbide is essential for precision machine tools.

"Concealed behind dummy corporations, the enemy went unchecked for years, using our own legal machinery to hamstring us."

To be sure, the Germans lost World War II. But how meaningful is that defeat when the very instruments of her aggression are preserved?

Old Sights in the New Germany

The dispatches were filed by different men in different cities, writing at approximately the same moment:

BERLIN, Nov. 25—Berlin's Jewish communal organizations and several other groups protested today against an alleged revival of anti-Semitism and ultranationalism at a rally of the German party . . .

Several students were attacked and beaten by the crowd, apparently when they failed to stand for the singing of "Deutschland Ueber Alles." The foreign reporters were abused and menaced when they did not sing . . .

Booted orderlies quickly moved in on anyone who did not sing. Two students, reportedly mistaken for Jews, were set upon . . . At the meeting the loudest applause was for representatives of an organization of former members of the Waffen SS, the branch of Hitler's elite guard in the Army.—From a dispatch by Walter Sullivan to The Times.

BONN, Nov. 25—Two of the four government coalition parties asked today for a general amnesty for all German war criminals before the Paris agreements are ratified . . . On the basis of the record in parliament, even the Social Democratic party is expected to support, at least partly, the two right-wing parties' motion. Little doubt is felt that a large proportion and possibly a majority of the German people and members of the Bundestag do not accept the doctrine of German war guilt.—From a dispatch by Albion Ross to The Times.

Thus the sickening echoes multiply as West Germany prepares to be affectionately welcomed into the free community.

Yet there is still no sign that the U.S. Congress will seriously debate our German policy. Many months ago it became an axiom of American political life that the Germans were the guardians of Western civilization, and that there could be no serious argument on the point.

Nevertheless it becomes clearer each day that something has gone disastrously wrong with post-war Germany. The Communists offer each episode as proof that "Western imperialism" is sponsoring a revival of Nazism; in reality, of course, the re-emergence of fallen Nazi heroes was officially sponsored in Communist-ruled East Germany long before manifestations of intolerance became acute in the Western zone. There is little comfort for free men, however, in the reminder that things are grim all over.

What is essentially being demonstrated is the failure of the Occupation. In the Eastern zone the totalitarians changed brown shirts to red; but it was in the West that the victorious battle for democracy was presumably to be waged. What happened to the forces of freedom?

Possibly the simplest answer is that the emphasis on German rearmament—rather than on German re-education—became the keynote of allied efforts long before the Germans had absorbed any lessons.

There was a steady disintegration, too, in the calibre of Occupation personnel, partly because of the irrational severities of the security program. Imaginative men who saw Germany as a challenge to creative democratic planning were replaced by brass-hats who saw Germany as a new military bastion, and who could not tell a democrat from a storm trooper.

No doubt there have been other factors: Germany is not a simple story, and there have been affirmative moments. In the Eastern zone German workers staged their memorable uprising against despotism not long ago. In the West there are decent men like Berlin's Mayor Schreiber who have spoken out eloquently against the newest outrages, and the Bundestag itself has condemned the incidents.

But democracy in Germany remains on the defensive, losing rather than gaining ground. As this is written neither President Eisenhower nor any other Western leader has taken note of the latest demonstrations; Prime Minister Churchill is busy trying to explain why he contemplated arming captured Nazis in the closing days of World War II.

How much more must happen before free men recognize and challenge the ominous symptoms?

(Editorial, N. Y. Post)

The "Agonizing Reappraisal"

Last year Secretary Dulles warned our Western Allies that unless Germany was returned to a status of power and influence, the United States would undertake an "agonizing reappraisal" of its foreign policy. Offhand, it would seem that the recent Paris agreement restoring the sovereignty and military might of Germany, would obviate such "drastic" action. Yet, we had a hunch that the so-called reappraisal project is proceeding full steam ahead. This is not to say that we can expect a radical change in the direction and content of American policy in Europe. On the contrary, we have the feeling that the "new look" will turn out to be a more intensive preoccupation with the development of ways and means which would enable Germany to dominate Europe.

Unveiling the Blueprints

An important clue, indicating where this "reappraisal" is leading us, has been provided by an expert on Germany, Professor James K. Pollock of the University of Michigan. Prof. Pollock unveiled the blue prints in an address before the Residential Seminar On World Politics at Bryn Mawr (September 1954). In a sense it was most appropriate that Prof. Pollock should choose the Bryn Mawr Conference to expound the latest thinking on the German problem. After all, the Conference was attended by influential educators from all parts of the country and their favorable response to Prof. Pollock's propositions could help condition American public opinion.

Professor Pollock began his address with a moderate declaration that his proposals were made on his own responsibility "as a working scholar without the least official connection or benediction, and only with the hope that what I say will be helpful and at least stimulating." That Prof. Pollock should make this detour before going to the heart of his subject is in itself a cause for suspicion. In any event, the humbleness of his words need to be weighed in the light of the fact that during the formative years of the American occupation of Germany he was considered "the No. 2 political adviser in the American Military Government of Germany" (AP, March 31, 1946). Any history of the development of U.S. policy in Germany since the end of the war would be inadequate if it did not take into consideration the great influence exercised by Prof. Pollock in Military Government affairs. Indeed, despite Prof. Pollock's self-effacing gesture, his address must be regarded as one of the most significant pronouncements with respect to the future course of American policy in Germany.

Germany's Destiny

Professor Pollock's talk revolved around several main topics. In the first part of his address he bemoans the fact that for almost 10 years after the surrender of Germany "we are still fumbling and talking about the German problem . . ." In this connection he denounces "the mistakes of the past decade in trying to work with what we thought were our friends. . . ." Among our false friends the French are especially condemned by Prof. Pollock.

Throughout the rest of his address the anti-French attitude of Prof. Pollock is as obvious as is his pro-German bias. Since the French cannot be trusted, according to the Professor, it is necessary that all of our plans be based on the leadership of Germany in Europe. This is what Prof. Pollock means when he proposes that "we should strike out boldly and originally along completely new lines in the development of a sound and realistic policy toward Germany." Hitherto U.S. policy has been ineffective because, in the words of our expert on Germany, the U.S. has failed "to give sufficient weight to the potentialities and dynamic power of Germany, as we are now failing to utilize that other dynamic power in the Far East—Japan." The United States must now make good its dismal failures. Let no one dare to stay in the way, the Professor thunders, "the dead feet or hands or maybe soul of France can no longer control the direction of our policy toward Germany, nor should any other similar force in any other country be permitted to prevent the formulation of a new American policy toward Germany."

What Professor Pollock is suggesting is simply this: that the country which brought untold ruin and misery to a world in two wars, which desecrated every human value, which made Europe into a vast cemetery—that nation must now be placed on the pedestal of power. As for the rest of the world —who cares!

After sounding off on behalf of Germany the Professor turns to the business at hand. The first step in implementing the "new" policy must be the remilitarization of Germany together with the granting of full sovereignty. These steps are the least that can be taken at once in view of the fact that Western Germany is "the only pro-American government in Europe." As a follow-up the Professor demands that Germany be admitted to NATO as a full fledged member. If the French or any other country expresses opposition they will, in due time, be forced to recognize "the position and power of West Germany." (At this writing it appears that the above mentioned demands of Prof. Pollock will be carried out following the Paris agreements.) Once Germany is able to regain her power and influence "to which it is entitled," the United States must develop a vigorous support for a United Europe under German leadership." Here Prof. Pollock approaches the core of his plan.

Negotiations With Moscow

The concept of a United Europe under the domination of Germany is linked up with Prof. Pollock's idea regarding Russo-German relations. The Professor demands that the U.S. underwrite "realistic German proposals for negotiations" with the Kremlin. To make sure that this proposition is not misunderstood, Prof. Pollock emphasizes that in all such moves "the Germans should be given the initiative with the Russians" and the U.S. "should be content to advise and warn." Amplifying this concept, Prof. Pollock avers, "there is no sense in reconstituting a German force and initiative if we do not intend to use it in the direction of an improvement in our relations with the Soviet Union." Therefore, the Germans must be given the go ahead signal to do business with the Russians and "the burden of planning and action should rest with them." (Professor Pollock would have us believe that the Germans are going to wait until we say, "go.")

Professor Pollock's views concerning Russo-German negotiations are not without precedent. As a matter of fact, important sections of the German press have been spouting this line for several years and many of Germany's leading politicians including Chancellor Adenauer have also dwelt on the coming of a Russo-German rapprochement. Thus, the second part of Professor Pollock's address boils down to a plea for a meeting of the minds between the Russians and the Germans.

The Pan-German Dream

A Russo-German understanding, as advocated by Prof. Pollock, would be a major prerequisite for the establishment of Germany's paramountcy over Europe. He estimates that "German power could conservatively be calculated to increase steadily over the next 25 years." Under these circumstances it will be necessary to encourage and develop Germany's talents and influence in "legitimate areas and activities." Ergo, "Central and Eastern Europe is a natural area in which German abilities may be utilized. . . ." Toward realizing this grandiose objective Prof. Pollock proposes that the Germans be given "the idea of a Central and Eastern European Treaty Organization similar to NATO. . . ." The construction of such a block of nations would "then provide a proper outlet for German energy and ability."

Professor Pollock does not advocate anything which is startling original. It is a matter of record that this program has been at the heart of the Pan-German idea of a Greater Reich. As early as 1810 Adam H. Müller in his "Ueber König Friedrich II" declared, "the great federation of European peoples which will come some day as sure as we live, will also bear German hues, for everything great, fundamental, and eternal in all European institutions is certainly German." Müller's theme "engaged nearly every German writer and thinker of prominence throughout the 19th century—Friedrich List, Wagner, Nietzche, Treitschke, Ranke." One of the most articulate proponents of a Pan-German Europe in recent times was Friedrich Naumann who, incidentally, is considered to be the intimate collaborator and teacher of the President of the Bonn Republic Theodor Heuss. In his book "Middle Europe," published in 1916, Naumann called for the organization of a European power bloc dominated by Germany. This bloc, as envisaged by Naumann, would comprise the old Austria-Hungary, Turkey, the Balkans, and would stretch from the Baltic deep into Asia Minor. "The population," wrote Naumann, "of the German Empire and of Austria-Hungary together amounts to about 116 million. Then there is the German colonial population of perhaps 14 million. If we count in with these 25 million of Asiatic Turks and about 20 million of other Europeans, with perhaps 25 million of other non-Europeans, the population of the Middle-European economic world group would be roughly reckoned at about 200 million."

In this world group Naumann wanted to have included

". . . under the London Treaty, the Germans will become the arbiters of Europe's destiny. Once the Federal Republic is a sovereign State, it can veto any negotiations with the Russians and with the Americans, continue to organize the cadres for armed insurrection in the Eastern Zone. Alternatively, it can use its sovereign powers to come to an agreement with the Russians; and, in that case any agreements reached with the West are no longer binding.

"We are well aware that even to express such doubts about the London Conference will be regarded in certain quarters as akin to treason. The Western alliance, we are being told, has been saved by British statesmanship, and we should all be ready to pay the very high price required in order to achieve that end. We would not grudge any price if the result were the creation of conditions for peaceful co-existence in Europe. Indeed, if similar guarantees had been offered to France at any time before 1950, we should have welcomed the initiative. What is ironical is that they are now being offered not in order to counteract the German menace but as a means of persuading France to connive at its revival."

some countries of Western Europe. He stated: "We shall not say very much of the Northern (Scandinavian) powers, the Rumanians, Bulgarians, Serbians and Greeks, and also of Holland and Switzerland, for it would be a mistake to include these smaller states in our scheme from the outset as fixed quantities, whilst actually they still have a breathing space before making a decision."

The "breathing space" was the First World War, whose outcome at the time Naumann published his scheme was still undecided. Professor Pollock's rhapsodic visions of a German dominated Europe are merely a more up-to-date expression of the age-old Pan-German dream.

After outlining the central idea of his program, Prof. Pollock concluded that if Germany's Europe is properly organized and encouraged "it can become next to the United States a great constructive force for economic well-being and freedom and peace in the world." Of course, Prof. Pollock is not insensitive to the fact that the satellite countries in Eastern Europe might not relish the idea of jumping from the frying pan into the fire. However, he quickly dispels these fears by trying to assure his listeners that the Germans have learned "what bitter mistakes they have made . . ."

Presumably, by "mistakes" the Professor refers to such episodes as the wholesale slaughter of peoples and the ruthless devastation of an entire continent. Prof. Pollock appears to be confident that these "mistakes" will not be committed again and that the peoples of Europe are just about ready to grasp the blood stained hands of their tormentors. In any event, he insists that "only Germany" can "rescue" Central and Eastern Europe from Soviet domination. Ironically, Prof. Pollock claims that the foregoing recommendations will go a long way toward curbing the voracious appetite of German nationalism!

The Professor's Consistancy

Professor Pollock's singular devotion to Deutschtum is not of recent vintage. Even before the end of World War II he expressed views which neatly fit in with his latest plan. Speaking at Carlton College in Minnesota on February 14, 1944, the Professor said, "Personally, I feel that we should be in no hurry to demobilize the German army. In fact, it would be much wiser to continue to utilize this well-organized force for civilian purposes . . . German armed forces are needed to assist in the rehabilitation of Europe . . ." He went on to express his conviction that "it would be folly to attempt a reshuffling of European industry solely in the interests of preventing the future possibility of German rearmament," adding that "such a move would be calculated to disrupt the whole European economy, not to mention the untold and unnecessary suffering it would inflict upon millions of Germans."

Elaborating on "Germany's importance" to Europe, he stated that "a very brief consideration of Germany's capacities and resources and the nature of her population and her position in Europe should be sufficient to reject any plan which looks towards the destruction of German industry." The Professor then stated that Germany was a first class industrial country possessing "a productive capacity which will be badly needed in the reconstruction of Europe." All this was said while our GIs were struggling against the Nazi Wehrmacht whose murderous power had been nourished by Germany's "productive capacity."

Domination via Russo-German Deal

And what about Professor Pollock's expert views on the meaning of Hitlerism? In October 1930, Prof. Pollock delivered an address before the American Association of University Women at the University of Michigan. His talk was based on a recent trip to Germany. The Michigan Daily, the University newspaper, reported his speech in its issue of October 13, 1930: "Pollock concluded by pointing out that Hitler's party embraces a doctrine of sympathy for the proletariat as well as the nationalistic attitude for which it is famous; and that, if it came to power it would, in all probability, not resort to the strong-arm measures feared in some quarters."

Only ten years ago our country together with its allies were fighting desperately to turn back the Nazi tide which hoped to conquer Europe in its bid for world domination. The Nazi armies marched under the banner of a "United Europe," but they suffered ignominious defeat thanks to the courage and determination of freedom loving peoples. The plan outlined by Prof. Pollock would realize the Pan-German dream of a United Europe as an appendage to the German eagle, blessed and financed by the United States and achieved via a Russo-German understanding.

". . . Germans who command respect here at home, such as former Chancellor Heinrich Brüning, are beginning to criticize the Adenauer government for its close link with the United States. They imply that the Federal Republic is today in a position to strike a bargain between East and West. After all, they say, America needs us and tells us so every day of the year. Why should Germany not begin to take an independent position determined by its own strength, its own needs and desires?

"Even American High Commissioner James B. Conant, who has so earnestly adhered to the policy of everything for cooperation with Germany, is said to have been afflicted of late by doubts. One hears in Bonn of a dispatch he sent to the State Department two months ago which he began by saying, 'I may seem to have changed my mind, but . . .' He is reported to have expressed reservations about the reliability of Germany as a Western ally once the process of rearmament with military equipment supplied by America is completed. Conant, it is hardly necessary to add, admits to no such doubts. . . ."

"SPAIN WAS RIGHT"

" 'España tenía razón'—Spain was right—is a slogan much in vogue at the moment. By 'Spain' is meant Franco, for, according to another much-stressed catchphrase, 'Spain is Franco and Franco is Spain.' And what people mean when they say that Spain was right is that Franco was right in overthrowing the Republic in 1936-39 and right in sending the Spanish Blue Division to the Russian front in 1941 to help the Germans. Conversely, the Allies were wrong, after defeating Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy, to penalize Franco Spain by imposing an economic and political boycott on the country. . . .

"As if to prove the point, the Spanish Government on October 25 presented the Grand Cross of Aeronautical Merit to Professor Willy Messerschmitt, one of Hitler's top designers of combat planes and today a resident of Spain. The ceremony, fully reported in the Spanish press, was the occasion for sentimental references to Spanish-German collaboration during the Civil War and World War II. 'Your compatriots shed their blood in the Spain of Franco, and the [Blue Division] volunteers of the great general Muñoz Grandes shed theirs alongside the Germans,' Air Minister General Gonzales Gallarza told Messerschmitt as he made the presentation. It was the Messerschmitt fighters, he added, that bore the brunt of the air struggle 'during the difficult times experienced by the German people.' "

THE $64 QUESTION

"Herr Theodor Blank, Dr. Adenauer's 'Defence Minister,' this week posted the first of 140,000 application forms to Germans who have already volunteered for the new German army.

"He and his advisers have put down 36 questions which would-be recruits have to answer. This is three less than the number which millions of Germans had to answer when the Allies took over after the collapse of Hitler.

"But Herr Blank leaves out the big query that loomed on the form of those days. It was: 'Were you a Nazi Party member?' . . ."

FRANCO'S FAST ONES

"Though a year has gone by since the U.S.-Spanish deal for military bases was signed, Dictator Franco still lags on his end of the arrangements. In international relations, however, he has been trying some fast plays, at times with assists from that shadowy figure of world intrigue, former Nazi Otto Skorzeny.

"It became known in July that Franco, while anticipating military weapons and equipment from the U. S., was selling mortars, shells and machine guns to Egypt, to the tune of $3,500,000. In Madrid, Skorzeny carries on unmolested, stirring up trouble for the European democracies whenever he can. Now it comes to light that it was he, acting through a dummy outfit in Switzerland, who arranged the deal to supply Egyptians with weapons described as 'ideal for hit-and-run attacks." Skorzeny's chief fame dates from his daring exploit of September 12, 1943, when his airborne commandos snatched the captive Mussolini from Allied custody. . . ."

EYEING EGYPT

"The announcement of the eventual withdrawal of British troops from Egypt has again revived sentiments for closer German-Arab relations. As the Empire sun sets, perhaps the German economic sun may rise. . . .

"No responsible German, however, believes that economic measures alone are sufficient. Germany's road to the Middle East is to be paved by political issues. This means closer German-Arab cooperation in international matters.

"This opinion is also shared by Arab spokesmen. An official of the Arab League who broadcast a few days ago over German radio stations insisted that the businessman is not the best liaison between Germany and the Arabs. He demanded that Germany send more students to the Arab countries to acquaint themselves more intimately with the political issues of the Middle East. He added that the peace of the world rests on German-Arab cooperation. . . ."

REUNION AT HEIDELBERG

"Fifteen thousand veterans of Germany's World War II Afrika Korps held a reunion today. They were told a new German Army must be based on the old military principle: 'bravery till death.'

"The advice came from former Gen. Ludwig Cruewell, who succeeded Marshal Erwin Rommel as commander of the corps in 1943 . . .

" 'It is hoped that German soldiers will eventually be able to write Europe next to Germany on their flags.'

"Taking part in the reunion were Marshal Rommel's widow and former Field Marshal Albert Kesselring, sentenced to death for war crimes but later freed."

The New German Imperialism

by
T. H. TETENS

Almost two years ago, T. H. Tetens presented in his book "Germany Plots With The Kremlin" startling documentation to support his thesis that U.S. policy in Europe was "leading toward a blind alley" and that the Bonn Republic "was secretly maneuvering for a new Russo-German collaboration."

In the light of recent events Mr. Teten's book has gained even greater significance. We have asked the author to give us his analysis of the present trend in Bonn's foreign policy.

Germany's struggle for the "integration" and final domination of Europe has not been interrupted or in any way diminished since the French National Assembly refused to ratify the treaty of the European Defense Community. This negative action reflected the deep rooted distrust of the French majority towards a supernational device which doubtlessly would have furthered Germany's time-honored aspirations to dominate the European continent.

Dr. Adenauer's Disappointment

The collapse of EDC had a deep psychological and political impact on German public opinion. It dashed the high hopes which Dr. Adenauer had raised with luring statements since he became Chancellor in 1949. He had repeatedly told the Germans that Western integration would mean the overcoming of the defeat of 1945, that his policies would revive the old European "Empire of Charlemagne," and that unification of Europe would result in a strong "Third Power Bloc" independent from East and West. No wonder that the French refusal to ratify EDC was a crushing blow to these dreams. German papers were full of recrimination and innuendoes. There was strong criticism among Dr. Adenauer's own following to the effect that his policies were not flexible enough and that he had put all his chips on Washington's support, and thereby had totally neglected European realities.

To the Chancellor himself, the French action came like a thunderbolt. When his dreams and schemes were shattered, he lost his posture. Unrestrained by the customary rules of conduct among friendly nations, the Chancellor gave free reign to his real feelings. His first angry outburst was, "Mendès-France must go!" (Frankfurter Allgemeine 9-23-54) In an interview to the London Times and in other statements, he accused Mendès-France of having sabotaged the European idea. Adenauer's attack was the cue for smears against the French Premier who was accused of playing Moscow's game. There even appeared reports that Dr. Adenauer had placed his liaison men in French political circles with the assignment to mobilize influential French factions for an organized drive to oust Mendès-France. (Der Spiegel, 9-15-54; 10-15-54.)

The New Approach

The fit of anger was only of short duration. By the middle of September the Bonn policy shapers had decided on a new approach. Indications are that they adopted a plan of action which was hatched by the industrialists within the Adenauer coalition. It is obvious that the managers of Rhine and Ruhr and their geopolitical advisors who had worked quietly for years to advance the scheme for a greater "Lebensraum," were not inclined to admit defeat. While Anthony Eden toured the European capitals in order to find a political "Ersatz" for EDC, intense negotiations were carried on between French and German industrial leaders.

Suddenly, by the middle of September, Secretary Dulles was urgently called to Bonn. After lengthy conferences on September 16 and 17, Adenauer and Dulles agreed on a new strategy. The underlying idea was to make a fresh attempt for European integration with the emphasis on Franco-German economic collaboration. Chancellor Adenauer pointed to this new strategy in the Bundestag as follows: "A United Europe," he said, "is still the aim of our policy. If we cannot reach it directly, we have to take a detour."

The "detour" calls for furthering by all means the plans of the German industrial octopus, the tentacles of which have already reached out all over Europe and into other parts of the world. As was done in the past with the Schuman Plan and Pleven's Defense Plan, it was decided that the new line should not come from Dr. Adenauer or Secretary Dulles. Thus, the gap between France and Germany was bridged by Mendès-France himself who announced a large scale program of economic collaboration with the long range view that common industrial projects in North Africa shall finally lead to European unification.

The African Enterprise

What caused the sudden switch in the attitude of Dr. Adenauer and Dulles who both had first deliberately snubbed the French Premier after the defeat of EDC? From a careful study of the German press the following picture appears: When leading statesmen were not on speaking terms and the diplomatic machine was stalled, the German industrialists carried on high level negotiations with their French counterparts. Dr. Fritz Berg, the influential President of the Association of German Manufacturers, as well as Dr. Pohle, director of the great Mannesmann concern, mobilized their friends in the "Conseil National du Patronat Français" who paved the way for an overall agreement based on a close Franco-German economic collaboration. A gigantic European industrial cartel is in the making, a trend that has been going on for the last few years. These negotiations center around several multi-billion dollar projects; among them is the development of new basic industries in Northern Africa, of hydroelectric power production in Africa as well as in the European Alps, and also a great armament pool.

Europe, Africa and the Arab world constitute a potential market of approximately 700 million people—four times greater than the United States and thrice as large as the Soviet Union. The necessary capital for these great investments are to be raised partly in Europe and partly in the United States.

It was on the basis of these tremendous projects that the German industrialists insisted that Dr. Adenauer should make the necessary political "concessions" to Mendès-France on the Saar issue. Without these "concessions" no French Premier could hope to gain the necessary support from the National Assembly for the far reaching treaties paving the way for German sovereignty and rearmament.

The German scheme for the industrial exploitation of Africa is an old one. At the beginning of the century, the Mannesmann concern almost precipitated a world war when imperial Germany tried to put the French out of Morocco. During the Weimar Republic, German industrialists saw clearly the great possibilities in Africa and played with the idea of a Franco-German combine for the exploitation of the Dark Continent. When Hitler had conquered Europe, the plans for many of these projects were ready for implementation, but the Nazi industrialists had to wait until the Adenauer-Schuman-Monnet crew, supported by Secretary Dulles, had prepared the political stage for a Germanized Europe with Africa as Hinterland. Dr. Adenauer acclaimed the Schuman Plan as the beginning of "a long range economic venture in Africa" (Rheinischer Merkur, 5-20-50). The details of the Adenauer-Dulles scheme on Africa can be found in my book "Germany Plots With The Kremlin." There, on the basis of considerable documentation, I pointed out that "the Germans are today the most vigorous and energetic pushers of the great African exploitation projects."

For many years, Germany's newspapers and magazines have published glowing articles about the great possibilities in Africa. On June 25, 1952, the "Frankfurter Allgemeine" pointed out in a sensational editorial the gigantic projects waiting for Franco-German collaboration in Africa. The paper stated:

"What is shaping up is based on the idea of creating a third great trading area between the 'Lebensraum' of the Soviet Union and the United States. The colonial quarrels among individual states are a thing of the past. Today we must build continental blocs."

The man who is pushing this big project is Dr. Adenauer's African specialist, the former Nazi Dr. Johannes Semmler, a member of the Bundestag and a delegate to the Consultive Assembly of the Council of Europe. Behind Adenauer and Dr. Semmler are the industrial and financial captains of Western Germany, such as Dr. Robert Pferdmenges, Hermann Abs, Dr. Fritz Berg and scores of others. These industrial lords are the architects of the so-called "Strasbourg Plan," of which the New York Times said:

". . . The 'Strasbourg Plan' proposes to create a vast new trading area embracing the British Commonwealth, Western Europe and its overseas territories, and matching either the Soviet bloc or the U.S. in economic power . . .

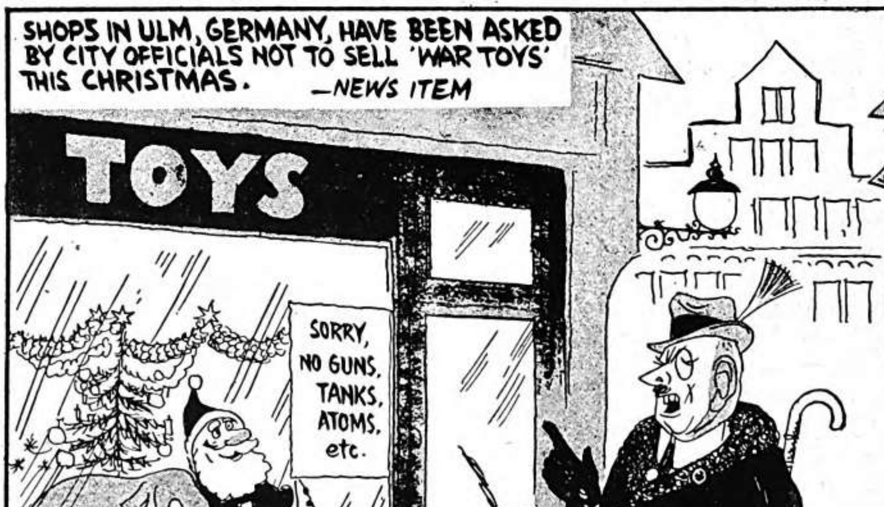
". . . Herr Semmler said the territory of the proposed economic development pool made up more than one-third of the inhabitable parts of the globe, covering a larger area than the Soviet bloc and Communist China together." (Nov. 26, 1952)

This is the 'Lebensraum' that Hitler's armies could not conquer, but which could now be economically "integrated" by Adenauer, Dulles and Monnet, to benefit the tycoons of the Franco-German supranational cartel.

This great African venture is slated to be carried out not through "political unification" but via the detour of "economic integration." This far-reaching project and the German demand for the immediate granting of sovereignty were the main topics of the Dulles-Adenauer talks in Bonn in the middle of September.

Franco-German "Collaboration"

The Frankfurter Allgemeine (10-21-54) called the Mendès-France proposal for Franco-German economic collaboration "a sensation." The next day the same paper stated, "all this allows only one conclusion: the idea of a unified Europe is shared by Mendès-France." The Rheinischer Merkur, however, still mistrusts Mendès-France and puts its entire hope on the initiative of Jean Monnet, former chief of the Schuman Plan Authority. In its issue of 11-19-54, this



SHOPS IN ULM, GERMANY, HAVE BEEN ASKED BY CITY OFFICIALS NOT TO SELL 'WAR TOYS' THIS CHRISTMAS. —NEWS ITEM

VICKY

'Never mind, son, Daddy'll be getting his toys back any day now!'

Adenauer weekly praised Jean Monnet's program for a United States of Europe and underscored his demand for a "European Parliament," "a common European foreign policy" and "a thorough political and economic integration."

The Rheinischer Merkur, together with the neo-Nazi magazine, "Nation Europa," appear as the most vigorous advocates of this new Europe-Africa scheme. The editorials in both papers seem to be a repetition of those sinister articles which Dr. Goebbels once wrote in his paper, "Das Reich." The same phrases about the "Balkanization of Europe," the "New Order," Germany's "Right to have Europe," and the concept of a "Third Power Bloc" are frequently peddled by both the Rheinischer Merkur and "Nation Europa."

In its issue of September, 1954, "Nation Europa" propagates the idea of a "European Union . . . which must become so strong that it can independently exist between the giants—the U.S.A. and the Soviet Union." The same article recommends European partnership in Africa but demands specifically "the exclusion of America."

In the August issue of 1954, "Nation Europa" declares:

"Based on . . . (the wealth of) Africa and backed by the multiple Franco-German strength, we could doubtlessly force the U.S.S.R. to withdraw their troops from all non-Russian territory. Such a Europe would at the same time be able to convince the Americans that it might be wise for them to scurry on to their ships and get out."

Of course, the Americans are expected first to finance this attractive African project to the tune of many billions of dollars, just as they did during the Twenties, when they were fleeced by the same industrialists and the Stresemann "democratic" German Republic.

The new plan of Franco-German economic cooperation, officially proposed by Mendès-France, and loudly hailed by Adenauer and Dulles, is not a new beginning in Europe, but an old scheme skillfully revived by the Nazi industrialists and their collaborating pals from the Vichy days in France.

How will the new experiment in Franco-German collaboration work out? Will the "Ersatz" give more substantial protection to the West than the doubtful EDC? Does Washington now feel more assured that German divisions will be forthcoming? To answer that question, we must know what is in the back of the mind of Adenauer and his old Ribbentrop diplomatic brain-trust.

The Chancellor's Mission

On July 23, 1954, Dr. Adenauer's paper, the Rheinischer Merkur stated editorially that "EDC is only a means to serve the great end of unification." In another editorial (Feb. 19, 1954) it was stressed, that through EDC the Bonn Republic will become "an international factor which will be attractive for the West, but will become far more interesting for the East." For those who remember the wealth of documentary evidence presented in my book, "Germany Plots with the Kremlin," it will be easy to grasp the real meaning of the above weasel-worded editorial.

One thing has to be made clear from the beginning. Despite the flowery speeches he has made, Chancellor Adenauer has never regarded it as his task to become the defender of the West, but to overcome Germany's defeat. In this he has truly worked miracles. He has lulled Americans into complacency on German nationalism and he has milked billions from the U.S. taxpayers. Today Germany is the most powerful nation on the European continent because Dr. Adenauer has changed the defeat into victory.

Soon after Roosevelt's death, American policy shapers, anticipating strained relations between the war-time Allies, embarked on a new course, first to fill the power vacuum in Europe and Asia, and later endeavoring to build situations of strength in order to "contain" and "roll back" the engulfing wave of Communism.

Very early Washington planners envisioned a resurrected Germany as the "arsenal of the West" and Hitler's idle Panzer and SS divisions as "the bulwark against Bolshevism." In the case of Japan, a similar diplomatic formula was applied. However, we are failing in both objectives. During the almost ten years since the collapse of the Axis, State Department and Pentagon officials have constantly lived, and live still today, in a fool's paradise.

German leaders and industrialists have expressed their reluctance to the present booming export industries toward a new armament economy. This is the reason why they have suggested setting up a new armament industry located in North Africa, and financed with billions of dollars by the U.S.A. Thus, there will be no arsenal for the West in Germany proper.

"Rearmament"

As far as German divisions are concerned, we have to face the same resistance and doubtful performance.

American correspondents stated that political conditions in Western Germany have changed considerably in recent months. It has been reported that the German masses show a great apathy toward the new Paris Treaty. German youth is openly and militantly opposed to service in a new Wehrmacht. Dispatches from Germany reported that the future Minister of Defense, Herr Blank, was shouted down in mass meetings and was even personally attacked. Other reports in the German press tell us of the great manpower shortage in Germany which will make it difficult to conscript hundreds of thousands of young men. German youth appear to be satisfied with their civilian jobs. According to the German press, they are deeply suspicious of the ultimate objectives of a rearmed Germany. (Frankfurter Allgemeine, 11-10-54)

The "Deutsche Soldaten Zeitung," often used as the mouthpiece of the Blank Office, stated in a front page editorial (11-15-54) that it will probably take several years until German divisions can be set up and organized. The question is, where will the 200,000 men, officers, non-coms and administrators come from for the creation of the first cadres?

War criminal Kesselring and other Hitler generals have declared that the former SS blackboots are "indispensable" in the new Wehrmacht. Thus, the Blank Office has to accept members of the former Waffen SS, the Nazi killers, the efficient professionals of Hitler's Panzerwaffe of which the Pentagon planners had dreamed as early as 1947 and Sir Winston Churchill even in 1945.

The uneasy feeling regarding German rearmament was recently aired by the conservative London Economist (Oct. 26, 1954) with the reminder that the officers of the new German Army will be recruited from the ex-colonels of the Wehrmacht, by men who once served "a criminal lunatic." As a point of consolation, the Economist has this to say:

"The most reassuring thing about the future German army is that it is not wanted by the public. It is being pressed upon the Germans as a whole by the Atlantic powers, by Dr. Adenauer, and by the professional soldiers—in each case with a different motive."

We must put the emphasis on "different motive." It has been reported from Germany that the more cautious elements among the German officers have gone into civilian life and are not inclined to go back into uniform, for the time being.

However, the rabble-rousing SS officers are eager to start all over again. But is there anyone of sound mind to believe that these butchers and criminals are willing to die for the defense of the West? These unreconstructed plotters have a burning hatred for France, Britain and the United States. The Americans have even the "honor" of being portrayed in the most contemptuous manner by the German nationalistic press.

No wonder that the highly respected "Frankfurter Hefte" (October 1954) sounded the following alarm:

"German re-militarization amounts to a catastrophe . . . An armed Germany will increase the risk of war and provocation considerably . . . Western Germany rearmed will bring a revival of the evil militaristic tradition and will lead to full (Nazi) restoration."

For Moscow's propaganda the German remilitarization is a gift from heaven. Moscow is able to rally the East European satellite peoples firmly behind its leadership because the Nazi horror is still fresh in their minds. The French people is in deep fear that the German remilitarization will lead to another catastrophe, as it did in 1939. The New York Times correspondent Harold Callender reported from Paris (10-31-54):

"The French hold it to be an axiom that the Germans are dynamically unstable, always prone to break out of bounds and upset something, as for example the peace of the world.

"This is why the French want British and American troops on German soil forever if possible. This is why the French are not in any hurry to see Germany unified in spite of official Western professions in favor of it. . . ."

The "Eastern Angle"

Contrary to the French, the Germans are eager to get the American troops out of Europe as soon as they are able to make a bargain with the East. The documentary record shows that Dr. Adenauer "follows a tremendously bold plan: first armament, followed later on by talks with the Russians, in order to persuade them to remove their armies behind the Bug River." (Frankfurter Allgemeine, April 3, 1952.)

Let us remember that Germany's leading geo-politician and foreign political adviser of the Adenauer CDU, Dr. Klaus Mehnert, stated bluntly as early as 1951:

"It would be necessary that we first create a united, healthy and strong Western Europe in whose name the following offer to the Kremlin could then be made: Continental Europe would break away from the Atlantic Pact if the Soviets agree to withdraw their forces behind the Pripet-Marshes and release not only the Eastern zone of Germany, but the whole of Eastern Europe into the European Union." (Christ und Welt, 12-27-51)

The Germans want no part in the risky Dulles' policy of "liberation." Their immediate aim is to regain full sovereignty in order to be free for unhampered negotiations with Moscow. Leading German papers, such as the "Frankfurter Allgemeine," the "Deutsche Zeitung," "Deutsche Kommentare," as well as the influential monthlies, "Aussenpolitik," and "Geopolitik" have suggested in recent months that Adenauer must keep "the wires to Moscow open" and be prepared for a vigorous pro-Eastern orientation. On September 29, 1954, the "Deutsche Zeitung" reminded Dr. Adenauer to conduct his Western policies always "with an eye towards the East." The "Frankfurter Allgemeine (Sept. 21, 1954) suggested the mobilization of American support for an effective German "Ostpolitik" and stated:

"Reunification must remain the primary objective of German Ostpolitik. . . . Germany must no longer be prevented from what all other nations constantly do, namely, negotiate with the countries of the Eastern bloc."

The "Fortschritt," mouthpiece for the Ruhr industrial interests, asks in a front-page editorial (Oct. 14, 1954) for a "keen German alternative in the great game of world politics." America, says the paper, is losing its influence rapidly in the world, England and France are flirting with the Soviets, and Germany is in danger of becoming the loser. Thus, the "choice of the alternative should not be too difficult."

A leading pro-Adenauer diplomat, Hans Georg von Studnitz recommends in the "Aussenpolitik" (Aug. 1954) a German foreign policy which seeks to gain the utmost from "all combinations" in a "constantly changing world situation." Taking advantage of U.S. foreign policy in Germany was the right thing in the past, but to achieve reunification, Herr von Studnitz suggests "going together with the Soviet Union against the United States."

In the "Geopolitik" (Oct. 1954) Werner von Hentig, until recently an active diplomat in the Bonn Foreign Office, asked "full political independence from West and East and the withdrawal of all occupation troops from Europe." Germany will even take "the risk of staying unarmed" and will wait for future developments to find solutions for the territorial questions of the Saar and the Oder-Neisse-Line.

"Nation Europa" (August 1954) gives the following advice:

"Germany must not sacrifice her biological substance in a 'holy war' against Moscow. Is there a salvation against this danger? Only if Germany frees herself from ties with the West, and adjusts herself in a new Rapallo policy. Our limited freedom of action, available under the occupation regime, must be exploited to the utmost in order to serve the interests of a national 'sacro-egoismo.' This without consideration of historic sentiments or ideological complexities."

During the last year, four former Chancellors of the Reich—Dr. Wirth, Dr. Bruening, Franz von Papen and Dr. Luther—have come out in favor of a more active pro-Eastern orientation. For several years the Bonn Government has kept secret contacts with top Russian diplomats. A few months ago it was reported in German papers and in the "Christian Science Monitor," (4-17-54) that Bonn representatives had secret meetings with high Russian officials in 1950 in Moscow and another one in August, 1952, in Copenhagen. From German press reports it is known that Dr. Adenauer, in the beginning of 1954, encouraged the rightist Bundestag member, Dr. Pfeiderer, to travel to Moscow and Peiping in order to negotiate secretly on mutual Russo-German problems. (Frankfurter Allgemeine, May 14, 15, 17, 1954)

The real issue for the Soviet Union is

How the Germans Are Miswriting Their History

by

TERENCE PRITTIE

Sir Lewis Namier picked on one of the most significant features of German thinking when he pointed out, in his book The Nazi Era, that Germans themselves persistently miswrite German history; and what is being served up to the German public today as genuine history are absurdly unreliable memoirs and biographies. Such, for example, have been the books of Von Papen, Schacht, Fritzsche, Weizsäcker, von Dirksen. All these books have been apologia for the authors, for Germany, in places even for the nazi regime.

The German people is in a receptive mood for apologia of this kind, and these muddled memoirs may well take the place of real historical studies in their minds. Sir Lewis Namier gives numerous illustrations of their unreliability, and takes perhaps the classic example from the momoirs of Erich Kordt, a member of the pre-war German Foreign Service. Kordt printed the text of an imaginary letter sent by Mussolini to Hitler on August 25, 1939. He left this letter out of the second edition of his book presumably because he had discovered that it had never been written. But Hitler's former interpreter, Paul Schmidt, borrowed the letter from Kordt's first edition, and used it in his memoirs. So did other so-called German historians. "In short," Sir Lewis writes, "it has become a fixture in German historical literature."

The Germans, Sir Lewis thought, invent, dream, and remember collectively. This may be the reason for their approach to history, which is to sort out convenient facts in order to prove a favorable historical theory. One need only ask intelligent Germans today about the last forty years of their country's history in order to discover the effects of this method. They will tell you, as they told me, that the first world war was caused by the Entente Cordiale; that Versailles was a deliberate act of political vandalism; that the Western Powers later sabotaged Stresemann and the Weimar Republic; that the British twice thwarted the German resistance by capitulating to Hitler, at Munich, and by formulating the doctrine of unconditional surrender; finally, that the British and Americans are responsible for the present ills of the world because they invited the Russians into Europe.

These are some of the fables which are almost universally believed . . . But all that the counter-arguments, about the German invasions of neutral countries and what happened there, will produce is the reaction of the German journalist who said to me with a bright smile: "Well, let's admit that we've all made much the same mistakes; if we admit that, then we can get on perfectly well together" . . . It may be that these strangely mixed feelings drive Germans to the recurrent rewriting of history in order to satisfy their consciences.

Here, for instance, are a few examples of how this rewriting is done in the columns of the daily press. In May of this year, the Refugee Press Service decided to explain away the eighteenth-century partitions of Poland. Prussia and Austria only took part, the writer maintains, because otherwise Russia would have taken more, or even the whole, of Poland. Poland, moreover, had shown herself incapable of resisting continuous Russian interference. This was the secondary reason for Prussian annexation of Polish territory; and the writer points out with vapid inconsequence that the difference between Poland then and Germany today is that the latter is a vital factor in the balance of world politics. Versailles, another Refugee Press Service contributor writes, created the Polish Corridor. The Polish Corridor was the cause of the second world war. Ergo, the Poles were responsible for its outbreak. It would be a waste of time to quote to such people the words written in 1922 by General Von Seeckt, creator of the post-1919 Wehrmacht. "Poland's existence," he wrote in an official memorandum, "is intolerable, and incompatible with the needs of Germany. She must disappear." Von Seeckt would hardly have held different views had he lived in 1772.

"Not as Bad as All That"

Not long ago, one of the joint editors of the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, Erich Dombrowski, produced a leading article entitled: "It was not as bad as all that." This paper is well produced and generally reliable. These were some of its editor's views. Louis Napoleon was primarily responsible for the war of 1870 because he "launched a ruthless counter-offensive to the Hohenzollern candidature for the Spanish throne." The French were largely responsible for the first world war. Countries should therefore stop worrying about their own histories, which are bound to be prejudiced. "For what is history," Dombrowski asks rhetorically, "save a sequence of stories, a ripple on the tides of eternity?" This is not an unfair description of the German approach to their own history.

"Who ever assaulted France?" was the heading chosen by the Cellische Zeitung, which went on to quote Dr. Adenauer as saying that French policy in the Saar was dictated by the "idea" that France was attacked by Germany in 1940, and occupied for four years. The Cellische Zeitung's "explanation" was that the German Government did not expect the allies to enter the war after the invasion of Poland. The Polish campaign, anyway, lasted only eighteen days, and for the rest of that winter Germany "tried every possible means of preventing an extension of the war." "The French campaign," this paper goes on, began a full nine months later, and because "France declared war on us in the first place." The Cellische Zeitung makes no mention of invasions of neutral Scandinavia and the Low Countries, and concludes: "Any talk of an assault on France is unjustified."

Part of the job of these re-writers in the popular press is to destroy the idea that Prussia was ever militaristic. "We should all keep on Prussia's side," wrote Egmont Roth in the weekly Deutsche Zukunft. And went on: "In referring to Europe, the British invariably refer to the Continent, with their feeling of aloofness from the center of gravity of the old world. This aloofness is the germ of the British policy of the balance of power after the Treaty of Utrecht" . . . Britain is Roth's chief villain in European history, and his theory is supported by the Refugee Press Service, which points out that England waged ten wars between 1815 and 1914; Russia seven; France five. Prussia waged only three; and these lasted under a year in all.

The same writer goes on to demolish that "gross lie," as he calls it, that the Prussian and German General Staff was the source of Europe's woes. Clausewitz, he pointed out, laid down that military strategy should be subject to political requirements; and the allies flagrantly broke this principle, and "are therefore responsible for the present situation in Europe." The writer does not mention Clausewitz' brilliant pupil, Schlieffen, who evolved the plan of the right hook round the unprotected French left flank. This hook had to be delivered through neutral Belgium, and its delivery brought England into the first world war. Schlieffen's plan, in fact, made German politics exactly dependent on military strategy.

The German press often shows a curious disregard for contemporary history. Richard Tuengel, writing in Die Zeit, condemns the Western Powers for refusing to employ ex-nazis of talent; for appointing ex-communists to de-nazification boards; and introducing strange Anglo-Saxon forms of democracy. The Deutsche Zukunft maintained that British junior officers manhandled Admiral Doenitz and his staff, and "shot hundreds of thousands of Germans into famine camps which contained as little humanity as the concentration camps." Suddenly, in an article about eastern Germany, the Düsseldorfer Nachrichten breaks into a tirade. "Have we not," it writes, "the example of the years 1945-48, when the victor nations weakened us by hunger in order to re-educate us."

When the British authorities in Hanover gave permission for the re-burying of the bodies of German war criminals, executed at Hameln, in consecrated ground, the entire press in Lower Saxony launched an anti-British campaign. Writing of the ninety-one corpses, including those of Josef Kramer of Belsen, the Hanoversche Allgemeine stated: "Under the conditions then prevailing, this leaves open the question whether guilty and innocent were not struck down indiscriminately. Out of this gruesome execution, it was not possible to give the executed person even a worthy resting place." . . . In reality, the British gave full particulars whenever enquiries were made; and furnished a full list of the executed, all of whom had been given fair trial for their shocking crimes. The worst of the business is that millions of Germans were deliberately misled and may believe this tale ever afterwards.

It is natural that war crimes are a sore subject for the Germans; but it would be encouraging if at least a reasonable proportion of the German people realized

". . . Parliamentary (German) leaders no longer need look to the generals to protect the State from a series of private armies, for since the Second World War no organizations like the Stahlhelm, the S.A. and S.S., the Reichsbanner, the Rotkämpfer have arisen. Nor have the German General Staff and the officer corps retained their continuity; nor do dreams of a glorious greater Reich appeal to Germans today quite as they did twenty years ago. . . ."

what their country had been responsible for during the nazi era. It is lamentably true that few Germans are interested in the subject. The Mayor of Bergen-Belsen can assert that he knew nothing about the camp one mile and a half from his front door. A daily newspaper can write: "But the first gas chamber seen in Germany was brought to Dachau by the conquering Americans in order to fix blame on the Germans."

Persistence of Anti-Semitism

Anti-semitism is a terrible thing to think about after what has happened in Germany. Yet it does still exist there, and takes all sorts of bizarre forms. On April 8 this year, the chairman of the Jewish community in Mainz was asked by the local Ministry of the Interior to inspect Jewish cemeteries in the neighborhood. In nine of them he found over sixty desecrated graves at a time when the Federal Government was outlawing genocide. Local authorities round Mainz were explaining they were not responsible for repairing graves which had been damaged by "larking schoolchildren." Gravestones which would have taken two grown men to shift had been systematically hammered to bits or thrown down thirty yards off. But not a single person has so far been successfully prosecuted for desecrating Jewish graves in Germany.

A few weeks ago poems were being circulated in the Ruhr by a schoolmaster called Strunk. One poem referred to the pre-war Jewish community in Germany as "the 500,000 hyenas who tried to ruin our Germany." They emptied all our shops, and so we kicked them out, the poem goes on: "300,000 went to their Fourth Reich in America and sold up New York in no time. That left 200,000. Half of them cleared out, and we haven't killed off the rest yet. But we're glad to say that Adolf liquidated a cool 6,000,000." The schoolmaster's ode ends: "I want to spit when I see the Jewish memorials go up." Strunk was fined the equivalent of £25, and will now no doubt be pardoned under the terms of the general amnesty.

Racial lunacy still lurks only just round the corner, "Jew, go back to Israel," a voice yelled at a recent Free Democratic Party meeting. "Our members of Parliament know how to waste cash," wrote one local newspaper, "as, for instance, the 3,500,000,000 mark present to Israel." Leading Free Democrats opposed that same reparations agreement because it might adversely affect German-Egyptian trade. In Nuremberg, ex-nazis formed an "Association for Racial Questions," and began to collect money for their anti-semitic campaign.

B'nai B'rith, the society which recently sent its team to Germany, writes: "The assurances which we have received in some quarters that anti-semitism no longer exists in Germany are not borne out by the evident facts. Most Germans, it is true, are embarrassed by discussion of nazi persecutions. They seek to avoid it and block it out of their minds. . . . Opinion-testing since the war has at no time revealed a real lessening of anti-semitism in the group that lived through the nazi period."

It is not surprising that Lord Russell of Liverpool's book, The Scourge of the Swastika, has stirred up especial resentment among Germans who just want to forget. The editor of one Düsseldorf newspaper declaimed against the book, which, typically, he has not even read, on the grounds that "at least 100 books about the concentration camps have already been written." Have they? In reality, just one major work, Eugen Kogon's The S.S. State, has been published in the German language about concentration camps.

The classic historical study of them, Reitlinger's Final Solution, is unlikely ever to be translated in German. Only one German newspaper had anything to say about the English edition of the book. The Deutsche Rundschau thought it should not be discussed in Germany because it might disturb the peace of mind of the German citizen. The Deutsche Rundschau was right: most Germans prefer to remain blissfully ignorant.

The absence of honest study of the recent past leaves a vacuum, and the German, tidy by instinct and preference, does not like vacuums. All too many foolish and dangerous myths are being evolved to plug the gaps in his convenient memory. There is the myth of the allied bombing of Dresden balancing out with all the evils perpetrated by the nazis, and this simple silly equation is often set boldly down in print.

There is the myth of the Western Powers inviting the Russians into Europe. Does any German remember the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact, which gave Russia the Baltic States, half of Poland, the Bukowina, and Bessarabia; in fact, all the vital approaches into Europe? There is the story of the second "stab-in-the-back" by the men of the German resistance who undermined the German war effort in the same way as the sailors in Kiel harbor thirty-five years ago.

There is the special myth of the first "European army," in the shape of the Waffen S.S. This is what one soldiers' newspaper, the Heimkehrer has to say on the subject. "Thousands of Norwegians, Danes, Dutch, Belgians, and Frenchmen entered the war as Europeans to battle alongside the Wehrmacht against bolshevism. They did this as volunteers: they were not even National Socialists. Their crime was to ally themselves with an occupying power against Europe's common danger." "What right," the Heimkehrer continues, "have our conquerors to treat as criminals tens of thousands of the first Europeans to jettison their national resentments?" As it happened, I was able, early in 1941, to watch one group of Belgian officers being systematically schooled for enrollment in the Waffen S.S. The bribe offered them was to return home from their prisoner-of-war camp, and Russia had not even come into the war at that time. Those Belgian officers were ordered to sing nazi songs, give the nazi salute, and study nazi literature. But if some day the true story of the Waffen S.S. is written, will many Germans trouble to read it?

Today a society for the victims of anti-nazi persecution has been formed to claim compensation for "democratic misrule." An ex-general has just been rehabilitated who had a sixty-year-old captain of the Reserve shot during the last days of the war because he tried to stop an artillery unit from defending a hospital crammed with wounded. Ex-Marshal Kesselring personally commended the general.

These happenings are the stranger when one remembers that victims of nazi terror are still trying in vain to get compensation, and that Kesselring, lately in jail as a war criminal, has become the head of the revived and uniformed Stahlhelm. Such grotesque events will multiply as long as Germans, with all their good qualities, still do not find out what happened in the immediate past. Nobody should want to teach them anything; but it is perhaps about time they started learning for themselves about themselves.

The Pan-German Prince

When Hitler seized power in 1933, the number of German intellectuals who went into exile increased considerably. Many of them received the warm hospitality and protection of the United States. In the eyes of most Americans they were the symbols of "the other Germany." There is no doubt that some of these exiles truly represented the best in the German tradition. On the other hand, there were others who disguised their real character and intentions by outwardly professing a democratic creed.

The late Professor John Brown of Catholic University, Washington, D. C., analyzed the activities of these individuals in an article entitled, "Deutschtum and America." He noted that they had the facility of speaking through both sides of their mouths. In one breath they would proclaim their anti-Nazism and in the next moment qualify it with typical Pan-German arguments.

Anti-Nazi Pan-German

Among those "anti-Nazi Pan-Germans" discussed by Prof. Brown, is Prince Hubertus zu Loewenstein, a self-advertised foe of Nazism (at present a member of the German Parliament). The Prince was a former German youth leader and anti-Nazi. He left Germany, so the story goes, because he could no longer stomach Hitlerism. Arriving in this country in 1935, he confidently predicted that Nazism and Hitlerism would not last more than two years. In spite of the Prince's "opposition" to the Nazis, we find that at the outbreak of World War II he protested the British blockade. Yet, even this episode did not detract from his popularity among some intellectual circles in the United States.

Indeed, the Prince was a most successful lecturer in the United States. Wherever he went he was greeted by large audiences who believed him to be a genuine anti-Nazi democrat. Naturally, he put on his best front before such groups describing in vivid terms the vast anti-Nazi underground allegedly operating in Hitler Germany. He was even able to get away with this hoax among more sophisticated and presumably better informed persons in the academic world. The Prince was among a number of alleged anti-Nazi democrats who were welcomed in the lecture halls of American universities, where he was able to put across his "line" to students and professors.

Commenting on a letter written by the Prince to the New York Times on August 22, 1943, Prof. Brown declared that it is a significant "indication of how even the sincere Christian anti-Nazi cannot escape the strain of the Pan-German." Implicit in Prince Hubertus' letter is an attempt of the Prince to portray Nazism as some sort of freakish phenomenon and not as the logical outgrowth of the warlike and predatory traditions rooted deeply in the history of Germany.

"International Morality"

Professor Brown's characterization of Prince zu Loewenstein is supported by the writings of the Prince during his stay in the U.S.A. as an anti-Nazi exile. One of his most definitive articles on the German problem appeared in The New Leader of April 15, 1944. This date should be borne in mind because the Allies were still at war and hundreds of thousands of our troops were locked in bloody battle with the Nazi Wehrmacht. His article had a very imposing title, "International Morality Versus Expediency."

What are some of the important elements comprising the Prince's views with respect to international morality? Among these elements is a recommendation that the Allies allow the German armies to remain on the Eastern Front mobilized until the "independence" of the eastern countries "has been fully established—with functioning and democratically elected governments of their own. . . ." Thus, while the free world was fighting to destroy the Nazi threat to democracy, the Prince was advocating that Hitler's armies be relied upon to serve as the guardians of the democratic process.

With regard to reparations he proposed a solution which in effect would have made the Allies pay at least part of the damages inflicted entirely by Germany.

Another part of his morality was expressed in his attempt to equate the armies of the French revolution with Hitler's Nazi hordes. In this connection the Prince spoke of the "undying glory" of the Western world's youth "on whatever side they may now have to fight." No distinction is made between Hitler youth ravaging Europe like a plague of pests, and the young people in the Allied countries fighting to liberate the enslaved from Nazi tyranny.

In his crusade on behalf of "International Morality" the Prince avoids the question of punishing the criminals who brought the world to the brink of ruin.

Writing in a liberal paper like The New Leader and making a generous use of liberal phraseology, the Prince appeared to be speaking as a democrat. This is the way he operated during his sojourn in the United States. However, upon his return to his beloved Fatherland, the liberal banner began to fade and the martial colors of Deutschland Ueber Alles emerged in all their glory. Reporting on an article which he had signed for the German language weekly, Deutsche Wochenschrift, The Overseas News Agency concluded that the Prince had now "come out for a form of Pan-Germanism as extreme as the Nazis" (12-12-46). The following are among his choice statements:

"The restoration of a German Reich is the first and most urgent of all tasks confronting the people in Germany and all those of Geman descent everywhere who are concerned with the survival of the German language culture. On the basis of natural justice, the future Reich must include all the provinces which historically belong to Germany. This means the restoration of the 1914 borders. (The territory in question involves Alsace-Lorraine, the Belgian cities of Eupen and Malmedy, Northern Schleswig, ceded to Denmark, and that part of Western Poland which belonged to Germany until 1918).

"The future Reich should also include German Austria, together with the South Tyrol. The Sudeten Germans, who have been driven out by the Czechoslovakians, must be permitted to return to their homes in which they lived for a thousand years and to decide by plebiscite whether their territory is to form part of the Reich. In general, plebiscites should be held in all contested territories."

Propagandist Par Excellence

From 1946 onwards, Prince zu Loewenstein has frequently written in German language newspapers and for some English language publications. An examination of his writings shows that he has had two primary objectives, (a) to break the western alliance and (b) to prevent the implementation of those policies which the United States had originally devised for the postwar treatment of Germany. He alleged that the Germans were starving; that their treatment at the hands of the Allies was far worse than that experienced by the victims of Nazism; that the English and French were looting German resources and that the Americans too were profiting at the expense of the Germans!

It is difficult to determine the precise influence of the Prince's propaganda but if we note how American policy shifted radically during the years 1946-47, then it is safe to say that the Prince helped to contribute to this change. His propaganda may perhaps best be summed up in his attempt to write a history of Germany. The quality of this work was described by the New York Times reviewer as follows: "It is five hundred pages of historicism, mystification, scholarly pretension and propaganda, adding up—in so far as it is coherent and comprehensible—to a flatly controvertible fabrication. In common with a number of recent books of German apologetics, it is the work of a German political exile enjoying asylum in this country."

Besides his frequent blasts at the Allied occupation through the medium of the German language press in the United States, Prince zu Loewenstein has taken an active role in whipping up nationalistic feelings among the Germans. Thus, in 1950 he took upon himself to become the spokesman and leader of a German protest movement against the British policy to demolish the German naval base in Helgoland. His melodramatic antics helped fan the flames of German nationalism. He cast himself in the role of a national hero dedicated to upholding the honor and integrity of the Fatherland against "perfidious Albion."

The Prince's hatred of the British and the USA is only exceeded by his fanatical diatribes against the French. The New York Herald Tribune (April 12, 1954) reported the Prince as calling for the isolation of France and for the establishment of a German-US alliance. He voiced the opinion that such an alliance "would finally bring the French Government to its senses." His nationalistic ravings against the French have been particularly virulent as regards the future of the Saar. He has denounced the U.S. for having accepted what he alleged to be a "pro-French" solution. In this connection he has tried to comfort the Germans by stating that prominent politicians including Senator McCarthy, were of the opinion that the U.S. was under no obligation to support its original pledges and policies. It is interesting to note that this boast, made in the spring of 1954, was part of an address delivered at the Rhein-Ruhr Club, a favorite haunt of the Ruhr barons.

Prince zu Loewenstein's anti-Communism should not confuse his position on relations with Russia. In the very same speech before the Ruhr industrialists he supported the efforts of the German politician Pfleiderer to renew diplomatic relations with Moscow. He insisted that "Before the resonant tones of diplomatic jubilation on West German rearmament subsided, an important sideshow scrap began.

"It concerns money; money for the Germans' contribution to Western defense and to their new army. Chancellor Adenauer's government is not inclined to be extravagant with its highly prized Deutsche marks and the Finance Minister, Dr. Schaffer, is a tough man with a mark. . . .

"He is thinking of his own home industries. They are thinking about themselves, too, and they can reach Schaffer's ear quite readily. At the moment they are pretty annoyed that arms control can lay bare all German industrial secrets to other competitors, namely British and American. . . ."

(Seymour Freidin, N. Y. Post, 10-19-54)

". . . The Russians hold big assets for a deal with the Germans: unification, withdrawal of the army of occupation, rectification of the frontiers, resettlement of the expelled refugees, trade, and great political influence in the destiny of Europe. This is no imaginary affair. There is powerful evidence that the pull towards a Russian deal is gaining momentum not only in the opposition to Dr. Adenauer but within his own coalition. Is it possible to prevent such a deal by a treaty which is designed to tie West Germany's hands? . . ."

(Walter Lippmann, St. Louis Post Dispatch, 9-24-54)

the Berlin Treaty of 1926 with Russia must be the aim of German foreign policy. This treaty, incidentally, served as an effective counterweight to the professed western orientation of Germany following the Locarno Pact.

More recently the Prince, in his capacity as "Fuehrer" of the so-called German Action Movement, demanded the immediate rearmament of Germany without restriction or the holding of a Four Power conference. In any event, he advocated immediate reestablishment of German diplomatic relations with the Kremlin (Manchester Guardian 9-9-54).

It is interesting to note that in outlining the program of his German Action Movement, he speaks of "German states of special character" and writes: "Switzerland is a part of Germany, the connection of which with the Reich was severed in 1648. However, the German speaking Swiss people together with the Alsacians and the Germans in South-Baden form a unity in the sense of an Allemanic race. The Swiss culture is determined by this unity of race and through it, is spiritually connected with the Reich. Only the cultivation of this awareness makes the loss of the external attachment bearable."

The voice of the Prince is not isolated. Indeed, he expresses the views of the most decisive element in Germany today. It may be summed up in his own words: "The restoration of a German Reich is the first and most urgent of all tasks confronting the people in Germany and all those of German descent everywhere who are concerned with the survival of the German language and culture." It should be obvious that this ambitious program knows no limits for it not only includes Europe but pertains to all other countries and areas abroad, yes, even the United States. It is Pan-Germanism pure and simple.

A Story That Has a Lesson

The story of Prince zu Loewenstein—his exile as an "anti-Nazi," the welcome he received in the United States, his posture as a liberal intellectual, his ability to dupe many well meaning Americans, his return to the Fatherland on the very first boat in order to unfurl the flag of "Deutschland Ueber Alles"—should help us to be more discriminating when it comes to judging real and alleged friends and to increase our vigilance against those who take advantage of our generosity so as to distort the real issue.

It is noteworthy that the Prince is but one of many exiles who posed as liberals in the United States only to return to the Fatherland to resume their deadly game of attacking the Allies and paving the way for a resurgent Germany.

Indirectly related to the Loewenstein "saga" is the Exchange Program financed by the U.S. Government, under which German youth is given the opportunity to visit our country, enjoy its hospitality and learn about its institutions. We recall that after World War I, democratic countries such as Norway instituted physical rehabilitation programs for German children who stayed with Norwegian families. As youngsters they came as guests, but under Hitler they returned as conquerors specifically chosen for the subjugation of Norway because of their knowledge of the Norwegian language.

The case of Prince zu Loewenstein should remind us that those who are really bent on our destruction may exploit our hospitality to further their sinister objectives.

"From the news of the past few months I guess it is safe to venture that the German victory in the last war is now clear-cut, as was the Japanese, and that if we play our cards right the Germans and Japs soon will take us into the family of nations. . . .

"The strutting that has been going on by the backslid Nazis over the last year or so is almost unbelievable—unless you've seen it. At home in West Germany and abroad, the Deutschland ueber Alles refrain is ringing again to the point where the toe of an old GI boot is apt to itch. . . .

"I consider the Germans a goose-step nation, ever ready to follow the new messiah, and head right back to supermanhood again. They are overbearing conquerors and sniveling supplicants. When they're up they're arrogant and when they are down they whine.

"I know nothing of foreign diplomacy, but that ain't strange, since the records shows that the diplomats don't know much about it, either. But I can smell things, like an animal smells, and what I have seen of the German abroad in the past year doesn't smell good. It smells like 1933. . . ."

REWARDS

"The Bavarian state radio and the newspaper Sueddeutsche Zeitung of Munich have disseminated charges that officials are systematically withholding payments to victims of Nazi persecution but rewarding former Nazi officials and their heirs with jobs and pensions. . . .

"The authors of the charges, Helmut Hammerschmidt and Michael Mansfeld said only 136,000 of 500,000 claims filed in the United States zone of Germany had been satisfied as of April 30 this year. . . .

"Aside from the material difficulties in settling the cases, the authors cited examples of officials who, for spurious reasons and frequently for reason of discrimination, refused to accept claims.

"One case cited was that of a 76-year-old widow of a man who was killed in the ghetto of Riga, Latvia. She could not get damages because she could not produce witnesses who had seen her husband murdered. The authors said the officials had taken this line despite documentary evidence that all 27,000 inmates of the Riga ghetto had been liquidated by the Nazis.

"As opposed to this treatment of the Nazi victims, the authors cited the following cases of readiness to reward former Nazi officials and their heirs: Rudolf Diels, first head of the Gestapo, received a pension. The wife of a war criminal held in the Landsberg prison also has received a pension."

REPORT ON GERMANY

"In May I began my lectures at the University of Munich. This once-famous institution has been partly gutted by allied bombs. It is being rapidly repaired; but the damage that Hitler wreaked upon education will exist for many years to come.

"Too few of my graduate students knew the work of Germany's great social scientists of the Weimar era. . . .

"Like other Americans, we met with a heartening welcome from the Muncheners. How could these people, we wondered, be the same who cheered the mad speeches of Hitler. How could they have tolerated the horrible Dachau concentration camp just a few miles outside of the city? If one looks for war criminals, he is apt to conclude that he is in the wrong country. . . .

". . . Two years ago, several German public opinion institutes reported these results of a new poll: Ten per cent express unqualified enthusiasm for Hitler; another 22% gave their qualified approval. THE PRICE OF IGNORANCE

"It is an old habit of American diplomacy to put all its eggs in one basket when dealing with foreign governments . . .

"American officials appear completely absorbed in Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. They are, of course, obeying in this the signals from Washington . . .

"Finally, the American view has been restricted by Senator Joseph R. McCarthy's war on the State Department and the Voice of America, in which Scott McLeod, the McCarthy friend who is security officer in the State Department, has enthusiastically participated. There has been a real purge here, and the failure of the High Commissioner, Dr. James B. Conant, to fight it more vigorously has cost him some of the prestige that was his as president of Harvard.

"The result is that there are many new people at occupation headquarters. Some of them—perhaps all—are experienced men. But, antiseptic though they may be and dear to McLeod, they have one fatal flaw. They don't seem to know anything about Germany.

BOOM—BOOM!

"West Germany's economic boom has hit a record high and shows signs of further expansion. Steel and automobile production and foreign trade are smashing all previous records. . . .

"Industrial production, which accounts for more than 50 per cent of the total output of the economy, stands at 185 per cent of the 1936 level, or about 10 per cent above a year ago. . . .

"Business leaders predict that the gross national product this year will be at least 6 to 7 per cent above 1953.

"Germany's massive steel industry expects 1954 production to reach 17,500,000 tons, compared with 15,419,000 last year. . . .

"German automobile production in October ran 33 per cent above October, 1953. In October 48,100 vehicles were turned out, to push total production for the first ten months of this year to 420,000. West Germany ended 1953 as the third biggest manufacturer of cars and trucks in Europe. The industry this year expects to better last year's output of 490,000 . . ."

PROMOTION

"Schleswig-Holstein's newly-elected Christian Democratic premier, 41-year-old Kai-Uwe von Hassel, has reappointed Hans Adolf Asbach, an important official of the wartime Nazi terror and murder regime in the Ukraine, as Minister for Social Affairs, Labor and Expellees in his new Cabinet.

"Asbach started out to be a lawyer, but never progressed beyond the preparatory examination. Instead, he joined the Nazi Party and by 1934, he had turned into a full-time Nazi Party functionary as Regional Legal Supervisor and Social Policy Advisory of the German Labor Front in all of Pomerania. His Nazi record was so black that, after the war, the Bar Association at Eutin in Schleswig-Holstein refused to admit him to the practice of law. He qualified as a journeyman bricklayer, but soon abandoned it for a political career in the ranks of the Nazi-infested BHE Refugee Party."

JUST WAIT!

"A Swiss correspondent said that he had been threatened by a cabinet minister for having reported a speech by the German minister advocating the recovery of territories lost to Czechoslovakia and Poland.

"The threat, made to Dr. Eduard Geilinger, correspondent of Die Neue Zuericher Zeitung, is being publicized by the West German newspapers as proof that the government cannot be trusted when it alleges it has no intention to control the press through the newly created coordinating committee.

"Dr. Geilinger said the minister who had threatened him was Dr. Hans Christoph Seebohm, Minister of Transport. Dr. Seebohm, a former member of the Nazi party, told Dr. Geilinger on the telephone 'we'd take care of you if we had our sovereignty.' . . ."

FRANCO'S PROFITABLE ANTI-COMMUNISM

"Another aspect of Spain's international trade relations is a Moscow radio report of the existence of a trade agreement between Spain and the Soviet Union. . . . Following are extracts from the Spanish Economic News Service, published in Madrid:

"March 30, 1954: 'Last week Bonn mentioned a deal of Spanish wine for Polish coal.'

"April 27: 'El Economista affirms that a deal for 200,000 tons of coal for Renfe (Spanish State Railways) in exchange for 300,000 tons of iron ore is in full swing. Licenses are said to have been granted . . . to ships are about to leave with Menera and Setolazar ore destined for Upper Silesia' (Poland). 'If samples are satisfactory other important shipments will follow . . .' "

A NEW HIGH

"West Germany's economy, certain to set post-war records in both industrial production and foreign trade this year, has a valuable asset in merchant shipping.

"While the nation's merchant fleet recently passed the 20,000,000-ton mark, about 50 per cent of the pre-war figure, tanker tonnage has reached a new high. . . .

". . . The common distrust of Germany which unites Frenchmen is aimed at the so-called ruling circles, the group that unseated the Weimar Republic and which Frenchmen regard as once again firmly seated in the Bonn and Ruhr command posts.

". . . 'We are all for French-German reconciliation,' one high French government official told me. 'But you know as well as I do that the Bonn administration employs thousands of former Nazis and that Dr. Adenauer's foreign office is run by many of the same arrogant people who served under a Ribbentrop. Do you expect us to stage a French-Nazi reconciliation?' The official then added:

" 'This is a fundamental matter. You Americans are a moral people par excellence. You apply the highest standards of integrity in your own Civil Service. How can you blind yourselves to the real character of these men in Bonn? Do you really believe you will find security by letting these men fill Europe's streets with the clutter of German soldiers' boots again?' "

"There is danger West Germany may be rearmed without safeguards against revival of German militarism and aggression.

"This—rather than the much publicized fear that the French will prevent arming Germany against Soviet aggression—is what worries the American and British governments. . . .'

The New German Imperialism (Continued from page 39)

not the twelve German divisions, but the establishment of American bases in Europe and Asia. Russia's efforts are aimed at forcing the American withdrawal from their present European and Asiatic footholds. In the light of this basic problem, Dr. Adenauer's diplomatic maneuvering over the past five years—playing the East against the West and vice-versa—has been rewarded with fabulous success. The German Chancellor believes that he is in the driver's seat and that he can extort more concessions from the U.S.A. as well as from the Soviet, as long as the present situation continues. This fact was emphasized and came clearly to light when the "London Daily Express" published the ill-famed memorandum of the Bonn official, Dr. Sonnenhohl, who recommended agitating continuation of the Cold War in order to exact greater concessions from East and West. The fact is that the Germans, at the present time, are fearful of war but like to go on fishing expeditions in troubled international waters.

"Blitzkrieg" Diplomacy

The German industrialists and Herr Adenauer know that they do not have available another $300 billion dollars for a new super-modern Juggernaut to conquer "Lebensraum." So why should they arm in the first place? It is for this reason that they have concentrated all their ingenuity, trickery and double-talk into large scale diplomatic efforts in order to achieve the same results which in former times were harvested only by armed aggression.

If Dr. Adenauer can build an empire by diplomatic "finesse," by Western "economic integration," by playing East against West, and finally winding up with a super-bargain with Moscow—why should Germany resort to suicidal expenditures for a super rearmament? The "Old Fox" knows that it is much safer, profitable and effective to apply "Blitzkrieg diplomacy" than to get stuck in "blitzkrieg warfare."

There is no doubt that a sovereign Germany has to bargain with the Russians if it goes ahead with building its empire in Europe and Africa via the detour of Franco-German "economic cooperation." Germany, says the "Aussenpolitik" (June 1954) "must become attractive as a partner for the Russians" and that it has "to pay any price for reunification."

The whole German history demonstrates the striking fact that all dynamic German moves were made either with the tacit understanding of or in active collaboration with Russia against the West. Dr. Adenauer is continuing the time-honored tradition in German world politics. The only difference is that in former times the Germans had to raise and pay for huge armies in order to conquer their "Lebensraum." However, under Dr. Adenauer, they have developed a refined procedure for imperialistic aggrandizement. Today, the masters of Rhine and Ruhr are achieving their old Pan-German objectives through Dr. Adenaur's skillful diplomacy—so highly admired by Secretary of State John Foster Dulles.

The Prerequisite for World Disarmament

Does the Russian proposal to negotiate directly with the Bonn Government vindicate our German policy, or is it final proof of its futility? To answer this question it is necessary to compare the main objectives of that policy with the results obtained.

According to U. S. policy makers, the restoration of Germany's prewar power, integrated both politically and economically with our European Allies, has been a cardinal aim. It was assumed that by this process the unity of western Europe would be so strengthened as to induce the Soviets to retreat all along the line. The program received the highest priority and was underwritten with billions of dollars from the U. S. Its success was publicized as a sure thing because the Germans, so we were told, were the "most reliable anti-Communists" and by culture and conviction the "most pro-Americans."

It is obvious that the program has produced spectacular results, but is it not also patently clear that they are of a different character from those presumably contemplated?

The spectre of a resurgent Germany has provoked bitter cleavages among the peoples of Western Europe. Communist and anti-American propaganda has had a field day. The haunting vision of being isolated and confronted by a new German Wehrmacht was skillfully exploited by the Russians when they scrapped their treaties with Britain and France. The impact of a resurgent Germany has also had its effects on the satellite countries. The current stirrings of nationalism and militarism in Germany have spread fear among the captive peoples of eastern Europe and thereby strengthened the grip of the Soviet commissars.

In the wake of the strife and suspicion which has sapped the hopes of the peoples of Western Europe and strained their friendship with the U. S. A., the Paris agreements were put into force. Chancellor Adenauer put his finger on the significance of these agreements when he told the German Parliament that hitherto the Bonn Government had been "a mere object of international policies." "Consequently," he declared, "it is one of the first aims of the Federal Republic to achieve freedom and self-determination . . . Thereby, the Federal Republic also will obtain freedom of action on behalf of all Germans."

Then he predicted, "the Russians will negotiate and they will do so not in spite of, but because of the realization of the agreements" (N. Y. Times, 12-16-54).

It is in this context that the meaning of the Soviet proposals to Bonn become clear. They indicate that all of the conditions climaxed by the Paris agreements are being met for the preparation of a Russo-German deal.

For years, this Society has warned that our German policy would create the very conditions which would undermine it ultimately. In our analyses we sought to distinguish between the transitory and constant factors governing Germany's behavior. Thus, we were not surprised that the Germans, after the initial shock of defeat, should proclaim their love for the West, bearing in mind that they obtained hundreds of millions of dollars by a similar performance after World War I.

The constant factors determining Germany's actions were of greater significance to us than their professions of attachment to the democratic cause. (See "German Realities" 1953-1954, Nos. 42 and 44, PREVENT WORLD WAR III.)

In our analysis of Russia's policy and propaganda (No. 43, PREVENT WORLD WAR III) we stated that the Russians, in spite of the twists in their propaganda, favored the creation of a Germany "that would possess the material wherewithal to launch its own independent actions and be able to pursue an independent policy in all directions. This would open up great possibilities for the Russians, because it would offer the Germans the vast markets in the East. Moreover, as a consequence, it would create military and political guarantees of a nature which would enable the Germans to exert its power against the West. In other words, only a 'strong' Germany can create an independent Germany, so far as the Russians define the word independent, and such a Germany would enable the Russians to gain another trump card in its dealing with the West."

That this Germany is in the making can hardly be doubted. Yet, the tragic irony of it lies in the fact that this dangerous development received its nourishment from U. S. German policy. The inherent fallacy of that policy cannot be overcome by handing over additional billions to the Germans, be it in money, machinery or armaments. In the eyes of the Germans, such grants are considered a form of tribute and will only serve to enhance Germany's attractiveness, thereby producing the ideal setting for close Russo-German cooperation.

This Society never accepted the myth, so assiduously cultivated, concerning Chancellor Adenauer's "trustworthiness." In the summer issue, 1953, of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, we stated that the Chancellor was not opposed to dealing with the Russians per se. Though he feared Allied negotiations with Russia over Germany and sought to discredit such a step "it would not in any way prevent the Germans from making their own secret deals with the Kremlin." This, we contended, was the real key to Chancellor Adenauer's diplomacy.

A Russo-German deal does not necessarily require direct negotiations. If Adenauer can have the Western Allies further the German cause under the illusion that they are advancing their own interests, then Adenauer might very well give his blessings to a Big Four meeting on Germany. Regardless of the tactic, the U. S. and her Allies must face the geopolitical reality that it is Russia who holds the key to the realization of Germany's ambitions. Foremost among these aspirations is the unification of Germany in full possession of its freedom and "Wehrhoheit" (the German term describing a country's exclusive prerogative to determine the size and disposition of its armed forces). These are the stark facts which should guide our policy makers.

In this connection, Mr. Walter Lippman reminds us that:

"The Germans know they can reunite Germany only by a deal with the Soviet Union; if they make the deal, France will become a third rate power in Europe in comparison with a reunited Germany which is on good terms with the Soviet orbit. The French know that if the German Soviet deal is to be prevented, they and their English speaking allies first must come to an agreement with the Soviet Union. Down deep at the bottom of the fight between Paris and Bonn is the question of whether the future of Germany is to be negotiated between Bonn and Moscow or by the Big Four powers" (Washington Post, 12-30-54).

Is a Russo-German tieup really unavoidable? To admit it is to believe in the inevitability of World War III. The Society does not believe that the western cause is lost. Nor do we mean to imply that there are no longer any means of preventing Germany and Russia from upsetting the delicate power of balance in Europe to the detriment of the West.

A Big Four agreement on Germany which maintains the integrity, freedom and security of the democracies and would, at the same time, preclude the emergence of a German-Russian bloc dominating Europe, should be based on the following principles:

a: That both East and West Germany be permanently demilitarized under United Nations control.

b: That the territorial integrity of East and West Germany becomes the responsibility of the United Nations.

c: That the United Nations shall establish armed force contingents to be located in the states bordering Germany for purposes of implementing that responsibility.

d: That both East and West Germany shall pay in cash to the United Nations a sum in an amount roughly equivalent to the cost of any occupation forces, or any other forces, which would have to be sited on German territory for the protection of peace and the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe. Such funds shall be employed to support the armed forces established by the United Nations for the protection of Germany's territorial integrity.

The implementation of these principles could pave the way for the ultimate unification of Germany in peace. More than that, it would create an international climate of goodwill and confidence which are the prerequisites for the success of a general program of world disarmament.

Modern Germany has been the breeding ground of two world wars. The powers who have defeated her aggressions have had to sacrifice the flower of their sons and daughters. Let them keep faith with those who have paid with their lives. Let them give hope to our children, and their children. As for Germany, the acceptance of this program would test her readiness to show the way toward world disarmament and her will to peace.

> "It is possible that the Russians may risk the resurgence of German militarism rather than face the inevitable prospect of a unified Germany integrated with Western Europe. If they choose this course, they are in a position to make important economic, territorial, and other concessions to the Germans. Moreover, they could withdraw their occupation forces and expand the nucleus of German militarism which already exists in the East German Communist Army. They could, in other words, offer Germany a unification with real nationalistic inducements and ask in return only that the Germans separate themselves from Western Europe . . ."

Editorials

THE NEW LOOK

Now that the German Wehrmacht is in the process of rebirth, a number of articles have appeared describing how "different" this army will be from that which served Hitler and the Kaiser.

Writing in The Reporter (1-13-55), Norbert Muhlen claims that many of "the young former officers" of Hitler's armies exhibit an aversion to Prussian militarism. "Their disillusionment with traditional German army attitudes and manners has led them to become progressive reformers."

The Reader's Digest also devoted space to this subject (January 1955). The writer of the Digest piece, Frederic Sondern, Jr., states that the top German official in charge of the rearmament program, Theodor Blank, is dedicated to democratic ideals which he is determined to infuse in the new German army: "For four years now Theodor Blank and a staff of military, political and economic advisers have been laboring at the colossal task of planning a military system which breaks entirely with German traditions. A visit to the old red-brick building in Bonn which houses Blank's office, is a surprising experience for anyone who knew German military headquarters of former years. Heel clicking is rare; there is no parade ground; voices are seldom raised; no one swaggers . . ."

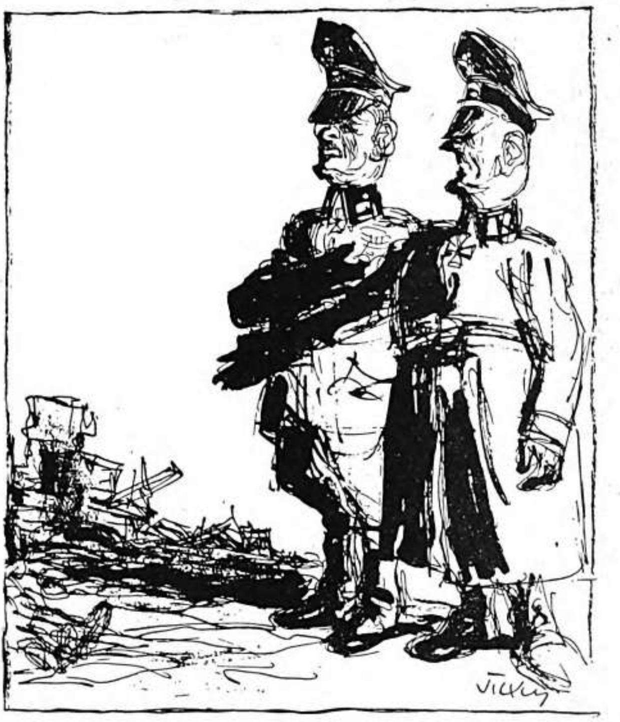
The "new look" is described in some detail by Charles W. Thayer in The Reporter (4-21-55). We are told that the German soldier will be permitted to wear civilian clothes and to participate in community and political life. They "will salute only the officers of their own units." The German soldiers, Mr. Thayer says, are going to be taught the principles of democratic "teamwork." "In the barracks too, the principles of teamwork will be emphasized. Each squad will live together—the non-coms with their men." Barrack discipline will be deprussianized. Even the uniforms of the Germans will change although the color of the uniform still poses difficulties. Mr. Thayer notes, "German fieldgrey might stir unhappy memories among the Western Allies, whereas American khaki is apt to recall to the German the early and not always happy days of the occupation. This problem has yet to be solved."

These and similar articles have set us to wonder. Is there any real grounds for believing that the new army will be more democratic in makeup than other branches of the Bonn Government which are crawling with Nazis as, for example, the Foreign Office? Needless to say, changing the outer trappings of German militarism will not suffice: the color of the uniform will not affect the quality of the soldier.

Mr. Muhlen referred to "progressive reformers" among the German officers but he did not identify them. Therefore, we feel that our readers are entitled to know the backgrounds of some of the leading lights who have been entrusted with the organization of the "new" German army:

1) General Adolf Heusinger. He is at present the top man in the new army setup. Mr. Sondern describes him as "spare, ascetic, clipped of speech, he looks the typical Prussian officer." Heusinger was Chief of the Operations Branch of the Nazi armies and worked out the plans for Hitler's aggressions against Holland, Belgium and France. In a recent book he attacked Hitler for failing to wipe out the British army at Dunkirk. General Heusinger was a close pal of General Jodl, hanged for war crimes at Nuremberg. He has characterized Jodl as "a perfectly decent fellow."

2) General Ludwig Cruewell. He succeeded Marshal Rommel as Commander of Nazi Germany's Afrika Korps. The New York Times (9-13-54) reported that General Cruewell addressed a reunion of 15,000 veterans of Hitler's African armies. He declared that "the new German army must be based on the old military principle: 'bravery till death.' " Cruewell told his enthusiastic audience, "It is hoped the German soldiers will eventually be able to write Europe next to Germany on their flags." According to the Times, Marshal Rommel's widow took part in the reunion celebration as well as Fieldmarshal von Kesselring "sentenced to death for war crimes, but later freed." Von Kesselring is the leader of the notorious militaristic organization "Stahlhelm." General Cruewell is the man



"GIVE US THE TOOLS—WE'LL FINISH THE JOB!"

most frequently named as the future military commander of the "new" German army.

3) Major General Freiherr Smilo von Luettwitz. He played a decisive role in the Nazi destruction of Warsaw. He also commanded a tank division when Hitler's armies invaded France. Von Luettwitz' father gained notoriety when, as a general of the old Wehrmacht, he participated in the Kapp Putsch of 1920 which was designed to overthrow the Weimar Republic. For services rendered to Hitler, Smilo von Luettwitz was given the second highest Nazi decoration, the "Knight's Cross with Laurels and Swords." Von Luettwitz is a member of the Officers Selection Board which has been assigned the mission of screening reliable cadres for the "new" army.

4) Colonel von Claer. He is an important adviser to Herr Blank, present head of the German Defense Ministry. A few months ago von Claer told representatives of the German Ex-Prisoners of War Association that "it was high time that the people stopped talking about coddling the German soldier . . . The German soldier would on the contrary, have to be tougher than his predecessor of the second world war . . ." Von Claer said that the release of German war criminals was a precondition for the formation of a new German army. He maintained "that this was also the official view of Herr Blank's defense office" (Manchester Guardian, 1-27-55).

5) Colonel Count Johann von Kielmansegg. From the very beginning the Count has played an important role in organizing the "new" army. In discussing the development of German rearmament with the writer for Reader's Digest, Herr Blank said that von Kielmansegg "is one of my closest associates—an aristocrat, cavalry man, former officer of the General Staff. We get along perfectly, I think that decent people with a common goal usually can."

How "decent" is von Kielmansegg? In a sworn affidavit at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials Ernst Rode, former SS Brigadeführer and member of Himmler's personal command staff, revealed that von Kielmansegg, as a member of the German General Staff, participated in the preparation of Draconian measures against anti-Nazi partisans. He stated that these measures "were ruthlessly carried out . . . a thing which was also quite in keeping with Hitler's desires or intentions." These measures, the Nazi Rode declares, were not only directed against partisans but against Jews and other "non-Aryan" peoples. Indeed, Rode admits, these so-called anti-partisan warfare which was conceived by von Kielmansegg together with other members of the German General Staff, "gradually became an excuse for the systematic annihilation of Jewry and Slavism."

6) General Hasso von Manteuffel. An influential and articulate military figure in Germany today is General von Manteuffel, former Commander of Hitler's "Greater Germany Division." Von Manteuffel was one of the key organizers of the so-called Brüderschaft, a sinister military association established in Germany a few years after the end of World War II. (For a detailed exposé of this organization see issues Nos. 35 and 37 of Prevent World War III.)

The Brüderschaft was an instrument for the preservation of Germany's military spirit and it was dominated by former members of the German General Staff. Its leaders had close ties with the Nazis and the Gestapo. Von Manteuffel himself, according to Melvin J. Lasky, "was Hitler's favorite military adviser to the end" (New Leader, 11-6-50). The German banker Pferdmenges, a close friend and adviser of Chancellor Adenauer, provided von Manteuffel with substantial funds. It is interesting to note that the Brüderschaft had as one of its foremost aims "the union of the peoples of Europe between the Atlantic and the Ural with the Reich of all Germans in its ethnographic and historic borders as an organic part. European Union and the German Reich are no contradiction . . . Our foreign policy should not lead to a unilateral tieup with the West . . ." As a matter of fact, leaders of the Brüderschaft advocated a more "friendly" attitude toward the Soviets stressing the affinity between German Prussianism and Russian totalitarianism.

This same Manteuffel delivered an interesting speech in the Bundestag (12-16-54) in which he tried to show how democratic the German army was under Hitler. He alleged that personal contact between the officers and enlisted men was far greater under Hitler than in any of the other armies including, of course, the armed forces of the Western democracies. Von Manteuffel was selected as one of the Germans who will help to develop "democracy" in the "new" German army. He was even permitted to tour military installations in the United States to obtain ideas as to how to go about "democratizing" the "new" Wehrmacht.

These are some of the German officers who are shaping the "new" German army—which reminds us of the French proverb "Plus cela change, plus c'est la même chose."

Many of the articles describing the "new" German army give the impression that former leading Nazis, members of Hitler's SS and convicted war criminals will not be eligible to serve. Fact is that there is no evidence to support this impression. In this connection, the New York Herald Tribune (6-8-55) reports that in Adenauer's haste to put through a bill that would permit immediate enrollment in the army, there is "no provision for weeding out the undesirable ex-SS (Nazi elite guard) types." Furthermore, the bill contains no provision for the screening of the 130,000 volunteers who have indicated their desire to enter the army. We wonder if these omissions are an oversight on the part of Herr Adenauer.

Further indication of the German attitude may be seen n the position of Chancellor Adenauer and his Defense Minister Blank. During the general elections of 1953 Herr Adenauer went out of his way to pay a sympathetic call to Germany's worst war criminals imprisoned in Werl. Following his return from the United States in 1953, he boasted that the U.S. had promised to review the cases of these criminals. He then went on to say: "I would like to stress this today at the occasion of my first public speech after my return, because former German soldiers of all ranks have complained to me that they are much concerned about the fact that there are still many prisoners at Landsberg Prison who have been tried and convicted when, shortly after the end of the war, judgment was passed somewhat hastily. I believe that our former soldiers may be satisfied that the last stigma—if there was any at all—will be removed from our former armed forces."

The New York Times (1-12-55) reported that Herr Blank assured a militaristic group that "the West German Government will attempt to obtain the release of the German war criminals still in Western custody before new West German armed forces come into being."

We are aware of the fact that, while many people are uncertain about the "new" German army, they are confident that as long as Adenauer lives, the West will have nothing to fear. This was the sense of an editorial appearing in the Washington Post (5-18-55). Can the Western democracies afford such a reckless gamble on one man, particularly when he has reached the age of 80? But the gamble of a "new" army has even more ominous implications. This is admitted by Adenauer himself. He has publicly stated his opposition to a German national army, declaring, "We, as so many others, believe that this would unquestionably lead to German militarism" (New York Times, 7-3-54). The world knows the record of German militarism. Apparently Adenauer too is aware of its consequences for, according to the Washington Post correspondent Chalmers Roberts (7-11-54), Adenauer has declared that "he would never agree to a national German army because that would be the beginning of World War III."

" 'I am absolutely convinced—100 per cent convinced—that the German National Army, forced upon us by Mendes-France, will ultimately be a very grave danger, not only for Germany, but for the whole of Europe, especially, after I'll have left the scene. I really don't know what is to become of Germany, should we not succeed in creating "Europe." '

" 'Believe me, the danger of German nationalism is much greater than one thinks. The crisis of the European policy makes the nationalists bold, they are gaining in self-confidence as well as in followers . . .' "

Konrad Adenauer.

(Quoted from German weekly Der Spiegel, The Tablet, 12-4-54)

EVIL PEOPLE FOR EVIL CAUSES

In late the fall of 1949 a rather youngish looking man with alert but shifty eyes arrived in the U. S. Hardly anyone knew of his coming, nor does it seem that anyone would have cared. This does not imply that he was disappointed over the fact that the red carpet had not been rolled out in tribute to his visit. On the contrary, the less was said about his presence, the better.

He had every good reason to shun the photographers' flash bulbs. His bank had been charged with the wholesale looting of German occupied Europe and Allied authorities had recommended his indictment and trial as a war criminal. It is no wonder, therefore, that Herman J. Abs should have avoided publicity.

Yet, despite all precautions, Abs was found out. Public indignation began to rise. Senator Guy M. Gillette protested to the State Department, declaring that the "public interest is not best served by allowing a man with such a record to make unpublicized journeys to the U. S. for any purpose whatever." Senator Gillette noted that after having waited more than a week for a reply to his letter concerning Abs, he received a telephone call from the State Department's Bureau of German Affairs giving "part of the story." Apparently the Bureau of German Affairs was just as surprised as Abs himself when the visit was uncovered.

The State Department declared that Abs had come to the U. S. to talk with American bankers on certain debts which the Germans had incurred in the early 30s. The State Department also alleged that Abs had been invited to the U. S. by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. However, Senator Gillette learned that the Federal Reserve Bank of Washington, D. C., would not confirm this allegation. Regardless of whether the State Department was trying to pass the buck, the fact is that the spotlight thrown upon Herr Abs, shortened his stay in the United States although it must be admitted that he was able to resume profitable contacts with his friends in American banking circles.

"NO RESEMBLANCE, WE HOPE"

(Illingworth in The London Daily Mail)

In contrast to the difficulties Abs experienced during his initial visit to the United States, his return to a position of power in Germany was rapid. Indeed, from the very early days of Dr. Adenauer's chancellorship, Abs served as one of his chief advisers. Meanwhile, under the benevolent eyes of the Chancellor, Herr Abs began to rebuild his banking empire. Abs returned to the Board of Directors of a number of Germany's leading monopolies including I. G. Farben's Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik. Besides his success in the financial and industrial fields, Abs became one of Germany's leading "statesmen." It was Mr. Abs who led the German Delegation to the London Debt Conference which resulted in the scaling down of Germany's debts to the Allies to $2 billion. It was at that conference that Abs hinted to Allied negotiators that Germany might not honor the reduced debt unless she regained her former external assets.

The prestige of Abs grew so rapidly that reports began to circulate that he would succeed Adenauer as the German chancellor. It was during that period when Abs was consolidating his power in Germany, that the Allies began to "reappraise" their German policy. The reappraisal had a decisive influence on the climate surrounding German-American relations. Our experts began to perfume the atmosphere, hoping that in this way the stench of the concentration camps would be forgotten forever.

It was in this "purified" atmosphere that Herr Abs returned to the U. S. in February 1955. This time there were no excuses or buck passing. On the contrary, Herr Abs was warmly greeted by Secretary of State Dulles. In an atmosphere of mutual understanding they discussed the main reason for Herr Abs' return to the U. S., to wit, the return of former enemy assets that were confiscated in accordance with the laws passed by the Congress of the United States. The proceeds from these assets had been used to compensate G. I. prisoners of war and/or their survivors. Now the Germans, in the person of Mr. Abs, were out to make the American taxpayers shoulder the responsibility.

Knowing of Secretary Dulles' professed concern for keeping policies on a moral basis, we called his attention to Mr. Abs' criminal record. In this connection we stated: "It is said that only evil people can effectively represent evil causes. In that sense the appointment of Mr. Abs to speak for the Bonn Government in its effort to regain enemy assets is not surprising. On the other hand, however, we feel confident that the overwhelming majority of the American people is repelled by the record of Mr. Abs and the cause which he presently advocates." Mr. Dulles never replied personally to our letter although we received a communication from the Deputy Director of the Office of German Affairs. In his letter the Deputy Director alleged that Allied authorities had no "specific ground" for demanding that the German Government prohibit Abs from holding important positions in the German economy. In addition we were told that it was American policy to permit the Germans "freedom" to choose its representatives and officials.

Space does not permit us to reprint the text of our reply but we quoted chapter and verse from U. S. Government documents attesting to the fact that Abs was one of Germany's leading financiers who "in an outstanding way thrived under Nationalsocialism . . . , welcomed it in the beginning, aided the Nazis to obtain power, supported it in office, shared the spoils of expropriation and conquest, or otherwise markedly benefited in their careers or fortunes under the Nazis." We cited the reports of U. S. Government investigators concerning Abs' role in the looting of Europe. We quoted the German banker von Schroeder as stating that Abs' influence with the Nazi Government was "tremendous." That we should have had to devote 3½ typewritten pages to prove what the State Department knows, is in itself a commentary of what has happened to the moral qualities which are supposed to guide our German policy.

To the point that the German Government had the right to choose its representatives and officials we queried whether the U. S. would accept Alfred Krupp or Rudolf Hess to represent the Bonn Government. We did not receive a reply to this letter, nor did we receive any comment from the State Department with respect to our opposition to the return of former enemy assets.

For the past two years the Germans and their lobbyists in Washington have been working overtime to seize these properties. In this operation they have had their helpers in Congress as well as in the State Department. We exposed this give-away deal in the No. 45 issue of Prevent World War III. We showed that the Germans were not particularly interested in what happened to the assets that belonged to "widows and orphans." They have had their eye on bigger fish. Actually their main target is the General Aniline and Film Corporation. They have sought by all devious means to regain this property. They have pretended that General Aniline was owned by a Swiss company Interhandel. This fraud was exposed in one of Switzerland's outstanding newspapers "Die Tat." In a front-page editorial this paper stated:

"It is known far and wide that Interhandel undertook to camouflage the I. G. Farben interests in Switzerland. At that time, the purpose was to put the German chemical interests under a Swiss name before the entry of America into the war and, in particular (to disguise), the very strong German participation in the General Aniline and Film Corporation.

"As a result, the execution of the Washington accord (to release Swiss property siezed during the war) led to a very unpleasant controversy because, although legally the camouflage was very skillfully done, the fact that Nazi interests were being disguised was obvious" (New York Times, 4-11-55).

Needless to say, the above mentioned article raised a storm of controversy in Switzerland for it struck home the truth that certain Swiss interests were cloaking for the Nazis and therefore acting against the interests of Switzerland itself.

The Germans have also resorted to some "economic" arguments why these assets should be returned. The Bonn Government alleged that the return of these assets would relieve the Germans of great financial burdens. This myth was exposed in the New York Times (2-16-55). It was pointed out that whereas the Western democracies are burdened with huge national debts "West Germany is in the unique position of being almost free of debt."

Finally, the Germans have been talking of the sanctity of private property. One can judge their sincerity by the fact that Herr Abs has been delegated to plead this principle!

There is no question but that Herr Abs will not give up the battle. Does he not possess inexhaustible funds to take care of his American lobbyists and propagandists? Furthermore, he has influential friends. During his stay some of these people paid their respect to him. Among those who visited him in New York, were Gordon H. Michler, Chairman of the U.S.-German Chamber of Commerce and a Standard Oil bigwig; Ernest H. Meili of the J. Henry Schroeder Banking Corporation, one of Secretary Dulles' former legal clients; Joachim Stresemann, Chase National Bank; Marcell N. Rand, Remington Rand Inc.; Rod Herod, International General Electric Co.; Eric M. Warburg; and Dr. Eric Stoetzner, New York Times. The names of these individuals and their connections indicate that the German cartelists have once again built a bridge of friendship with their American counterparts.

It is beyond doubt that, if the State Department has its way, General Aniline and all of the former enemy assets will be returned. We are positive that the American people, if they knew the facts, would strenuously oppose this scandalous giveaway. They would support the resolution of the American Legion which stated, "Believing that the American veteran has a vested interest in enemy assets seized by the United States and that such assets should continue to be devoted to the purposes provided by the War Claims Act, the American Legion opposes any effort to return these assets to their former owners or their governments."

WHO ARE THE WAR CRIMINALS?

When Allied newspaper men travelled through Germany during the early days of the occupation, they reported that it was almost impossible to locate a self-confessed Nazi. Practically everyone—high and low—denied affiliation. The Germans were then aware of the stigma that Nazism carried. Accordingly, most of them played the part of innocent bystanders who were caught in the crossfire of opposing power blocs.

However, within a short time they changed their tune. They soon found out that if one could "prove" to have been "inveigled" or "forced" into the Nazi Party—or if one could obtain a favorable endorsement from an Allied cartel lawyer or high churchman, then past activities on behalf of the Nazis would not be considered sufficient reason for criticism or punishment.

Thus, the circle of the guilty ones was considerably narrowed. Perhaps, the main culprits could be found among former Nazi bigwigs together with a handful of bankers, diplomats and soldiers. But in due time, even this smaller group managed to escape the net.

A new brand of literature began to flourish extolling the industrial Ruhr barons and Hitler's generals. Such literature began to find its way into the United States. For example, last year a former American newspaper correspondent, Louis P. Lochner, devoted a whole book "to prove" that the Krupps and the Thyssens had been duped by naughty Adolf. Parenthetically, it should be pointed out that this is not the first time that Mr. Lochner has employed his pen to blame it all on Hitler, thereby absolving the militarists and their paymasters.

The circle had narrowed to the extent that only a handful of Nazis were to blame. Apparently even this concession is no longer admissible. There is a growing number of publishing firms in Germany which devote almost exclusively all of their efforts to the publication of memoirs and other types of literature glorifying Nazi bigwigs.

But this isn't all. The Germans have been carefully preparing their own counter offensive and the target—the Allied Powers!

As early as 1952, this new twist in German propaganda became discernible. For example, a leading figure in Chancellor Adenauer's Party, Dr. Eric Mende, declared that the German war criminals had been convicted for acts that "were no different from those committed by the United Nations troops in Korea." A more blunt statement was made by General Ramcke who had been convicted of war crimes. Following his release from jail he addressed a huge meeting of Hitler's former Waffen SS where he declared, "Who are the war criminals? They are those who made the Versailles Treaty. They are those who destroyed German towns . . ." The New York Times reported that the speech was received with "clamorous applause by the assembled veterans . . ." At that time, leading German politicians including Chancellor Adenauer sought to deflate the significance of General Ramcke's remarks by alleging that they did not reflect German public opinion. Whatever might be said to support this view in 1952, the fact remains that the Ramcke thesis is now popular.

For example, the Chicago Tribune correspondent, reporting from Frankfurt, February 12, 1955, writes, "With West Germany making steps toward regaining sovereignty rights, the people are asking for explanation of what they allege were Allied war crimes . . .

"West German newspapers, forbidden after the war to criticize the Allied nations and Russia, now are free to print undisclosed facts (sic) about the Allies." The correspondent then reports at length about the so-called criminal bombardment of the city of Dresden by the Allied Powers. He writes that the Germans commemorate in memorial ceremonies this "Allied war crime." The Germans, he states, are not satisfied with official interpretations. "They want more details. They ask for precise data. Who planned these raids . . ."

The Associated Press (4-21-55) reported that officials of the State of Rhineland-Palatinate have conducted an investigation on charges that six members of Hitler's SS have been shot to death by GIs after they had been captured during the closing days of the war.

The French, too, have been accused of war crimes. Thus, the Stuttgarter Zeitung (2-2-55) charged the hero of Dien Bien Phu, General Christian De Castries, with having ordered the burning and looting of a German town in the last days of the war.

We can be sure that now that the Germans have their sovereignty, there will be more of such charges and investigations.

Pro-German propagandists in the Western hemisphere are also playing up this new line. The Pan-German magazine "Der Weg," published out of Argentine, refers to Allied war "crimes" frequently. In a recent number (No. 2, 1955) it quoted the German newspaper "Die Zeit" as stating that the Roosevelt Administration and the Communists had conspired to create war between the U.S. and the Axis Powers.

In the United States vicious slanders against the Western Allies as well as the Roosevelt and Truman Administrations are increasing in those publications dedicated to the cause of "Germandom." The Steuben News, published by the Pan-German Steuben Society, and the German language newspaper Bürger Zeitung of Chicago are outstanding examples. In this connection the Bürger Zeitung (5-19-55) dwells at length on the alleged Allied crimes perpetrated against "helpless Germans." The writer of that article, "Politicus," declares that the "enlarged misdeeds" of the Nazis pale into insignificance when they are compared with the crimes perpetrated against the Germans on the basis of the Yalta decisions. Writing in the same vein is the pro-Nazi propagandist, Austin J. App, professor at the Incarnate Word College, San Antonio, Texas, a frequent contributor to German language publications. In one of his columns for the German language newspaper Nord-Amerika (March 24, 1955) Herr App accused the Allied leaders of committing war crimes. He charged that they behaved like "Chicago gangsters after a successful train robbery" and declared that "by Nuremberg standards all the active participants at Yalta would have to be hanged as war criminals.

How does it happen that the Allies are now in the dock? For the answer one must turn to the overall policy which the Allies have been pursuing for the past few years. This policy was designed to revive Germany's power to confront the menacing shadow of Soviet expansionism in Europe. It seemed to be a simple and sound solution—restore the balance of power in Europe via a "rehabilitated" Fourth Reich and all would be well.

Forgotten in the haste to counter the Soviet challenge was the fact that a reinvigorated Germany does not automatically create a balance of power favoring the West. Forgotten, or perhaps deliberately ignored, was the fact that the restoration of Germany to a position of preeminence in Europe entailed a series of measures the cumulative effect of which would discredit the very principles for which the Allies had fought to defeat the Nazis. When the Allies began to water down their original program to decartelize German industry and reduce its war potential capacity; when the Allies no longer cared if important Nazis and Hitler supporters gained key positions both in public and private life; when the Allies closed their eyes to the reemergence of militaristic organizations; when the Allies showed leniency or granted premature freedom to notorious war criminals, they also sapped the basis of their moral authority.

The Germans saw that the Allies were walking into a trap. They knew that a policy which called for the revival of Germany's military power would induce the Allies to embrace many of the very criminals they had pledged to punish. Yet, it is more than a handshake with a Krupp that is involved. By de-emphasizing the record of German crimes and releasing prematurely some of the worst criminals, the Allies have given the Germans the opportunity to defame the Allied cause during World War II. More than that, it undermines the foundations of international law and morality which should guide nations in their relations to each other. (See "Are We Men or Murderers?" page 14.)

The logic of our present German policy confronts the democracies with a grave challenge and we shall have ourselves to blame if we remain silent while the Germans trample on the record of history and on the principles of international justice.

TARGET DATE—1955

Two years ago, an expert on German geopolitics predicted that the year 1955 would witness a major German diplomatic turnabout culminating a series of betrayals from the days of Frederick the Great to the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939. Mr. T. H. Tetens made this prediction on the basis of an analysis of postwar development in Germany, supported by an unusual wealth of documentation. All of this was contained in his book "Germany Plots With The Kremlin" which made a strong impression on book reviewers throughout the country. Special editorials were published by newspapers dealing with the significance of this book. The Los Angeles Daily News said:

"We should be well advised to heed Mr. Teten's warning. At least we should read his book. We hope the President reads it. We hope Secretary of State John Foster Dulles reads it, too, for that mattter. It's something that needs telling and the last we can do is listen."

Certainly the reading of this book in 1953 would have armed our policy makers with an insight into Germany's postwar objectives. The fact that the warnings contained in this book based on concrete evidence, were ignored does not detract one wit from its value today. Indeed, it is more urgent than ever before to study Germany Plots With The Kremlin in order to cope with the German plan now unfolding before our eyes.

Mr. Tetens was not fooled by Chancellor Adenauer's pledges of eternal loyalty to the West. He pointed out that the Chancellor was a faithful student of German Realpolitik which admitted of no other loyalties than those dedicated to the furtherance of Pan-Germanism. He showed that Chancellor Adenauer's pro-Western policy was basically an opportunistic tactic; that with the help of billions from America the German would be able to weld together a Europe under German hegemony. This was Chancellor Adenauer's concept of the Third Power Bloc. Mr. Tetens quoted the Chancellor as stating on May 20, 1950:

"A federated Europe will become a Third Force in the world, not as strong as Russia or the United States, but powerful enough to intervene successfully—in a decisive moment—to safeguard the peace . . . Germany has again become a factor with whom others will have to reckon in international affairs . . . There is also a long-range economic goal: the colonization of Africa . . . If we Europeans colonize Africa, we create at the same time a supplier of raw materials for Europe which will be of the greatest importance."

Five years later, in a special article for the New York Times Magazine (6-26-55), the Chancellor redefined "the Mission of Germany." He declared that it was "absolutely necessary for a third power to arise. Only a federated Europe can be that third power.

"This federated Europe would never be as mighty as Soviet Russia or the United States. And by virtue of its internal structure it could never be an aggressor. The countries that made it up would be unalterably opposed to war, because they have had enough of it. But such a power as united Europe could throw her weight in favor of peace at crucial moments, when the tensions between the two great powers grew too alarming . . ."

It will be noted that the Chancellor does not make any sharp distinction between the intentions of totalitarian Russia and the United States. On the contrary, implicit in his statement is the belief that the United States might break the peace and in that case, the weight of a German-dominated Europe could be swung against the USA presumably in collaboration with Russia.

From the foregoing it is clear that ideological considerations or cultural affinity do not play a decisive part in Adenauer's calculations. This is the key to his diplomacy and when our policy shapers recognize the fact, they will be able to throw off the hypnotic spell so cunningly cast by the "old fox."

In his book, Mr. Tetens showed that the Chancellor had all along planned a deal with Moscow. However, he realized that under no circumstances must the Germans give cause for suspicion lest they lose the opportunity of extracting billions from American tax payers. In this connection Mr. Tetens quotes the Chancellor as stating, "We must move very cautiously. We ought not to give the im- pression, either in Germany or in the United States, that we shall collaborate in any way with the Russians."

The days of caution are approaching an end. Within a few months Chancellor Adenauer embarks on his mission to Moscow. Why has the Kremlin after denouncing Adenauer as another Hitler, rolled out the red carpet? Perhaps they took the advice of Germany's leading newspaper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung which suggested direct talks between Bonn and the Kremlin because "only Chancellor Adenauer can convince the Kremlin of the honesty and general usefulness of Germany's policy" (10-3-53). And what will Adenauer tell Moscow? Perhaps this, too, may be answered by the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung:

"We do not need to call the attention of the experienced men in the Kremlin to the fact that a strong and unified Western Europe can defend its independence against every side. Why should the Kremlin not be interested in such an independence? . . . If the world, which is split today in two parts, could be reshuffled into a numbe of independent power groups, it may prevent this horrible conflagration for mankind. A flexible and prudent Russian policy could, for instance, grant German unification in exchange for the independence of Europe which could be defended against every side. In such a case the reunification of Germany would become a guarantee for peace. The treaties which are presently signed will not prove to be a curb toward reunification if the Russians remain interested in such a solution" (May 30, 1952).

At this crucial juncture in our foreign relations it would be well for our policy makers to read German Plots With The Kremlin. A detailed analysis of this book was published in the No. 42 issue of Prevent World War III. Because of its significance, the review was inserted in the Congressional Record by Senator James E. Murray, reprints of which may be obtained from the Society upon request.

(after Heine)

Suffering has transformed and purified the German nation. Dr. Adenauer

As fair as is a flower,
So pure you are, so bright!
The radiance you shower
Fills all the West with light.

We gaze upon your petals
But memory calls to mind
You were like stinging nettles
Of the most annoying kind.

You are such sweetness shedding,
So fresh, so pure, so clean! . . .
You were like darnel spreading,
So lothsome, so obscene!

You were like fungus spotted,
So vile, so full, so rank!
You were like bindweed knotted,
And Himmel! how you stank!

But now with fragrance laden
The parterre you perfume—
The budding Hitler-maiden
Becomes Bonn's choicest bloom!

You are transformed, transplanted;
So bright, so fresh, so new,
The First Prize gladly granted
In Nato's show, to you.

As fair as is a flower,
So pure you are, so white,
Says Dr. Adenauer—
But is the Doctor right?

A Nazi Comes to Town

by
N. PETER LEVINSON

She was tall, blond, and blue-eyed and she had a preference for tailored suits. Her hair was combed straight back, her walk mannish, and she reminded you of the amazons Hitler had recruited for the B. D. M., his favorite youth organization. Marching along the streets of Hamburg, Munich, and Berlin, its girls had once been heard singing of their flag fluttering in the breeze and the blood of Jews dripping from the knives.

She was an exchange teacher on a tour of the States, perhaps sponsored by the State Department, and her mission was ostensibly to acquaint herself with the methods and techniques of the American public school system. Perhaps she was also to learn something of the democratic way of life. For she was young and supposedly of open mind. On the other hand, it was probably expected that she would do her part in dispelling the prejudices many Americans still harbored against the German people. For Western Germany was today the "bulwark of democracy" and its indispensable defender. As a typical representative of the new German youth she would be an ambassador of goodwill to a formerly hostile nation.

Our small town welcomed her with true Southern hospitality. She was showered with friendliness and several homes that would ordinarily be closed for many a good American citizen were opened to her. Miss Hilde Meyer went around the schools and addressed classes. She gave talks at civic clubs and before churches. Within a few days the entire town was singing her praises and quoting her authoritative views on Communism and the current political situation in Europe.

If we were to ask ourselves to which particular quality Miss Meyer's success was to be attributed, the answer would be simple. Certainly, it was not her scholarship, her profound knowledge of contemporary affairs or the like. It was on the one hand the universal desire to accept her, and on the other, the admiration of the average small town citizen for the educated foreigner, the one who has come to visit—and not to stay. For this is the essential difference between the visiting foreigner and the so-called refugee. Since the former is not interested in making the United States his home, he is subconsciously considered to be superior—he does not need us. The refugee, however, is suspect, even though he has made democracy his choice, or more accurately, precisely because he has chosen America in preference to his former home. Miss Meyer was definitely no refugee. And since she did not want to be one of us, she could be quoted as an authority.

Above all, it was the "continental charm" which captured the hearts of her listeners, to say nothing of the amazing fluency of her English. "Isn't she wonderful?" her admirers would exclaim, "Just imagine us giving a talk like that in a foreign country." And while everybody tried to outdo the other in their praise, they would comment on her choice of words, the level of her education, her sense of humor, and her poise. It all culminated in a rapturous article which appeared in the local newspaper. Nobody, however, in all this whirl, seemed to have listened to Miss Meyer's words or to have noticed what she actually said, which is essentially the point of this article.

Miss Meyer's talk was well constructed. Appearing before the local Rotary Club she discussed the Germany before, during, and after the war. The period immediately before the war became the subject of many nostalgic reminiscences. How wonderful it all had been in Germany, how there had been no poverty, no unemployment, or scarcity, but only prosperity, wealth and abundance. What she failed to mention and what most of her listeners missed was that she was describing the peak of Hitler's power, the years of wealth and affluence attendant upon Germany's annexation of half of Europe. Indeed, in the measure in which the peoples of Europe were plundered, robbed, and deprived of their livelihood, the victorious Nazis had grown fat, smug, and satisfied. No wonder that in the memory of Miss Meyer these years of Nazi supremacy appeared as symbols of pride, glory, and accomplishment.

However, when she spoke of the years of the war her mood changed abruptly. Where there had been triumph there was dejection, where there had been exaltation there appeared gloom. Miss Meyer was describing the sufferings of the Fatherland—the death, the bombings, the destruction. She told of historical landmarks being wantonly destroyed, of cultural centers annihilated, of the agonies of men, women, and children. She spoke with all her conviction and with righteous wrath and indignation. In her audience there were men who had participated in the bombing of German cities. I was wondering whether they listened and how they felt. For here the finger was being pointed at them.

But there was no mention of those who had been responsible for the tragedies of this war, of German guilt and shame; no notice was taken of the millions butchered by the Nazis, of many more tortured in concentration camps. It was the fatherland that had suffered; German culture that had been trampled in the dust. There were no tears shed for the cultural treasures of many nations consigned to the pit. And it was expected that here in America we would join in the chorus and perhaps beat our breasts for having desecrated German soil. Her words could have been uttered by Communist agitators in Eastern Germany who today brand our Armed Forces for the "terror" bombings of Dresden and Berlin.

Her final remarks were devoted to a description of today's Germany, the miraculous revival of her industries, the devotion of her peoples to the cause of the West, the problems of Communism and democracy.

While the speaker had shown her true convictions throughout her talk, it was in the questioning period that they became most pronounced. At one point Miss Meyer declared that there had been good in the Nazi Party. Asked to enumerate those qualities which she considered "good," she replied without hesitation: "The feeling of fellowship and comradeship in the youth movement, and the healthy patriotism, the love of country, which you Americans likewise cherish." In one breath she had cheered the party and dared to equate Nazism with American patriotism.

So much for Miss Meyer's stay in Mississippi. It is bad enough that she could have voiced these sentiments without protest in an average American community. For not even in Germany today could she get away with openly praising Nazism—there are still some democratic Germans left, not to mention the victims of the Nazi regime. What was disturbing about the occasion was not so much Miss Meyer's address as the inability of the audience to see through it. They seemed to fall for her lip-service to democracy and utterly failed to comprehend the implications of her glib words. Surely our enemies speak in the name of democracy, peace, brotherhood, and some may even speak in the name of God. But in these perilous times we must be alert to distinguish between the genuine friend and the masked foe.

(Courtesy, "Congress Weekly")

"The release by Soviet authorities of ex-Marshal Schoerner, notorious Nazi war criminal, has aroused public indignation in Western Germany, where Schoerner is regarded, and probably rightly so, as the very type of the Nazi war criminal. The ex-marshal has settled in Munich and has put in a claim for a pension . . .

"Schoerner, a fanatic Hitlerite who was known as 'the terror of the Eastern front,' distinguished himself by his violence and brutality . . . He was wearing civilian clothes when captured, though he had condemned to death all German soldiers who had tried to stop resisting when the situation had grown hopeless.

"The indignation of the Germans is comprehensible and justifiable. However, there seems to be a contradiction in German public opinion. Its violent reaction in Schoerner's case seems to be due to the fact that he committed crimes against Germans; it would be difficult to find as much contempt and hostility toward military men or civilians who deliberately exterminated foreigners—that is, millions of Jews, Poles, Russians and others . . .

"Are we to conclude that, for the general public in Germany, war crimes are serious only when the victims are Germans, and that the extermination of non-Germans is of 'lesser importance'? I raise the question; I do not answer it. But I do admit that I have been struck by the difference in attitude.

(Henrik van Hoven, The World Veteran, 3-55)

"Chancellor Adenauer is back in Bonn, having reassured the U. S., France and Britain that so far as he is concerned, there is no country more solid than Germany in the Western camp.

"Der Alte is a hard bargainer and he knows what he wants for the good of Germany in a united Europe. In Washington, however, there are many fingers crossed. Suppose the German-Russian talks just amble along for the sake of appearances until Adenauer is no longer around to hold the line? What then is something the masterminds in Foggy Bottom, creators of the indispensable man in the indispensable country, haven't yet figured out."

(Theodore Kaghan, N .Y. Post, 6-20-55)

"What I like about Dulles is that he insists on having the best of both worlds—of the God of vengeance and the God of mercy. It is hard to catch him without a theologian's cap and a reference to the Man Upstairs, at the same time that he thunders about American atomic might.

"Thus, in asking Congress to accept the German rearmament treaty he referred to Europe as 'The Cradle of Christianity.' It was an unhappy reference, considering that it was a plea to rearm the German nation which had acted in a somewhat less than Christian way.

"It was also an unlucky stroke, considering that Christianity was actually cradled in the Middle East and may die—along with other religions—from something that may start in Asia."

(Max Lerner, N. Y. Post, 3-30-55)

On the Paris Agreements

A Pandora's box was opened when the U. S. Senate ratified the Paris Agreements granting Germany sovereignty and the right to rearm.

The Society was aware of the dangerous implications in these agreements and intended to have its spokesmen testify at length before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Unfortunately, the unusual haste with which the Senate proceeded to sanction these agreements, though they dealt with problems of major importance, precluded our testifying. Therefore, we submitted a letter to Senator George which summarized our views. This was inserted in the Testimony of the Hearings of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. (3-30-55)

In view of current developments with respect to Russo-German relations, we print below the text of this letter.

March 30, 1955

The Honorable Walter F. George
Chairman Senate Foreign Relations Committee
U. S. Senate Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator George:

In view of the crucial importance of the Paris Agreements in terms of American security, the Society submits herewith its views on this subject for the earnest consideration of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

1. At the outset, the Society takes this occasion to welcome your courageous and far-sighted declaration that the tools of diplomacy must be actively employed as the alternative to war. On the other hand, the Society believes that the efforts to achieve positive results through diplomatic negotiations may well be vitiated by hasty ratification of the Paris Agreements.

2. So far, our dollars and our diplomacy have strengthened Germany economically and politically. Now, under the Paris Agreements, we will reinvigorate Germany's military potential. In the process, we have given relative short shift to dependable allies whom we have forced into an uneasy alliance with their former oppressor.

3. Restoring Germany's power and uniting Western Europe simultaneously are irreconcilable concepts. As this fundamental contradiction deepens, the opportunities for Soviet machinations increase. Soviet propaganda has already exploited skilfully and effectively these incompatible policies. In Western Europe this propaganda raises the ominous spectre of German militarism while in Germany it revives the spirit of Tauroggen and Rapallo—symbols of Russo-German collaboration.

4. Despite the reaction to the ratification of the Paris Agreements, it is doubtful whether there is any justified grounds for optimism. Indeed, the consensus of expert opinion is that with the best of luck and cooperation, it will be from 3 to 5 years before 12 West German divisions can be organized. What would prevent Russia from overrunning West Germany before German armed forces are ready? As a matter of fact, it is highly doubtful whether only 12 German divisions added to NATO could appreciably weaken Russia's capabilities for invading Western Europe.

5. It is the considered judgment of the Society that Germany, at the present time, cannot be trusted as a dependable ally. Once Germany obtains full sovereignty, all prior commitments made by West German politicians become subject to abrogation. That Germany, if her interests so dictate, will repudiate the pledges of the present Chancellor or that he himself may do so, must be expected in the light of Germany's notorious record on that score. In this connection we respectfully draw your attention to the views of Chancellor Adenauer's legal adviser who declared that the Paris Agreements would become invalid and inapplicable after Germany's reunification. The New York Times (12-21-54, clipping attached herewith) reported:

"The view of the adviser, Prof. Wilhelm Grewe, can be taken as the authoritative opinion of the Chancellor and his most intimate political associates. It means that a reunified German state, automatically liberated from the obligations of the Federal Republic to the Western alliance, would be free to pursue any foreign policy it desired vis-a-vis the West and the East."

It is noteworthy that Prof Grewe's opinion was published in a special edition of the Federal Government's Official Bulletin (12-15-54).

6. To qualified students of German politics the unquestioning confidence reposed in the present German leadership by U. S. negotiators could place the United States in an untenable position. Is it not short-sighted to pursue a policy—embodied in the Paris Agreements—the success of which depends on the continued good health and popularity of a single—and a very aged German political leader? Thus, the ratification of the Paris Agreements may produce grave consequences. To use President Eisenhower's words while he was Chief of Staff after World War II:

"I do not think even this one savage defeat has destroyed their (Germany's) will for war when you consider their history."

7. Soviet Russia is apparently very anxious not to have West Germany rearmed as contemplated under the Paris Agreements. She may be willing to make concessions at the proposed Four Power Conference which may be of some value. She may be willing to prevail on Red China to avert armed conflict over Quemoy and Formosa. It is not possible to prophesy the course of events, but so long as it is within our power to confirm adherence to the Paris Agreements, then so long as these remain unconfirmed, at least for the immediate future, we would retain our bargaining power without shutting the door to a modus vivendi with Russia, if that should be possible. In short, we ought to retain the largest possible bargaining power for use at any future negotiations.

8. Haste in ratification of the Paris Agreements would impair our bargaining power without advancing our ultimate objectives. Because the foremost remaining aim of current German policy would then become the reunification of Germany, the ratification of the Paris Agreements (granting sovereignty and rearmament) may very well facilitate the reemergence of a Russo-German understanding at the expense of Western security and world peace.

Respectfully submitted,

SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF WORLD WAR III, INC.

Are We Men or Murderers?

by

NORMAN COUSINS

(Editor, The Saturday Review)

Something happened not long ago that made no headlines and was hardly even reported. In fact, it was all but lost in the flurry over Formosa. But it was as important as any single event in the past ten years. What happened was that the United States Government quietly repudiated its historic position under which heads of enemy governments at the end of the last war were killed or punished for the crime of war. Without benefit of national debate or a vote of Congress or even an explanation to the American people, the United States reversed itself on the principle of world law under which we had earlier declared that no nations but individuals make war and are therefore to be held accountable for war.

Before fixing our gaze on the incredible historic liability we have just incurred, let us review the background. Almost as significant as victory itself in World War II was the proclamation of a new principle, investing sovereignty in the community of nations as a whole. Under this principle it was decreed that war was a crime by individuals against the world community. Accordingly, eminent jurists from the victorious nations came together in a Four-Power Tribunal to define the principles of world law under which individuals were to be tried. Hundreds of political and military leaders from the Axis powers were arraigned, tried, sentenced, and punished. The indictment drawn up against the inner Nazi circle, for example, charged twenty-two men with (1) participating in a conspiracy to commit crime against the peace and against humanity, (2) planning and executing a war of aggression, (3) violating the rules of warfare by mistreatment of civilians and prisoners of war, (4) murdering and enslaving people because of race, religion, or political belief.

The Tribunal condemned twelve high-ranking Nazis to death by hanging. Seven were sentenced to long prison terms; three were set free. Subsequently, acting under these precedents, and with prosecutors from the Allied nations, other trials were held. The final score was 456 death sentences and 1,112 convictions with lesser penalties. In Japan, acting under the same legal sanctions, the United States tried twenty-eight Japanese war leaders, executing seven and imprisoning eighteen.

Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson, who headed the American staff of jurists participating in the Nuremberg trials, made it clear that this country was not using the forms of legality as a cloak for vengeance. Even though there was no government of the whole to represent the human community, the community existed and possessed certain basic rights. When these rights were violated it became the responsibility of that community not only to protect itself but to invoke the mechanism of legality at its disposal against the criminals. Individuals who operated or governed aggressive nations could not escape responsibility by pretending to be merely the agents of those nations. Their decisions were the ones that led to the crimes.

Seldom in human history had there been anything as epochal as the definition and application of these principles. In essence, they laid down the basis for world law. They also made implicit the need to create a constitutional basis for the community of nations in order to enable it to deal with world criminals before and not after the damage was done. In any event, we had made certain specific commitments to basic legal and moral principle from which we could not depart without becoming world criminals ourselves. For if the decisions that were to send more than a thousand human beings to their death were to be undone, we would stand condemned under the very statutes we invoked to condemn others.

To repeat, the big challenge after the Nuremberg trials was to incorporate its basic provisions into the Charter and structure of the United Nations, which was vested with the responsibility for keeping world law and order. This meant that the Nuremberg principles would have to be codified and given the full machinery of implementation. Since aggression did not disappear with the end of World War II and since, indeed, it became essential to create within the shortest possible time the adequate means to safeguard world peace, the principles of the Nuremberg Trials offered a magnificently prepared ground on which to build. If a human community did in fact exist, and if there were threats to that community, then Nuremberg represented both a mandate and a fixed need.

However, the work of drafting a code based on the Nuremberg principles went slowly in the councils of the United Nations. Finally, the issue recently came before the General Assembly of the United Nations and a preliminary decision had to be made. It was at this point that the United States opposed the arguments of the representative from the Netherlands. On November 17, 1954, Charles H. Mahoney, U. S. Representative, explained the American position. There was nothing ambiguous about our statement, nothing which would enable us to avoid the condemnation of history. What we said, in so many words, was that the United States Government did not wish to subject its citizens to "those regular and continuing processes of investigation, prosecution, and trial by international agencies which would be necessary for real enforcement of an international criminal code." We also said officially that "the project for a code of crimes under international law in today's world is impractical and inappropriate."

Impractical? Is it more practical to wait until a billion human lives are expunged before we decide that something ought to be done about the principle of individual responsibility? Is it practical to construct an elaborate legal mechanism in the name of justice and then to turn away from it when it fails to serve our purpose? Inappropriate? Is there anything more inappropriate than to be guilty of a double standard in the eyes of history, seeking immunity from the very legality we solemnly impose upon others? There is an equally important question that concerns Supreme Court Justice Jackson and the able corps of American jurists who worked with him at Nuremberg. Have we by our action before the United Nations converted them into murderers? If the legal basis of their work is to be dissolved, what status are they to occupy in history?

Ever since the United Nations was founded, American delegates to the United Nations have chafed under the frequent use of the veto by Soviet Russia in the Security Council. But not once have we reminded the world that we ourselves proposed the veto. Nor have we ourselves proposed that the veto be replaced with binding obligations—on us as well as everyone else. Similarly, we have made dramatic postures against aggressors and world criminals but when the hard question of individual responsibility actually comes up we ourselves have run for cover. Most perplexing of all is the presumption of our Delegation in saying that the American people are not ready for the measures that are an organic part of world law and therefore world security. Has the question been put to our people? Has there been a national debate? How does the Delegation know?

Is it possible that the American Delegation to the U. N. is more concerned over the probable attacks by certain Senators who fear world commitments than they are over the moral and historic significance of their reversal of Nuremberg? It is undoubtedly true that some Senators will shout to the skies against the creation of a higher sovereignty. That is their right. But it is also the right and privilege of the Government to take the fight to the people.

The American Delegation to the U. N. has put the American people on the spot. Whether we get off it or not depends on whether the American people will allow their name to be used lightly in the world, even by their own government.

"In the struggle ahead unity of approach by France, Britain and the United States is of primary importance. And there is one difference between London and Washington that could have important repercussions in relation to the big four conference in Germany. Secretary of State Dulles' repeated remarks about the necessity to bargain for a changed status for the satellite states causes a certain uneasiness in the British foreign office. It is feared here that any proposal for 'freeing' the satellites in eastern Europe of Russian control will bring a counterproposal with respect to Germany.

"And when it comes to bargaining, Adenauer has close at his elbow some shrewd and resourceful diplomats who are prepared to take part in this game of power politics . . .

"One may be sure that for all of Adenauer's fine speeches and sincere protestations of loyalty these diplomats in the immediate background will be determined to get all they can for Germany from both sides . . .

"So the lines are being sharpened, and the German people, so lately denounced, despised and condemned, find themselves smiled upon and flattered from the east and the west. Whether this rivalry will ultimately mean peace or war the coming months may well determine."

(Marquis W. Childs, Newsday, 6-13-55)

". . . There is a line of thought common among the German people that predates by hundreds of years the 'master race' theory of the Nazis. It views all Slaves as primitive and the Russians as the most uncivilized.

"In contrast to this is another tradition of thought known as the 'Tauroggen complex,' which stems from the alliance formed with the Russians at Tauroggen when Prussia languished under the heel of the Napoleonic occupation. It led to the liberation of Prussia and Prussia's regeneration as a modern state.

"Thus was born the idea that any successful foreign policy must be based on an alliance with the Colossus to the East.

"This point of view had strong adherents in the German General Staff. It was reflected in the Treaty of Rapallo when the two outcasts, Germany and Soviet Russia, banded together in 1922, and in the Hitler-Stalin pact of 1939. In the postwar years, the Russians have done their best to cultivate the remnants of this attitude.

"Emissaries have been sent quietly from East Germany to make contact with former generals in Bavaria and political leaders in Bonn considered susceptible to such wooing. Last year's defection into the east of Dr. Otto John, head of the West German internal security organization, probably was linked with this effort . . ."

"WE MADE THE KAISER—THE KAISER FLOPPED. WE MADE HITLER—HITLER FLOPPED. WE NOW WILL HAVE TO MAKE DEMOCRACY AND AGAIN LIBERATE THE GERMAN PEOPLE."

The Mannesmann Saga

In the summer of 1905 the Port of Tangier, Morocco, was the scene of an unusual event. Amidst much fanfare, stimulated by skilled propagandists, His August Majesty, Kaiser Wilhelm II, debarked from his warship to announce to the world that the day of Germandom was at hand. In a bristling speech, punctuated with aggressive threats, the Kaiser asserted, "We are the salt of the earth . . . God has created us so that we should civilize the world."

Needless to say, the Kaiser's belligerent boasts made the newspaper headlines and the so-called Moroccan crisis was on in full fury. Historians tell us that the Moroccan crisis was an important contributing factor to the growing tensions preceding the outbreak of World War I. It is also a fact that behind the Kaiser's dramatics lurked powerful predatory interests coveting the mineral resources of North Africa. The industrial war lords of the Ruhr were resolved to throw out the French—no matter how. Consequently, the Kaiser's show was merely a coverup. In reality the Kaiser was performing the services of a travelling salesman from the Ruhr.

Stranger Than Fiction

Among the powerful interests for whom the Kaiser fronted in Morocco, were the Mannesmann Works whose main specialty is the manufacture of steel tubing. The Mannesman story is indeed stranger than fiction. Mannesmann power thrived during the two world wars and survived the hazards of peace and defeat. Mannesmann outlived the trappings of monarchy, republicanism and dictatorship, although in each case it found conditions congenial to its worldwide ambitions.

From the time it was founded by the brothers Max and Reinhard Mannesmann in 1890 the Mannesmann interests worked closely with the Kaiser. This cooperation was maintained when in the first decade of the 20th century, the Mannesmann works came under the control of Germany's most powerful banking monopoly, the Deutsche Bank.

Thus, the Kaiser's junket to Morocco received the blessings of the Mannesmann interests which sought to lay hands on the iron ore riches of North Africa. It turned out that the high pressure salesmanship of the Kaiser fizzled and when that occurred it was not long before German troops were goose stepping their way to the French border.

As was the case with other powerful industrial interests, Mannesmann spared no effort toward preserving and reinvigorating Germany's industrial war potential following World War I. In this connection, Mannesmann worked jointly with the Vereinigte Stahlwerke to capture and control the international steel tube cartel. Indeed, through this cartel Mannesmann became so powerful that it was in a position to dictate its own terms to American producers of steel tubes.

Nazi Rewards

Under the direction of the Deutsche Bank, Mannesmann's influence and power became world wide. The ultimate objective of the Mannesmann combine was the complete ownership and/or control of the world's tube production facilities. The Mannesmann Works had benefited considerably under the Weimar Republic, but those in control of this monopoly felt that democracy had its limitations. That is why its leaders were particularly interested in securing Hitler's victory. They were convinced that Hitler had much more to offer in the way of realizing Mannesmann's ambitions. Therefore, the Mannesmann combine was most cooperative in furthering the cause of Nazism between 1933-1939. The Mannesmann Works were very active in the distribution of Nazi propaganda abroad. Utilizing its world wide connections, the Mannesmann interests performed invaluable intelligence and espionage services for Hitler.

Mannesmann's reward for services rendered came after the outbreak of World War II. With the help of Nazi bayonets, Mannesmann agents began to loot the occupied countries of Europe and in the process seized practically all of the tube making facilities. This was in keeping with the plan which the Mannesmann interests had outlined in 1939 envisaging the seizure of the tube industries in Holland, Luxembourg, France, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland.

Because of the favorite position the Mannesmann Works enjoyed among the Nazi bigwigs, the plan went through without any serious obstacles. Thus, in Rumania the management of the Mannesmann Works cooperated on close terms with the head of the Gestapo, Himmler and it was through Himmler that Mannesmann was able to seize control of the important Rumanian steel production unit, the Titan Nadrag Callan.

Mannesmann made enormous profits from the employment of slave labor provided by Hitler's SS. Allied investigators uncovered records attesting to the fact that the Nazi Government allocated more than 10,000 slave laborers to man the company's plants during the war.

To sum up, Mannesmann's close ties with the Nazis were most rewarding. Production at Mannesmann had tripled between the years 1926-1943 and at the end of World War II the Mannesmann combine controlled 140 companies both in Germany and abroad.

Across the Atlantic

Mannesmann had made significant progress in capturing the steel tube markets in the Western hemisphere. As early as 1908 it established the Sociedad Tubos Mannesmann Ltd. in Buenos Aires, Argentina. It is interesting to note that the Mannesmann properties in Argentina escaped confiscation during World War I because the manager of the properties, one Max Pahlke, had succeeded in acquiring Argentine citizenship. Herr Pahlke performed the same services during World War II. In Chile and in Brazil Mannesmann representatives carried out important assignments for Nazi intelligence during World War II. The United States too was involved in the Mannesmann espionage network. Its chief agent in the United States during World War II was Gerhard Wagner. Herr Wagner, like other Mannesmann agents, wore two hats. He not only served Mannesmann business interests but also performed "valuable services for the intelligence service of the German High Command by transmitting blueprints and other details of machinery orders for war plant in the U. S. on which Mannesmann's American agency submitted bids." This statement is taken from the book "All Honorable Men" by James Stewart Martin, former Chief of the Decartelization Branch of the Military Government in Germany. Mr. Martin writes, "copies of letters from the High Command and blueprints and reports from Wagner were attached as appendices in order to convince the Economics Ministry that it was desirable to keep this channel open even at the expense of using some of the precious dollars which the German government wanted to hoard."

Zangen and Rasch

Since 1934 the leading figure of the Mannesmann combine was Wilhelm Zangen. He joined the Nazi Party in 1930. Zangen had been appointed to take over Mannesmann by the Deutsche Bank and because of his intimate ties with the Nazis he was able to combine his business activities with his duties as a loyal supporter of Hitler. Zangen was a close friend of Himmler and was one of Hitler's mainstays in providing funds for the Party. He had been a charter member of the so-called "Keppler circle" consisting of powerful German industrialists whose main task it was to keep Nazi finances in the black.

In 1938 the Nazi government appointed Herr Zangen chairman of the top organization for mobilizing the German economy on a war basis. As a result, when the war broke out, Mannesmann was in a strategic position to increase its power at the expense of its competitors both in Germany and in those nations that were to lay prostrate under the Nazi heel. This, of course, was in keeping with the reputation of the Deutsche Bank under whose direction Zangen operated.

The criminal role of the Mannesmann interests was recognized by the Allied authorities and therefore this combine was designated as one of the major steel monopolies to be deconcentrated and decartelized. But while Allied policy called for the breaking up of this monopoly, Mannesmann agents were able to gain influential positions in connection with the shaping of Allied policy in Germany. This scandalous situation was exposed in detail in the February-March 1947 issue of Prevent World War III under the title "The Mannesmann Combine." As early as 1947 a Mannesmann agent, Dr. Harold Rasch, became the guiding spirit behind the so-called Executive Committee on Economics, a German setup which decisively influenced Allied bizonal economic policy. Dr. Rasch was one of Herr Zangen's trusted lieutenants who had administered steel plants in Czechoslovakia seized by the Nazis. Dr. Rasch's record was well known to Allied authorities, yet, his advice had an important influence on determining Allied economic policy.

Decartelization in Reverse

Perhaps the latest information will provide our readers with an idea as to the success of Dr. Rasch's efforts. According to the New York Times (12-28-54) Mannesmann announced "its remerger with two sister companies made independent only last year under the Allied decartelization program." The two companies involved in the fusion are the "Consolidation Bergbau" of Gelsenkirchen and "Stahlindustrie & Maschinenbau" of Düsseldorf. Mannesmann is now larger than it was before. This is the verdict of the Manchester Guardian (2-24-55). The Guardian states that "the Mannesmann trust controls a production of 6 million tons of coal and 1.4 million tons of steel a year." In contrast, Mannesmann under Hitler produced 1.1 million tons of steel. Not only has Mannesmann gained more power than it had before the end of the war, but there is a plan afoot to once again revive the steel tube cartel under the aegis of Mannesmann and the reconcentrated units of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke.

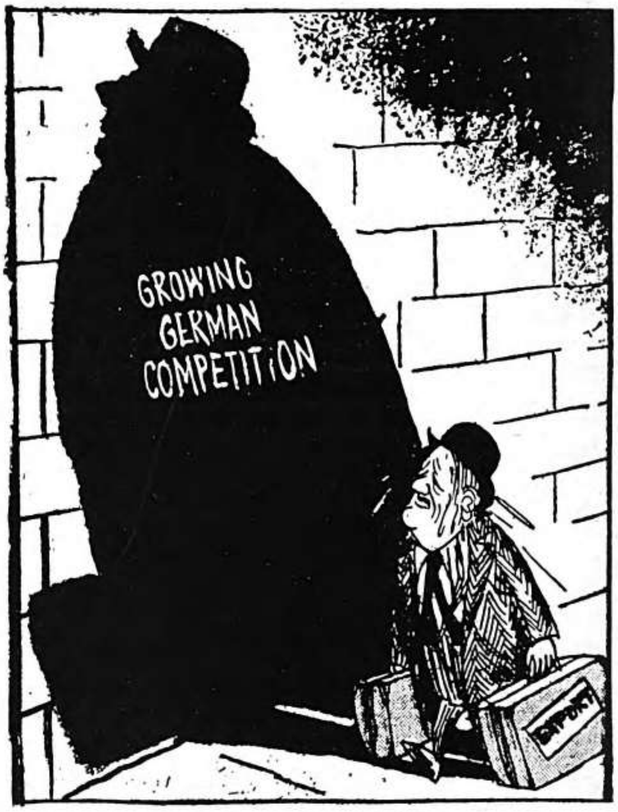
It should be noted that the High Authority of the Schuman Plan gave its blessings to the reconcentration plans of Mannesmann. The conversion offered to share holders of Consolidation Bergbau and Stamag are very attractive. A leading Mannesmann official boasted that the share holders of the two companies would receive more substantial dividends under the plan for reconcentration than they had had so far. This top official went on to paint a very promising picture for Mannesmann's future. He stated that the days of deconcentration and decartelization were over. "We have entered the final phase of the so-called dismemberment, in our case a redismemberment."

By including a mining company which formerly belonged to the Flick interests, Mannesmann's power will even be greater. According to the Rheinischer Merkur (1-14-55), "the Mannesmann concern has at its disposal a decidedly broader coal basis than before the war and is in a position to even expand the combine."

The Mannesmann official who boasted about the restoration of Mannesmann's power was none other than Wilhelm Zangen. He, like his firm, managed to survive the early postwar period and to once again appear on the scene as the Chairman of the Board of Directors of Mannesmann A. G. The work of his trusted assistant Herr Rasch, was not in vain.

Valuable Friends

Yet all of the credit for the rebirth of the Mannesmann combine does not go to the efforts of Zangen and Rasch. They



'LIFE OR DEATH OF A SALESMAN'
(Vicky in The London Daily Mirror)

found understanding friends among Allied officials who had been entrusted with the task of breaking up Mannesmann. These friendships paid off handsomely. It appears that among those who worked diligently on behalf of the Mannesmann interests was the J. Henry Schroeder banking house of New York. This private bank has had a long record of close cooperation with pro-Nazi circles in Germany. During the war and immediately thereafter the Schroeder banking house managed to place its high officials in strategic positions where they could keep in touch with the situation in Germany. According to "La Tribune Des Nations," Paris (7-23-54), the Schroeder banking house of New York played a decisive role in protecting the Mannesmann interests. Of course, such activities by the Schroeder banking house were in flagrant violation, at least in spirit, of the Allied decartelization laws. But the Schroeders had the right men in the right places. This must have helped no little in obtaining the necessary assurances that the Mannesmann reconcentration plans would not be opposed. In this connection La Tribune Des Nations states, "It is permissible to conclude that the American law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell (to which Mr. John Foster Dulles belonged) which defends the interests of the Schroeder banking house in New York, has played an appreciable role in the matter."

This story would not be complete without a few words on the status of the Mannesmann interests in the United States. In our previous study of the Mannesmann combine it was pointed out that the Maschinenfabrik Meer, another company connected with the tube industry, was controlled by the Mannesmann Works. The combination of the two exercised a profound influence over the machines supplied to or withheld from its domestic or foreign competitors. It was predicted that if this combination were restored, it would once again place a stranglehold on the tube making industry, not only in Germany but abroad including the U. S. A. In August 1953, the New York Times carried a small item tucked away in its Financial Section. It read in part: "Mannesmann Works and Maschinenfabrik Meer A. G. of Germany have formed a company in Easton, Pennsylvania . . . A full line of seamless tube mill machinery, hydraulic equipment and special mill machinery for the metal industry will be offered by the new company."

Perhaps readers of this article are curious to know the fate of Dr. Gerhard Wagner, the man who represented the Mannesmann interests in the U. S. and provided the Nazi High Command with intelligence material during World War II. According to the New York Times announcement, Wagner was named President of the new Mannesmann-Meer Engineering and Construction Company, Easton, Pa. He maintains a suite of offices in downtown New York.

". . . There are those who look upon any German visit to Moscow with the pessimism of no confidence, and there are optimists who think it's perfectly alright and no real harm can come of it. There are armchair tacticians who already see the German army aborted and lost to us, and there are careful people with memories who think maybe that wouldn't be so bad, particularly if peace resulted.

"What our peerless leaders see in their crystal balls beyond faith in an old man of almost 80 doesn't come through clearly. What happens to Mr. Dulles' plans for Germany when Adenauer isn't running the place is something we don't hear much about, and there are some people who think that's because nobody in Washington really knows."

(Theodore Kaghan, N. Y. Post, 6-9-55)

"Never before has a bombed-out, defeated and despised nation risen so far and so fast as Germany, which regains sovereignty today 10 years after the Nazi armies began unconditional surrender . . .

"Despite her new democratic political institutions, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's leadership and the people's genuine desire to live down the Nazi past, most social institutions and ways still essentially are authoritarian . . .

"The future danger is not from the present new-Nazi elements, but from a new form of chauvinistic patriotism, inflamed by another demagog, supported as before by big business, and followed by an emotional mass which still obey too automatically . . ."

(Ludwell Denny, N. Y. World-Telegram & Sun, 5-5-55)

". . . Bled to exhaustion by Hitler's goose-stepping locusts who converted the whole of France into a national prison-camp which they labelled 'occupation,' the people of France secretly nursed the hope for liberation; secretly worked for it, and heroically fought for it in the underground. We are apt to forget that in the first months of World War II, France suffered nearly a million casualties!

"To understand present-day French progress, we should remember that Hitler's retreating hordes blew up and laid waste enormous French areas. In bridges alone they destroyed a total of 2,800. Their calling card was occupation; their 'thank you' note was destruction.

". . . Significantly, all the moneys given to France by the United States since 1946, every dollar and more, in a budgetary sense, was spent by the French Government in pursuit of a war against communists in southeast Asia. This meant that while other countries of free Europe—foremost among them Germany, our deadly enemy of World War II—received billions of American dollars in reconstruction aid, the French people were obliged to rebuild a weakened and ravaged France with their own depleted resources, their own toil and sweat. Little wonder that their standard of living fell dangerously low, to the delight of the communist-vultures . . ."

Ten Years After

by
ARNOLD J. TOYNBEE

In looking back at World War II, for instance, we Westerners might be tempted to ask ourselves: "What was the sense of putting ourselves through this awful war in order to hoist communism into the saddle over half the world?" And, vice versa, the Communists, I suppose, might be tempted to ask themselves: "What was the sense of going through it in order to leave capitalism still in power in half the world?" On both the present sides, such questions are, perhaps, natural. All the same, they are also unrealistic unless both liberals and Communists ask themselves in the same breath: "What was the sense of putting ourselves through it in order to save the whole world, present liberals and present Communist halves alike, from being conquered by the Nazis?"

The point is that, in the circumstances of our time, we could not have put down Hitler without consequently producing the situation with which all of us now find ourselves confronted. It is hardly worth saying that this is a situation that pleases none of us on either side of the Iron Curtain. But the pertinent question is: "Do we find our present plight more unpleasant, or less unpleasant, than that other plight in which we all should now be finding ourselves if the Nazis had won the war?"

When the question is asked, as all practical questions ought to be, in this form of alternative choices, I, for one, have no doubt about my own answer. I dislike our present plight less than I should have disliked being under Nazi rule. And, in this sense, I feel that the cost of World War II has been worth while, even when we have added the cost of the war's present consequences to the cost of its horrors while it was being fought. . . .

Well, I believe myself that World War II did settle three things: first, that the world should not be unified politically through being conquered by the Nazis; second, that it is going to be unified politically in some other way (maybe better or maybe still worse) sooner or later; third, that if it were to be unified through the fighting of a third world war, this world war III would be infinitely more terrible than either of its two predecessors, because it would be fought with atomic weapons. Let us take a look at each of these three points.

A Nazi World

If World War II had not been fought and won by the Western powers and the Soviet Union through their combined efforts, the Nazis would have conquered the world. Perhaps this proposition sounds less convincing to Americans than it does to Britons, who were so very nearly conquered, or to Russians, who were half-conquered, or to Continental Europeans, who were wholly conquered till they were liberated from overseas with the cooperation of their own resistance movements.

Nevertheless, I believe this is the truth. I believe that, today, the whole world would have been in Hitler's power if Britain and France had not gone to war with the Third Reich over her attack on Poland, and if, after that, Hitler had not made war on the Soviet Union, and if Japan had not made war on the United States.

If there had been no World War II, or if there had been one in which the Third Reich, instead of being destroyed, had not only made the vast conquests that it did make during the war, but had retained the greater part of these in a peace settlement, I believe that then, in either event, Hitler would eventually have made himself master of the whole world.

This is almost indisputable, I should say, on the second of the two alternatives that I have just suggested. For a World War II ending in a Nazi victory that left the United States, the British Commonwealth and the Soviet Union still in being as nominally independent powers would really have left all three, including the United States, at Hitler's mercy.

They would have been at his mercy for two reasons. One is that the war potential of Continental Europe, if organized and mobilized in peacetime, is a factor that could tip the balance of world power. We in the West are well aware of this today. It is the reason why we have rearmed in order to relieve the Soviet Union of a possible temptation to occupy Western Continental Europe and thereby win for itself what might be a decisive preponderance of power in the world as a whole.

Conquest Through Peace

The second reason why, if Hitler had retained his wartime Continental European conquests, this would have enabled him to move forward to world dominion is that, through holding Continental Europe in a post-war period of nominal peace, he would have gained control over the Continental European powers' colonial possessions and naval and air bases overseas, and, when we add up the French, Dutch, Belgian, Italian, and also the Portuguese and Spanish overseas possessions, as these then were, we see that they amount to a world-wide network of strong points that is not incomparable to the network that the NATO countries, between them, hold today.

Winding his coils tighter and tighter around French Africa, Hitler would eventually have struck at the New World across the Atlantic between the westernmost bulge of Africa and the easternmost bulge of Brazil. I feel sure that he would have conjured up strong enough "fifth columns" in numerous enough Latin-American countries to be able to prize away the whole of Latin America from its traditional association with the United States; and then, one day, you would have waked up in New York to hear that Hitler's advance guards were poised on the Mexican bank of the Rio Grande.

What would the United States have been doing meanwhile, and what would she have done then? Do you know the answer yourselves? I do not know it, but my guess is that, in these formidable circumstances that were ruled out of possible realization by Hitler's overthrow, the United States might not have made up her mind to act until her only choice had become one between surrender and an inevitable overwhelming defeat.

Those Twelve German Divisions

by

R. H. CROSSMAN

"The ingratitude of these damned Germans! I shall never trust them again." The place where this was said to me was Königswinter. The occasion was the Conference of the Anglo-German Asociation, where a representative collection of British and German politicians and journalists meet annually to discuss world affairs, and always end by discussing German rearmament. The speaker was a well-known Labour M.P.—a no-nonsense supporter of German rearmament — who has often bluntly told the Commons that, since the French are hopeless, we must forget old scores and trust the Germans as our allies in defence of Western civilisation. That kind of speech still goes down at Westminster, and would have been applauded by our German hosts at Königswinter even twelve months ago.

But this year, throughout the Federal Republic, the wintry climate of cold war has suddenly changed and German loyalty to Nato is breaking up like an ice-floe in Spring. No wonder the British M.P.s, who believed that Western Germany had been safely frozen into the West, were shocked by what they heard and saw at Königswinter. Editors of staunchly anti-Socialist newspapers, Right-wing Generals, even members of Dr. Adenauer's Coalition were all thawing out of their rigid Western orientation, stretching themselves in the Spring sunshine and turning grateful eyes eastwards towards Moscow, whence Dr. Raab had just returned to Vienna, loaded with concessions.

I can see why my colleague was so angry. How bitter to have backed the wrong horse in Bonn! How bitter to be forced to admit that, in opposing German rearmament and warning us against the attempt to integrate the Federal Republic into Nato, Erich Ollenhauer, the Socialist leader, has shown more responsibility than his detractors! If we had taken his advice, Britain—or at least the Labour Party—would long ago have put forward a plan for German neutralisation with adequate safeguards—and so forestalled the Russian peace offensive. As it is, while Mr. Molotov presents himself as the benign protagonist of peaceful co-existence, the Western Powers appear in German eyes to be preventing German unity and rearming Western Germany to suit the convenience of their own nuclear strategy.

Until this Spring, Germans had only been shown the advantages of the Paris Agreements — the restoration of sovereignty which they bring, and the lavish dollar assistance. But now the discussion has moved from an abstract debate about the pros and cons of German rearmament towards more concrete and disturbing problems.

What sort of Army will it be? How will it defend Germany? How will it be fitted into the military headquarters at S.H.A.P.E. and the political headquarters at Nato? When German rearmament is studied in this way, the idea of being integrated into the West soon loses its attractions, and the argument for neutralisation gains in force.

Let us face the problem in German terms. Nato strategy assumes that the first phase of a European war will be an offensive by 70 crack Russian divisions, to which the only possible answer will be a fighting withdrawal of Nato's ground troops to the Rhine, while the offensive is broken up by nuclear bombardment of the Russian lines of communication through the Eastern Zone. Thus, Eastern Germany will at once be vaporised, and the Federal Republic will become a battlefield, exposed to Russian nuclear retaliation. The military integrations of the Federal Republic into Nato certainly strengthens the shield protecting Britain and America, but it is difficult to show what protection it gives to the Federal Republic.

Until quite recently, this problem was only discussed on a technical level inside the Shadow Defence Ministry in Bonn. Now, as the result of the dismissal of Colonel von Bonin, it has become a first-rate political issue. Von Bonin is an extremely handsome Prussian Junker of 48, who ended the war as Guderian's Chief of Operations and obtained a high position in the Shadow Defence Ministry under General von Speidel (Rommel's No. 2).

Last July, after a trip to America, where he was much impressed by the new anti-tank gun, he submitted a Memorandum on the role of a German Army and, finding that he was getting nowhere with it, began to intrigue with Generals outside the Ministry. Last month he was sacked, and immediately published the Memorandum in Der Spiegel.

The first part deals with the call-up. Von Bonin believes that, since there has been no military training for ten years, the idea of building the twelve divisions in 24 months is absurd. In his view, it will take four years at least to train the 150,000 volunteers for the cadres and another three years to recruit the 350,000 conscripts. "The whole German working class is terribly anti-militarist," he said to me. "If you rush it and train the cadres and the conscripts together, you just won't get an Army." This may be true, but I suspect that what he really wants is to follow van Seeckt's example in the 1920s and build up an élite of long-term officers and N. C. O.s, which can re-establish the Prussian tradition. On this issue he will get little popular support.

It is the section of the Memorandum dealing with strategy which has caused the sensation. Von Bonin repudiates General Gruenther's strategy of planned withdrawal. Instead, he proposes that the Nato divisions be kept in reserve, West of the Rhine. The newly constituted German Army should have the sole responsibility for holding the forward areas while General Gruenther's divisions get ready for the counter-offensive. It should consist of small, highly mobile Sperrverbände ("block units"), mainly equipped with anti-tank guns and defending in depth a 50 kilometre strip all along the Zonal frontier. "Ours," he said, "would be what the French call an armée de couverture, a purely defensive force, which by its very structure could not undertake offensive operations and which would, for this reason, convince the Russians of our peaceful aims."

I asked him the obvious question why British or American units should not be trained to take part in this frontier defence. "The idea shocks me," he said. "This is Germany, and it should be Germans who defend the frontier." And he added that, if his armée de couverture had been proposed to the French when E.D.C. was being discussed, he was sure that they would not have turned it down. "Of course I was in favour of E.D.C. when it was first proposed. After all, we were all overshadowed by the thought of Korea in 1950 and the fear that it might be repeated in Europe. We had to accept whatever we could get at that time. But now we must consider most the defence of our own country and the possibility of ending the partition of it. If we have the kind of German Army I want—one which has not been integrated into Nato—there will be no obstacle on our side in the way of neutralisation if the Russians agree to it."

"But do you think the Russians ever will agree?" I asked. "Of course, my mind says they will never retire from Eastern Germany," he replied. "Why should they? But we must try." He went on to outline a plan for Bündnislosigkeit, which he agreed was closely similar to the neutralisation of the Low Countries and Belgium before 1914. The frontiers of a united Germany should be guaranteed by the Western and Eastern powers and it should be permitted an army for self-defence. "Suppose the Russians agree?" I asked, "What would you do about the People's Police in the Eastern Zone?" "We'd take them over," he said, "as part of the united German Army"; and when I showed some surprise, he remarked: "After all, that would be a minor problem compared with the nationalised industries, the education system and all the other changes carried out by the Communists in the Eastern Zone. If we can manage to merge East and West Germany on all these social and economic levels, then surely the problem of the People's Police is a minor one. The fact is, we haven't much time," he said. "If we are forced to wait ten years they will have Communised the youth of the Eastern Zone, and then it will be too late. That is why we must get unification quickly and permit nothing to be done by way of military integration with the West which could impede it. We must make the Russians an honest offer soon." "And what if that offer is rejected?" I said. "Then we will have to accept Nato integration," he replied, "and see Europe turned into another Korea and Germany permanently divided, unless there is another war. But that is too dreadful to contemplate. We must succeed."

The publication of von Bonin's Memorandum has, for the first time, confronted German public opinion with the appalling dilemma implicit in the Paris Treaty. He himself struck me as the best and most dangerous type of Junker, an ambitious, patriotic officer, who would stick at nothing in order to re-create the German State in the authoritarian Prussian image; and I am not surprised that the Social Democrats, though they may agree with some of his strategic ideas, have been careful not to identify themselves politically with him. Indeed, what is important is not his row with the Shadow Defence Ministry but the public debate that it has caused.

Dr. Adenauer, of course, still adheres tenaciously to the policy of Western integration, and I was told by one of his chief lieutenants that there should be no negotiations with Russia until that integration has gone so far that it cannot be reversed. Such a view may be acceptable to Rhineland or Bavarian Catholics, whose dislike of Prussia outweighs their German nationalism. But it would be most unwise to make Western policy and strategy dependent on political forces which will soon be regarded as separist by the majority of Germans. "We can't have a C.D.U. Army," von Bonin said to me scornfully. "It must be a German Army, serving German national interests."

There he spoke not only for his own narrow caste, but for the millions who have supported the Socialist opposition to the Paris Treaty. If their demand for neutralisation is brushed aside on Dr. Adenauer's advice, the Western powers may succeed in integrating the Federal Republic into Nato and raising twelve German divisions. But those divisions will soon be as militarily valueless and politically unreliable as the People's Police of the Eastern Zone. Then, sooner or later, someone will stage a Nationalist coup d'état in Bonn, accept an invitation to Moscow, and return to be greeted with tumultuous applause as the liberator of his country.

"Report on European Mission"

by
GENERAL JULIUS KLEIN

In the early winter of last year, General Julius Klein submitted a report on his European Mission to a Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, U. S. Senate. As Special Consultant, General Klein was assigned the task of investigating conditions in Europe. General Klein's findings, based on his on the spot investigations, are a valuable contribution to a better understanding of the problems confronting American policy. Of particular significance was his analysis of the situation in Germany, excerpts of which we have reprinted below.

German cooperation with American foreign policy has not been a matter of choice. It was inevitable. As an unequal, Germany could not measure her diplomatic muscles against those of other European countries. In search of a "big brother" to protect her, Germany naturally found the United States of America to be most suitable for the role. A German foreign policy closely coordinated with, and dominated by, a European nation would in effect mean subordination to that nation. A German policy in compliance with American policy did not imply the same, for America is generous and far away.

In essence, this has been the basic thesis of the Bonn policy. In reality, few have thus far questioned the soundness of this principle. Hardly anyone (with the possible exception of the Communists and the extremists of the right) advocates today an anti-American policy, or, for that matter, a policy which would disregard American wishes. The opposition, that is the Social Democrats and elements in the Government parties who have recently called for some changes in policy, do not ask for a weakening of the ties with Washington. What they say they want is more diplomatic elbow room in the east.

Some segments of the German population are questioning, however, the wisdom of America's policy. Outwardly this questioning bears the appearance of a search for information. It may lead eventually to some forms of criticism of American policies, but so far it has not assumed such forms. There are several reasons for this behavior:

(a) Instinctively Germany feels that before she can start deviating from a dominant diplomatic course, she must achieve equality. It is no secret that German political leaders believe that only the United States could raise them to par. Aside, therefore, from economic considerations, German allegiance to Washington is conditioned by her position in the so-called family of nations. With her increasing independence and sovereignty, she is becoming more and more aware of her own interests. The stronger she grows, the less she needs United States support, and the more she is conscious of her interests which conflict with those of the United States.

(b) Germany never really has felt secure in Europe. After 1945, many in Germany sincerely desired a united Europe. But it is easier for Germans to become good Europeans in a political melting pot than to become good neighbors with a given European country. The United States gave Germany a feeling of security against what she considered the anti-German feeling in Europe.

(c) Germany, that is the Federal Republic, needed some protection against the Communist world. It is not to be forgotten that the Germany of 1949 was a frail being. She needed not only political introductions to foreign nations, she also needed economic aid. Above all, she required political security to make her impervious to eastern ideologies and to enable the regime to complete the restorationist policies it had begun to put into effect during the bizonal days. Only the United States could give this necessary protection.

In short, German allegiance to United States foreign policy did not stem from the conviction that such policy is right or correct but from a belief that Germany must find a strong enough protector among its occupiers to defend her against the demands of the other occupiers. It stems also from the belief that for a weak nation it is better to ally herself with a strong one, preferably the strongest.

While the Germans might have become America's favorite Europeans, they did not cease to be Europeans, although there is some doubt whether they have become Western Europeans in the real sense of the word. Though many (including the Chancellor) are devoted to the idea of European integration, it would be unwise to argue that Germany as a whole, or even that the majority of the Germans, actively desire a united Europe. It is no secret that to many, consciously or unconsciously, a united Europe concept has represented merely a shortcut to equality. After all Germany's deposit in an integrated Europe would have amounted to no more than a deficit sovereignty. To many, therefore, both the allegiance to United States policy and the devotion to European integration, have been no more than tactical moves to improve Germany's, rather than Europe's, position.

German Relations with the Soviet Union

The current tendencies, therefore, for ties with Russia are the results of the following:

(1) Germany has grown sufficiently to take a bolder look at the world around her. After all, the Western European countries (with the exception of Spain and the Vatican) maintain diplomatic relations with Russia.

(2) There is a feeling that American interests in Europe, and therefore American strength in Europe, is decreasing. Germany feels that she is not strong enough, at least now, to deal with Russia. Those who favor relations with Russia now believe that such relations may ward off Russian "dissatisfaction" with Germany, which might express itself, unless it is heeded in time, either in a Franco-Russian anti-Germany pact or even by war.

(3) West German proponents of relations with Russia now feel that the sooner such relations are established the later "the inevitable third world war will break out." Such relations, some feel, would ease the tension in Europe and especially in central Europe.

Unification of Germany

There is a growing dissatisfaction with past methods aimed at bringing about the unification of Germany (and possibly the restoration of lost territories). It is felt that the period of "making faces at each other," better known as the cold-war period, has produced almost no tangible results. It is argued that two alternatives are now available, either military action to convince Russia (and the Communists) about the moral justification of Germany's claims, or diplomatic means. The latter must offer advantages to Russia. It is said that after all Russia is the boss in the Communist world, and if Germany wants unification and territorial changes it had better deal directly with the top.

Foreign Trade

The expanding German economy is looking feverishly for markets. "The miracle babes" are not too optimistic about their chances in the Western World.

German industrialists believe that Russia and the Russian orbit represents, from the export point of view, a spongy area which will soak up all the German production, especially consumers goods and machinery.

Of course, not every proponent of relations with Russia now uses all the arguments listed above. They advance only those which are suitable to their own economic or political interest. The following are the groups which are most accessible to ideas of relations with Russia:

(a) German Protestantism as well as the German Protestant Church organizations: Apparently the efforts of Heinemann and Pastor Niemoller have borne fruit. Class-conscious Protestantism in Germany has never felt comfortable in its postwar position in the Federal Republic. Many of them feel that German Catholicism is assuming a political role far beyond its numerical justification. To overcome their own weaknesses they feel that they must have the support of the Germans in Eastern Germany and above all they must ease the pressure from the east which forces Germany into the Catholic sphere of influence of southwestern Europe (Eastern Germany is predominantly Protestant).

(b) Refugee organizations, advocates of unity at all price and political groups: Most refugee groups have ceased to brandish the sword against the East and would like to see some arrangements which would enable them to return to their homeland, or at least to certain parts thereof. In the Bonn government itself there is a strong wing which favors "more activity" in diplomatic circles connected with Russia. Federal Minister Jacob Kaiser, the self-styled defender of Eastern Germany, and leader of the nonexistent leftwing of the CDU, represents a group inside the CDU which advocates talks with Russia. Ernest Lemmer, also a CDU leader (from Berlin), echoes Kaiser's sentiments. He is joined by such rightwing members of the CDU as Von Bismarck.

Outside the CDU the FDP constitutes the most solid political bloc favoring talks with Russia. However, as in the case of the CDU, the FDP is motivated by regional and economic interests. And in both cases, in the FDP and the CDU, the advocates of talks come from the areas which believe they may benefit from such talks and they represent the interests which favor such talks.

The Social Democrats, generally speaking, favor conversations with Russia. Since the Pfleiderer Plan was launched the SPD has become somewhat less enthusiastic about the idea. They want international talks with Russia rather than a German-Russian tete-a-tete.

Regional and economic interests: Lower Saxony and Württemberg-Baden represent the areas in which talks with Russia are most popular. They represent also the area which looks askance at Bonn and at the alleged Rhine-Ruhr influences on Bonn's policy. These are the areas in which small industries and consumers goods industries are located. These industries promise themselves a great future in trade with the East and expect diplomatic policies to pave the way for their goods.

No Fear of Communist Ideology

Behind the will to talk with Russia there is also the self-induced conviction that "ideologically we are safe." The proponents of relations with Russia belong to the strongest opponents of communism. They differentiate between German Communists and Russian Communists and between Russian communism and the Russian state. They hate the German Communists in Western Germany most. Slightly less hated are the Communists in the Eastern Zone. They are, however, feared. Those who want the talks for purely political reasons refuse to have any dealing with the Eastern Zone representatives. Those who want talks for economic reasons feel that they cannot disregard their brethren in the Communist camp. They, both, fear them and feel that they need them. They fear that the Eastern Zone may develop competitive industries. They hope that both as Communists and Germans some of the Eastern Zone economic agencies may facilitate economic contact between Western Germany and the Russian Empire.

In any event, the proponents of dealings with Russia feel that Western Germany does not have to fear Communist ideological infiltration. Contact with Russia will not, according to them, contaminate their pure neodemocratic ways of life. There are even some who feel that (like some Americans in 1941) such contacts with the Russians may affect, positively, the Russians.

This is more or less the background of the "movement" for conversations with Russia. Its criticism of American policy is only indirect. It is considered that the United States is "smothering" German diplomatic relations with too much passion for its democratic purity. The United States, it is considered, tends to behave toward Germany as a jealous parent toward an offspring who is about to get married. The United States is unwilling to realize that Germany has come of age and that it is entitled to make its own diplomatic mistakes, a field in which it is an expert.

The American policy in the Far East "annoys" Germany only insofar as it interferes with its economic penetration of those areas. There is still no noted criticism of American political objectives in the Far East. On the contrary, it can be said that the dominant majority of Germany's editorial writers favor the United States course, though some find it hard to hide their dissatisfaction at the difficulties encountered. Generally speaking, they favor slightly the admission of Red China to the United Nations. They believe that such an admission would ease German economic relations with the United States.

Germany is still uncertain about American objectives in Europe. She hoped to gain some benefits from the United States-Spanish agreement, but was disappointed. She now feels that the United States is building its defense line west of the Rhine; this means that Germany is destined to become the no-man's land in case of a successful defense of Western Europe. Needless to say this solution meets with little enthusiasm.

However, Germany's slight criticism of American foreign policy is not so much based on its disagreement with these policies as with the facts that (1) it hinders her own development, and (2) it does not trust American judgment.

The first has already been discussed here. With regard to the second, Germany is merely borrowing opinions from the other European countries. These opinions state that the United States is diplomatically immature and that in our hastiness and impatience we may talk ourselves into a war. It is these rather than any other reasons which have infused a slightly non-American, rather than an anti-American sentiment in German political thinking.

Above all, it must be borne in mind that the advocates of relations with Russia are at the same time fascinated by the vision of Germany "as a bridge between East and West." The concept that this is Germany's "historical mission" implies of course on one hand that she would like to be liked by all and on the other hand that she does not intend to turn against anyone. It also implies a weakening of the efforts toward integrating Germany in Western Europe. . . .

Analysis of the Strains and Stresses of the Bonn Coalition

The democratic institutions in Germany and the present form of government are fairly stable. At the moment they are not seriously endangered by any subversive elements. Stability, however, does not necessarily equal strength. During more than 5 years of its existence the Bonn government has been unable to evolve a national consciousness among the population of the Federal Republic. One may encounter "nationalistic" sentiments in Germany and possibly such sentiments may be voiced by many people. But rarely does one encounter patriotic sentiments, for the fact remains that Germany is one of the most "nonunited" nations of Europe. It is this lack of national consciousness which basically weakens the Federal Republic. Possibly the German militarists are correct when they claim that the German Army, the Wehrmacht, represented the unifying elements in Germany.

The existing institutions in Germany lack meaning and tradition. They exist because they are, and not because they are accepted.

Since the existing institutions have not as yet met the test of real opposition, that is undemocratic opposition, their strength cannot be judged. For up to now they existed under the protection of the occupying powers who by their sheer presence discouraged the development of antigovernmental movements.

Formalistically, the Federal Republic has the strongest parliamentary government in Europe. The Chancellor, who depends on the confidence of the Bundestag, cannot be turned out of office unless his replacement is appointed and unless this replacement has obtained at least an absolute majority of the Bundestag. This means that it is hardly possible to topple the Government.

This constitutional strength of the Government is reinforced by the authoritarian tendencies of German public life. The fact that Dr. Konrad Adenauer has been Chancellor for 4 years helped him in last year's elections. Because, after all, his opponent could not claim such a distinction. The same applies to all levels of political and economic life.

The existing Government has not yet achieved acceptance by the people. Bonn remains in a transitional stage and no one accepts the term of a "Federal Republic nation."

The nonacceptance of Bonn as the representative of the German people stems from the fact that the Government does not fill out the entire framework of duties which devolve on it, either under the Bonn basic law or through international agreements. The Federal Government has a tendency to take refuge in foreign policies to escape the unpleasantness of domestic affairs. However, the existing governmental structure of Germany has saved Bonn from the results of popular dissatisfaction.

The efforts of the Government coalition to isolate the Socialists, and the confessional issue represent the major divisive elements in Germany today. But they are so deep as to make it impossible to develop a national esprit de corps and unity of the nation. There are, of course, other issues which tend to nibble off portions of the national consciousness—the refugees, the ex-Nazis, the ex-militarists, etc., for instance. Germany today represents a conglomeration of interest groups, each seeking to solve national and international problems through their own narrow perspectives.

Negative Aspects

The chancellor has proven himself to be a better leader of a minority party than of a majority party. During the first Bundestag in which the CDU held only about 35 percent of the seats, Dr. Adenauer had the chance to show his real skill as a political manipulator. With a firm absolute majority behind him in the second Bundestag he brought only division inside the Government camp. For he no longer can scare the other parties into obedience by threatening that "unless they come to an agreement the Social Democrats may combine with the leftwing of the CDU to form the government." And the other parties no longer consider the SPD as a threat.

There are many negative aspects of the Bonn government and it would be folly to be misled by the outward appearance of strength. This outward appearance is based primarily on effective press propaganda and prosperous economic conditions. The Government appears strong because no one at the moment has an interest in testing its strength. In reality it has failed up to now to develop a power of its own, namely, real popular confidence, and must rely on support flowing to it from other factors.

The strength of the Bonn structure may be tested in the near future—

(a) If a deterioration of economic conditions develops;

(b) When Dr. Adenauer is no longer able to head the Government;

(c) When the activation of the German troops actually begins.

From the present vantage point a deterioration of the German economic situation is merely speculative. It is true that the current German prosperity has (and this is admitted by Government economists) not as yet achieved a firm and durable basis. It still depends on too many variables, such as international conditions, world rearmament, isolation of certain producing areas as a result of the East-West conflict. At the same time it is argued that there is no reason to believe that these factors which work in favor of the German economy should change overnight. It can therefore be assumed that full employment and slow but steady rise of the standard of living will continue.

Less promising is the situation with regard to the longevity of Dr. Adenauer. Press offices have invented many things in their time. But even they have not as yet succeeded in producing an effective rejuvenation method and protective measures against old age.

The unity in the CDU as well as the adherence of the other Government parties to the present coalition are intimately connected with the personality of Dr. Adenauer. Even those among the coalition parties who oppose him advise patience. His rival political leaders in the Government parties satisfy their ambitions for the moment by comparisons of birth dates.

Adenauer's Successor

It is therefore certain that in the event that Dr. Adenauer is no longer able to lead the Government a reorganization of forces in German political life will take place. This period will no doubt constitute a weak point in German public life, and will lower West Germany's resistance to subversion. It does not, however, mean that Western Germany will not be in a position to produce a man and government capable of replacing Adenauer. The possible successors of Dr. Adenauer have not as yet materialized because all available floodlights are directed on Adenauer.

After Adenauer the stability of the Government will decline. The weakness which will at that time appear on the surface will, however, merely reflect the true state of affairs inside Bonn.

The Role of the Military

The new military units will constitute an important factor in German political life. Their mere existence will strengthen the prestige of the Bonn Government at home, and may revive the dormant national consciousness. The military will be obedient during the first period of its existence. But it is equally likely that as soon as it is strong enough it may seek to play a political role of its own.

It is doubtful whether Bonn could muster sufficient strength to control such military, without making concessions to it and eventually giving in to it. A conflict with the military may ultimately produce a climate beneficial to the growth of antidemocratic and nationalistic groups.

In the analysis of the political strength of the present Bonn Government I have not touched on some minor points, such as the confessional conflict, the Rapallo tendencies, and above all the fact that the present Bonn Government has for all intents and purposes eliminated parliamentary control over its actions, and has thus again created a public mood of apathy toward governmental affairs. ("The politicians do what they want.")

The weaknesses of the Bonn Government are naturally only weaknesses if one regards them from a democratic point of view. They may turn into strength if a different approach is taken. In any event, they indicate that the West cannot fully rely on democratic support from Germany. And that the democratic Germany, the only Germany which would be inclined to ally itself durably with the West, is still too weak and too ineffective to make its influence felt.

It is in my opinion a fatal error to equate German organizational talent with democratic strength. What one sees in Bonn or in Dusseldorf is merely a functioning organization with all parts duly distributed. It does not reveal the contents of the organization nor the purposes for which it is functioning.

Pertinent Opinions

LET'S NOT BE BEASTLY . . .

At the hearing yesterday by Sen. Warren Magnuson's committee into the deal which our State Department people had cooked up for Lufthansa (the reborn German commercial airline operating—at the moment—with American planes, and British and American pilots) a State Department official explained why it was decided to give the Germans the biggest bundle of concessions—so far as we can find—ever handed in a single package to any airline, of any nationality, including our own.

He said it was done because the Germans were bound to have the third biggest airline in the world anyway, some day!

Back in 1943, Noel Coward started singing a song called, "Don't Let's Be Beastly to the Germans." Today, somehow, we were reminded of it. The refrain went something like this:

Oh, don't let's beastly to the Germans
When our victory is ultimately won;
It was just those dirty Nazis who persuaded them to fight,
And their Beethoven and Bach are really far worse than their bite;
So, let's be meek to them, and turn the other cheek to them
And try to bring out all their latent sense of fun.
Let's give them full air parity and treat the rats with charity—
Oh don't let's beastly to the Hun . . .

Our State Department fellows seem to have adopted Noel Coward's policy, but have missed the irony.

Right now, Germany is the most powerful industrial and commercial unit in Western Europe. It will be nice to have them on our side, if they stay there.

Before the war, they were able to more than hold their own in competitive trade. They're even better able to do so now, with a brand new industrial plant which American funds and material helped them build.

Let's not be beastly to the Germans; but let's not give them the ball game before it's even played, either.

(Editorial—N. Y. World-Telegram & Sun, 6-15-55)

"ASTONISHING TRUST"

Germany, the nation which 16 years ago signed a pact with Stalin, is welcomed to the ranks of the democracies as a bulwark against communism. We have granted the rearmed Germans sovereignty with no safeguards and no assurance that they will adhere to their alliance with the West other than the inevitably brief tenure of leadership of a 79-year-old chancellor.

Indeed, it would appear that we have cast away the only high card in our hand and practically pushed West Germany into the waiting arms of Russia. For only Russia can now grant what all Germans understandably and most fervently desire—the unity of their divided country. There is no clause in the London and Paris treaties which forbids Bonn to negotiate with Moscow, and when they reach agreement, as they surely will some day, the Germans will automatically shed all obligations to NATO and to the West . . .

But we set up this unhappy situation with our eyes wide open, knowing the record of treaties broken by Germany in recent history, knowing the Germans' military record and aware of their willingness to let a dictator do their thinking for them. We cast away our diplomatic ace-in-the-hole with astonishing trust in Bonn . . .

(Tom Guthrie, Cleveland Plain Dealer, 1-20-55)

THE GOAL AND THE GAME

It may be only a matter of weeks before the free world is confronted with a very big question. Under what circumstances will we abandon the idea of German rearmament? Do we regard German troops as so indispensible to the defense of freedom that no Russian concessions would justify a drastic revision of Germany's role?

A year ago it would have seemed inconceivable that Chancellor Adenauer would be invited to Moscow and—more important—be tempted to accept the invitation. But that is where we are today. There is a hint that the Russians are prepared to yield a lot of diplomatic ground in order to achieve a disarmed, neutralized Germany.

Are we prepared for the implications of such a move? Or has Secretary Dulles become so enamored of the idea of German troops that he is incapable of responding flexibly and affirmatively to this altered climate?

Santayana once defined a fanatic as a man who redoubles his efforts once he has forgotten his aim. The whole project of German rearmament was conceived as a stratagem to induce the Russians to engage in honorable negotiation. If that prospect is in sight, we need to review and re-examine all our positions.

Or have we reached the point at which we are redoubling our efforts because we have forgotten what we are after?

PRUSSIANS — EAST AND WEST

". . . Europe," wrote Adalbert Weinstein, the best military commentator in the West German press, "needs the new Prussians, who will resume Prussia's historic task of defending Europe's eastern frontiers, but in a spirit of peaceful cooperation with other western nations." The Russians have had the same idea, with the difference that they have faced their Prussians west . . .

. . . It has been perhaps too easily assumed that the arms race which must now start in Germany will be decided in the West's favor. The Communist East German regime has created a military elite, always something acceptable to Germans in the past. It will fit the Soviet Zone into an "Eastern NATO" and satisfactorily explain the purpose of this to distrustful Czechs and Poles. It can make much of the fact that the Red Army has military superiority, on the ground, in Central Europe. It can cite historical and economic arguments—Yorck von Wartenburg's exploits, Bismarck's policies, the mutually advantageous connections between the German and Russian General Staffs between the world wars, the need for East-West trade, and the natural urge for cooperation between industrial East Germany and the agrarian land mass of Eastern Europe . . .

(Terrence Prittie, The New Leader, 5-25-55)

DULLES AND GERMANY

The other day Secretary Dulles emphatically rejected the idea of a neutralized Germany. "It is the view of the United States that a policy of neutrality has no application to a country of the character of Germany," Dulles said. His statement was designed to "clarify" a remark by Ike which had stirred the impression that the U. S. might seriously consider the concept of German neutralization as part of an over-all program for European stability.

We think the President was right the first time. Of course it is far from clear that a realistic accord providing for creation of a free, unified, demilitarized Germany can be reached. We have no basis for assurance that the Russians are actually ready for such an accommodation. But it is surely a thought that should not be rejected in advance of the projected 4-Power conference.

Admittedly there are hazards and uncertainties in the neutralization formula. But there are also real perils in a rearmed Germany—dangers which always seem to elude Mr. Dulles but still torment millions of free men who have been unable to banish all recollections of Nazism.

The strongest case for the German rearmament crusade was that it might help to convince the Russians that the time for real negotiation is at hand. To Dulles, however, a rearmed Germany appears to have become a supreme goal rather than a tactic of Western defense.

Dulles has repeatedly voiced his certitude that a rearmed Germany will be a great legion of democracy. Other men believe the same thing. At least it must be conceded that the returns on that point are far from clear.

On Friday came the news that a poll of West German public opinion showed that 14 per cent of the people would vote for Adolf Hitler if he reappeared at this moment.

Simultaneously came the news of the appointment of one Leonhard Schluter, a publisher with a long record of pro-Nazism, as Culture Minister in the State of Saxony.

The latest communiques from Washington indicate that Mr. Dulles has voiced no comment on these developments.

The Triumphant Monopolies

About five years ago the former US Secretary of War, the late Robert Patterson, was retained by German industrial interests to halt Allied plans for the decartelization and deconcentration of German heavy industry. His assignment was made easy by the fact that he had the sympathetic ear of top Allied officials including the US High Commissioner for Germany, John J. McCloy.

A year before Mr. Patterson embarked on his "mission of mercy" the Allies had passed Law No. 27 which called for the breaking up of the German cartels and monopolies. Yet, for all practical purposes, the law remained a dead letter during that period. Needless to say, the German capitalized on these delays by throwing more rocks into the decartelization and deconcentration procedures. Consequently, by the time Patterson arrived on the scene, the program had been so emasculated that the Allied authorities were actually seeking the Bonn Government's approval for the implementation of the law. This rather unusual procedure stalled the program still further. "This delay," said a prominent steel owner in Düsseldorf, "has given us a chance to renew the fight to kill the entire dissolution program." (Wall Street Jornal, 2-23-51.) At that time it seemed that this anonymous Ruhr tycoon was "whistling in the graveyard." Whose graveyard? That is where some of us flunked.

In the last issue of Prevent World War III (No. 45) we published a survey of cartel and monopoly conditions in Germany under the caption "How Dead Are The German Cartels?" Today we know the answer. It is now clear that the monopolies and cartels are throbbing with new life while the objectives of law No. 27 lie buried in the graveyard.

In this connection Business Week (1-1-55) reported, "Allied deconcentration efforts were too little and too late; now the Allies have just about washed their hands of the problem."

The Germans have not only succeeded in scuttling law 27 but they have also delayed to death German legislation on this problem. In previous articles we pointed out that the Germans had drafted anti-cartel laws in accordance with their pledges to carry forward the Allied program. Though these laws contained "more holes than cheese" (New York Times, 4-3-55) the German industrialists were not satisfied. It is now admitted by every competent observer that for all intents and purposes German heavy industry will be free of any meaningful anti-cartel or anti-monopoly controls.

The success of the German campaign against decartelization and deconcentration is reflected in the spectacular rise in the value of the shares of German heavy industry. During the year 1954 the value of 672 German stocks increased by more than 50 per cent. By the end of November 1954 the total value of all stocks had reached the figure of DM 17.6 billions or roughly 162 per cent of the parity values at which they were originally issued. Many stocks were above the 200 per cent mark, particularly those of the electrical and chemical industry. This increase becomes all the more impressive when it is borne in mind that at the end of 1949 only 8 of all 672 stocks had even reached parity. More significant is the fact that it was precisely the stocks of the 38 iron, steel and coal companies, supposedly deconcentrated, which led the boom. Their stocks increased in value by no less than 79 per cent by the end of November 1954.

The New Republic (2-7-55) observed that this spectacular rise was due to the fact that the Germans anticipated that with sovereignty, decartelization and deconcentration would soon be a thing of the past "and that the steel and coal companies would again combine for yet more profitable expansion." It is no wonder, therefore, that the Manchester Guardian, reporting on the restoration of the Ruhr steel and coal companies, should conclude that "Allied 'decartelization' policy has been reversed with a vengeance" (2-24-55). The implications of the Manchester Guardian's statement can best be understood by a brief rundown of the present status of leading industrial complexes of the Ruhr.

I. G. Farben

The intimate ties between the I. G. Farben chemical empire and the Nazis are no longer a secret. American officials uncovered voluminous data on this subject—much of it being employed to convict the leading Farben officials of war crimes. Indeed, even some of Farben's bigwigs admitted to Allied investigators that I. G. had played a decisive role under the Nazi regime. Listen to Georg von Schnitzler, Farben's leading commercial director: "Thus, in acting as it had done, I. G. contracted a great responsibility and constituted a substantial aid in the chemical domain and decisive help to Hitler's foreign policy, which led to war and to the ruin of Germany.

"Thus, I must conclude that I. G. is largely responsible for Hitler's policy."

Because of Farben's criminal record, it was among the first of the gigantic combines slated to be broken up. However, it turned out that there was a yawning gap between paper policies and deeds. As the objectives of the occupation began to fade, Farben's strength returned. Of course, there were many Allied announcements proclaiming that Farben was dead, yet, somehow or other, these optimistic assurances always turned out to be false alarms.

In this year of 1955, even the pretenses have been discarded. In February, the Allies published a new law turning over to the Germans the responsibility for the breaking up of the Farben combine. Previously, Allied regulations had cancelled all rights and powers of the managing board, the managers, the supervisory board, and the general assembly of Farben stockholders. All of these rights and powers were vested in an Allied Control Board. The new law restores "the rights of the administrative bodies of I. G. Farben . . ." (New York Times, 2-4-55). There are certain limitations controlling the powers of the old Farben governing boards, but who will take them seriously? Business Week (2-12-55) declares that "the joker in the whole setup is that there is nothing in the new law to prevent the Farben units from voting to recombine, nor does the new law prohibit convicted war criminals or former Nazi supporters from serving on boards of directors— although this was a rule under the old deconcentration act."

In anticipation of this, the shares of I. G. Farben's successor companies enjoyed an unparallelled boom. Farben was back in business. The impact of a resurgent Farben on the industries of other countries is sure to be felt. Even American businessmen are beginning to realize this fact although so many of them were silent during the years when the opportunity was available to deal Farben a smashing blow. Farben knows how to compete not only through the reconstruction of her supposedly separated units but also through the exploitation of a cheap labor supply. Thus, the Chairman of the Board of Monsanto Chemical Company, Mr. Edgar M. Queeney, pointed out that while American workers in the chemical industry receive on the average $2.50 per hour, German chemical workers average no more than 50c (New York Times, 2-28-55).

Krupp

The case of Krupp is another glaring example of how grandiose plans to break up the huge German monopolies have withered on the vine. As the world knows, the house of Krupp has been synonymous with Germany's wars of aggression since the days of the Kaiser: The more blood was shed, the more profits accrued to the Krupp interests.

Following the end of World War I, the Allies appeared to be determined to break up Krupps monopolies over the armament industry. Friedrich Krupp was not a man to be deterred by Allied prohibitions. After Hitler came to power, Krupp freely boasted that he had fooled Allied inspectors during the 1920s and thereby preserved the know-how so essential for the rehabilitation of the Wehrmacht. The older Krupp was never put on trial for war crimes committed during World War II, but his son Alfred was tried and convicted in 1948. He was sentenced to 12 years imprisonment for having exploited slave labor and plundered German occupied Europe. His ill gotten properties were declared confiscated by this same verdist.

However, Alfred Krupp had friends—-powerful and influential friends, some in the Allied camp. In due time, U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy set him free and returned the properties that were to be confiscated. Now, Krupp is at it again.

In previous articles Prevent World War III disclosed how Krupp's power was reemerging. In a report entitled "Krupps Resurgent," the London Financial Times (1-19-55) states that the Krupp concern represents "the largest private fortune in Europe estimated at some 150 million Pounds Sterling." Though Krupp pledged that he would sell his iron and steel properties, the Financial Times reveals that "directors of Krupps openly say that the demand for repeal of the obligation to sell will prove irresistible."

It is no longer any secret that the Bonn Government is supporting Krupp up to the hilt. According to the Manchester Guardian (2-24-55), the Bonn Government "has seen to it that his firm has had a lion's share of state credits which have been channeled into heavy industry." These credits come out of the funds of the so-called Marshall Plan Ministry of the Bonn Government. With these funds Krupp has been able to expand his interests all over the world. The irony of it all is that these funds have become available through the Marshall Plan help which the U. S. rendered Germany. To put it in another way: Krupp has been one of the main beneficiaries of the Marshall Plan in Germany and is now utilizing this windfall to pursue his own "Point Four" Program.

Because of the special attention which Krupp has received from Adenauer's government, Alfred Krupp is now regarded as the Federal Republic's unofficial "industrial ambassador." At the request of the Bonn Government, Herr Krupp has received the heads and other leading representatives of foreign countries. These contacts have had their rewards. In 1954 the Krupp firm enjoyed a profitable year with sales amounting to $240 million. Krupp has made significant inroads in India, Pakistan, Greece, South America and the Middle East.

The tentacles of the Krupp empire are reaching out everywhere. One of Krupp's leading officials, Herr Beitz, raved about his recent trip to the U. S. He told the correspondent of the Financial Times that his visits opened favorable prospects for "cooperation with American firms." In this connection the New York Herald Tribune (2-27-55) reported that the Krupp interests had entered the field of making machines for the manufacture of textiles "on a world wide scale in collaboration with the Von Koborn International Corporation of 501 Fifth Avenue, New York City." As a matter of fact, Krupp like other German industrial monopolies, is moving into many fields including retail and light consumer goods. The monopolies of the Ruhr have now even a more voracious appetite than under Hitler.

Vereinigte Stahlwerke

In the mid 1920s the world witnessed the formation of the

". . . The majority of West Germans oppose rearmament. And, similarly, the Bonn parliament 'approved' the treaties for reasons other than the desire to rearm.

"It was buying continued American and British support. It was buying restoration of German sovereignty. And, like the French parliament, it was achieving a better bargaining position for negotiating with the Kremlin . . ."

(Ludwell Denny, N. Y. World-Telegram & Sun, 3-28-55)

". . . In this light the German problem, viz., German unity, is the problem of Europe. The weapon in the foreign policy field is the playing off of the West against the East . . .

"This problem would not exist if the great powers were on friendly terms. They would agree to keep Germany from any temptation to go on the rampage. As it is, the old German ambition may be revived by East-West competition for Germany's favors. Russia has better cards than the Western Allies to play—markets in the East in place of competition in the West. Then there is the Polish card. I refer to the 'lost territories' in the East which were given to Poland for the time being at the Potsdam conference. Historians are many who think of an alliance between Communist Russia and a Germany of the Right as still logical . . ."

(Herbert Elliston, Washington Post, 5-15-55)

United Steel Works (Vereinigte Stahlwerke) which, together with I. G. Farben and the Deutsche Bank, were the main pillars and profiteers of Nazism. The Vereinigte Stahlwerke had received its initial impetus through a multi-million dollar loan granted by private investors in the U. S. under the leadership of the Dillon, Read banking house of New York City. One of the leading officials of Dillon, Read was William H. Draper, Jr., who served as economic advisor to General Clay during the occupation. Responsibility for the failure of decartelization and deconcentration cannot be understood unless one takes into account Mr. Draper's special role.

Through the international steel cartel, Vereinigte Stahlwerke dominated the steel markets of Europe and many places abroad. In that way it strengthened Germany's war potential and weakened the economies of the prospective victims of German aggression. This gigantic combine was supposed to be broken up in 12 principally independent companies. A main objective of Allied legislation was to so redistribute the capital of this steel combine that it would not be controlled by a small group of families and their associates. Once again a good plan has been so manipulated and distorted that it no longer has meaning.

Several months ago the Hüttenwerke Phoenix Steel Company, one of the Ruhr's largest producers of steel tubes, and the Rheinische Röhrenwerke prepared plans to form a single company. Together these two firms control a steel production capacity of about 2½ million tons a year. It is reported that this new company may fuse with the August Thyssen steel plants in Duisburg-Hamborn. This combination "will control a steel production of 3.5 million tons a year and will be, by far, the biggest single concentration of economic power in the Ruhr and in Europe" (Manchester Guardian, 2-24-55). It so happens that all three firms belonged originally to the Vereinigte Stahlwerke.

The significance of this fusion is obvious. The Vereinigte Stahlwerke is in the process of being revived and will be even more powerful than under Hitler. Moreover, the tiny family groupings which had a powerful control over this huge steel monster, are again in a position to resume where they left off. For example, the Thyssen family the head of which was Fritz Thyssen, the man who was Hitler's financial benefactor, is once again consolidating its position in this new steel combine. It is also reported that the Haniel family interests are coming into the picture again. The power of the reborn steel combine will, like I. G. Farben, be felt in other countries. Thus, the New Republic notes that the Thyssen steel plant "whose old steel furnaces were torn down for reparation payments . . . now boasts production facilities as modern as any in the US" (2-7-55).

Haniel

The Haniel industrial interests take their name from the Haniel family. The coal industry was the basis of the Haniel fortune. The largest single property was the Gute Hoffnungs Hütte or Good Hope Company, which was based on the ownership of coal mines. However, the interests of the Haniel family extended beyond coal. The Haniels controlled iron, mines, steel plants, automobile factories, armament works, and ship building. Prior to the war it is estimated that the Gute Hoffnungs Hütte complex had assets valued at $275 million.

The Haniel family interests, like the Thyssen family group, were participants in the formation of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke. The role that the Haniel interests played in building up Hitler's war power may be found in the records uncovered by Allied investigators. James Stewart Martin, former Chief of the U. S. Decartelization Branch in Germany, describes in his book "All Honorable Men" how tricky the Haniel clan was when they were confronted by Allied interrogators. He notes that Baron von Schroeder who helped to put Hitler into power and who was connected with the von Schroeder banking interests, was a good friend of the Haniel family. Mr. Martin relates that one member of the family, Alfred Haniel, who claimed to be an anti-Nazi, had at the same time important interests in companies which enabled him to preserve his good standing with the Nazis. During the war Alfred Haniel was able to make trips to Switzerland with the approval of the Nazis, and there conferred with Mr. Allen W. Dulles, head of the European Mission of the OSS and a director of the J. Henry Schroeder banking corporation in the U. S.

Following the end of the war the Haniel combine was to be broken up but these plans are also turning into a dead letter. Dr. Hermann Reusch, the managing director of the Gute Hoffnungs Hütte Steel Company which was a successor to the original trust, "made it clear that it was his intention to reorganize the original trust" (Manchester Guardian 1-20-55). From the very early days of the Allied occupation Herr Reusch fought the Allied decartelization and deconcentration program. He thought up many schemes to achieve this end. One of his projects was an offer to French industrial interests to take shares in the industries of the Ruhr in the hope that such a deal would block the Allied program. He even proposed that the German trade union movement cooperate with German heavy industry" in order to carry out a form of decartelization which would not endanger the economic position of the works concerned . . ." This is not to say that Herr Reusch was highly regarded by the German trade union movement. On the contrary, in 1948 German steel workers threatened to strike unless Reusch were removed from his post in the Allied Steel Study Commission. The workers condemned Reusch "as representing the ideas of Krupp and Thyssen" (New York Times, 6-1-48).

According to U. S. Government records, Herr Reusch not only helped the Nazis to achieve power but reaped substantial benefits from the German looting of Europe. His father, Dr. Paul Reusch, served as general manager of all the Haniel properties from 1904-1942. The elder Reusch was a life-time friend of the accused war criminal and expert on armament economy Hjalmar Schacht. Even though he is now 86, he still advises his son on the conduct of the Gute Hoffnungs Hütte properties while he continues to direct several subsidiary enterprises.

> "The question responsible diplomatic circles are asking in London today is this: If centralization and cartelisation are resurgent in industry, if nationalism is resurgent in German politics, where will this centralization in the military lead? Will this trend for lebensraum be given even more acceleration by a General Staff of the type now envisioned and plotted on the proposed T.O. (Table of Organization)? . . ."

> (N. Y. Post, 3-17-55)

Hoesch

The Hoesch steel combine together with Krupp and Vereinigte Stahlwerke was the largest producer of tinplate in Germany. The Hoesch family interests controlled tremendous coal resources in the Ruhr and were "a focal point for agreements and understandings that shaped the rest of the business of the Ruhr" (All Honorable Men). This outfit too which helped to consolidate Nazi power, is being "rehabilitated." This fact is discussed in German newspapers. The Stuttgarter Nachrichten (12-31-54) notes that the desire to correct the "mistakes" committed by the Allies is "also being asserted within the Hoesch interests."

The above article reveals that the Altessener Bergwerke A. G. which controls a number of former Hoesch coal mines, is about to be reincorporated in the Hoesch interests. In this connection Altessener Bergwerke A. G. possesses basic capital assets valued at DM 90 million. This newspaper states that it "may be assumed that in the case of Hoesch the same procedure will be followed as with Mannesmann" (see article "Mannesmann Saga," page 16). It is noteworthy that the Mannesmann and Hoesch interests are already working together, having organized a company with a basic capital of DM 12 million. This initial capital will in due time be augmented.

Kloeckner

The Kloeckner steel combine, one of the big six, was also a target of the Allied decartelization and deconcentration program. Here again we find an industrial complex whose leading officials always played an important role in Germany's wars of aggression. Together with other bigwigs of German heavy industry, including Hugo Stinnes and Carl Bosch, Kloeckner officials helped sabotage the delivery of German reparations after World War I.

Under Hitler the Chairman of the Board of Kloeckner's was Günther Henle. U. S. Government records indicate that Herr Henle shared the spoils of expropriation and conquest during the Nazi regime. In this connection, he was also of great help in making it possible for the Nazis to seize power. Nevertheless, when General Clay turned over to the Germans the responsibility to deconcentrate the German steel industry, Henle became a member of the German group that was supposed to carry out the Allied program.

Another Kloeckner bigshot is Dr. Gerhard Schroeder, a relatively young lawyer who, prior to his joining Kloeckner, served for three years as the legal assistant to the Nazi Finance Minister, Herr Hjalmar Schacht. Schroeder was a member of the Nazi Party and also belonged to the Nazi storm troopers.

Under the guidance of these two men the Kloeckner combine is in the process of reconcentration. There is no effort on the part of the Kloeckner big-wheels to conceal this fact. Indeed, they have even restored the old name of the firm after it had been changed under Allied regulations.

German Banks

For decades the financial resources of Germany were controlled by three banks—the Deutsche Bank, the Dresdner Bank, and the Commerz Bank. Led by the Deutsche Bank which was the most powerful of all, they spearheaded the drive of German imperialism throughout the world. Within Germany these banks dominated most of the economy to the detriment of small business. They not only created but also nourished industrial monopolies. Hitler could have never taken or remained in power without the cooperation of these banks and he knew it. Consequently, in return for their support, he made sure that they would get their full share of the loot when the German armies ran roughshod over Europe.

For all of these reasons the Allies adopted plans to break up these banking monopolies. Now, all of these plans have gone for naught. The London publication, The Banker (November 1954) describes the process of reconcentration as follows: "Each of the former 'big three' banks, it will be recalled, is now represented by three succession institutions, making a total of nine banks with headquarters in Munich, Hamburg, Frankfurt or Düsseldorf, and all having—either separately or jointly—direct representation in the Western zone of Berlin. These succession banks take a great deal of trouble to emphasize that they are the former component parts of the Deutsche or the Dresdner or the Commerz bank. The banks in each group work in close co-operation with one another, and there is little doubt that at a suitable opportunity they will rejoin forces, under their original names . . ." The Germans themselves have been most candid about the future of the banking monopolies. Dr. Robert Pferdmenges, one of Adenauer's chief advisors and Chairman of the Board of the National Federation of Private Banks, wrote, "it seems that the possibility

". . . What has happened since World War II also is causing another kind of bewilderment.

". . . West Germany is seen to be prospering, recovering from its war-end ruin faster than anyone would have believed possible 10 years ago. After fighting its first war to end all wars in 1917-18, the United States invested heavily in rebuilding its beaten enemy, Germany. Now the U.S. again is helping to rebuild Germany, and this time to rearm her as well.

"American taxpayers' money also has gone into rebuilding two other defeated enemies, Italy and Japan.

" 'The way to win a war," it is being quipped, 'is to lose it to the U.S.' . . .

". . . What people are beginning to wonder is: Ten years from now, who will be America's friends, and who will be its enemies? Who really won the war?"

will be provided shortly for them (the successor banks of the big three) to be united again in the original three huge banks" (Washington Post, 12-26-54).

The Schuman Plan High Authority

This survey would not be complete without a word about the attitude of the Schuman Plan High Authority with regard to the reconcentration of the German heavy industry. Theoretically at least, an essential aim of the Schuman Plan was to do away with cartels and powerful concentrations. The Schuman Plan High Authority was given the responsibility to carry this out. The fact is that the High Authority has not only failed in this direction but has given its blessings to the reconcentration moves of Mannesmann and the former units of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke. In the past, the Society expressed its misgivings over the Schuman Plan because we felt that, as it was set up, the Germans would be able to regain their former economic power based on cartel monopolies. It now appears that the Society's fears were by no means groundless.

Though the High Authority has given its official stamp of approval to the German moves, it has been at pains to excuse itself on the grounds that these German concentrations of economic power were never really broken up by the Allies and were tolerated by them. This is certainly a poor and cynical alibi.

Impact of German Cartels

The strange attitude of the Schuman Plan Authority toward cartels and economic concentrations has brought protest from countries outside of the Schuman Plan. These countries are beginning to feel the impact of these cartels and combines which, in the last analysis, can only weaken their own economies. In the United States, too, there is a somewhat growing awareness of the dangers involved. The minority report of the U. S. Attorney General's National Committee To Study Anti-Trust Laws is indicative of these facts. The report points out the necessity "to protect the American economy against exploitation by foreign cartels . . ." It further states that "foreign monopolies, cartels and restrictive arrangements of comparable effect are costly burdens upon the American economy . . ." (New York Times, 4-4-55). Unfortunately, this report has not received the publicity which it deserves.

Admittedly Germany is not the only country which has created cartels and monopolies, but history tells us that no other country has employed the cartels and trusts so effectively in furthering aggression as the Germans. The United States among other countries, not only suffered economically at the hands of Germany's cartels and trusts, but our defense efforts in the early days of World War II were also hamstrung due to the influence of the German cartel network. Have we not learned from the past or must we again be burned?

Finally, in terms of their influence on Germany's democratic future, the reemergence of these cartels and trusts is an ominous sign. In this connection we remind our readers of the statement which appeared in Fortune Magazine way back in September 1942. It was part of an article entitled "No Peace With I. G. Farben" and it read: "The cartels became the real government, anonymously ruling the life of the nation down to the last details of burial, and the Weimar Republic withered in powerlessness.

"It is a moot but unresolvable point whether the cartels created Hitler, or Hitler used the cartels. It is now historical fact that the steel and chemical cartels financed Hitler's early political adventures. It is also history that the cartel system is always ripe, with the passivity of a trollop, for the worst uses of nationalistic passion. Under Hitler the German cartels passed through an ultimate, subtle evolution: they became the direct politico-economic instruments of the Nazi party at home and abroad, wielded with the single aim of rearming Germany for war . . ."

"Much more interesting to the business world is the possibility of increased trade with the Communist bloc—especially Red China. The Chancellor may focus his attention on the West, but the Ruhr is looking eastward . . .

"The prospects of trading with Red China are particularly tempting to many Germans, possibly because distance lends enchantment. German exporters see in Red China's industrialization a great new market for a wide variety of heavy capital goods and equipment such as steel mills, rolling stock, bridges, telephonic and other communications systems, machine tools, rails, pipelines, cement factories, and electrical supplies.

"It must also be remembered that a ruling impulse of Germans whose country is split by the Iron Curtain is to reunite it, and Bonn knows that this can be done only by making some kind of deal with the U.S.S.R., master of the eastern territories . . ."

(Myron M. Cowan, The Reporter, 6-2-55)

"The United States and Great Britain have achieved a vote in favor of German rearmament, on the basis, of course, that such is necessary as an anti-communist or anti-Russian measure. But they have achieved at the same time a vote which the French communists can and no doubt will use to great advantage in their efforts to become stronger and more popular among French people.

"Could it be that Western policy-makers are so hypnotized by the idea of German rearmament that the strengthening of the French Communist Party's position in that country was not taken into consideratoin as a result of the Assembly vote? Whether or not it was, the Communists in France have definitely gained. And we shall see in the long run if the French people among whom these gains are made are worth more or less than arms in the hands of a new German military."

A Perplexing People

by
ALBION ROSS

Having returned to Germany for the first time in something over fifteen years, this correspondent feels both confused and embarrassed. There is a sense of being at a loss, which is all the greater because one lived in this country for eight years before the war. Where is that Germany and who are these people? What is happening to them, and what course will they take now that the Paris pacts open the way to West German rearmament and near-sovereignty? . . .

The Germans themselves are, more than the economic miracle of recovery, the German wonder. They are so intact, so unscarred. They are not ashamed. The concentration camps and the gas chambers have left no mark. Talk to them about those things. They tell you about what the Russians did. Press the point. They lose interest. Oh, they agree with you that it was all very bad. You can even call it sinful. They are not resentful.

The cry "Sieg Heil, Sieg Heil" of the vibrant, thunderous throngs echoes only as a whispered memory within your own mind. You can still recall mistily the massed swastika banners, the rows of shining faces, the man with the comical mustache. But it is like some private memory of your own, and unreal.

You can remember the Jew in a dark bedroom off a courtyard in East Berlin coughing blood and gasping for breath and the hopeless expression on the doctor's face. The Storm Troopers had caught the victim back there in the early days before the concentration camps were set up to do that sort of thing more systematically. You can remember another man who was taken out of your apartment house just before dawn, and the sobs and desperation of his wife, whom everyone hastily avoided.

But all this—and what followed—seem to have made no impact on Germans. Hitler is dead and therefore, apparently, all that is dead with him, so far as they are concerned. The years of their great catastrophe have passed out of sight like a set on a revolving stage.

You talk with them now in terms of our common interests which, of course, are real enough. The long agony and the last agony of those other millions seems like a discourteous thing to remember. You feel as if it all were bad manners. It was just one of those things. Nevertheless, you struggle a little against that "we," remembering the pictures of the stacked naked corpses and remembering that you were here when the Germans were what they were and not what they now say they were. . . .

Are they the same Germans? Who are they now?

Superficially, the majority seem to have become, to use a European phrase, a race of Swiss hotel keepers. The phrase may be unfair to Swiss hotel keepers, but it refers to a somewhat stuffy person, to accepting a somewhat restricted existence, to pretty thoroughly compromising with life.

There is undoubtedly something about these post-war Germans in West Germany that makes them resemble the German Swiss, the Dutch and the Danes. It was always there along with the other thing. The plump, scrubbed German and his plump wife, almost caricatures of domestication, with cuckoo clock and goldfish bowl, are not new. There had never seemed to be any explanation in the old days for the presence in the same people of a burgher stodginess that came close to the grotesque, a seemingly unbridled romanticism, chronic melancholia, an incorrigible philosophical wrestling with life, a primitive fleshy sense of humor and a sort of brass band militarism and heavy-witted belligerence.

The Germans of Konrad Adenauer's West German Federal Republic are not only intact, seemingly untouched by the war; they are more intact in some ways than they have ever seemed before to those who knew them in the last years of the Weimar Republic and during the National Socialist regime. It is probably fair to guess that they have not been this way since the quieter years of the Hohenzollern epoch. Perhaps they have not been this way since the Hohenzollern Reich was established and did away with that other Germany of small states that Goethe knew. . . .

With the martial romanticism of the Reich idea gone, German life has poured into the channel of creative work. This is a business man's society, an indefatigably industrious society. . . .

If there is a place where the "Managerial Revolution" can be seen in concrete form, it is in the boiling busy world of the new West Germany. The managerial caste is the extreme example of the thing which the Germans themselves call their "work fanaticism." However, the whole society shows it, though at a somewhat calmer pace.

Another expression that is heard here is that work is the post-war German opiate. Work is less a means to an end than an end in itself. Try to find out just where they think they are going. It does not take much effort to discover that they actually don't know and that in a sense they don't care.

If a man uses work as an opiate is he cured? Have the Germans made their compromise with life?

Talk to these apparently sound, unscarred and unbroken people who are so busy and you begin to find yourself assailed by doubts and uncertainty as to who they really are. This Germany is too much like living in a hotel. The universal feling is that it is all provisional. The capital—the rather despised "Capital Village Bonn"—is provisional. The western "Rump Republic" is provisional. The increasingly elaborate structure of the economy balances on the tightrope of international trade.

The surprise over these so normal, unshaken Germans wears off slowly. You begin to notice the little things again.

The girl who came into the bookshop in Munich said: "I was 'draussen' and just came back." That way of saying that you have been abroad rang a bell. She had been "draussen," which is to say outside. They all say the same thing. They said it then and they say it now. An American or a Frenchman or an Englishman does not say that he has been outside when he has been to another country. A German does.

There are speech habits that have an intonation, a significance that is inescapable. The use of "draussen" for abroad, with its implications of a people caged in, is the partner of that other famous German expression "Lebensraum" or space to live in. Two wars have been fought for "Lebensraum." It has long been one of the main themes of German political thought. You do not say that you have been outside when you mean abroad if you have made your compromise with life.

Is the expression now only a habit, with the old implications gone? Perhaps. . . .

Bismarck was probably the last of Germany's leaders of historic significance whose nerves did not get the better of him under the urgent sense of how late it was in terms of Europe's epoch of greatness and predominance. Wilhelm II's rather flamboyant expression, "the yellow peril," was rooted in this instinctive German feeling that time was running out for Europeans. . . .

Germany was not the only country that stood still in stagnant hopelessness at the end of the Nineteen Twenties and the beginning of the Nineteen Thirties. It was a world-wide crisis. It brought to Germans, however, a complete nervous breakdown. The sense of the urgency of time was so intense in this nation. The world fell to pieces around them in an irrational hodge-podge of resentments, hatreds, fears and imagined things.

The Weimar epoch's confused effort to accept the fact of the first defeat in 1918 ended. With Hitler the effort to compromise with life ended. What did the Germans really seek? Few who in those days had almost daily one occasion or another to ask that question will forget that no concrete answer was ever given. National Socialism has been called Nihilism by Rauschning and others who were perhaps close enough to it to know. It can be called many things. It was the end of compromise.

The nation responded to that ringing command that vitalized a people. Would it respond again in another form under other conditions?

The second defeat has been more overwhelming than the first. A third of the territory of the German Reich lies east of the Oder-Neisse line, which presumably will remain the eastern frontier of even a reunited Germany unless there is a third world war. Millions of refugees from out there to the east live today in what is left of Germany.

A thing to remember is that to date no nation has been willing to surrender an irredenta making up a third of its former territory. . . .

Yet in spite of the hectic provisional character of the life of this people who use work as an opiate against the desperate frustrations arising out of the collapse of their towering ambitions, there is in this twice-defeated Germany perhaps the conviction that a decision has been reached, notably in the long struggle between German and Slav. The odd intactness and health of these Germans may be related to acceptance of the fact of defeat. The blood-red banners of the new Rome flying on the eastern horizon answer perhaps one of the questions which the German people put to history.

There is also some evidence that the German looking westward has an actual conviction that the center of gravity has passed from Europe to what the Europeans call the overseas world. Jealousy has been woven through the history of the Reich. But it was jealousy of other members of the intimate European family. . . .

No one would say that the Germans have now found a new code to live by. No one could feel in honesty that their possible allies and associates can be sure which road the Germans will take. No certainty exists as to just who and what these post-war Germans are or what they may become. For a time they seemed to have found a new road in the doctrine of European unity. Was it a disguised resurgence of a desire to dominate? Will it prove on the contrary to be the way into the future and out of a present that seems to have neither past nor future?

The Germans may at last be about to find such peace of mind as they can in the acceptance of the fact that the race with time is over. They may be preparing now to make their compromise with life, sadly, rather bitterly, but also with a sense of relief. Perhaps, and perhaps not.

A GERMAN ANALYSIS OF U. S. FUTURE

"It will become more and more difficult for the United States to stem off much longer the economic crisis of overproduction which has been postponed by artificial measures of 'cold' and 'hot' wars. A sudden slump in the economic activities of the U. S. will cause severe social unrest and changes in the political structure that might lead to consequences which are difficult to appraise at the present time. Therefore, the United States must be considered as an ally upon whom we cannot rely blindly."

(Zeitschrift Für Geopolitik, Darmstadt, June 1955)

"Up to now, the interest of America and Germany have coincided as if in patterned precision . . .

"Now, however, the Germans have had all the grants and gifts our policy is capable of bestowing, and we enter a new era. In this era, the sovereign state of West Germany will have one overriding goal—to free East Germany. Whoever stands in the way is already considered an enemy. America, Germany's enemy in the past, can, by the alchemy of German passions, be redrawn as an enemy if our policy lags, or if its justified caution in dealing with Russia seems to postpone what the Germans consider essential.

"So long as Adenauer survives and keeps control, it is unlikely that Germany can quickly withdraw from our embrace; so long as Germany is unarmed, it is unlikely that Germans will dare challenge our power or our diplomacy; so long as the present high level of German prosperity continues, it is unlikely that either right or left can mobilize Germans to demonstration or violence in favor of unity. But sometime in the near future the Germans must insist on settling the major problem of their national politics . . ."

CLEAR IT WITH KONRAD!!

"The Western Big Three has become the Western Big Four. Adenauer's voice, in fact, will be second only to Eisenhower's and Eden's in the councils of the West. "An elderly woman juror fainted in court at the trial of German chemical manufacturer Dr. Gerhard Peters when she heard him explain calmly how a lethal cyanide product of his own invention and manufacture, known as 'Zyklon B,' was injected into closed rooms at concentration camps through shower-type nozzles. Dr. Peters is being tried for being 'an accessory' to the murder of 300,000 Jews in Nazi gas chambers.

"Dr. Peters is charged with the death of just 300,000 Jews because at least that number was killed with the 'Zyklon B' gas crystals he furnished to Auschwitz after SS Lt. Col. Kurt Gerstein had, by Peters' own admission, revealed the purpose of the shipments to him in the summer of 1943. The indictment makes no mention of the hundreds of thousands of killings of innocent people resulting from earlier poison gas deliveries made by Dr. Peters.

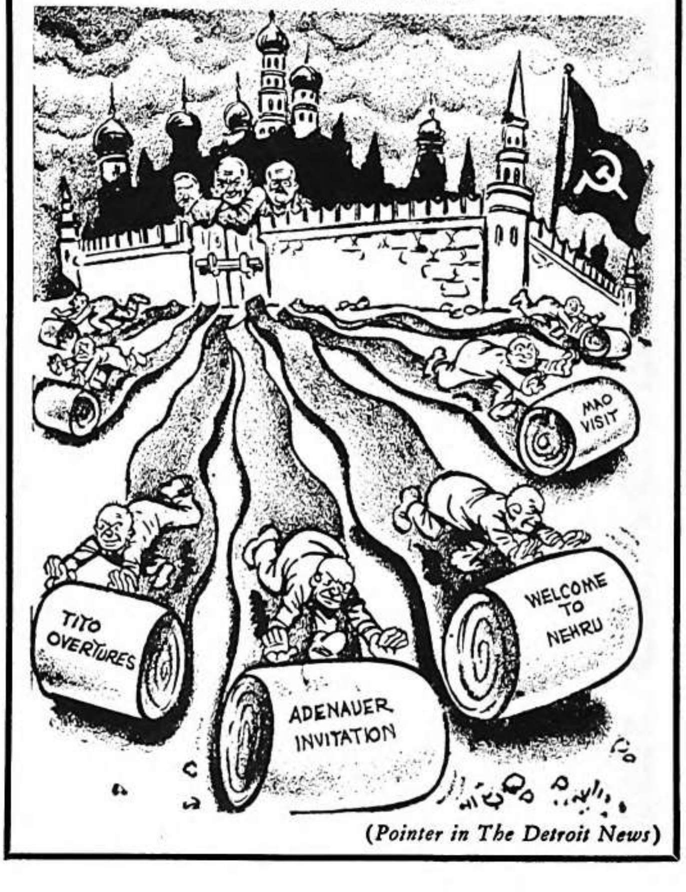
'RED CARPET CRAZY'



(Pointer in The Detroit News)

Japan—Her Hour of Destiny?

During World War II few words meant so much to the American people as the stern warning "Remember Pearl Harbor!" It was more than a rousing battle cry. Generally speaking, it expressed the awareness of the American people to the fact that the predatory forces directing Japan's destinies could never be appeased. It was also apparent to the American people that it would not be possible for the U. S. to stay out of the path of these implacable foes of freedom, should they succeed in recapturing power after the war.

There is no question but that the American policy reflected the sound instincts and wishes of the American people and their allies with respect to the treatment of Japan. Under General MacArthur's leadership the U. S. proceeded to implement a program which would whittle down Japan's war potential; punish her war criminals; break up the Zaibatsu industrial monopolies; eliminate feudal agricultural conditions and establish democratic political and social institutions. Indeed, upon the initiative of General MacArthur, the Japanese adopted a constitution which explicitly prohibited the reestablishment of Japanese armed forces.

In addition to these basic measures, the U. S. sought to encourage the economic development of those countries in Asia which had suffered under the colonial exploitation and agressions of the Japanese. U. S. policy makers, responsible for this program, believed that it would lay the groundwork for a peaceful and democratic order in the Far East.

The U. S. Program

Mr. Ed Pauley, President Truman's special representative on the problem of Japanese reparations, outlined some of the factors and objectives of this program in a special memorandum, excerpts of which follow:

"From the very beginning of the Meiji Era, nearly a century ago, the political rulers of Japan thought in militaristic terms. Their country was deficient in the raw materials needed for modern industry, especially war industry. Nevertheless, they created such industries, basing them on imports of raw materials. Since the raw materials came predominantly from territories not under the Japanese flag, militaristic thinking dictated the economic penetration and control of these territories, beginning with territories close to Japan . . .

"The end product of half a century of Japanese war-planning and war-making was a top-heavy industrial structure which was incapable of functioning efficiently except when geared either to making war or preparing for war . . .

"In order to keep the required cheap labor available for such industry, the standard of living in Japan had to be kept down. The people had to be taxed to provide grants and subsidies for the uneconomic industries. They were unable to buy more than a minimum part of the product of their own factories. The rest went into ships for the navy, equipment for the army, artificial industries like aluminum for the creation of an air force, stockpiles for war, export goods dumped on foreign markets to acquire foreign exchange for keeping up war-planning and war-making budgets — and finally, into the waste and destruction of actual aggression, first on the continent of Asia and later throughout the Pacific . . .

"The allocation of surplus Japanese industrial potential to countries entitled to reparations, especially neighboring Asiatic countries, should improve the economic balance, and contribute to the political stability, of Eastern Asia as a whole. Militaristic Japanese economic planning deliberately held back the normal industrial development of adjacent areas in Asia. Raw materials of these areas were exploited, but key processes, especially finishing processes, were retained in the home island of Japan, so as to ensure control of a widely ramifying industrial structure. As long as this advantage lay in Japanese hands, neighboring peoples were unable to resist aggressive Japanese economic penetration . . .

"In the future, with strengthened industrial systems, these peoples should be able to trade with Japan on an equal footing, to resist Japanese economic control, and to forestall any attempt at renewed Japanese military aggression. They will then be like sentinels, watching Japan from nearby, so that it may never again be necessary to call on millions of young Americans to fight a war across the whole width of the Pacific and its far shores . . ."

It is a fact that this program was strongly supported by the peoples in the Far East. It is also a fact that American prestige throughout that area was considerably enhanced when this program was announced. Yet, within several years following the end of hostilities, this policy began to fade away under the impact of the so-called practical realists who took charge of our Far Eastern affairs. Their's was a "new approach"—so the American people were told. Japan, they averred, must be given the wherewithal to play her "rightful role" as the "guardian of freedom" in the Pacific. A powerful Japan, 85 million strong, would serve as democracy's reliable bulwark against Communist aggression.

The "Hour of Destiny"

The invasion of South Korea facilitated the propagation of this new line. Thus, by February, 1951, six years after the Japanese surrender, Secretary of State Dulles was able to tell a meeting of the American-Japan Society that Japan's hour of destiny had arrived. He painted a glowing picture of the "new Japan" and the opportunities which awaited its energies:

"The Japanese have always been ambitious people. That is a good thing. Nations like individuals, have the right to be ambitious . . . The fact that that was a wrong method, which failed, does not mean that ambition itself is wrong.

"The new Japan has a great opportunity to exert an influence in Asia by what the founders of the United States called: 'conduct and example' . . ."

More recently the "new role" of Japan in Asia was outlined by the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Walter F. George. Speaking before a meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors (4-24-55). Senator George condemned the original U. S. policy in Japan as "a great mistake." He then proceeded to outline the new mission of Japan. Restored as a great power, Senator George assured his listeners, Japan would become freedom's bulwark against Communist aggrandizement in the Far East.

Thus, the restoration of Japan's primacy in the Pacific has become a central objective of American policy. Toward that end the U. S. has pumped close to $5 billion into Japan, exclusive of the vast sums spent by U. S. troops in that country since the end of the war. Furthermore, our policy makers began to cancel the various political, social and economic programs laid down during the early days of the occupation.

That White Horse

It will be recalled that Admiral Halsey became a heroic figure when he publicly announced his intentions to enter Tokyo on the Emperor's white horse. Halsey's popularity reflected a deep desire and determination of the American people to do away with the Emperor System—the backbone of Japanese feudalism and militarism. Perhaps the fact that Admiral Halsey was never able to make good his boast was a hint as to the future of the original policy for Japan. The Emperor is still around and the cult surrounding his "sacred person" is beginning to flourish again. Last year the Tokyo correspondent for the Manchester Guardian, Hessell Tiltman, reported "the revival of the practice of banzais for the Emperor" at the meetings of newly established "patriotic" organizations (New Republic, 7-12-54).

" . . . The rebirth of the German General Staff—is the most overt of these divergencies thus far on the military front. Instead of following the lead of a Joint Chiefs system, with its political and legislative safeguards . . . the German Defense Ministry revised its Table of Organization . . . along the old OKW type of command structure which so usefully served Prussian militarism.

". . . But a far more basic issue, as far as the United States is concerned, is that this same system could also be used to conceal and distort the true German defense picture from our own and NATO authorities.

"There is solid historical precedent for this. The General Staff did it before, and it is a fact that the 'shadow' OKW after World War I—in which such geniuses as Erwin Rommel were mere captains—concealed their true aims from the Weimar government . . .

"While the combined 14-nation military authorities of NATO are not likely to be as naive as the idealistic (and sometimes corrupt) men of Weimar, could they fool NATO, too? . . ."

(William Richardson, N. Y. Post, 3-27-55)

Another outstanding expert on Japan, W. MacMahon Ball, who represented Australia in the Allied Control Council for Japan, wrote that the Japanese Ministry of Education "has announced plans for re-introducing courses in the schools on what the Emperor really means to Japan despite the surface changes enforced by the occupation" (The Nation, 3-19-55). In this connection the New York Times (5-8-55) reported that the Japanese were once again celebrating the Emperor's birthday. The Times noted that while on the surface Emperor Hirohito had renounced the status of divinity, nevertheless the celebrations created doubt as to "how much war and occupation had changed the fundamentals in the Japanese character."

An Unwavering Spirit

The encouragement of the militaristic spirit is also growing. As early as January 18, 1954, the New York Times revealed the growing revival of the Shinto religion "which, with its worship of imperial and national ancestors, was one means that militarists used to work up nationalist feelings among the Japanese masses." The Times reported that although official subsidies are not granted for this worship, the Japanese Government spent about $55 million in 1953 to support the shrines as "national monuments."

The rise of militaristic organizations has also been noted by Far Eastern experts. (See article "Japan—A Reliable Ally?" No. 44 issue of Prevent World War III.) Last year the Associated Press (7-12-54) reported from Tokyo that about 700 militaristic and nationalistic organizations had emerged and were actively engaged in whipping up the militaristic spirit.

Education for What?

In the field of education there is a growing tendency to stamp out independent thought and academic freedom. Takashi Oka writing for the Christian Science Monitor (4-2-54) revealed that new laws were being put through that were reminiscent of the way thought-control had been imposed upon the Japanese people prior to the war. Indeed, he mentioned several key personalities, all associated with Japanese thought-control in the past, who are again in important positions in the Japanese educational system. The effort to clamp down on academic freedom has been noted by other persons conversant with the situation in Japan.

Zaibatsu

One of the important objectives of the original Allied policy concerned the breaking up of the great Japanese monopolies which had provided the sinews of Japanese war-making power and had exploited and looted the countries invaded by the Japanese armies. Here too, there has been a retreat all along the line. The most powerful of these industrial monopolies, Mitsui, is in the process of reconcentration. The general situation with respect to decartelization and deconcentration was described in the U. S. News & World Report (5-6-55):

"Meanwhile, across the Pacific, big Japanese business is getting bigger and small concerns are getting weaker. Once more the pre-1945 Zaibatsu—cartel—system is taking shape. Breakup of the cartels, engineered in the early days of the American occupation, is a joke now . . .

"Formation of larger trading companies in the foreign-trade field also shows the trend. Before the war, the Mitsubishi and Mitsui trading companies controlled 30 per cent of Japan's trade. Several Mitsubishi fragments recombined last year. Three of the four Mitsui firms have now decided to merge. New merged companies will still be small by prewar standards. But just give them time to grow in the fertile atmosphere provided by the Hatoyama Government!"

The general consensus of current reports on Japan confirms Mr. MacMahon Ball's appraisal that there is a "steady trend back to conservatism and authoritarianism in Japan."

Old Stamping Grounds

Hand in hand with the break down of democratic reform in Japan's internal structure is the return of a pattern of external policies which has a sinister implication. Prior to Pearl Harbor, the Japanese were busy developing what they called their "Greater South East Asia Co-Prosperity Project." This rather cryptic title was a camouflage slogan for Japanese imperialistic policy. It rested on the assumption that Japan had the God-given right to direct the destinies of the Far East and that, if the peoples in that area accepted the status of vassalage, they would "benefit." Of course, it meant that all of the riches of East Asia would be turned over to the Japanese in the interests of "co-prosperity."

While the first target of this policy were the peoples in the Far East, the success of the Japanese challenge presupposed the defeat of the United States. It was this basic requirement which impelled the Japanese to launch their treacherous attack on Pearl Harbor. The lessons of Pearl Harbor made it clear that the United States would have to adopt measures in the post-war period that would thwart any attempts on the part of the Japanese to revive the co-prosperity project.

In the early days of the occupation the Japanese, apparently recognizing the resistance to their pet scheme, said little about it. But when U. S. policy changed, the Japanese found encouragement to speak up with a surprising degree of frankness. In a speech delivered before the Japan Society of Boston (Christian Science Monitor, 3-18-55), Japanese Ambassador to the United States, Sadao Iguchi, outlined Japan's views with respect to the program for the "Arc Of Free Asia," a phrase recently coined by Harold E. Stassen.

Mr. Iguchi seemed to be very enthusiastic about the prospects for the development of this "Arc." He said it was up to Asia to use its own "natural forces —the forces of economics, growth, nationalistic ideals, and normal flow of trade"—with the leverage being provided by economic aid. Mr. Iguchi stated that countries in the "Arc" were striving to better the living standards for their peoples and the economic improvement was so imperative that, unless it was forthcoming, these countries would "collapse."

How could this plan be realized? According to Mr. Iguchi, Japan, as the great industrial country of Asia, would participate in the raising of the economic conditions of her neighbors "as processor of Eastern raw materials for the West; processor and interpreter of Western technology to the East." The Japanese ambassador pointed out that trade was the key to Japan's survival and that the island required new sources of raw materials and new markets. That is why, he said, the idea of multi-lateral trade and technical cooperation, envisaged by the "Arc of Asia" program, was so attractive to the Japanese.

The present Japanese foreign minister Shigemitsu also stressed Japan's role. He told a press conference (New York Times, 3-30-55) that Japan hoped to use her industrial power to elevate living standards throughout South East Asia. He applauded the program of U. S. help in that direction.

U. S. policy to strengthen the economic position of the free countries of Asia is a laudible objective—provided that it does not become the vehicle through which the Japanese gain positions which they failed to attain during the war. Yet, there are disturbing reports which seem to confirm that the so-called "Arc of Asia" program may well turn out to be the opportunity for Japan to become lord and master of South East Asia. For example, Business Week (10-16-54) reveals that the "roots of the whole idea can be traced back to the closing stage of the Korean War. Washington was then looking for some way to get Japan and South Asia together: Japan needed raw materials and markets in South Asia, while South Asia needed Japanese capital goods . . ."

The New York Times (3-10-55) reported that Harold E. Stassen had proposed that Japan "concentrate on trade with South Asia rather than on commercial arrangements with the Communist powers." The Japanese in turn presented Mr. Stassen with detailed plans on how to go about "devedoping other Asian economies." In short, the Japanese hope that with American money they could sink their claws into South East Asia and succeed in exploiting the area under the guise of helping the free Asian countries to improve their standard of living.

"If"

If the plan for helping South East Asia turns out to be a windfall for Japanese imperialistic designs, then the United States will not strengthen the free countries of Asia against Communist expansionism. On the contrary, by associating ourselves with the new drive of Japan we may very well compromise our own positions as an anti-colonial power.

There is a vast difference between a plan that encourages economic equality among the nations of Asia and one which, under the pretense of such equality, foists upon these peoples a new version of Japanese domination and exploitation. We can hardly afford to permit the Japanese colonialists to run loose again. Their reappearance in South East Asia would hasten a re-alignment in that area in favor of the Communists and therefore to the detriment of the free world.

A foretaste of how the countries of South East Asia feel about Japanese ambitions was recently experienced in a conference of these nations at Simla, India. This conference was supposed to set up a program of economic help to be financed at least in part by the United States. However, the conference broke down and one of the reasons for its failure was precisely the fear of many of the countries of South East Asia as to Japanese intentions. The New York Times correspondent, reporting on the reasons why the conference did not succeed, noted that "memories of Japan's pre-World War II Greater South East Asia Co-Prosperity project, a mask for Japanese aggression, are still quite green in this part of the world" (5-10-55).

In this connection, the Manchester Guardian expert Mr. Tiltman, mentioned above, writes: "But Japan's aim has not changed—only her methods. The aim is still the integration of Japanese industry and Asian markets into some sort of co-prosperity sphere . . ." (New Republic, 5-30-55).

Where Is the Evidence

We can anticipate, of course, the defensive arguments of those who are responsible for the "new approach" to Japan. They have told the American people time and again that Japan is our main bulwark in the Far East against Communism and that therefore everything must be done to reinvigorate her power. Even if it were true that Japan is our best friend in Asia, we certainly do not halt the inroads of Communism by providing a wedge through which Japanese colonialists can gain advantage in South East Asia.

But is it true that Japan is our reliable comrade in the Pacific? Where is the evidence, what is the basis for this assumption? There is no evidence and there is no basis for this assumption except the assurances of Mr. Dulles and those Japanese diplomats and politicians who know how to get on the best side of Uncle Sam. The fact is that the Japanese have never been seriously wedded to the cause of Western democracy and if recent portents have any meaning, it is hard to see how we can expect much from the Japanese in the future.

For a while, particularly during the Korean war, Japanese policy seemed to be identical with that of the USA. Our officials were flattered and believed the VIP treatment they received was the real thing. However, when the Korean war ended and with it hundreds of millions of dollars which shored up the Japanese economy, the Japanese began to behave in a rather different way. Whether they got their cue from the late Soviet dictator Stalin is not known, but on December 31, 1951, he told the Japanese people that the Soviet Union had deep sympathy "for the Japanese people in the distress that has befallen them owing to foreign occupation . . ." Needless to say, Mr. Stalin was thinking of the USA and his thoughts must have impressed the Japanese. By 1952, Japanese businessmen were beginning to talk about the "possibilities" of doing business with the Soviets and with Red China.

The gradual warming up between the Japanese on the one hand and the Soviets and Red China on the other, could not fail to influence Japanese politics. In the early part of this year the so-called pro-American politicians were ousted from power. According to the London Economist (3-5-55), the defeat of the pro-American Liberal Party marked a definite break with the past: "The Japanese will become more Japanese. They will, that is to say, henceforward be at once more nationalist and more neutralist in their attitude to other nations. While remaining governed by an essentially conservative government, they will throw off the mantle of American influence and seek to make fresh terms with the Communist powers. And yet, in that their new policy will above all assert the national character of Japan, it will by no means be simply pro-Communist . . ."

The Main Winners

It is not without significance that the two main winners of the election were the present Prime Minister Ichiro Hatoyama and the Foreign Minister Mamuro Shigemitsu. Hatoyama had such a dubious record during the war that he was barred from political activity by General MacArthur. Shigemitsu, who signed the surrender on board the battleship Missouri, served a term on conviction as a class A war criminal. These are the present leaders of Japan. The fact that they should be permitted to attain important political positions is but another example of how far we have retreated from our original objectives.

Under the direction of this leadership Japan is developing its own new approach. Hatoyama is not America's best friend. He has his own ideas as to how Japan should deal with its powerful Western and Eastern protagonists. It is his policy, according to the Christian Science Monitor (2-8-55), which represents "an effort to shake loose from one sided ties with the U. S. and thereby gain maneuvering room in the field of interna- tional relations." The Hatoyama policy was described in Business Week (4-9-55): "10 years after the war, the reaction to defeat and occupation has brought a tide of neutralism and nationalism. It threatens Japan's close postwar ties with the U. S. . . ." Appropriately the title of the Business Week article is "Japan: Talking to Both Sides."

The mood of the Japanese which was registered in the elections, has been disturbing Washington. James Reston, reporting in the New York Times (2-21-55), states: "Japan, in the midst of a divisive election, is increasingly anti-American and increasingly determined to ease her economic and political problems by 'normalizing' trade relations with Communist China and diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union . . ."

Of late, there have been many concrete instances of anti-Americanism which have come to the surface. The hassle over the extent to which the Japanese will finance their rearmament is a case in point. One would expect these allegedly enthusiastic defenders of the free world to spare no effort toward strengthening the military defenses of the "Arc of Free Asia." Yet, the Japanese have been dragging their heels. They have pleaded poverty although Mr. Struve Hensel, former General Counsel of the U. S. Defense Department, pointed out that Japan was spending only about 2½ per cent of its gross national product on armaments which is the lowest of any country in the world receiving U. S. aid.

The fact is, as admitted by all competent newspaper correspondents, that Japan has no intentions of building up armed forces of sizeable efficiency unless the American taxpayers are willing to pay the bill. According to the New York World Telegram (4-18-55), this will be done. It reports that the U. S. "agreed to foot the bill for expanding the Japanese armed forces in a move to avert a slowdown on Japanese rearmament that would stall U. S. defense plans all through the Far East."

Another case where the Japanese are driving a hard "bargain" relates to Japanese debts owed to the U. S. The total sum was in the neighborhood of $2 billion but the U. S. offered to settle for about $600 million spread over 37 years with a nominal interest rate of 2½ per cent. The Japanese have balked at signing this agreement.

In others matters, too, the Japanese have shown a distinct unwillingness to cooperate. Commenting on these pinpricks the London Economist (4-18-55) writes: "It is impossible to say to what extent all these irritations and frustrations are part of a fixed pattern, or are merely coincidental and indicative of an irresponsible attitude of mind rather than of a calculated attitude of policy . . ."

In contrast to the growing animosity which the Japanese display toward the U. S., there is a developing tenderness between them and the Communist bloc. Delegations are sent from Japan to Russia or to Red China while Russia and Red China promptly reciprocate. It is essential to bear in mind that these delegations are not, for the most part, made up of wide eyed radicals. Many of Japan's best known conservative politicians and industrialists have participated in these handshakes. A few months ago, the press reported a meeting of the "Peoples Conference for Restoration of Diplomatic Relations with the Soviet Union and China." The meeting was very well attended by all major political parties. "The chairman was an ultra-nationalist and rightist, Suanosuke Kuhara. On the platform were Soviet and Peiping officials in Tokyo attending the U. N. economic conference. They said nothing. They just smiled" (New York Post, 3-30-55).

Flirting with the Reds

That economic conditions are a major force in the growing rapprochement between Japan and the Soviet bloc is undeniable. Only those who indulge in wishful thinking will try to gloss over the importance that Japan attaches to the Chinese mainland. As the London Economist stated, "the loss of markets and important sources of supply on the mainland have been a crippling blow to the Japanese economy" (3-26-55).

While the Economist has put its finger on a basic element which will determine Japanese policy, its advice to cope with the situation is rather naive. "If Mr. Hatoyama is determined to sup with the devil," the Economist warns, "he should take care to provide himself with a long spoon" (3-26-55). Is it possible that the Economist really believes that those who are steering Japanese policy today are unacquainted with the devil's tactics? Despite the advice of the Economist, the Japanese are working diligently to mend their fences with Red China. A short while ago they concluded a trade pact with China to the tune of $168 million. Of course, the Japanese will try to sooth Western public opinion but that is an old story with the Japanese since they have been quite adept at carrying water at both shoulders.

The Hatoyama policy is moving swiftly. Negotiations are already taking place between the Japanese and the Soviets "to normalize" relations. What this normalization will ultimately mean in terms of U. S. security no one knows at this time. However, the significant fact is that the Japanese are no longer playing the role which our policy makers expected from them. The strange part about this episode is that our policy makers still behave as though the Japanese will always be with us.

The Real Japan

As pointed out in the early part of this piece, our present policy toward Japan has been based on assumptions which are groundless. We have lost sight of Japan's historic traditions as well as her geopolitical position. Mr. MacMahon Ball, who truly knows Japan, observes that though Japan "belongs to Asia, it has been required to behave as though it belonged to the West. The plain fact is that in the cold war Japan loses more, because of the restrictions of its trade with Russia and China, than does its Western associates, and that in a "hot war its prospects of survival would be much dimmer than theirs. To expect Japan to be a trusted armed ally of the West is to defy economic and geographical realities . . ."

Perhaps some will say that Mr. Ball is overstating the case. To satisfy that criticism we present the views of the President of Tokyo University, Dr. Yanaihara, as reported by Joseph Alsop in the New York Herald Tribune (4-25-55). President Yanaihara occupies a unique position in Japanese life. He speaks for the most articulate groups within Japan and that is why Mr. Alsop felt his views important enough to be reported. He told Mr. Alsop that Japan "is now America's barking dog. We now bark or bark not, as the signal may be given." Dr. Yanaihara complained about the alleged indifference of the American forces when the president of another Japanese university objected to our planes landing near his school because they were making too much noise. According to Dr. Yanaihara, the American Air Force ignored these complains. "I ask you," President Yanaihara said, "is this real independence? Is this our country or is it yours?" This little incident merely gave President Yanaihara the opportunity to tell Mr. Alsop that the world was being convulsed by the struggle between the U. S. and the Soviet Union. He did not state who was to blame, but he told Mr. Alsop that all Asians fear "American imperialism" and "American belligerence." The Japanese, he said, do not want to have any part of this struggle since they desire friendly relations with both sides. Therefore, the first and most essential thing is for all American forces to leave Japan immediately.

President Yanaihara spoke in the language of the intellectual, but his views reflected those who guide Japan today. They are the very people and groups who have utter contempt for democracy, who are filled with the feeling of revenge, and who would not hesitate—given the right moment and favorable opportunity—to turn against us.

Assumption or Fact

Will our policy makers wake up in time or shall we continue to walk the rosy path outlined by Mr. Dulles which leads to the abyss? We are told by Mr. Alsop in another column (5-4-55) that President Eisenhower and the National Security Council are in the process of re-examining the fundamentals of Japanese-American relations. According to Mr. Alsop this re-examination starts with the assumption "No. 1, that the Japanese American alliance could in effect be taken for granted for an indefinite term of years."

Mr. Alsop reports that certain American representatives in Tokyo who are in contact with the facts "protested sharply that taking Japan for granted was profoundly unwise." Will they be heard? If Mr. Dulles' policies toward Germany are any guide, then we can be sure that the few who question the realism of our present Japanese policy, will be ignored. As in Germany, we have constructed a program for Japan which is a mixture of short-sightedness and a refusal to face the facts.

"The German people are not ready to be trusted with a military establishment. If given arms before they have developed a far more firmly established democratic tradition, their nation is likely once more to become 'not a state possessing an army but an army possessing a state.' For this assertion I can give you two authorities: John Foster Dulles and Konrad Adenauer. Both of these gentlemen stated what I have just said as their chief reason for supporting the now defunct European Defense Community. Chancellor Adenauer used this argument to obtain ratification of EDC by a reluctant parliament. Secretary of State Dulles made an eloquent speech to Mr. Molotov at the Berlin Conference a year ago, warning that a national German army would constitute a terrible threat to peace. Both are now striving with might and main to create that army . . ."

(By James P. Warburg, Congr. Record, 4-20-55)

". . . The fact is that the Soviet note is right down many Germans' alley. The second largest party in Adenauer's coalition has long demanded diplomatic relations with Russia. Much greater trade with the East, which the Soviet message stresses, has long been the dream of many German businessmen . . .

"The Western diplomats, as they glumly contemplate the Soviet invitation, had best not confine their thoughts to the steadfastness of Adenauer, great though that is. They had best be thinking about the present pressures inside Germany for unification, for more trade and closer diplomatic ties with the Soviets.

"Above all, it might be a mistake to forget that historically the Russo-German affinity has not been so much a case of German innocence and Soviet deceit as, for both parties, a marriage of cynical convenience."

The Coming Deal With Moscow

by

T. H. TETENS

(Author of "Germany Plots with the Kremlin")

When, on May 7, 1945, Fieldmarshall Keitel signed the instrument of surrender at Reims, nobody in the world would have dared to predict that only ten years later the younger set of the Prussian officer elite would again be busy with the organization of a new Wehrmacht of 500,000 men. Who would have dreamt in 1945 that exactly 10 years after the German collapse, history would repeat itself with a world situation in which a revived Germany enjoys a diplomatic Roman holiday by squeezing concessions from East and West? Indeed, with her sovereignty restored, Germany has gone a long way from the capitulation at Reims to the recent Soviet invitation for "direct talks in Moscow."

How did this "miracle" come about?

We know today that the Germans already banked on the coming split among the Allies during the last months of the war. In spite of many warnings raised at that time, the Allies walked right into the trap which had been carefully laid by the German High Command. During the first months of the postwar period, there was, at least on the surface, unity and cooperation on the highest level among the occupation authorities.

When the tug of war began between the USA and the Soviets in their respective occupation zones, the German political leaders offered the United States a ready made program for the revival of a strong Germany. At that time, Dr. Adenauer emerged as the leader of the conservative forces. Expecting a showdown between East and West, he offered the necessary German manpower to strengthen the Western position and he intimated that if the Germans were expected to develop an inclination to fight for the West, they had first to be won over as allies.

The Balance Sheet

We know today that our policy advisers in the Pentagon and in the State Dept. fell for the German bait. Washington diplomats pressured our hesitating western friends. We started with a large scale "WPA" program for the rebuilding of shattered German cities and industries; stopped the dismantling of German plants; brought denazification to an abrupt end. We gave Germany self-government; organized a new state, a new industry, a new currency, a prosperous economy, and backed the build-up of a new national German leader—Dr. Konrad Adenauer. The chancellor artfully dangled German divisions before our nose, and it was this "bait" which lured us into the morass of our European policy.

If we sum up the balance sheet of how Germany profited from the East-West tension, the following picture will emerge:

(1) Germany exploited the breakup of the wartime alliance.

(2) The Potsdam agreements, aimed at rendering Germany harmless, were never carried out.

(3) German economy was built up by the United States and modernized to the tune of billions of dollars.

(4) The United States freed Germany from reparations and unburdened her from most of her domestic and foreign debts. With U. S. support, a new currency was created which has become one of the strongest in the world.

(5) Due to U. S. economic help and political backing Germany became again a dominant economic and political power on the European continent.

(6) Washington installed Germany in a diplomatic and strategic key position where she could easily exploit the East-West conflict.

(7) U. S. insistence on German rearmament and the subsequent ratification of the Paris treaties caused Russia to scrap her assistance pacts with France and Great Britain, a major triumph of German postwar diplomacy. Thus, Washington opened the door for direct Russo-German negotiations.

(8) Ten years after the war's end, Moscow reversed its policy by offering the Bonn Republic large scale Russo-German cooperation with features reminiscent of the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939.

(9) Dr. Adenauer is taking a diplomatic offensive by suggesting that East and West should disarm, but he insists at the same time on the rearmament of a unified Germany that should have freedom to choose her military alliances.

(10) The Bonn Government is in a strong bargaining position to side with Moscow for the removal of all American military bases from Europe. In turn, Dr. Adenauer expects territorial and other concessions from Moscow. As soon as the deal is made, Germany will instigate a campaign for U. S. withdrawal from Europe "in the interest of European peace and security." This plan has already been openly discussed in the pro-Adenauer press.

A brief glance shows that Germany's economic and political postwar gains are staggering. In her global political approach she starts anew with a clean slate, unburdened from liabilities and old concepts. Furthermore, she is not encumbered with obsolete ideas and weapons in the military field.

Her officer corps has been kept intact and well organized in the traditional soldiers associations. They have used their temporary retirement for theoretical military studies and thousands of them went into service in Spain, Argentine, Egypt and other countries. Her geopolitical planning staff has been kept intact and excellently trained. In science she has made great progress and her old world contacts have been reestablished.

A New Start

Unquestionably, Germany is in an excellent position for a new start in world power politics. Her old opponents in Europe are weakened and she has freedom of decision to become either the partner of the United States or of the Soviet Union.

When Germany regained her independence and sovereignty in May of this year, the German papers stated bluntly that a new phase in German history had begun. The question is, what will it bring for the free Western world? Is Dr. Adenauer, as President Eisenhower publicly stated, definitely the trustworthy leader who will go to Moscow and take care of Western interests because he knows the Russians best? Are there valid reasons to give us concern not to trust the Germans and to remember their former double dealings?

Let us find out what is in back of Dr. Adenauer's mind. A close analysis of recent German policy statements by Dr. Adenauer himself and in the pro-Adenauer press shows a complicated labyrinth-like reasoning and arguing which can be boiled down to the following thoughts: With German sovereignty restored, the Bonn Repubic must develop a new world-wide diplomatic activity. The coming Four Power Meeting might endanger Germany's future. There is always the possibility that the Big Four might agree on a settlement at Germany's expense, or that they might keep the status quo, i.e. the present division of Germany. Whatever the solution would be, it would have a bad effect on Germany's future. Dr. Adenauer frequently stated in the past that such a possibility is a "nightmare" to him because it would harm his long range diplomatic planning.

A Means to the End

During the early months of 1955 the German press demanded an immediate German diplomatic initiative in order to forestall such a danger. The German papers made it clear that the signing of the Paris treaties was only a means to an end for Dr. Adenauer, i.e. to gain sovereignty for the Bonn Republic in order to start bargaining with Moscow.

The Russians had categorically declared that after ratification of the Paris treaties there would be no use to talk about the German problem. The Germans also feared that France and Great Britain might have a secret interest in keeping Germany divided. How, then, could the Bonn Government break this deadlock? The "Stuttgarter Nachrichten" of April 28, 1955, stated in an editorial that there is "great urgency" to find a new way "to open East-West negotiations on the question of German reunification," even after the Paris treaties are ratified.

The pro-Adenauer weekly "Christ und Welt" reported on April 28, 1955, that, in order to keep developments in flux and to push German reunification, the "Bonn Government would insist on an immediate East-West conference." The same paper stated in an editorial of May 19, 1955, "there were reports circulating for weeks that the Federal Government had shaped a definite plan for reunification which, for obvious reasons could not yet be made public." The paper added that the time had come for intimate talks between East and West and Adenauer's repeated predictions that the Kremlin would be ready for secret negotiations had been right.

The "Frankfurter Allgemeine" of May 9, 1955, stated in an editorial that the Federal Government would insist that German reunification should have first place on the agenda of the Four Power Conference. The paper discussed even the price that could be offered to the Soviets in turn for German reunification, namely Russia's inclusion in a security system of Europe, German neutrality, and the future withdrawal of U. S. forces from Europe.

"Christ und Welt" of June 2, 1955, in a front page editorial discussed the new German diplomatic initiative: "It is impossible for the Bonn Government to lay its cards on the table. But the question is whether the cards are well stacked." The paper acclaims Dr. Adenauer's emphasis on general disarmament and declares that Germany must furnish a convincing plan for the coming Four Power negotiations, a plan "which first of all must be regarded by the Western Powers as their own (diplomatic) blueprint."

Adenauer's Diplomacy

The foregoing statements show clearly that the Bonn diplomats and geopolitical planners had already worked out a secret plan in the early months of 1955, a kind of diplomatic time bomb, that would open a new phase in European diplomacy and would allow Germany to take an active part in the shaping of future events. Even with our scanty knowledge of background facts we have enough significant circumstantial evidence which allows us to draw certain conclusions. We must not forget that Dr. Adenauer's diplomacy, like the proverbial iceberg, is 4/5 invisible under water. We know today that the German Chancellor has always cultivated secret contacts with the Kremlin rulers. This went on as early as 1948 when, as is known, the former Moscow Ambassador Nadolny shuttled back and forth between West Germany and the Russian headquarters in the Eastern zone. In the summer of 1953, only three months after signing of the Bonn Contractual Agreement, a German delegation of businessmen and diplomats met—with Dr. Adenauer's approval—high Moscow officials in Copenhagen. It was also Dr. Adenauer who, in the spring of 1954, encouraged Budestag member Dr. Pfleiderer to secretly negotiate with Soviet high officials in the Eastern zone and even suggested a trip by Dr. Pfleiderer to Moscow and Peiping. In recent weeks, Dr. Eugen Gerstenmeier, President of the German Bundestag and Dr. Adenauer's right hand, took a trip to Belgrade just before the Soviet leaders arrived there. Dr. Gerstenmeier had a long confidential talk with Tito on "important problems," details of which were not published in the German press. Acording to European press reports, the negotiations between the German and Russian embassies in Paris have also gone on for a considerable time.

'PAINFUL MEMORIES'

(Walker in The South Wales Echo)

Direct Talks with Moscow

There is other evidence to show that for a long time the Adenauer diplomats were eager to come to direct talks with Moscow. When the Russian note of January 15, 1955, made substantial concessions to Germany with regard to free elections, national armed forces and reunification, the entire German press was in favor of acceptance. However, Germany had not regained her sovereignty yet. Nevertheless, Dr. Giselher Wirsing, one of the geopolitical masterminds, suggested "direct talks between Bonn and Moscow" in "Christ und Welt" (1-20-55). Such talks, said Dr. Wirsing, would be possible "whenever the team of our travelling diplomats will meet Soviet diplomats at a neutral place." Stressing the great urgency, Dr. Wirsing recommended quick action because Germany "was under the pressure of time."

That the question of direct Bonn-Moscow parleys was constantly on the minds of Bonn officials is shown by a statement made by Dr. Adenauer's first assistant, Prof. Hallstein, published by the "Frankfurter Allgemeine" (4-5-55):

"Secretary of State Hallstein affirmed that the Federal Government, after ratification of the Paris treaties, could enter independently into negotiations with the Soviet Union."

The monthly "Aussenpolitik" which is close to the Bonn Foreign Office, recommended in the April 1955 issue a "genuine talk with Russia which some day will and must come." It noted hopeful signs for a future close Russo-German cooperation:

"If Russia cannot protect her sparcely inhabitated spaces in the Far East, then sooner or later she will have to be concerned with her security in the West. Then the great hour will come for Europe and for Germany."

From the facts known, we can conclude that during the early months of 1955, unofficial talks went on between Bonn and Moscow concerning the future status of Germany. When Dr. Adenauer, in the second half of May, suddenly recalled the German ambassadors from London, Paris and Washington, there was world-wide speculation for the reason of this unusual German diplomatic move. No sensible explanation was given for the long conference Dr. Adenauer held with his chief diplomatic aides. Subsequent events have shed light on this mystery. The conference took place at a time when Moscow had made the decision to send the carefully worded invitation to Dr. Adenauer for a visit to Moscow. The Chancellor, knowing beforehand the delicate situation that would confront him in early June, hastily called his ambassadors back to Germany in order to instruct them for smooth diplomatic double talk to overcome this extremely complicated situation with as little embarrassment as possible.

There are other signs which indicate that Dr. Adenauer had advance knowledge of the Soviet note. Bonn's large scale preparation for "well informed" journalistic coverage of this sensational event in the American press makes it sufficiently clear that the Soviet note of June 7, was not the same "surprise" for Dr. Adenauer as it was for Paris, London, and Washington.

The Chancellor's delicate problem is how to negotiate, in obvious violation of the Paris Treaty obligations, on Germany's future status, reunification and territorial issues. The German press has clamored for years for direct negotiations with Moscow and has constantly enumerated the favorable features of such a bargain: increased Soviet-German trade, security for Russia's Western front and the elimination of U. S. bases from Europe—everything that Comrade Molotov has wanted for years. Whatever concessions Russia will have to make will be to the benefit of Germany, and not to the Western powers!

How to Handle the U. S. A.

How can Dr. Adenauer negotiate on such questions with Moscow without the Americans becoming suspicious? Adenauer's strategy in this situation must be to "condition" Russia as well as the USA in order to bring both big powers around to his views. In plain English, the Chancellor has to use diplomatic double talk, an art at which he is an unexcelled master. In order to succeed he must first ease the tension and win the consent of Washington for a direct Russo-German bargain.

It must have come as a great shock to Mr. Dulles and the State Dept. when Dr. Adenauer presented his new policy program of "reunification through disarmament and relaxation of tension" before the Bundestag in May. Year after year, Dr. Adenauer had drummed the slogan that only a "policy of strength" would in the end force the Russians to yield ground and to withdraw their armies not only from the Soviet zone but from the whole of Eastern Europe. That was the basic thesis of the so-called "policy of liberation" which Washington intended to buttress with active support of popular revolts behind the Iron Curtain. Now, quite suddenly, Washington is confronted with the big Adenauer switch: to ease international tension! Since early this year, when Washington policy advisers were talking about the possibility of a "Sino-American war by the middle of April," the German masterminds blueprinted a rather different approach to global affairs. Nothing had been changed in the world, except the status of Germany. With restored German sovereignty, Dr. Adenauer was in a hurry to openly start his bargaining with the Soviets. For this he needed a period of relaxation in international affairs.

One wonders why Washington accepted Dr. Adenauer's sudden bid for "relaxation." In the past, Mr. Dulles systematically rejected every suggestion for high level talks or offers on disarmament, whether they came from London or from Moscow. When Churchill in May 1953 suggested a Big Four meeting at the summit, Dr. Adenauer opposed the plan and Mr. Dulles refused to consider the British suggestion. Thus, the Churchill plan for a Big Four meeting was killed. Washington's diplomatic somersault came only two years later when Germany was ready with her new "dynamic diplomacy" in the East.

Indeed, something seems strange with our policy shapers. On May 8, 1955, Stewart Alsop wrote in his column:

"The change of atmosphere in Washington in the last few weeks is astonishing. Hardly a month ago, there was more war talk than at any time since the Korean War. Now the talk is all of peace, with President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles both on record with optimistic remarks about the prospects. Why the change?"

Furthermore, why did Mr. Dulles declare in March of this year: "I came back from this trip to the Far East with a sense of deep concern," and why did he see a change in the world situation a few weeks later which he called "a turning point in history"?

The fact is that under pressure from Bonn Mr. Dulles had to change his entire policy! This was clearly pointed out by the able diplomatic correspondent of the "Christian Science Monitor," Joseph C. Harsch, on May 16, 1955:

"Washington's old reluctance to return to the table of diplomacy with the men of Moscow might have withstood pressure from just London and Paris. But when the West German Government became the principal advocate of such talks, Washington had no choice."

Allied Reactions

There also is wonderment and grave concern in Paris and London about the course of U. S. foreign policy. Looking back on past events, there seems to be much justification in the well known German quip: "Who makes Washington's European policy?—Konrad Adenauer in Bonn!"

The French have become painfully aware of this situation. The Paris correspondent of the "Christian Science Monitor" reported on June 16, 1955:

"Rapidly spreading talk about a 'Washington-Bonn Axis' indicates how strongly French thinking still is dominated by apprehensions of West Germany getting a more and more favored position in Washington at the expense of France . . .

"The Washington correspondent of the conservative Le Monde described the enthusiasm for the new 'Washington-Bonn Axis' as such a success for Dr. Adenauer that 'it would not be exaggerating to say that, considering all points, it is Washington which has aligned itself with the Chancellor's views . . . The Germans have not only become once more the masters of their destiny but more and more the measure by which is determined the destiny of all the others' . . ."

France and Britain clearly see the danger that Germany might break away from the Western Alliance. The highly respected British historian, Prof. Geoffrey Barraclough, raised the warning in a radio lecture over BBC in early May that the Bonn Government was practicing a "black mail diplomacy" and he predicted that Germany would seek a new pact with Moscow (Frankfurter Allgemeine, 5-13-55).

Dr. Adenauer will see to it that the forthcoming Big Four conference will bring no definite results. At present the Chancellor most urgently needs but a "relaxation of tension," not through an agreement on the German problem, but through some diffuse propaganda designed to lull the Americans to sleep.

The Grand Design

During the coming months Dr. Adenauer will continue with his "double-bottomed juggling policy." However, the Chancellor is aware that he is walking on thin diplomatic ice. He knows that there is growing suspicion even in the United States. Some observers in Bonn have noted the strange behavior of the German public, politicians and press. Times correspondent M. S. Handler reported from Bonn (6-12-55):

"It was symptomatic of the state of mind in West Germany that the Soviet invitation was greeted as the most important single development in postwar German history . . . The Government is well aware of the hazardous tasks that confront it . . . The Chancellor does not want to do anything consciously or by inadvertence that would arouse any suspicion that the Germans are returning to the policy of 're-insurance.' . . . It is, therefore, of primary importance to him that in the months to come nothing be done or said that would shake Washington's confidence in his reliability . . ."

Those readers who are acquainted with the material in my book "Germany Plots With The Kremlin," will recall that on the basis of documentary evidence the coming of the Russo-German rapprochement was predicted outrightly. Recent developments have confirmed what the "Frankfurter Allgemeine" (4-3-52) described as Dr. Adenauer's diplomatic grand design:

"The Chancellor follows a tremendous bold plan: First, rearmament, followed later on by talks with the Russians in order to persuade them to remove their armies behind the Bug River. For this goal the Chancellor has been working tenaciously for some time. And because he sticks to his timetable, he is presently (March 1952) opposed to the Russian Note."

Today the features of Dr. Adenauer's "bold plan" are in the process of being translated into German Realpolitik. After the West has lost all its trump cards, the Bonn-Moscow bargaining has begun exactly as I predicted in my book two years ago. The question, "Will Dr. Adenauer make a deal with Moscow?" was then answered with four little words: "target date is 1955."

Whatever might be said in criticism of Dr. Adenauer's cunning diplomacy, even his sharpest opponents must admit that he is one of the shrewdest political leaders of our time.

The Moscow invitation to Dr. Adenauer is a signpost marking the beginning of a new phase in world history. Ten years ago, a defeated Germany was the object of the grand wartime alliance. Today the Bonn Republic appears as Gretchen who sells her charms to the highest bidder.

Dr. Adenauer's trip to Moscow puts the seal under a ten years postwar period marked by ignorance and confusion. In the future we will have to face Ribbentrop's ghost of 1939 brought back to life by the statesmanship of our Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles.

Inside Germany

IMPERIAL GERMANY

"Leading members of the former German imperial house of Hohenzollern are adopting a 'wait-and-see' attitude to a new movement which aims at the restoration of the monarchy in Germany.

"The 'Movement for Kaiser and Reich' wants to bring back the Hohenzollerns as rulers of a reunified Germany, whose frontiers would be 'fixed by justice and international law.'

"Its founders are a 29-year-old Ruhr financial consultant, Wilhelm Werth, and a 45-year-old Westphalian elementary school teacher and former air force officer, Walter Hannemann . . .

"Werth, who was in the Luftwaffe during World War II, says that since the last Kaiser went into exile in Holland in 1918, 'Germany has never been really happy.'

" 'Hitler was for me and many others virtually a god,' he says. 'Many people followed him because he was, in a sense, a symbol for the monarchy. But he misused the good attributes of the German people. That was our disaster . . .' "

(Peter Johnson in the Washington Post, 5-22-55)

SOARING

"West German exports of motor vehicles to the United States increased almost eightfold in the first quarter of this year compared with the same period last year. Sales of German cars principally Volkswagens, in the American market amounted to $8,050,000 in the first three months this year as against $1,010,000 in 1954. Bicycle exports jumped in the same period from $450,000 to $1,170,000 . . ."

(The New York Times, 5-22-55)

GERMAN POLL

"The question to what extent anti-Semitism still prevails in postwar Germany has been examined repeatedly since 1945. In recent years the reappearance of Nazi-tinged groups, frequent desecrations of Jewish cemeteries, the rehabilitation of many high Nazis, and public anti-Jewish manifestations have provoked justifiable apprehensions regarding the attitudes of the Germans toward Jews . . .

"To gauge the attitude of the population, opinion polls were undertaken by public information agencies of the occupying powers of West Germany. The results of these polls have been published and have been interpreted by competent observers as indicating that democratic sentiments remain weak among the bulk of the German people, and that certain portions of the population still harbor attitudes of aggressive nationalism and racism . . ."

(Gerhard Jacoby in the Congress Weekly, 5-6-55)

A NEW LOBBY

"West German 'Aryanizers,' whom the courts compelled to return Jewish businesses or real estate they acquired during the Nazi regime, assembled in this city to elect a new leadership of their organization and to raise funds for the establishment of a lobby in Bonn. The 'Federal Union of Restitution Vicitims,' formerly known as the 'Association for Loyal Restitution,' met behind locked doors. Guests were definitely not welcome. 'Those who are lukewarm, snoopers or antagonists must not be permitted to eavesdrop or participate,' said the invitation to the meeting."

(J. T. A. News, 6-9-55)

NO OBLIGATION

"The German Supreme Court ruled recently that the Government was not obligated to be truthful in information given to the press. This has been protested in the official organ of the German Press Association.

"The journalists' organ referred to the educational efforts of the Western Allies after World War II and the press laws introduced in the United States occupation zone at that time. It apparently was suggesting the decision seemed to be a step backward to the days of Joseph Goebbels, Nazi Propaganda Minister . . ."

FREED

"Former SS Sergeant Martin Sommer, 44, charged with murdering 78 inmates of the Buchenwald concentration camp, was ordered freed from prison.

"A German court ruled that Sommer was so badly injured in a wartime tank explosion that he is unable now, or ever, to stand trial on the charges.

"Sommer, known as 'the killer of Buchenwald,' had been held in the prison hospital for the last five years awaiting trial. Besides being charged with 78 murders, he was accused of beating 'hundreds' of other inmates so badly that they later died of the injuries.

"Sommer's name was mentioned frequently in the trial of Ilse Koch, of Buchenwald, who was convicted in 1951 of atrocities and sentenced to life imprisonment."

SATELLITE PLANS

"Plans to reconstruct aircraft plants in East Germany and build atomic piles to produce energy for 'peaceful uses' were made public today.

"The plans were revealed by Walter Ulbricht, East German Deputy Premier, in a speech at a conference on construction techniques being held in East Berlin . . .

"Included in the program are 'significant projects for the peaceful use of atomic energy and the construction of an aircraft industry,' he reported . . ."

(Walter Sullivan, N. Y. Times, 4-6-55)

STEEL

"West Germany is starting to talk about producing 20,000,000 tons of steel this year.

"This not only would be a new post-war high for the Ruhr steel area. It also would mean West Germany—despite the loss of the Saar and of East Germany—would be making almost twice as much steel as France does . . ."

(Gaston Coblentz, N. Y. Herald Tribune, 4-8-55)

TINKERING WITH TITANIUM

"The giant Krupp heavy industrial works in the Ruhr, forbidden by the Allies to make steel, announced it is now making titanium, the new metal indispensable for jet engines and supersonic rockets.

"Krupp has thus become the first Western concern outside Canada and the United States to make titanium . . ."

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

"For having been an "accessory' to the murder of five Jewish inmates of the Bischadka labor camp in Poland, Nazi guard Jakob Emrich was sentenced to four years and six months at hard labor by the local German Court of Assizes. The prosecution had demanded a seven-year term.

"He killed so many Jews, witnesses testified, that the camp commandant used to say: 'Let Emrich do it—he likes to shoot.' The defendant himself denied this with the assertion that he shot only such Jews as were unable to work due to sickness. 'How was the degree of sickness determined?' the judge asked. 'Well, we guards talked it over and selected those who had to be executed,' Emrich replied."

FOR "OLD TIMES" SAKE

"West Germany and Saudi Arabia are preparing to establish diplomatic relations with each other for the first time. Simultaneously, a team of West German industrial experts is visiting Saudi Arabia . . .

"The German economic team in Saudi Arabia is sponsored by the Bonn Government, but most of its leading figures are from private industry . . .

"The incident that threatened to block the development of German activity in Saudi Arabia last fall involved two substantial German industrial construction firms, of Duesseldorf and Wiesbaden.

"They won a highly promising contract from the Saudi Arabian regime for German construction of small and medium sized industrial plants, plus other projects. However, sharp disputes arose with the Saudi Arabian authorities over the performance of contracts. The Arabians nailed up the German office in Jidda and refused to let four top German engineers leave the country. The indicent became so serious that President Theodor Heuss had to send a message to King Saud, invoking traditional 'German-Arabian friendship.' " . . .

A FOUNDER OF THE SOCIETY HONORED

The thirteenth annual Christian Culture Award Gold Medal presented by Assumption University will be given to Dr. Friedrich Wilhelm Foerster, author of a large number of influential works on ethics, education and politics.

Past recipients have included Jacques Maritain, Frank J. Sheed, Etienne Gilson and Christopher Dawson.

Dr. Foerster, 85, was born in Berlin and is a former professor of the University of Munich. He is now an American citizen, living in New York City. He is not a Catholic, but his works have shown a deep understanding and appreciation of Church teachings.

One of the noted European figures of the last half-century, his strong criticism of two of Germany's leaders during five decades saw him imprisoned by one and pressured out of the country by the other.

The Nazis publicly burned his books in 1935. However, since 1952, five of his most important volumes have been re-published in Germany and met with success.

Dr. Foerster numbers among his honors the blessing of Pope Pius XI for promoting in his writings "right ethics, spiritual renovation and the foundation for peace."

(The Catholic News, 3-12-55)

STRANGE REACTION

"A film based on Adolf Hitler's last ten days in a Berlin bunker, shown last night, stirred moans and tears from German movie-goers. Critics agreed that it may be Germany's biggest post-war box office hit.

"A selected audience watched the world premiere of the Austrian film 'The Last Act.' There were loud cries of 'Oh, no!' when Hitler, dictating his testament said: 'The German people are not worth being led by me.'

"Many women wept when they heard the dictator say: 'A hundred thousand lives do not matter at all'. . ."

The Message of Geneva

The dust has settled at Geneva. Illusions have been dispersed. Now the West can see the ultimate direction it has been travelling since the end of the war. It is toward a dead end.

To ascribe this predicament to the Russians alone is merely another way of avoiding the long overdue re-examination of our German policy. While the Russians have done everything in their power to split western unity and to undermine the democratic cause, is it not clear that our German policy has facilitated the carrying out of their sinister aims?

The Western democracies were supremely confident that they held all of the trump cards in Germany. Handing over billions to the Germans, discarding essential controls prematurely, freeing of war criminals were some of our "trumps."

But the Russians too have played the same game and at times with more deadly effectiveness.

At Geneva, the Western democracies and Soviet Russia vied with each other for the hand of the Germans. Both sides professed unswerving support for the idea of German unity. Yet, there was no agreement. The simple fact is that there will be no concessions from either the Soviets or the West so long as either side fears and mistrusts the intentions of the other. Thus, where neither side will concede to its opposite, both are inclined to raise their bids for the Germans. Where will this lead? It will inevitably result in a steady increase in Germany's potential power and the relative decrease of the strength of her former adversaries—particularly in the West.

The urgency of a realistic approach to the German problem is more than ever a matter of direct concern to the security interests of the Western democracies. A Germany which is disarmed and whose territorial integrity and potential military activities are strictly controlled by the United Nations would create the necessary conditions conducive to German unification which is the professed desire of both, East and West. There is no other safe way.

For years, the Society has warned of the pitfalls which lay ahead in the carrying out of our present policies. The realities of Geneva underline the timeliness and validity of the analysis we made four years ago which is reprinted below.

A CALCULATED RISK?

(Reprinted from "Prevent World War III," Winter issue 1951)

It is commonly agreed that foreign policies, no matter how ell thought out, involve risks—risks which may produce sults diametrically opposed to the objectives of such policies. fiasco in foreign policy is a source of great embarrassment r diplomats, and may easily create a wave of indignation d resentment among the people whose hopes have been in- ted by the speeches and essays of the diplomats justifying eir policies. Yet, time and again, foreign policy experts ve weathered these storms, thanks to the tolerance of the ople in general, who must realize that diplomats, like the st of us, are only human. Perhaps the people are guided the saying, to err is human, to forgive, divine. But can one expect the people to forgive their experts on foreign policy when they discover that discredited policies which have in the past brought them to the brink of ruin have been rehashed and presented as something "new" and "far-sighted?" In other words, are the people expected to accept the rationalizations of statesmen who refuse to learn from past error and persist in pursuing policies which have proven disastrous? Policies which are demonstrably unsound on the basis of past experience do not merit a return engagement. Such policies merely help to repeat the same blunders for which the people have already paid a heavy price.

In this category of discredited policies one must place the Allied program for Germany as it is now developing. In the near future the American people and their Western Allies may be confronted with the fateful decision to rearm the Germans and release them from all basic and effective political and economic controls. In reality this is not a new policy which involves unforeseeable risks. Rather it is the "touching up" of an old theory which was tried after World War I and exploded into the most devastating war which mankind has experienced.

Millions of Americans instinctively fear the present trend in American policy toward Germany. Many of our foremost experts on foreign policy, including Mr. Sumner Welles and James P. Warburg, have warned against this policy. Experienced journalists are also alarmed. For example, Mr. James Reston, the outstanding diplomatic correspondent for The New York Times, noted that, "A Japan that is strong enough to serve as a bulwark against Communism is also strong enough to ally itself with Communism." Mr. Reston believes that this equally applies in the case of Germany.

Another well known Times correspondent, Drew Middleton, points out that the Soviets have many aces to play for the hand of the Herrenvolk, including the return of the lost Eastern territories now under Polish rule. "This may be dismissed as fantastic," writes Mr. Middleton, "but the idea of a German-Russian rapprochement would have been dismissed as equally fantastic in April, 1939." Mr. Joseph E. Evans, foreign policy expert for The Wall Street Journal, shares these views generally. In a penetrating analysis of the implications of restoring Germany's political and military power, he described how the Soviets could woo the Germans. As Mr. Evans points out, Western Germany may still refuse a deal with the Soviets, "but the point is not whether it would refuse or accept; it is that, sovereign and remilitarized, it would be in a position to accept." According to Mr. Evans: "The West is constantly admitting its need for German troops, as it is for German cooperation in the Schuman Plan. The Germans have already ably exploited this Western weakness to get as much sovereignty as they now have and to get concessions even on the troops question. They need only keep raising their price for cooperation to get complete sovereignty and a German national army if they want it."

Why do these seasoned observers make these admissions? It is because they have not forgotten the history of German diplomacy over the past 30 years, and fully understand the strategic position which Germany potentially possesses once the drapes are taken off. Thus Mr. Middleton reports that many believe, "The Federal Republic can get anything it wants from the Allies."

The Germans employed their strategic position with cunning and skill after World War I. They are at it again. A caculated risk assumes that there is an even chance that Allied policy will achieve its objective. But in the case of our present policy toward Germany, this assumption cannot be made. We do not only have the record of past German history, but even the present situation obtaining in Germany tells us that we are travelling along a road studded with pitfalls. The rise of neo-Nazism, the reactivation of Hitler's militarists, the deals between the Ruhr barons and the Soviets, the growing attacks by the German press against the Allies—all of these are danger signals, but more are in the offing.

According to two reliable European sources, namely the London Economist and the Manchester Guardian, we get the following composite of things to come:

The Germans will demand political sovereignty over the Saar.

They will demand that the Bonn Government refuse to recognize the legality of the Nuremberg judgments on German war criminals.

They will demand that the Bonn Government deny the right of the Western powers to intervene in the Federal Republic if Allied interests, prestige and security are threatened.

They will demand a reduction in the occupation costs on the grounds that these costs have not been freely negotiated between the Bonn Government and the Western powers.

They will demand the emasculation of Allied laws dealing with the seizure of German foreign assets abroad.

They will demand the right to conduct their foreign policies with the satellite East without Allied supervision.

They will insist that the Allies help them to regain the territories in the East.

They will demand the categorical restoration of the honor of the German soldiers and the reestablishment of the German General Staff.

Already the newly formed veteran organizations have demanded that, "The men who fought for their fatherland and 'for Europe' and the officers who kept their oath to their supreme commander (Hitler), must be rehabilitated and the Allies' work of 'glorifying treason' must be undone." (London Economist, September 8, 1951.)

This is the price which the Germans will put on the table for "cooperation" against the totalitarian East. But this is not

"The central problem of Europe remains the future of Germany . . . The German Federal Republic has joined NATO; but as long as NATO is only a military alliance, the Germans will regard it as merely a means to the end of reunification . . .

"Yet the possibility of a unified, rearmed Germany, free to engage in its traditional power politics, must be of the greatest concern not only to western Europe but to the United States . . ."

(Senator Richard L. Neuberger, "Freedom & Union, 10-55)

"A day of reckoning will come over Germany just as it came over China. I suspect that the resulting explosion in the U. S. will make the outcry on China seem like a pleasant afternoon tea.

"For in Germany it will be seen that we have not only lost the second world war—and that the Nazis, rather than we, were the victors, but that we have, unconsciously, prepared the way for us to lose a third world war, if it comes."

(Senator Guy M. Gillette, N. Y. Town Hall, 4-19-50)

cooperation. It is German dictation. The London Economist, discussing this all-important issue, seems to be shocked over the German attitude. Yet it prefers to hope that somehow, some way, it will change. "If there is any common sense left in Western Germany" writes the London Economist, "a bargain can still be struck." Did we have to bargain with Britain or with France when the Western world faced the mortal danger of Hitlerism? How is it that we must bargain with the Germans in the face of the growing threats of Soviet totalitarianism? Those who believe we can bargain with the Germans and thereby obtain their cooperation, are projecting their own ideals of diplomacy and morality on the standards which have governed Germany since the days of Bismarck. Striking a bargain with Germany is, in effect, placing our security at her mercy.

The London Economist ignores this cold fact. It prefers to scold the Germans, telling them that while the Allies are willing to meet the Germans half way, "they will not be willing to put money down for nothing. The Germans will have to realize—to put the matter in its bluntest terms—that there is a question whether they can be trusted." Do not the scars of bomb-ridden Coventry serve as a grim reminder that the Germans cannot be trusted? We believe that most West Europeans share the same feeling of distrust for the former enemy.

They fear the duplicity of the Germans, who are old hands at dividing their foes. They fear the Germans, not only because they may join their forces with the Soviets, but also because they may well make a new attempt at dominating the West or provoke a new war for their own selfish motives.

Repeating the observations of American journalists, the New Statesman and Nation writes: "West Germany rearmed and independent, in fact if not in form, would be in a unique position to sell her favors to the highest bidder. . . . It is difficult to resist the conclusion that once sovereignty is restored to Bonn and rearmament becomes a fact, West Germany will become the harlot of Europe, the more exclusive and expensive because of her scarcity and the unsurpassed physical assets she enjoys."

It is our considered judgment that an investigation of present-day Germany is imperative. The American people have been told to invest their confidence in the present German leaders and the forces they represent. Common prudence requires investigation before investment. Until the people of the West are given the facts concerning the leadership of Germany, the state of its economy, the degree of democratization, only then should we consider the question of accepting Germany as a partner of the West.

REFLECTIONS ON ADENAUER'S LEADERSHIP

During the 1953 election campaign in Germany, Konrad Adenauer assured an audience in Cologne that Providence had chosen Germany for special assignment. "The fate of Germany," he declared, of Europe and of Christion culture depends on the result of the election because God has given our country the mission to save the Western and Christian world" (The New Republic 7-27-53).

As a seasoned politician Chancellor Adenauer carefully prepares his speeches with a view toward evoking the maximum favorable response. The crusading spirit, rekindled by his words, could have appealed to Germans of different generations. The very old might have recalled the "blood and iron" days of Bismarck while younger generations could have turned their thoughts to German leaders of a more recent vintage.

Although Adenauer was victorious in the elections, it it is difficult to tell to what degree it was a personal triumph as against the electorates' reaffirmation of the spirit of his Cologne speech. From the evidence on hand it does seem that most Germans believe that Adenauer's leadership is inseparably bound up with Germany's "holy mission to save the Christian world." The only German leader who came close to that uniqe position was Adolf Hitler. Neither Bismarck, Kaiser Wilhelm II, nor Adenauer have been able to achieve the sanctity that grew around the person of "Der Führer." Indeed, there is even less respect for "Der Alte" than was shown toward Bismarck or the Kaiser. In and out of parliament he is closely watched and criticized unhesitatingly. True, he has managed to brush off these criticisms in an almost contemptuous manner for it is a well known fact that he regards "too much" democracy as a liability to efficient government. Nevertheless, in the eyes of the German people he is a politician, albeit a rather successful one, but still subject to repudiation and ignominy should the situation warrant it.

For Adenauer time is relative. He is a man in a hurry but in the public eye he is obliged to walk at a nonchalant pace. Despite this frustrating predicament the Chancellor has maintained a majestic calmness, especially when he is in the company of Americans. Fortunately, there are always the French—just in case he must give vent to his pent-up feelings. In Germany he is not regarded as a bold innovator of policy but a man who knows how to perform his duty. In the United States he takes on the stature of a leader who is one step ahead of Moses. Here, his speeches are reported as though they were "Commandments from Above."

Thus, where Hitler succeeded in Germany as a sort of demigod, Adenauer has been raised to these lofty heights in the U. S. A. For many adult Americans, particularly a number of our experts on Germany in and out of government service, Adenauer is the superman come true. It is not an uncommon experience to find people admitting that U. S. policy toward Germany may be risky, but . . . and it is a big but . . . they will say no more when the subject of Adenauer is mentioned. He is sacred ground. To even think that the German Chancellor may be wrong, or, at worst untrustworthy, is to side with the devil. The zeal and devotion accorded to Herr Adenauer compares favorably with the rapturous enthusiasm exhibited by teen-agers toward a Frank Sinatra or an Eddie Fischer.

Many of his followers here equate loyalty to America with obeisance to Adenauer. While we have not heard his name mentioned in the same breath as the Lord, he is regarded among his devotees as having the inside track to Him. In this connection, a former Communist, Freda Utley, recently described Adenauer as "God's gift to Germany and to us" (Facts Forum News, October 1955).

Needless to say, the Chancellor does not resent the adulation showered upon him by the faithful. Aside from the fact that it must serve his personal vanity, the Adenauer cult has paid off handsomely to divers personalities in more ways than one. Above all, it has restored Germany to a position of power and importance, perhaps more so than before the war. This is not easily recognized by many people in the U. S. A. although the view is commonly shared in Europe "that the Germans have again won the war" (The Magazine of Wall Street (10-1-55). It is this aspect of the Adenauer cult which has a lasting value and is readily appreciated by Germans of all persuasions.

> "Our position at Geneva is inspired primarily by loyalty to Dr. Adenauer, by a determination not to concede anything which might be construed in Germany as rocking Dr. Adenauer's boat. If we concede an inch, we fear that Dr. Adenauer's German opponents will be encouraged to concede a yard. So on Germany the West is immobilized and unable to put itself in a position to negotiate.
> "The trouble with this position is that in the not so very long run it will alienate us from the Germans who mean, if they must, to negotiate for reunification directly with the Soviet Union and the East Germans . . ."
> (Walter Lippmann, N. Y. Herald Tribune, 11-1-55)

However, the Germans have not been swept away by the successes achieved by "Der Alte." They know that he is mortal and, more important, they are aware of the fact that in the realm of diplomacy as in economic affairs the law of diminishing returns operates inexorably. Thus, they prepare for the day when circumstances may require a new approach. They are resolved that the gold which they have reaped under Adenauer, shall never turn into brass. This is not to say that Adenauer as long as he lives, is not equipped to adapt his leadership to changing circumstances. It merely means that the Germans are taking no chances.

All of this may come as a rude shock to Adenauer's admirers in the U. S. A. There is no evidence to show that they even contemplate the idea that "God's gift" may be ruthlessly snatched from them. They seem to be deaf to all warnings and blind to all portentous signs. Indeed, if past performance is an indicator of things to come, we can anticipate that his loyal followers here will defend him, come what may. Toward this end they may concoct a new "stab in the back" myth to the effect that the Chancellor was "crucified" by evil forces who prevented the U. S. A. from going all out on his behalf. This line has already found expression in the German language newspaper The Bürger Zeitung of Chicago which is influential among persons associated with the Adenauer cult.

In the August 11th issue of this paper we read that the Geneva Conference was a "fiasco." President Eisenhower is personally involved in a nefarious plot hatched by such evil men as Bernard Baruch "and of the Sanhedrin of which he is the lead (sic)." The Bürger Zeitung screams that the "Fatherland" was thrown to the "scrapheap and Adenauer to the Reds. What he has been dreading all the time, his abandonment by the West, has now become an accomplished fact." The Bürger Zeitung states that Adenauer must act with determination in the face of this betrayal. "If he (Adenauer) had any pride, he will now have to swallow it if he wants to play the role of Bismarck with whom he has been compared, because without the acceptance of the Red demands there will be no reunification."

Regardless of Adenauer's future fate, it must be admitted that his leadership has hardly been equaled in recent times in terms of achievement. Some who have studied this phenomenon have ascribed Adenauer's sucess to his unparalleled wisdom and statesmanship. Undoubtedly the members of his cult would support this view except that they would probably add to it his almost godlike qualities. There are others who are not so sure. They prefer to explain the Chancellor's accomplishment s basically a reflection of our own monumental stupidity. Perhaps it is a combination of both, perhaps we shall ever know.

HELPING THE FORCES OF EVIL

Several months ago the U. S. News & World Report, a magazine which has a nation wide circulation, published a copyright interview with the former German Field Marshal Albert von Kesselring under the caption "How Hitler Could Have Won The War." The Field Marshal dilated at length on the power of the Nazi armies and the unmatched wisdom of the German General Staff. He assured his interviewer that it was Hitler's "mistakes" which prevented the otherwise invincible Wehrmacht from licking the combined Allied forces. In spite of these criticisms von Kesselring's tone seemed friendly toward his former boss. In contrast, his attitude toward the Allies was harsh and contemptuous.

Von Kesselring declared that it was the Allied leaders' fault and shortsightedness which forced Hitler to fight a two front war. If only the Western Allies had capitulated to the Germans, he said, Hitler's legions would have had no trouble in destroying the Russians and the whole world would have been thankful for this great German contribution to the safeguarding of civilization. As it turned out, the Western Allies refused to acknowledge Germany's overlordship, ergo, they are responsible for the rising tide of Communism in postwar Europe. But the Allied responsibility, according to von Kesselring, dots not stop there. The Allies are also responsible for unleasing World War II. Had Britain put pressure on Poland in 1939 to submit to Germany's demands, there would have been no war at that time for, according to the former Field Marshal, the German General Staff was preparing for war for the year 1948!

The New York Herald Tribune correspondent Roscoe Drummond devoted an entire column denouncing this "most pernicious, poisonous, purposeful, massively misleading pro-war, pro-Nazi-innocence propaganda . . . "

Dead, or just resting?
(Burck, Courtesy Chicago Sun-Times)

(9-8-55). Mr. Drummond's anger is understandable but it is misdirected. After all, it was a leading American weekly which gave this German militarist the opportunity to mouth what Mr. Drummond called "the ruthless, immoral, iron heel, evil doctrine . . ." Did the U. S. News & World Report examine Herr von Kesselring's credentials? We should like to believe that this publication would have had nothing to do with this evil character, had it been apprised of his past activities. Yet, it seems incredible to us that this magazine employing experienced correspondents and boasting of a well staffed research organization, should be ignorant of von Kesselring's services to Hitler.

Von Kesselring was Commander-in-Chief of the Nazi Armed Forces in Italy. He was also one of Goering's top Luftwaffe officers and helped direct the bombing of Britain in 1941.

In 1947, a British court sentenced von Kesselring to be shot on two counts: (a) responsibility for the massacre of hundreds of Italian civilians in March 1944; (b) responsibility for inciting the murder of more than 1000 Italians who had opposed the Nazi occupation. The execution of Italian hostages was pursued relentlessly and without mercy by von Kesselring. It was von Kesselring who ordered 10 Italians to be shot for each of 32 Nazi soldiers who were killed in Rome; altogether 335 Italian civilians were murdered on this occasion.

Von Kesselring's life was spared by the British, and in October, 1952, he was freed. The Associated Press (10-23-52) reported that the British had granted clemency because von Kesselring "was suffering from cancer." A strange kind of cancer it was. A few months after his release he ran for public office in West Germany. Nor did his "cancer" prevent him from accepting leadership of the most militaristic organization in Germany today, the Stahlhelm. Prior to World War II the Stahlhelm played a decisive role in enabling Hitler to gain power. The new Stahlhelm under von Kesselring's guidance continues the old traditions. Von Kesselring described the functions of the Stahlhelm in these words: "We must create the German soldier from the corpse of 1945—we must recreate the German military spirit of 1914-19 and 1939-45." Von Kesselring has boasted of his friendship with Hitler: "I can only explain Hitler's striking confidence in me," he once said, "by the fact that he knew I dealt with him without any mental reservations." Von Kesselring's imprisonment did not shake his firm belief in Hitler's cause. If it had been left up to the Nazi Wehrmacht, he declared upon his release from prison, "we would have had a united Europe long ago."

This in brief is the von Kesselring record. What is frightening in the whole episode of his interwiew in the U. S. News & World Report is the fact that so far as we know, only one important newspaper commentator had the courage and decency to denounce this notorious killer.

Yet, there is more to be said about the significance of the von Kesselring interview. In the last analysis, it would not have occurred had one of the basic war aims of the U. S. been carried out both in letter and in spirit. The aim was the destruction of German militarism and all its works. In the case of von Kesselring himself we find that he was taken into confidence by high U. S. military authorities. In February, 1954, von Kesselring together with 20 top pilots of the Nazi Airforce toured an important U. S. airforce base in Germany. Several months later, a leading American general had a reunion with von Kesselring in Frankfurt, Germany. The last time this U. S. general faced von Kesselring was during the war in Italy, the scene of von Kesselring's crimes. The New York Times published a photograph of the get-together showing the U. S. general and his wife smiling as she posed with von Kesselring arm in arm.

By compromising one of the U. S.'s basic war aims, the German militarists were able to revive their sinister activities. There would have been no wining and dining of Herr von Kesselring; there would have been no interview in the U. S. News & World Report; and there would have been no need for Mr. Drummond to vent his anger had we not, through our German policy, created the climate which spawns the rebirth of German militarism. The essence of our present German policy is mirrored by the von Kesselring interview. It is reflected in the secret release from prison of one of Hitler's trusted lieutenants, Sepp Dietrich, the man responsible for the cold-blooded slaughter of American GIs taken prisoner during the battle of the Bulge. Our policy makers cannot have it both ways. They cannot preserve America's moral prestige while at the same time continue to coddle war criminals and insist on the rearmament of Germany.

> "Not only with a feeling of revulsion but also with a sickening impact does one view the successive release of high ranking militarists, those Hitler henchmen who did not shun to commit the most heinous atrocities to please their master. The parole of former SS-General Dietrich strongly insults the feeling for justice of those peoples who have suffered the bitter woes and fears at the hands of mass murderers of his ilk. After Mackensen, Kesselring, List, Milch Schörner, named Ferdinand the butcher, and by far too many other minions of Hitler, this Dietrich, one of the most sadistic killers, is shown a mercy, the meaning of which was never known to him . . . If this release is intended as a favor to the Germans, is it forgotten that they only respect force and that such a policy will only awaken the arrogance of the Nazis who are still around? . . ."

Alibiing for Adenauer

The results of Adenauer's mission to Moscow created difficulties for those who have taken on the task of maintaining the Chancellor's prestige in the USA. The picture of Adenauer as the irreconcilable crusader against the godless forces of Communism was in danger of losing its luster. Thus, we find almost a desperate scramble among his apologists and admirers to protect the "Old Fox's" reputation. Judging from the various contradictory "explanations" it would appear that the usually efficient public relations apparatus failed to coordinate the labors of those who tried to "clarify" the meaning of Adenauer's sojourn in Moscow.

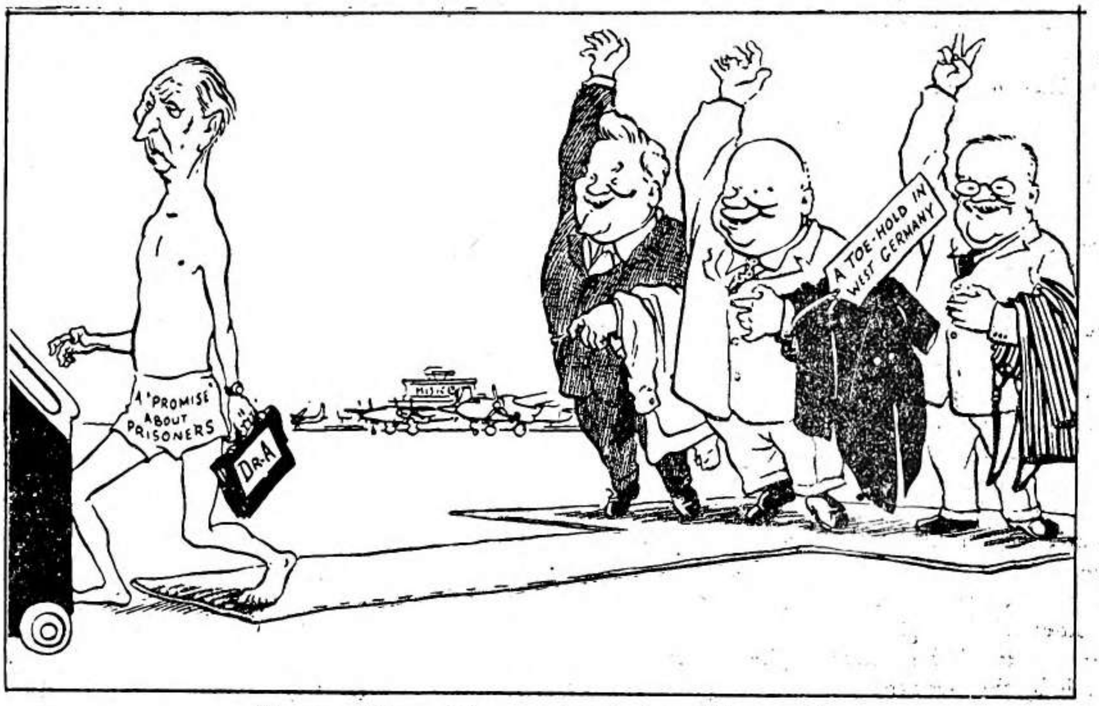
The U. S. publication "Human Events" (9-17-55) blames it all on the British. They were the culprits who "put pressure on Adenauer to conclude the pact reopening diplomatic relations with Moscow." Adenauer is depicted as resisting this pressure "up to the last minute," but at the zero hour the British finally put on the squeeze and the proud Chancellor of the Germans submitted.

Christopher Emmet, writing in the New Leader (9-26-55), provides the reader with another view of what happened in Moscow. If Adenauer appeared to have weakened in his negotiations with the Kremlin, "the fault must rest with the immense pressure of pacifist opinion which the spirit of Geneva has unleashed." Thus, the main culprit for Mr. Emmet is the "spirit of Geneva."

The New York Times, which never seems to let the Chancellor down during embarrassing situations, declared editorially that it was not the Chancellor's fault. "The Chancellor could scarcely stand apart and reject diplomatic relations which the Western powers already maintained. And he made the most of the bargain in the circumstances" (9-25-55).

There have been more lengthy rationalizations for the Chancellor's "surprising" behavior in Moscow. The foreign editor of the Scripps-Howard newspapers Ludwell Denny focusses his criticism on the Allies, particularly the French. French antipathy toward Adenauer's policy of friendship; France's withdrawal of three divisions from NATO to be sent to Africa; France's alleged appeasement policy vis-a-vis the Russians compelled poor Adenauer to make the best possible deal. In addition to the discouraging attitude of the French, Mr. Denny points to other "reasons" which made it necessary for Adenauer to deal unilaterally with the Kremlin. The Cyprus conflict, the Tito double-cross, and the Allied troop withdrawal from Austria induced more Germans "to think about negotiating with Russia" (New York World Telegram 9-23-55).

Norbert Muhlen, who writes frequently on Germany and who is a staunch supporter of the Chancellor, recently had what was reported to be an "exclusive talk" with Adenauer (New Leader 12-24-55). However, in reading this interview one finds that there is much talk by Mr. Muhlen but very few direct quotes from the Chancellor. As if to cover up his "sins," the Chancellor is quoted as stating that the West must not relax its vigilance. Other than that warning which is repeated several times, the Chancellor is non-committal. Nevertheless, Mr. Muhlen does imply that one of the reasons that Dr. Adenauer did not do so well in Moscow, was that he was taken by surprise as to the kind of men who rule world Communism. It seems that Adenauer, according to Mr.



"Just another of those retreats from Moscow."

(Cummings in The London Daily Express)

Muhlen, never encountered persons who were so ruthless as the men in the Kremlin. Adenauer "learned that the Soviets' smile was as dangerous a weapon as the Soviet fist . . ." Yet, even here, the reader is kept in the dark as to the basic reasons why Adenauer decided to make friends with Moscow. Apparently, even Mr. Muhlen was dissatisfied with the rather vague statements of Herr Adenauer. Consequently he reports that other German participants in the negotiations complained of the "diplomacy by third degree methods" practised by the Soviets. Toward the conclusion of this strange interview, Mr. Muhlen tells us that it was Adenauer's "chief domestic policy adviser in Moscow" who insisted that he accept the Soviet olive branch while his foreign advisers urged that he reject it. Once again we are left in the dark as to whether this explanation comes directly from Adenauer himself.

The most elaborate dissertation that we have seen up to date, was written by Richard C. Hottelet for the New Leader (10-17-55). Mr. Hottelet is supposed to be an authority on Germany, having represented the CBS broadcasting system in that country for a number of years since the end of World War II. He admits that prior to Adenauer's trip the Chanceller assured Western officials that his talks with Moscow would be "primarily . . . exploratory . . ." Mr. Hottelet was merely confirming a well known fact that Adenauer had given his word to Allied policy makers that diplomatic relations with the Soviets were out of the question unless substantial and concrete concessions were made to the Germans. Naturally, Mr. Hottelet does not believe that the Chancellor was engaging in a piece of duplicity, nor does he feel that "physical collapse" or "political amnesia" explain the Chancellor's about-face. There are many reasons, Mr. Hottelet declares, for Adenauer's "sudden" change with respect to his position on the question of diplomatic relations with the Russians. In this connection, we have extracted what we believe to be the most important reasons given by Mr. Hottelet:

(1) The Chancellor was "overwhelmed" and out-maneuvered" by his Russian counterparts.

(2) The Chancellor did not adequately prepare for the conference as he had done for other negotiations (Mr. Hottelet does not mention that Adenauer had roughly three months to prepare and came to Moscow with more than 100 assistants).

(3) The Russians employed a subtle kind of psychology in their talks with the Germans. They sought to build up Germany's greatness and flattered the ego of Adenauer and his assistants who were constantly reminded of the latent power of Germany.

(4) the Russians applied psychology with deft skill when Adenauer was invited to the famous Bolshoi Theater in Moscow. Originally, Mr. Hottelet tells us, the program called for the performance of Boris Godunov. However, for Adenauer's "benefit" the Russians staged Romeo and Juliet. Mr. Hottelet described in vivid terms how the audience nearly went wild when "Adenauer grasped and shook both of Bulganin's hands" at the point when Montague and Capulet embraced each other at the sight of their dead children, the beautiful Juliet and the dashing Romeo. The performance was most deeply felt by the Germans and their hosts, reports Mr. Hottelet.

(5) Mr. Hottelet tells us that Soviet blackmail was also a potent factor during the negotiations. He quotes the Social-Democrat Carlo Schmid who accompanied Adenauer to Moscow, that the Russians threatened to "look around for other partners" if the Germans did not extend a friendly hand.

(6) Mr. Hottelet dwells for a moment an another consideration, namely the danger that "German arrogance" would reemerge. If the Germans refused the friendly offers of the Soviets, wouldn't this appear as an arrogant rebuff? Wouldn't the Soviet Union regard the West German leaders as revanchists and provocateurs who wanted only to humiliate the Soviet Government?

(7) Another point stressed by Mr. Hottelet is that the Germans did not want to appear "as violators of the Geneva spirit, dogs in the manger and general world nuisances."

(8) It should also be borne in mind, Mr. Hottelet warns his readers, that the usually energetic Chancellor of the Germans was "fatigued from heavy infighting at the conference table and ceaseless fencing over vodka and caviar." Truly, Herr Adenauer had never been confronted with "such merciless pressure."

(9) Finally, it might have dawned upon Adenauer that by accepting the original Soviet invitation, he had "in fact committed himself to diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union under practically any conditions short of dishonor."

After having analyzed minutely the hidden motives which impelled Adenauer to come to terms with the Kremlin, Mr. Hottelet admits that perhaps the whole truth of what happened in Moscow "must await the improbable publication of Adenauer's frank memoirs . . ."

Fortunately, it is not necessary to await the publication of Adenauer's confessions. The mainsprings of Adenauer's policy are not beyond present discernment. Indeed, Adenauer has been more frank than Mr. Hottelet would have us believe. It is a matter of record that the Chancellor has been in the forefront of those who have insisted that only a policy of strength would force the Russians to agree to Western terms. He has repeated this thesis on a number of occasions. Usually, these statements were passed out for foreign consumption with particular reference to the U. S. A. Yet, when he returned from the Soviet capital he spoke in different terms. As reported in the New York Times (9-17-55), the Chancellor declared that he could no longer ignore the fact that the Soviet Union was "one of the most powerful states in the world. This cannot be doubted, this cannot be ignored, and it would have been unwise for us to have turned down the offer to establish diplomatic relations." Defending his position before the Bundestag on September 22, 1955, he said that the lack of diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia was "an anomaly since German reunification cannot be effected without the cooperation of Moscow." The Christian Science Monitor (9-16-55) reported that Adenauer admitted that "diplomatic relations were bound to come sooner or later." Commenting on the Chancellor's arguments, the CSM correspondent stated that it was strange for the Chancellor, of all people, to state "that the strength of the Soviet Union must be taken into account and that a policy of coexistence now should be tried."

Did Dr. Adenauer make these discoveries in the few da that he was wined and dined in Moscow? Was it a twelf hour revelation, as the press reported? To put it another w

Did the Soviet Union transform itself into a mighty power ust as Adenauer was about to break off negotiations? To ask hese questions is to answer them.

Adenauer knew all along that in dealing with Moscow he vould have to discard the propaganda which had been so ffectively employed with the Western powers. It was Adenuer who told the West that negotiating from strength would orce the Russians' hand, but it now appears that he knew hat such a position would produce the opposite effect. Natrally, when the staltemate occurred at Geneva, conditions ere ripe for unilateral negotiations with the Russians.

Mr. Walter Lippmann pointed out in a significant article 9-15-55) that diplomatic negotiations had been going on etween Bonn and Moscow since the spring, that is, before Moscow sent its official invitation to Adenauer. Lippmann urther reveals that the basic decision to establish diplomatic elations "had been reached in Bonn, presumably also in Moscow, by the time West Germany joined NATO." Yet, while the Germans and Russians were holding their secret lks, Adenauer was prodding the Western Allies to negotiate rom strength and to demand that Moscow accept the Western erms for the unification of Germany.

In a sense, Mr. Lippmann's revelations were confirmed by Adenauer himself. Last year, he told American journalists of is plan to enter into diplomatic relations with the Soviets. n a copyright interview with the U. S. News & World Report (12-31-54) he said that, after the ratification of the Paris treaties, diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union would happen soon "if the chance offers itself." In this connection he stated that it would all depend on the "will" of the Soviets. Anyone familiar with Soviet diplomacy knows that the Russians do not extend invitations unless they have assurances beforehand that the intended guests will accept.

The ways of Adenauer remind us of the tactics of his close friend Gustav Stresemann. It was Stresemann who succeeded in his own words in "combining this Locarno policy (friendship with the West) with a consolidation of our relations with Russia." Stresemann proved that it was possible to revive Bismarck's policy of operating simultaneously on Eastern and Western orientation.

The noted authority on Soviet Russia, Prof. Edward Hollett Carr, notes that in recent years Stresemann was bitterly attacked "from the Soviet and from the Western side by writers who depicted him as a monster of duplicity . . ." Prof. Carr declares that this is fundamentally an unfair description of Stresemann's statesmanship. He writes that "Stresemann was a German patriot who valued both the Eastern and Western connections, for through that policy Germany rose again as a mighty power." Admittedly, Prof. Carr notes, Stresemann had to do some shrewd maneuvering but this does not detract from his honest patriotism. "Few statesmen," Prof. Carr observes, "fail in an emergency to recognize the duty to lie for their country." Whatever can be said of Adenauer's mission to Moscow, no one can question his patriotism, let alone his statesmanship.

SEFTON DELMER ON ADENAUER'S MISSION TO MOSCOW

Moscow: "My information is that Dr. Adenauer would like to get a subtle agreement which, while leaving the Americans confident of his loyalty to them, would nevertheless make it clear that he is more valuable to the Russians and that the U. S. must pay more to keep him loyal."

(London Daily Express, 9-12-55)

Moscow: "I find the Russians grinning with satisfaction and triumph. . . . Marshall Bulganin shook hands with Dr. Adenauer and held on for at least ten minutes, looking into the Chancellor's eyes. For a moment the two rows of delegates waited as though at a loss what to do next. The Communist Party chief Khruchev irrepressible as ever threw out his hands in a gesture of 'Well, what more do you want?' Dr. Adenauer grinned and got up. The seven smiling Russians and the seven dejected Germans filed into the room next door—to the inevitable caviar, champagne and vodka. Should these Germans be so depressed? I do not think so. For they have achieved a contact with the East which may help them to impress their own value on Washington. And now the Germans hope that they are going to establish trade relations with Moscow on a really big scale."

The "Old Time" Spirit

By

JOHANNA PRYM

Thousands of wartime German paratroopers met at Wuerzburg to loudly proclaim their distaste for the proposed new-model German soldier.

The fourth meeting of the six-year-old Federation of German Paratroopers, unlike the three previous meetings, went unmarred by clashes or rowdyism. But heated criticism of the new German army and repeated calls for a return to the "traditional" German military spirit put Bonn defense officials on the warpath.

Although the report of the convention's official Bonn delegation was not revealed, revived rumors of neo-nazism swept through the capital . . .

Amid an atmosphere of march music and cheers, the convention speakers went from the army problem to an appeal for the "peaceful reunification" of Germany and a return of all Allied and Soviet war prisoners.

Between speeches the some 5,000 veterans swarmed through the hall cutting up old touches, seeking autographs from the VIPs and former commanders and singing old—and permitted—military songs.

Representatives from the Bonn government mingled with ex-parachutists from East Germany, Italy, Sicily and Spain. On the first day of the two-day meeting, 100 vets from the disputed and riotous Saar were given an enthusiastic greeting . . .

Scheduled speakers included Rolf Linder, leader of the Northern Bavarian group of paratroopers, Arnold von Roon, president of the association, and former generals Kurt Student and Hermann Ramcke.

An unexpected guest, invited by the Africa Corps faction, drew the biggest ovation, despite his reluctance to speak.

The guest, former Field Marshal Albert Kesselring, who together with Student and Ramcke were convicted by the Allies of war crimes, was welcomed with a standing ovation.

At one point, the veterans began a rhythmic, in-unison chant of Kesselring's name prompting him finally to walk to the stand.

In a few words, he called for a lasting comradeship of the German war veterans, and bolstered the other speakers' calls for a return to a "traditional" German army.

All the speakers took a running start at Bonn's defense plans, and Von Roon openly criticized the German "chief of state" for "boasting of the fact that he never was a soldier."

Von Roon never mentioned names, and left in doubt whether he was referring to West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer or West German President Theodor Heuss . . .

Von Roon teed off on the government a second time when he accused it of failure to win the return of all war prisoners, "not only those in the Soviet Union, but also those in the hands of the Western powers."

"Our last hope," he said, "lies in Chancellor Adenauer's impending visit to Moscow."

Student, who jarred observers by greeting the assembly with a waving upraised arm salute, was slated as the principal speaker of the convention.

The salute later was adopted by the other generals, who used it as the congregated veterans filed past the stage before leaving the hall.)

The former commander of the 7th Air Division won his biggest round of applause, however, when he officially welcomed surprise guest Kesselring.

Following Von Roon's lead, Student also cried for the release of the "comrades" in military prisons.

He dropped a minor bombshell into the attentive crowd, when he said, "We don't want politicians in our ranks and we don't want to serve foreign purposes."

Neglecting to identify the foreign powers he meant, he went on to warn the veterans that "our fight is against those who accuse us of being war criminals, robbers, pilferers and collectively guilty. We protest the accusation that we are fascists."

At the same time he called for a return to the traditional German army, for an "army without the living values of tradition has no force . . ."

"I soberly and critically see the reforms indicated by Bonn," he said. "Certainly some old remnants should be abolished; but an army which could fight for six years against a superior foe can't have been all bad."

Student terminated his address with a passionate appeal for "rebuilding of the fatherland and reunification of Germany" that left a number of veterans weeping openly.

Final speaker was the aging Ramcke, who described himself as "Papa" Ramcke and the worried father of four military-age sons.

An unscheduled speaker, Ramcke rose to add his voice to the criticism of the new army.

"I want to know beforehand what kind of military bed my sons will sleep in," he said. "We cannot minimize the heroism of our fathers, and so we ask that the army be recreated in the old bonds of tradition."

He asked further that "there be no party loyalties, no religious differences."

The meeting ended on a sour note, though, that left most of the veterans a little unhappy.

As the crowds began to file out, a Spaniard from the famed Blue Division appeared behind the microphone. Aided by an interpreter, he expressed his hope that the Spanish "soon would be fighting again alongside their German comrades."

One paratrooper exclaimed loudly, "He should never have said that."

Nazi Literature on the March

By

S. BARAT

"West German Ambassador Heinz L. Krekeler said today efforts to revive nazism were 'dead as a door nail.'" (N. Y. Times 11-21-55)

The "memoirs literature" of prominent Nazis will shortly be augmented by a new book. The "Plesse-Verlag" (Plesse Publishers) in Goettingen is releasing Alfred Rosenberg's last notes "Ideals and Idols of the National Socialist Revolution," which the author of the "Myth of the 20th Century" allegedly wrote in the Nuremberg prison for war criminals prior to his execution.

The advance notice states: "The book should serve as a contribution for the evaluation of the recent past by the general public in its realistic aspects." . . .

A few years ago when memoirs by a prominent Nazi appeared on the German book market for the first time, protests could still be heard from various quarters and many book sellers even refused to sell such books. However, since then people have gotten tired of protesting and the few voices raised here and there are so weak that no one listens nor pays any attention to them; one gets the impression that no one believes any more in the effectiveness of even raising objections.

The responsibility for the excessive freedom in the German book market, as is occasionally pointed out in the press, is relegated to governmental authorities who do not avail themselves of the laws to forbid Nazi books. But it must not be forgotten that the flood of Nazi publications and their success —many of these publications such as "We Acquit Hitler" attained second and even third editions—indicate an atmosphere which cannot be eliminated by bans alone. It is proof for the existence of an avid interest in Germany for books by one-time Nazi big shots and for kindred literature for, if it were otherwise, no publisher would risk the publication of such a book . . .

In certain circles in Germany the question is raised, what could follow in the wake of A. Rosenberg's book—perhaps a new edition of Adolf Hitler's "Mein Kampf"?—This possibility should not be rejected entirely for "Mein Kampf" is available in many second-hand book shops and all efforts to stop the sale of this book have failed thus far.

"Ninety-five officers and six N. C. O.'s of the new West German Army were sworn in over the weekend in the garage of the Defence Ministry in Bonn. The two top-ranking officers who received their commissions were Generals Heusinger and Speidel. Both were very close to Herr Hitler . . ."

"It has become almost a cliche to remark that the aged Dr. Adenauer cannot live forever, but it is nonetheless a key Kremlin calculation. There are many and powerful voices in Germany now, both in Adenauer's coalition and in his opposition, contending that efforts toward unification should take priority over West Germany's alliance with the West . . ."

How the Saar Statute Was Killed

By ALBERT SIMARD

The recent defeat of the Statute which was designed to give the Saar a special European status, has been interpreted as "a blow to Western European unity." A Christian Science Monitor reporter, writing from Germany, notes that the Saarlanders, after having obtained "most of the economic benefits they could get from France," decided to take advantage of the booming economy in Western Germany. He adds, "the days when the Saar might have been expected to pay reparations, are over; its industries have been built up" (10-24-55).

In a similar vein the New York Times reported that among the French it was felt that "the Saar was glad enough to be a French ward at the end of wars that Germany lost, when the Saar needed help, but that when Germany grew strong again the Saar turned against its French benefactors" (10-25-55).

Whatever conclusions are drawn from the results of the Saar referendum, two key factors must be considered, i.e., the ambiguous role of Chancellor Adenauer and the studied silence of U. S. policy makers.

It has been said that Adenauer was an uncompromising supporter of the Saar Statute. Certainly his public declarations on the subject give that impression. Yet, upon close examination Adenauer's position is not as simple as it appears on the surface.

As early as 1949 Chancellor Adenauer insisted on Germany's "right" to the Saar. Nevertheless he cautioned the Bundestag to tone down their demands. "Please recognize," he admonished his listeners, "that Germany is still strongly distrusted everywhere abroad" (New York Times 9-30-49). From time to time Adenauer returned to the theme that the Saar "by right" was part of German territory. He was particularly emphatic on that point following the conclusion of the Franco-Saar economic treaty in 1950. At that time he denounced the French in no uncertain terms, ridiculing the French thesis that the Saar must be treated in a special way for security purposes. On the contrary, Herr Adenauer declared, the French were converting the Saar into a colony to be exploited by their "hunger for gold" (New York Times 3-5-50).

It is interesting to note that this line became a rallying point for the nationalistic manifestations which occurred prior to the referendum. Kurt Conrad, the leader of the Social Democrats in the Saar, exclaimed to a cheering audience, "We do not want Germany to be Europe's coolie and we in the Saar do not want to be France's coolies" (New York Times 8-2-55).

During the preparation for the establishment of the European Defense Community Treaty, the Germans continued to focus attention on their "rights" to the Saar. In deference to Allied hopes in maintaining Western solidarity, the French consented to negotiate with West Germany on the future status of the Saar. Following a number of talks between Adenauer and the French Government in the early part of 1952, agreement was reached to take measures that would ultimately Europeanize the Saar under the Council of Europe. Writing in the New York Times (3-22-52) Anne O'Hare McCormick stated that the agreement was looked upon by the leaders of the Council of Europe as a means by which the Saar would become the nucleus of a European federation. However, when Adenauer returned to Germany, he denied that he had consented to the Europeanization of the Saar. On April 23, 1952, the Bonn Parliament, with the approval of Adenauer, denounced the agreement categorically. The press at that time noted that even German officials were puzzled by Dr. Adenauer's complete about-face.

The present Saar Statute was the result of negotiations between Adenauer and French leaders on the basis of the Paris agreements granting West German sovereignty and the right to rearm. Once again, Adenauer consented to support the Europeanization of the Saar, certainly at least until a peace treaty was signed. The agreement stipulated that a referendum must be held in the area to obtain the approval of the Saar population for the statute.

When the electioneering campaign got under way, unrepentant Nazis and assorted nationalistic elements emerged and once again the Saar was turned into a cauldron of pro-Nazi and chauvinistic agitation. The London Daily Telegraph reported the campaign in the Saar "already recalls that of Hitler in 1934" (8-11-55). Adenauer's own party in the Saar heaped vituperation on the statute. Indeed, all of the affiliates of West German political parties in the Saar joined hands in smearing the French as well as the Allied agreements which were the basis for the Saar Statute.

Most prominent among the agitators was Dr. Heinrich Schneider, "an unrepentant Nazi who still keeps a photograph showing him in a brown shirt uniform in Berlin in 1934" New York World Telegram 9-26-55). Schneider organized rallies which brought memories of the Nazi get-togethers during the 1930s. His audiences joined in singing such lines as "German is the Saar, German forever" and "From the Maas to Memel, from the Adige to the Belt." There is no doubt that Herr Schneider sought in every way to emulate his late and lamented Führer. Gangs were organized under the auspices of the pro-German political parties to break up the meetings of the democratic elements. Needless to say, anyone who dared to oppose publicly the tactics of these superpatriots was branded as a traitor to the "Fatherland."

Up to the eve of the election Adenauer's position was cloudy. He was silent when the Pro-German parties in the Saar as well as prominent leaders within Germany declared that Adenauer had been coerced into signing the Saar Statute. In this connection, the New York Post correspondent reporting from Germany revealed that Adenauer's party which had given only reluctant support to the agreement with the French, "wants to back out." However, noting the cautious methods of Adenauer's leadership, the Post correspondent declared that the party was seeking "a graceful way (to back out) but hasn't yet found the exit" (8-15-55).

This is not to say that the Chancellor himself has ever expressed publicly the desire to renege on the agreement. Yet, his utterances during the campaign were not the kind that would induce enthusiasm for the statute or clarity to help those who were undecided as to how to vote.

On September 3, 1955, he finally issued a public statement declaring his concern over what was occurring in the Saar. "I understand that the Saarlanders do not want the Hoffman Government after 7 years of suppression but the way to another government is by approving the Saar statute and then in an ensuing election to elect a landtag opposed to the Hoffmann Government." When the Chancellor was subsequently called upon to reaffirm his support for the statute, he referred to this statement but added that it was his hope that the Saar population, "taking into consideration all points of view, would make a wise political decision" (New York Times 10-21-55).

Adenauer's statement of September 3 does not express concern over neo-Nazi and nationalistic activities in the Saar but is an attack on the Hoffman Government which was far more democratic than anything experienced by the Saarlanders heretofore. From the above statement it is clear that the Chancellor did not regard the Saar Statute as an agreement that would cement ties between the French and the Germans, thereby creating conditions for greater Western unity. On the contrary, he viewed support for the Saar Statute as a method by which to destroy the Hoffman Government and enable those who have been spouting nationalistic slogans to take over. Surely, Herr Adenauer was aware of the fact that these forces had sworn to destroy the statute at the first opportunity. It should also be noted that in his latter statement referred to above, he mentions again his qualified and rather strange support for the Saar Statute though he tells the Saarlanders that in any event they may vote as they please.

As election time approached, French Premier Faure met with Dr. Adenauer in Luxembourg. Their joint statement on the Saar resulting from this meeting was essentially non-committal. According to the Associated Press (10-5-55), the French Prime Minister favored a joint appeal with Adenauer asking the Saarlanders to approve the statute. "Dr. Adenauer declined to sign" such an appeal.

The equivocal position taken by Adenauer played right into the hands of the neo-Nazis and the nationalists. The London Telegraph commented, "rarely has any situation been so confused" (8-11-55). This was precisely the kind of double talk that Adenauer indulged in to the very last moment. Consequently, both the democratic and anti-democratic elements in the Saar were able to prove to the population that Adenauer supported one or the other side. The New York Times (10-23-55) described the situation as follows: "The pro-German press today published page size appeals under the photograph of Dr. Adenauer quoting him as saying that the Saar was free to vote as it chose. The pro-statute press published equally conspicuous appeals under the same portrait quoting Dr. Adenauer in favor of the statute."

"The position of France and the West with respect to Germany had already been weakened by Adenauer's action during his visit to Moscow in granting diplomatic recognition to the Soviet Union with no strings attached. Russia, as a result, now has access to West Germany as well as East Germany, which means a bargaining position on reunification greatly superior to that of the West.

"What was not revealed officially after Adenauer's visit to Moscow last month was almost equally important in its psychological impact on the West Germans who accompanied the old chancellor. On excellent authority this reporter can state that the Russians urged the Germans to join them in carrying out the industrialization of China.

"As they report this in strict confidence, German officials belittle the offer . . . An old dream cherished by many Germans has been the leadership of German brains and technical skill of the resources and manpower of the vast Eurasian land mass covering two-thirds of the geography and population of the world. Industrialization of China would keep German factories humming."

OLD NATIONALISM
POLITICAL & ECONOMIC INTEGRATION OF EUROPE

Counting the Saar Ballots

(Courtesy N. Y. Herald Tribune Inc.)

One more aspect which is linked to the Adenauer position, are the views of his top collaborators. The Vice Chancellor of the Bonn Republic, Franz Bluecher, described the Saarlanders rejection of the statute as "a victory of reason (A. P. 10-24-55). Thomas Dehler, the leader of the German Free Democrats, part of Adenauer's government, was also jubilant and acclaimed the Saarlanders because they "tore to pieces the fog of a treacherous statute and of many false advices."

In this connection it is noteworthy that the Kölnische Rundschau, a German newspaper very close to Chancellor Adenauer's party and, indeed, close to the Chancellor himself, wrote the following: "The Saar plebiscite has demonstrated to the world that a frank and courageous avowal of the idea of a new political order pointing to the future—like that of a united Europe—can hardly be expected of one small part of a nation as long as such an avowal might be interpreted as a denial of nationality . . ." Significant too is an editorial statement appearing in the Steuben News (November 1955): "It shall be noted for the record that high Bonn officials, in close contact with the Chancellery, sent congratulatory messages to Saarbruecken as soon as the voting results became known."

Is this another case of Adenauer's skill in finessing? William Henry Chamberlin, writing in the New Leader (10-17-55), states: "On the German side, there are two somewhat divergent viewpoints. Chancellor Adenauer has leaned over backward in an attempt to promote acceptance of the Statute in the Saar voting. This is the official German viewpoint. But privately Germans will suggest that the Saar Statute was a French idea, and that the Saar population has as much right to turn it down as the French Parliament had to reject EDC." Our only qualification to Mr. Chamberlin's statement would be to question his allegation that Adenauer went all out for the Statute.

The U. S. Government maintained silence throughout the election campaign. This was a rather odd posture for our policy makers. In the first place, the U. S. had pledged its support for the French position on the Saar from the very early days of the occupation. Former Secretaries of State Byrnes, Marshall and Acheson went on record supporting French claims with respect to the Saar (see Prevent World War III, No. 40 [1952], page 31). So far as we know there have been no public statements made by our policy makers that would indicate that our previous pledges of support were no longer binding.

We originally supported the French position because it was known that the Saar economically linked with the French economy would act as a counterpoise to Germany's economic ambitions. As reported by the New York Times (10-31-55) the adverse vote seriously endangers the precarious balance. The New York Times notes that the loss of the Saar would reduce French production of coal, iron and steel to 24 per cent of the total production of the European Coal-Steel Community. If the Saar should again become German, West Germany's share would climb above 53 per cent. Moreover, the loss of the Saar might further decrease France's share below 20 per cent and this would result in the loss of her "special position in the Community."

It is important to bear in mind that our policy makers supported the Europeanization of the Saar not only because it would strengthen France vis-a-vis Germany but it would also facilitate the development of a Western European union. On the basis of these pledges and in view of our past efforts to develop unity among the Western Powers, would it not have been logical, let alone urgent, for the United States to have publicly supported the statute before and during the crucial election period? There are those who say that the U. S. could not speak out for fear the support would be interpreted as intervention.

The fact is that our policy makers did not hesitate to come out for Adenauer when he was running for reelection in 1953. In the Saar case the reasons were not only more cogent for U. S. support but in a very real sense we had a moral obligation to do whatever we could to uphold the Saar Statute. Why then was there this strange silence? Is it true, as some say, that our policy has become so blindly pro-German that any idea of Western unity except on German terms, has become taboo? Can we expect France to develop its strength while at the same time, we lend aid and comfort by our silence to those who are striving to undermine the French position?

Let it not be thought that the defeat of the Saar Statute will satiate German demands. The lessons of history should serve as a sharp warning to those who harbor such illusions. As we stated in our previous article, if the United States does not "stand firm on the Saar, then we shall be opening once more the flood gates to German expansionism whose limits know no bounds."

"Germany, crushed just a decade ago, now finds herself in a military and political position desired by generals and statesmen alike, wooed by both sides . . .

"West Germany is, nevertheless, economically the strongest power on the Continent . . .

"Many Germans still look to the East, and in East Germany, in particular, the attractiveness of a German-Russian economic-political-military arrangement is whetted by a desire for rectification of Germany's Eastern frontiers.

"Germany's bargaining power with both sides is likely to increase, not decrease . . ."

(Hanson W. Baldwin, N. Y. Times, 9-10-55)

"Ambassador Bohlen cabled from Moscow that Adenauer had been virtual putty in Russian hands, and warned that the United States could not trust the West Germans to stand up against the Kremlin in the future.

"Prior to this, Adenauer was the darling of John Foster Dulles. He could do no wrong. Today, Dulles seems not so sure. The United States had counted on West Germany as the backbone of the military bloc to defend Europe against Russia. Today opinions are shaken."

Sinister Forces at Work in Germany

By
GASTON COBLENTZ

Col. Bogislav von Bonin, who was dismissed from a high post in the Bonn Defense Office earlier this year, is becoming the darling of some of the most sinister forces at work in West Germany at present.

The case of the prominent forty-seven-year-old officer appears to be worth following closely.

Part of its interest comes from the fact that Col. von Bonin held important jobs in both war-time and in post-war Germany.

He became chief of operations of the Geman Army in 1944 at the remarkable age of thirty-six. After the war, the became chief of the Bonn Defense Office's Military Planning Section.

He was fired because he tried to rally his friends among high-ranking Germany military men against the plans to tie the projected West German Army as closely as possible into the Western military alliance. He charged this would prevent the reunification of Germany.

The colonel's case derives added interest from the rapidity with which a man widely known as a strong anti-Bolshevik switched to association with pro-Communist elements in a matter of a few months.

It is ironical that Col. von Bonin was one of the men in he Bonn defense set-up for whom a number of American military men tended to have special regard.

He appeared to them in recent years as the paragon of igorous Prussian virtues and integrity and seemed the inarnation of the type of upright German officer who could work in the common defense against Bolshevism.

One of the first things the colonel did after he was fired was to tie up with the "Rhine-Westphalian News" of Dusseldorf, which is accused of having Communist connections in East Germany.

The paper has been campaigning for the withdrawal of West Germany from NATO.

It is closely linked with another Dusseldorf group called he Hans von Seeckt Society, named after the famous German general of the Weimar period who favored close cooperation with Russia.

One of the heads of the Hans von Seeckt Society is Gen. Otto von Wagener, former chief-of-staff of the Nazi S. A. Storm Abteilung) in 1929-'30. He is also one of the pubshers of the "Rhine-Westphalian News."

Gen. Wagener is reported to have been in contact with Marshal Frederick Paulus in East Germany. Marshal Paulus, the loser at Stalingrad, has long been a spokesman for Communist propaganda. He is appealing from East Germany to the ficers' corps in West Germany to rebel against Bonn's liance with the West.

Col. von Bonin has told journalists that he also wants to make contact with Marshal Paulus and may visit East Germany r this purpose.

The Hans von Seeckt Society and the "Rhine-Westphalian News" are connected with Nazi elements in West Germany in addition to their eastern ties.

They constitute part of a network of connections between the Soviet-directed. East German Communists and a segment of the extreme Right Wing in West Germany.

Last week Col. von Bonin addressed a group of about 100 officers in Frankfurt. They were assembled by Col. Adolf Dickfeld.

Col. Dickfeld, who shot down 164 enemy planes as a Luftwaffe ace in World War II, is head of a body called the "Working Group for All-German Soldiers' Meetings."

This organization is also friendly to the Soviets. At the same time it has ties with former Hitler Youth and S. S. figures in West Germany.

Among the men who attended the Frankfurt session were reported to be some friends of Otto Strasser, a prominent leader of the Nazi movement in the mid-1920s. Mr. Strasser recently returned to Germany from Canada this year, and has been trying . . . to organize a new radical movement.

Col. von Bonin is also reported to have entered into contact with some notorious "National Bolshevik" elements in North Germany—that is, former Nazis who are working with the Communists. (Courtesy, N. Y. Herald-Tribune)

"...Nothing But the Truth?"

Commenting on the State Department's declaration that Adenauer's agreement with Moscow was a diplomatic triumph for the West, the noted New York Times diplomatic correspondent James Reston wrote: "There has been a growing tendency in Washington since the war for the Government to put out not what it knows to be true but what it wants people to believe is true . . . (9-16-55). We can think of many instances to confirm Mr. Reston's observations. For example, we recall former Secretary of State Acheson's exuberant optimism over the future of the treaties relating to the establishment of the European Defense Community (EDC). Testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1952, Mr. Acheson urged quick approval of the treaties and assured the Committee that the treaties would be ratified and ready for implementation "by the end of the summer or fall" of 1952. This prognostication turned out to be a dud. At these hearings former U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy assured the Committee that a unified Germany would "be bound by the obligations conferred and imposed upon the Federal Republic" by the EDC treaties. Here again this optimism was unwarranted since there was definite provision in the treaties which said the very opposite. Indeed, Mr. Dulles has publicly admitted since then that the EDC treaties were not binding on a unified Germany. The State Department's optimism had an infectious effect on the Senate. It ratified the treaties in record time although Senator Watkins warned that there were no concrete guarantees that the other parties concerned would ratify them.

Perhaps it is natural for government officials and departments to paint a rosy picture with respect to the soundness of their policies. On the other hand, Congress, representing the people's interest, has the duty and the right to demand facts and figures instead of platitudes and generalities.

It is in this connection that we call attention to a recent statement made by Thorsten V. Kalijarvi, Acting Deputy Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs before the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee (9-15-55). Mr. Kalijarvi told the Subcommittee that he was representing the State Department's view "concerning the relationship of antitrust policies to foreign trade and investment." He said that the State Department was striving to promote "an expanding world economy." He assured the Subcommittee that the State Department was endeavoring in every possible way to promote world competition "as an alternative to cortelism and socialism."

To "prove" that the State Department's efforts in liquidating cartels and monopolies since World War II "have not been insignificant," Mr. Kalijarvi cited several examples. In two cases he spoke about the cartel problem in West Germany and the attitude of the Schuman Plan High Authority. As regards the organization of the Schuman Plan, Mr. Kalijarvi informed the Senators that the charter of the European Coal and Steel Community had established "strong anti-cartel and anti-monopoly provisions closely akin to United States antitrust principles . . ." In our opinion it is debatable how effective these provisions are, even on paper. Nevertheless, if for the sake of argument we would agree that the provisions are strong, it is just as necessary to know how they are applied.

We do not have to go too far for the answer. Indeed, the Schuman Plan High Authority itself has admitted that cartels and economic concentrations may be permitted under certain conditions. Here is the way the High Authority has described its attitude toward the problem of monopolistic concentrations and cartels:

"Cartels are presumed guilty until proven innocent and therefore, prima facie, forbidden. Their innocence is something that the High Authority alone can decide. The High Authority can authorize them only if they lead to a substantial increase in efficiency, are not more restrictive than is necessary to their immediate purpose, and do not confer on their makers power to prevent competition on the common market.

"Concentrations, on the other hand, are presumed innocent unless the High Authority finds they distort the market. Accordingly, it must authorize them unless the newly formed companies to which they give rise, can restrict competition or establish themselves in 'an artificially privileged position'."

As can be seen, the High Authority tries to make a distinction between "guilty" cartels and "innocent" cartels. It therefore denies that cartels, by their very nature, impede the development of a free economy and are in direct contradiction to it. As for monopolistic concentrations, the Schuman Plan Authority declares that "Anglo-Saxon law applies, i.e., they are "innocent" until they are found to be "guilty." Once again we are told that monopolistic concentrations are not by their very nature an impediment to free enterprise. By so rationalizing the High Authority was able to give its approval to the reorganization of vertical trusts in Germany. Insofar as cartels are concerned, the High Authority declares that none have appeared on the common market, "though there is little doubt that prices are still being fixed after informal consultations between producers."

In this connection it is interesting to note how the Schuman Plan High Authority has approached the question of the German coal sales cartel commonly known as GEORG. For more than a year, discussions have been held with regard to this cartel. In May 1955, the High Authority announced that it had moved to "end" GEORG. After additional months of discussions the New York Times (11-25-55) reported that GEORG would be "broken up" into three "independent" coal sales agencies. However, these so-called independent units will be linked together by a "coordinating office" which, according to the Times, will have a monopoly of German export sales and sales of more than 50 tons of coal with the European Coal-Steel Community. No wonder, the New York Times correspondent calls this setup "a new and strange species of economic institution" designed to bring about more competition. The Times correspondent notes that by this re-arrangement of GEORG the High Authority "has rejected the American anti-trust approach . . ." The Times reports that involved in the rejection of the American position on anti-trust problems, is the High Authority's belief that there is such an animal as "good" cartels.

With regard to the cartel problem in Germany, Mr. Kalijarvi cites a public opinion poll in 1951 which showed that 30 per cent of the German people were in favor of free prices as against 47 per cent for fixed prices. A poll taken two years later showed that 51 per cent were in favor of a free economy as against 31 per cent against. Mr. Kalijarvi assured the Senators that this was a hopeful sign of progress.

On the basis of these examples and "other information," the State Department believes "that the philosophy of competitive enterprise is making significant headway in other areas of the world." As experienced politicians the Senators must be aware that public opinion polls are not always accurate. Furthermore, even if the above mentioned polls were true, how does this connect with the growth of cartels and monopolies in Germany? Certainly, reputable economists would not accept an opinion poll as an economic indicator for trends in Germany. It seems to us that the Senate Subcommittee dealing with monopolies and cartels, should beware of pat conclusions which remind us of the kind of canvassing of public opinion made by advertising agencies.

Prevent World War III has devoted many issues and pages to the cartel and monopoly problem in Germany. In its last issue (No. 46, Summer 1955), we cited reliable evidence, even admissions by German industrial leaders, that the cartels and monopolies are back again. Indeed, in many cases they are more powerful now than they were during the days of Hitler.

Whether it be Mannesmann or Krupp, Hoesch or Kloeckner, the Deutsche Bank or I.G. Farben, the fact remains that all of the anti-cartel and anti-monopoly laws, initiated by the Allies after World War II, have for all practical purposes been thrown into the garbage heap of history. This is not to say that all of the blame should be placed on the German cartelists. We would say that the fundamental responsibility rests with the Allied authorities including, of course, U. S. policy makers.

In the past we have shown how State Department officials and other U. S. representatives stalled on the implementation of anti-cartel and anti-monopoly laws until they withered on the vine. To be sure, the Germans were not idle, for there was never a sincere intention on the part of some of our own officials to carry out these anti-monopoly laws in letter and in spirit.

It is no wonder that the Schuman Plan High Authority justifies its approval of the re-concentration of German heavy industry on the ground that Allied authorities had sanctioned this development before the High Authority was officially established. We do not justify this cynical alibi but no one can refute the High Authority's assertion that it was the Allies in the first place who permitted the Germans to violate the anti-cartel and anti-monopoly laws.

If the Senate Subcommittee wants the true picture of the situation in Germany today and how it came about, they ought to call in all of the people concerned. Let them invite General Clay, John J. McCloy, John Foster Dulles, General Draper. By the same token, the Subcommittee should also call those who had direct responsibility for the carrying out of U. S. policy on cartels and concentrations over the past ten years. Are the American people not entitled to the whole truth which since the end of World War II has been shrouded from public view?

Pertinent Opinions

PINAY had a special reason for leaving the conference at Geneva to meet with Adenauer. Deeply disquieting reports have reached Paris from the Saar in the aftermath of the vote by which the Saarlanders, by a more than two-thirds majority, rejected Europeanization for that rich industrial sector so often in dispute.

It was, in effect, a vote against France by Saarlanders of German inheritance, with all the German political parties, including the Christian Democrats on the right and the Communists on the left, making nationalist appeals that sounded in their extreme form like the primitive war cries of the Nazis.

Now, according to reports to Paris, in preparation for the Saar elections next month to choose a new government, even stronger Nazi-like appeals are being made both openly and privately. Anonymous letters are being sent to all French and Jews with economic interests in the Saar warning them that they had better sell their holdings while they still can . . .

All indications show that German opinion has turned steadily against France during the past year. This has been in a more or less direct ratio to the resurgence of German strength.

Among Germans who think seriously about such matters, the need to find a way to work with France is still a factor, but the average citizen of the Reich inclines more and more to the view that France is a weak and decadent nation which Germany can conveniently ignore.

That attitude will, in the long run, directly serve the aim of the Soviets. German nationalists, supremely confident of Germany's power, would be emboldened to make a deal with Moscow. German industrialists are attracted by vast markets not only in the Soviet Union but in Communist China.

The Russians are convinced that in the matter of reunification time is on their side and therefore they need not make the slightest concession to the Western view that the Germans must choose their own future through free elections.

If unification can take place, as the Russians insist, only by mutual agreement between the two Germanys, then with the passage of time the West Germans will accept that fact and the two regimes, the one Communist and the other more and more nationalist in outlook, will merge with the objective of cooperating with Russia.

A MAN from the moon, not knowing any European history, might propose as a compromise a neutralized Germany, belonging to neither camp. Something of this type, in fact, may emerge ultimately.

But it raises the specter of a German government with immense bargaining power, able to upset the military balance of power by casting its weight in either direction. Any solution along the lines of neutralization would have to be accompanied by extensive checks and cross-checks on the resulting Germany.

SEPP DIETRICH must surely be convinced of his own immortality by now; he ran out of borrowed time long ago. As far back as 1934 he won special recognition from Adolf Hitler for carrying out the assassination of Ernst Roehm during the great Nazi blood purge. Hitler promoted him to the rank of general; subsequently he became commander of Hitler's bodyguards.

Dietrich's career in World War II was identified with some of the most ghoulish enterprises in the Nazi war record. His role in the slaughter that marked the capture of Kharkov won him the informal designation of "Butcher of Kharkov." Even more celebrated, however, was his conduct in the brutal Malmedy massacre—the massacre in which more than 115 captured American prisoners were ruthlessly murdered during the Battle of the Bulge.

Dietrich survived war, defeat and trial. In 1946 an American military tribunal found him guilty of heavy responsibility for the massacre, but he escaped the death penalty, receiving life imprisonment instead.

And now he has been freed—not because of the discovery of any judicial error or because he has achieved any miracle of rehabilitation but because we are in the process of trying to liquidate all German memories of that international unpleasantness known as World War II.

He was released without any public announcement; perhaps our officials had the decency to be embarrassed. But when a man with so monumental a record of murder beats the rap again, the event is bound to be discovered.

Dietrich's biggest killings may be over. He may never claim another victim. The terrifying impact of his release—like the restoration to civic eminence of other distinguished Nazis in both the Communist and Western zones of Germany—is to invigorate and inspire the darkest forces of German neo-Naziism.

If Sepp Dietrich has survived so monstrous a lifetime of slaughter, who can convincingly tell the new German generation that international crime doesn't pay?

THE NEW CONFLICT between East and West was directly Hitler's work. Communism had been contained in Europe by the barrier of intermediary states from Finland to Romania. Hitler destroyed this barrier and brought Stalin's rule into Central Europe, first by his accord with Stalin in 1939 and then by his attack upon Stalin in 1941.

It is one of the most disturbing factors in present-day Germany when some Germans reproach the Western powers of not having sided with Germany against Russia, and even add that it should have been done in defense of Western civilization. The Germans, and not the West, destroyed Poland and paved Stalin's road westward. The Germans were then as much opposed to the West and Western civilization as the Russians were. Through German fault, the whole of continental Europe, with the exception of the two small enclaves of Sweden and Switzerland, was early in 1941 under the control of totalitarian powers, hostile to the individual liberalism, the freedom of thought and the spirit of tolerance of the West . . .

(Prof. Hans Kohn, The Christian Science Monitor, 9-19-55)

THE CORRESPONDENT of Handelsblatt, West Germany's leading economic newspaper, reported from Moscow that the Soviet Government was prepared to negotiate a five-year trade agreement with Bonn . . .

Exports to be offered West Germany will include timber, cotton, manganese and chrome ores, oil and oil derivatives, phosphates, drugs and chemicals. The report said the Soviet Government wished to import ships, machinery, Diesel engines, pharmaceutical products, plastics, synthetic cloth, non-ferrous metals, chemicals, dyes and photo-chemicals.

Trade relations with West Germany appear to have been thoroughly studied by the Soviet Government. The problem was also investigated in Bonn in advance of Dr. Adenauer's visit to Moscow . . .

Prior to the Moscow agreement to establish diplomatic relations, the Government and what appeared to be a substantial segment of the industrial and business community took the line that even under the most favorable conditions trade with the Soviet Union could never again become an important factor . . .

The force with which these arguments were put forward in the weeks preceding Dr. Adenauer's mission to Moscow gave rise to the suspicion that there was perhaps more interest in the Soviet market than the Government for political reasons was prepared to admit . . .

It now appears that studies recommending exports as high as 3,000,000,000 Deutsche marks ($1,000,000,000) annually had been prepared by Government experts before the decision was made not to take the Economics Minister and trade representatives to Moscow . . .

So far as is known these ambitious export plans have not been discarded. The fact that Government experts drew up these plans would appear to contradict the internal propaganda line that trade with the Soviet Union does not have a future. (M. S. Handler, The N. Y. Times, 9-17-55)

THE PREMISE on which the conduct of Soviet diplomacy appears to be based at present is that all Soviet attempts, whatever they were worth, to agree with the western powers over Germany have failed, and that it is futile to continue them after Germany's inclusion in NATO . . .

The corollary to this is that if at any time Germany's unification could not be postponed any longer, and if it had to be "unification "on a capitalist basis," Moscow would negotiate over this not with the Atlantic powers but directly with the Federal German Republic. Russia could then offer the virtual surrender of East Germany to a West German government on the condition that said government get out of NATO.

Such a bilateral deal would fit in well with the traditions of Russian diplomacy, which in critical situations has more than once sought rapprochement with Germany whenever it could not come to terms with the western powers. The Rapallo Treaty and the Soviet-German pact of 1939 are the obvious precedents which in their turn had behind them the older tradition of Russo-German cooperation of the Bismarck era.

(Isaac Deutcher, The Reporter, 9-8-55)

"Democracy in West Germany is not very deep-rooted and in the final analysis the Germans could make common cause with the Russians, thus stated the journalist William L. Shirer—Russia could offer the Germans reunification, the traditional markets of Eastern Europe and return of the territories beyond the Oder-Neisse demorcation line. What price would the eventual successor to Adenauer be prepare to pay for this? asks Shirer."

Konrad Adenauer's Political Testament

By

LIONEL GELBER

Mr. Lionel Gelber's article was originally published in The New Leader as a review of Chancellor Adenauer's recently published book "World Indivisible."

Added force is lent to Mr. Gelber's observations by the fact that they preceded the September pilgrimage of Dr. Adenauer to the Kremlin and that it was published on August 15, 1955, just after the Big Four conferred in Geneva.

The Western Powers may have been discomfited by the concessions granted afterwards to the Soviet Union by Herr Adenauer in Moscow; forebodings, heightened by the East-West impasse over German reunification at the subsequent Geneva meeting of the Foreign Ministers, are rife.

Lionel Gelber's prior analysis may, however, serve today as a double reminder. What can be gathered from it, first of all, is that there has been little reason for surprise over the way things happened in Moscow. And, secondly, what it recalls to mind is that in the events by which we are now being overtaken, the West itself has had a hand.

Incidentally, Mr. Gelber's last book, The American Anarchy (New York 1953) discusses, among other topics, how the prospect of Russo-German agreement has been handled by our own political spokesmen and opinion media—how it is that the full danger of so grim a contingency took so long in getting through to the general public.

Sir Winston Churchill, a greater figure than either, has dubbed Konrad Adenauer the best German statesman since Bismarck. And it is hard not to respect the Bonn Chancellor for his good will toward France, his gratitude toward the United States, his admiration for Britain, his ties, as a man of faith and civilized instincts, with the West. Inconsistencies, nevertheless, do crop out and, if significant, could be disquieting.

When Chancellor Adenauer denounces the evil which Germans have wrought, skeptics may be disarmed. But would their record be so tragic if, over the years, his compatriots had not cherished goals which are mutually incompatible? And if on this score Herr Adenauer himself discloses ambiguities, what about unregenerate elements whose Western orientation is less firm than his?

At first blush it would, for example, seem churlish to express doubts over Herr Adenauer's view of European unity—the Coal-Steel Pool, the Council of Europe and other comparable steps. And the United States has supported unifying projects for two reasons: They do not only have a virtue of their own but fortify the overall defensive capacity of the West. A Third Force, a modified Bevanism, could derogate from that capacity. Does Herr Adenauer toy with such ideas?

"In the interest of world peace," he observes, "it is absolutely necessary for a third power to arise. Only a federated Europe can be that third power." In such a federation, a resurgent Germany would be dominant, but upon that prospect he is silent; he does not hint at what, in the eyes of Paris and London, has been one of the main obstacles. The neutralization of Germany, as desired by Russia, is rejected in these pages; a Third Force, in the style of New Delhi and Belgrade, is not what the Bonn Chancellor suggests. But does Bonn dream of a German-led Europe, a Puissance Médiatrice in the fashion of a bygone age, which, as Herr Adenauer says, could throw her weight in favor of peace at crucial moments"? Is it for this that, under American auspices, the renascence of German power was promoted?

A reunified Germany in a larger European framework is the Bonn Chancellor's aim. Nationalist excess can thus be condemned while, as he demands that the Soviet grip on East Germany be relaxed, the fulfilment of a more sober German nationalism is contemplated. But the terms upon which Russia might concede the reunification of the two Germanies are not discussed.

What Moscow seeks is to deny German strength to the West rather than let the Western camp acquire more of it. West Germany has, under Herr Adenauer, been rebuilt as an ally of the West. Yet it is the East and not the West that clutches in its fist German land and German kinsmen with which alone German reunification may be effected. It was clear from the outset that only the East would be in a position to finish the job which the West had begun. The Bonn Chancellor shows in this volume how few are the Germans who vote the Communist ticket; but it is national interest rather than doctrinal affinity which, once he has vanished from the scene, might induce a realignment.

And that it can do so is, alas, an old story. On the eve of the fall of Austria, a year and a half before the Nazi-Soviet Pact unloosed World War II, this reviewer warned (The Fortnightly, London, March 1938) that ideological conflict, the Nazi-Communist antagonism, would be no bar to the coming Russo-German agreement. On similar grounds, when the Bonn Republic was first established, this reviewer again contended (Reprieve from War, Macmillan, 1950) that once West German power was resurrected, it could never be controlled by the West in the interest of the West; that in the East-West contest for the German makeweight, the West might be outbid.

It is the leitmotif of Herr Adenauer's book that the German people have suffered a change of heart. But the masters of the Kremlin, if the German policy of the West is to be vindicated, will have to undergo a metamorphosis no less profound. At Geneva the Big Four have staged their comedy of manners. It is between Moscow and Bonn that a more serious, protracted drama is likely to unfold.

Meanwhile with this political testament the Bonn Chancellor recapitulates the sort of counsel which his compatriots have, in the wake of nation-wide iniquity, been getting from him. Europe never recovered from the shock of World War I and incidental remarks about its origins imply that Herr Adenauer may have shaken off most of that revisionist propaganda with which, after Versailles, Germans waged their psychological warfare against the West—which John Foster Dulles still purveyed after Munich, and in which, even after World War II, George Kennan's published lectures were steeped. A note of sincerity is struck when Herr Adenauer describes how, by way of restitution to Israel, amends for the "killing of five to six million Jews" are being made. And yet on the related subject of war criminals, it is the Bonn Chancellor himself who, in utterance after utterance, perplexed his friends in the West by questioning whether war crimes had even been perpetrated, whether the German armed forces had any stigma to efface.

In this volume, as it happens, it is "the prisoners at Spandau," the chief surviving malefactors, who earn a passing, compassionate reference. But it does contain two paragraphs on merging "the moral values of the German military tradition with democracy" which illustrate the ambivalence, from the standpoint of the West, that Herr Adenauer occasionally betrays.

Comment by him on this topic, with German forces about to participate in NATO, is no idle exercise in abstract theory. The French were reluctant to enter a European army, the Bonn Chancellor explains, not only because they cling to outworn ideas but because the French Assembly labors under the influence of Communists and Gaullists. Wholly ignored in this book, however, is the revulsion of the French against being associated with the forces of a nation which in one lifetime thrice ravaged their country.

"I should like to tender in the name of the Government," says Dr. Adenauer, "our deep respect for all the servicemen among our people who, true to high soldierly traditions, fought honorably on land, on the sea and in the air. We are convinced that the fine reputation and the worthy role of the German soldier, despite all the calumnies of recent years, are still cherished among our people and will remain so.

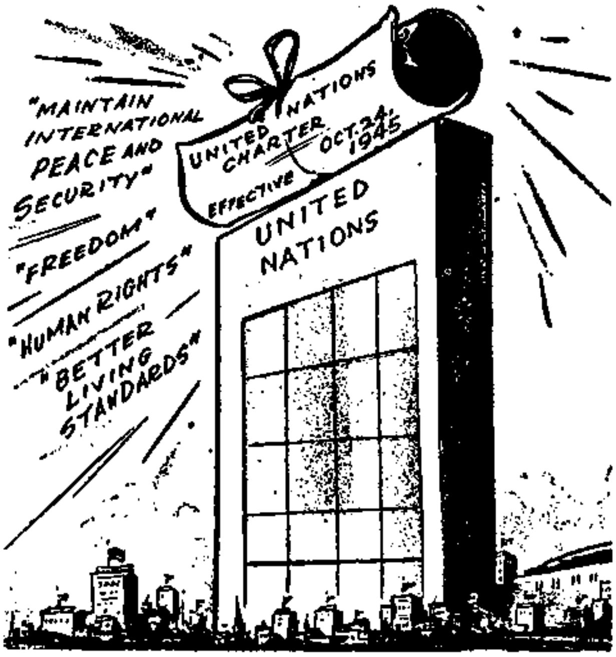
"It must be our common purpose—one I am certain we will carry through—to merge the moral values of the German military tradition with democracy. The German soldier of the future will do justice to his German and his European assignment only if he is keenly alive to the fundamental principles upon which the order of our state rests. At the same time this democratic set-up will guarantee that his loyalty will not again be misused."

Something for everybody is thus provided. Despite the fulsome tribute to the chivalry of the German fighting man, Herr Adenauer reassures the Atlantic community when he insists that, in a free society, the German armed forces must know their place. The verdict is, as it were: "Not guilty, but don't do it again."

Does the Bonn Chancellor rebuke the victims of German militarism when he combats "calumnies" against the German soldier; in such passages, to what German impulses is this critic of German nationalism, this champion of German democracy, also catering? And when Herr Adenauer speaks of the German military tradition, just what are the "moral values" he would conserve? If their "loyalty" was recurrently "misused," was it not because Germans gloried in a code of blind obedience to Prussian warlords, Imperial autocrat and Nazi dictator; in a tradition which, irrespective of régime and in war after war, spread fire and sword the length and breadth of Europe? The facts must be faced. Among Germans it is military values which have stifled democratic ones. They can now have either, but not both.

Ecrasez l'infâme! The Bonn Republic may, as a member of NATO and the Western European Union, have to bear its share of Atlantic defenses. But new political principles require military ones that are quite as new if the slate is to be wiped clean—if, as Herr Adenauer hopes, we are to start afresh.

As far as Herr Adenauer means to stick to his guns during his visit to Moscow, the publication of this book could not be more timely. What it documents is his sense of involvement with the West, his anxiety to resist what he calls "the suction of the East bloc." Yet even in Government and Opposition circles there may be those at Bonn who do not wish to postpone the inevitable; by whom, lest it give offense in Moscow, the appearance of such a book at this juncture may be deemed most inopportune. The German nation, according to Herr Adenauer, has been "transformed and purified." That, surely, is claiming a lot; in a plea for trust, the case should not be overstated. Under Herr Adenauer the foundations of German power have been restored. If these are employed to preserve our free world order, his name will be an honored one in the annals of mankind. If they are not, he may be but another in a long line of good Germans for whom German nationalism has been too much.



OUR BEST HOPE FOR PEACE

The Future of Germany

By
J. F. GOLAY

Seventeen months ago, I maintained in this journal that we could not do better than stand still in our relations with Western Germany. By doing so, I argued, we and our other Western partners would retain freedom of action for the future. Should conditions develop favorable to the negotiations of a four-power agreement to reunite Germany, we would be able to take advantage of them. If they did not, equally we would be in a position to prevent any move in Germany to our detriment.

Since then, we have begun to rearm the Western Germans and, disregarding the safeguards which we ourselves put into the Bonn and Paris agreements, have allowed the way to be opened to direct negotiations between the Bonn and Soviet governments on the future of Germany.

We are, as a consequence, losing our freedom of action in Germany. We cannot come to an agreement with the Soviets, even if they were disposed to withdraw from Eastern Germany, because, by rearming Western Germany, we shall already have prejudged the question whether all of Germany is to be rearmed and we dare not risk re-uniting a rearmed Germany which is to remain outside our own security system. Neither dare the Soviets risk a rearmed Germany outside their security system. Hence, the way to four-power agreement is closed.

At the same time, we are rapidly losing—if we have not already lost—all power to prevent the Germans coming to an understanding with the Soviets at our expense. The process will be complete when substantial German forces are in being. The least we have to fear is that these forces may be withdrawn from their NATO commitments. Of the strong position in which we once stood to control developments in Germany, all that remains to us now is such security as is afforded by the good faith of an estimable but aged politician.

The majority of Western Germans have hitherto supported Adenauer's exclusively Western-oriented policy because the economic recovery and the security of Western Germany depended on it. The first has been accomplished. As for the second, whatever value the Western Germans now set upon the ability of NATO forces to defend them (the valuation varies considerably), it is doubtful in the extreme whether the majority will be prepared to pay for it the price of a permanent division of Germany. From the start, Adenauer himself felt obliged to present rearmament and the NATO tie to the German public as the course most likely to lead to reunification. But the prospects for reunification are now poorer than ever. It looks to the Germans as though the major powers were preparing to found such arrangements as they can make to get along together on a tacit acceptance of "The General staff itself must be utterly destroyed. These wars of Germany's have been, from the standpoint of the General staff, merely incidents. They started back in 1806 under Scharnhorst, and they have determined to rule Europe, and, in my opinion, they have used these political leaders that have come along in order to implement their ideas and planning. If they found a Hitler-like leader with his tremendous ability of mob psychology, who could get the whole German nation behind him, he was useful. It happened he got so powerful he dominated them.

"Now, how you are going to destroy that German General Staff is something else again, because many of them have the excuse they did their duty as honorable soldiers. But my own opinion is that it should be made utterly impossible for them ever to function again."

(General Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1945)

IN 1955

"West Germany's Army was born today in a Bonn garage . . .

"For the ceremony, which took place in the Defense Ministry garage, Herr Blank stood under a huge reproduction of the Iron Cross. This Prussian emblem has been a German military decoration since 1813 . . .

"Herr Blank called attention to the fact that this day was the 200th anniversary of the birth of Gerhard von Scharnhorst, a Prussian general, father of the German concept of a 'citizens army.' . . .

"The leaders of the new army must study Germany's military past, but the old traditions must not be taken over wholesale, he asserted with emphasis . . ."

(Report to N. Y. Times, 11-13-55)

the status quo in Germany. Hence the strain in Adenauer's coalition. Herr Dehler, the parliamentary leader of the Free Democrats, the second party in the coalition, on September 25 described the Paris treaties as "aggravating German partition." He said that his party would be "loyal" to the treaties, but that they must not stand in the way of Germany's right to negotiate on reunification. Direct talks between the German and Soviet governments, he said, would be more important than the coming meeting of the Foreign Ministers in Geneva. Like views have been expressed by other Free Democrats and even by some Christian Democrats . . .

The Western Foreign Ministers are apparently prepared to trust the present Western German government to negotiate with the Russians. For that matter, there are political leaders in Germany in whom I too would have confidence in such dealings. But that is beside the point. No one can be sure that these leaders will have the control of affairs in Germany in the coming years.

The plain fact is that—with Western Germany rearmed—it is we, not the Russians, who will have the most pressing need to come to an understanding on the status of Germany and a European security system. Our leaders apparently do not grasp this point. Their bumbling complacency is reminiscent of Baldwinism in the thirties. They do not even trouble to make out a decent case for themselves. Mr. Dulles and Mr. Macmillan, as with one voice, assure the Western Germans that anyway world opinion will one day compel the Soviets to hand over the Eastern zone. When, the Germans ask, has world opinion ever compelled the Soviet government to do anything? The gentlemen answer, "Well, take Austria." What on earth can they be thinking of? Austria cannot be and does not want to be a member of NATO. The final terms for the ending of the occupation in Austria were negotiated between the Austrian and Soviet governments. Is this what Mr. Dulles and Mr. Macmillan want for Germany?

The only solution for Germany which has the slightest chance of being accepted by all concerned today is one which leaves none of the parties in a worse position than they are now. This means that neither NATO nor the Eastern system can be weakened or strengthened at the expense of the other, that Germany must be reunited in conditions of political freedom, and that all concerned must feel assured that Germany's position and power will not be exploited in the future to their detriment. The only way to achieve the latter is by making Germany's security the concern of all, that is to say, by creating a United Nations defense force for Germany in which all the interested parties, including a reunited Germany, participate. Such an arrangement would not entail "recognizing" or "guaranteeing" Eastern Communist regimes. It need not even entail a final settlement of Germany's eastern frontier. But by removing the principal source of political trouble: the partition of Germany, such a solution would go a long way to create a favorable environment for the settlement of other vexatious issues.

"One wonders whether the patient planners in Moscow have foreseen the exact shape and dimensions of the monstrous growth they propose to nurture.

"Almost by definition, the kind of West German politicians with whom they might some day reach a bilateral agreement must be men prepared to turn their backs on western friendship and on western traditions of liberty, prepared to accept at least the essence of the bogus electoral methods which Mr. Molotov described as 'highly satisfactory' in Russia (they satisfied Hitler, too), and infected with the arrogant notion that they can 'handle the Russians.' Has Mr. Molotov a nostalgic yearning to sign, some day, a new pact with a new Ribbentrop? The ignorant over-confidence so lavishly expressed in Moscow during this week's revolutionary anniversary carries with it a very real threat to the future not only of the German and West European, but also of the East European, peoples."

BERNARD DE VOTO

American culture has suffered a grievous loss in the recent death of Bernard De Voto. Mr. De Voto's contribution to American letters will have enduring value. He devoted his prolific pen to bringing to life the epochal events of American History. His scholarship coupled with a unique talent in the field of American prose, made his writings a pleasurable no less than an enlightening experience for readers.

Mr. De Voto was more than an outstanding essayist and historian of the American West. He was a courageous fighter for justice in the true democratic tradition. Mr. De Voto was a keen observer of the contemporary American scene. His regular commentaries in the "Easy Chair" of Harper's Magazine served to illumine many of the pressing problems that face all Americans in these troubled times. Mr. De Voto was not a dogmatist and never pretended to have pat answers for all of the problems he discussed. But he did display a unique insight and clarity as well as a frankness which undoubtedly helped his readers to understand this complex world.

His unflagging devotion to and defense of just causes was always a source of great strength to the Society for the Prevention of World War III. We shall miss him though his works give assurance to America's bright future.

Murder Dividends

Widows Wait for Top Nazis' Blood Money

By W. STANLEY MOSS

(Mr. Moss was asked unofficially by the British Foreign Office to find out what will happen to the war crime millions left by former Nazi leaders. This is his answer as published in the Sunday Pictorial.)

The widows and near relatives of top Nazis like Goering, Himmler and Goebbels are looking forward to £.S.D.-Day.

On January 1, 1956, they may be able to cash in on fortunes amassed as a direct result of murder, looting and profiteering by men whose memory is hated by millions of decent Germans.

Only ten years after the suicides or execution of these evil men comes the most outrageous scandal to have been bred by World War II.

The processes of "denazification" are scheduled to be ended on December 31.

This means that in the eyes of German law the word "Nazi" will no longer symbolize anything less desirable than a political condition.

Vast fortunes were secreted by nearly all the leading Nazis.

If those sums are not discovered by the German Government by the end of this year they may be claimed without question by the nearest relatives of the dead men.

The sums involved amount to millions.

Not one of the top Nazis had any money of his own when the party was first formed, but they all accumulated vast sums.

If ever the term "blood money" may be properly used, this is surely it.

I saw Emmy Goering in Munich last week. She looked like a million dollars—corpulent, smartly dressed, and as full of self-assurance as ever of old.

She rents an expensive flat and employs a maidservant.

She is blatantly unworried by any consideration for economy.

Her husband's account in Berlin stands at 1,000,000 marks (nearly £100,000), but the account is blocked, and she cannot get at it.

So how does she contrive to live so well?

When I raised this question with a German Government official, he said.

"Frau Goering was an actress before she married Hermann Goering. She is probably living on the sale of pictures, jewelry, and so on, which she owned before her marriage."

A succinct response to this statement was made to me by Air Commodore Frank Beaumont, who is now living in Bavaria.

Both Goering and his wife were frequently guests at his home in Germany before the war.

"The German Government statement is utter nonsense," he said.

"Emmy Goering was a third-rate actress with very little money before she became friendly with her future husband."

She remained Goering's "friend" for some years before marrying him.

During that time he showered gifts upon her.

Every one of those gifts was paid for directly as a result of Goering's affiliation to the Nazi party.

The money he acquired was the fruit of confiscation, bribery and looting.

On New Year's Day, 1956, however, Emmy Goering will be able to come out into the open.

All she will have to say will be:

"I've discovered that my husband owned so many shares in such-and-such a company, which I never knew about."

And then there will be nothing to prevent her cashing in the lot.

Goering, who committed suicide in his cell during the Nuremberg trials, was, of course, one of the giants of the party.

Chief of the Luftwaffe, pervert, drug addict, his overriding passion was the acquisition of art treasures plundered from occupied territories all over Europe.

He was cunning in his investments. He successfully salted away a large proportion of his gains.

Heinrich Himmler, by contrast, was far less skilful in his financial dealings.

It may be that he was a more genuine Nazi than his blustering colleague.

It appears that he was concerned rather with personal advancement in the party than with financial fiddling.

As chief of the Gestapo for nearly ten years, he was gullible enough to entrust his entire fortune to the Berlin banks.

There it still remains—blocked.

He committed suicide by swallowing cynanide.

And he left his wife and daughter with no visible assets save his vast but useless bank accounts.

Frau Himmler also lives in Munich.

A bespectacled, spinsterish-looking little women in her early sixties, she draws a small pension of about £7 a month.

She appears to rely mainly on her daughter's earnings for support.

Will she suddenly learn after January 1 that Himmler had some undisclosed bank account, or shareholdings of which she knew nothing?

Josef Goebbel's sister, Maria Kimmich, is living in comparative comfort.

When Goebbels, Hitler's superlatively efficient Minister of Propaganda, shot himself dead after watching his wife and children die of cynanide poisoning, he left Maria as his sole heir.

His bank account in Berlin stands at about £85,000.

But this is generally presumed to represent only a fraction f his total fortune.

Who knows where the remainder has been distributed, or vhen it will make its reappearance?

Could Maria Kimmich supply the answer?

Now let's take a look at the widow of Reinhart Heydrich, 'The Butcher."

His murder caused the extermination of the entire popuation of the village of Lidice, in Czechoslovakia.

Frau Heydrich is living in far greater comfort than Frau Iimmler.

But she does not stand to gain nearly so much as some of ier fellow-widows on January 1.

Her husband was killed before he could really cash in on he golden days of looting and pillage.

Frau Heydrich bore her husband four children in rapid uccession to help prove the theory of the "perfect Nordic ype."

This means that she now gets a comfortable pension.

Pensions in Germany are allotted by regional authorities, nd may vary greatly from State to State.

Herr Raunau, spokesman for the German Socialist Party in Bonn, told me:

"Fully-blown former Nazis are today in receipt of pensions mounting to as much as £175 per month.

"It pays to have been a Nazi."

To prove his point, he cited a scandalous case which has ome to light.

The widow of a man who had been executed for his part n the anti-Hitler bomb plot of July 20, 1944, was receiving pension of £15 per month.

The widow of the man who had denounced him and was, ierefore, directly responsible for his murder was being paid 84 per month.

Twenty-two top ex-Ministry of State officials all of whom iust have been proven Nazis even to qualify for their posts, ich get pensions of about £175 a month.

Yes, it certainly does seem to have paid some to have een Nazis.

Now it appears that it is going to be even more profitable be a widow of a top Nazi.

There have been many questions asked recently in the erlin Senate concerning the status of the widows. The most nsistent reply in their favor has been in the form of a rect reference to Alfred Krupp.

It is contended that if Krupp, multi-millionaire arms manucturer, managed to retrieve the bulk of his fortune, why ouldn't the widows do likewise?

But that is surely beside the point.

Any money their husbands acquired came from the blood literally millions who fell foul of the Nazis.

Every penny of it should be devoted to the rehabilitation the comparative few who survived.

As compensation for what they suffered they should be abled to live without want.

It is up to the Germans to see that this is done.

Unfortunately, the matter is now out of the Allies' hands. But this gives the Germans—millions of whom also sufed under Hitler—a chance to show the world they mean purge themselves completely of the guilt of Nazism.

That's No Ghost, That's Gen. Dietrich

Sepp Dietrich must surely be convinced of his own immortality now; he ran out of borrowed time long ago. As far back in 1934 he won special recognition from Adolf Hitler for carrying out the assassination of Ernst Roehm during the great Nazi blood purge. Hitler promoted him to the rank of general; subsequently he became commander of Hitler's bodyguards.

Dietrich's career in World War II was identified with some of the most ghoulish enterprises in the Nazi war record. His role in the slaughter that marked the capture of Kharkov won him the informal designation of "Butcher of Kharkov." Even more celebrated, however, was his conduct in the brutal Malmedy massacre—the massacre in which more than 115 captured American prisoners were ruthlessly murdered during the Battle of the Bulge.

Dietrich survived war, defeat and trial. In 1946 an American military tribunal fund him guilty of heavy responsibility for the massacre, but he escaped the death penalty, receiving life imprisonment instead.

And now he has been freed—not because of the discovery of any judicial error or because he has achieved any miracle of rehabilitation but because we are in the process of trying to liquidate all German memories of that international unpleasantness known as World War II.

He was released without any public announcement; perhaps our officials had the decency to be embarrassed. But when a man with so monumental a record of murder beats the rap again, the event is bound to be discovered.

Dietrich's biggest killings may be over. He may never claim another victim. The terrifying impact of his release—like the restoration to civic eminence of other distinguished Nazis in both the Communist and Western zones of Germany—is to invigorate and inspire the darkest forces of German neo-Nazism.

If Sepp Dietrich has survived so monstrous a lifetime of slaughter, who can convincingly tell the new German generation that international crime doesn't pay?

THE RIGHT HAND MAN

". . . Dr. Adenauer pushed through selection of a man closely linked to his chancellery as state secretary of the Bonn Defense Ministry . . .

"The new state secretary is Josef Rust, forty-eight, who has been a high-ranking official in the Ministry of Economics. He held an important post in Dr. Adenauer's chancellery from 1949 to 1952. His appointment follows that of Karl Gumbel . . .

"An important aspect of the appointments of Mr. Rust and Mr. Gumbel is that both men are closely associated with Hans Globke, fifty-seven, state secretary in Dr. Adenauer's chancellery. Mr. Globke has indisputably emerged as the 'gray eminence' of the Adenauer regime.

NOTE: In 1933, Hans Globke was appointed legal adviser to the Nazi bigwig Wilhelm Frick in the Ministry of the Interior of the Hitler Government. He collaborated with another leading Nazi, Stuckhardt in writing the official commentary on the Nuremberg racial laws. For the unfortunate and unhappy victims of Hitler's barbaric racial legislation Dr. Globke had this comforting thought: "They should have chosen their parents more carefully."

"Dr. Glauberg told reporters that Gestapo Chief Himmler had assigned him 400 Jewish women prisoners for his experiments at the extermination center.

The Road to Dachau

Leading out of the old German city of Munich to the northwest is a long street called Dachauer Strasse—the road to Dachau. The name calls to mind things that many people would prefer to forget. The huge Nazi concentration camp there became a synonym for the torture rack, the gas chamber and the most bestial excesses of the Hitler regime.

Since the end of World War II, the Germans have kept the camp open as a memorial to its thousands of victims. This week, ten years after the end of the war, the District of Dachau proposed that the camp be closed. But Minister President Wilhelm Hoegner of Bavaria ruled that it should remain open.

We commend Herr Hoegner for his decision. We think that not only the Germans but all peoples should be frequently reminded of the tragedy of Dachau.

We should remind us—as Dachau can remind us—that tyranny is not always imposed from without but can arise unsuspected from within, as Hitlerism first arose in Munich.

We need to remember that the way to the concentration camp begins inconspicuously at the vital center of a society—in the first signs of unopposed bigotry, race hatred, nationalistic arrogance, personal intolerance. It can start when people speak disparagingly of another race or creed or intimate that those who disagree with them should be suppressed.

It can begin when people fail to resist the first encroachments on liberty, when they shrug off a denial of someone else's rights and dignity and say—as many Germans once said—"It's none of my business."

Wherever freedom is successfully violated, on no matter how small a scale—there begins the road to Dachau.

FROM HAUSHOFER TO ADENAUER

"Words like Nature, half reveal and alf conceal the soul within"—Alfred ord Tennyson. U. S. diplomats who ave negotiated with the Soviets over the ears will appreciate Lord Tennyson's in- ight. They know from frustrating ex- erience that the Russians are masters in e art of confusing issues through the anipulation of words and phrases. Sev- ral postwar agreements between the So- iets and the Western powers have been endered meaningless because phrases uch as "democratic majority," "people's emocracy," when concretely applied, ave been transformed by Marxist sleight f hand into their opposite. There is ubstantial evidence to indicate that our iplomats, having been burned so fre- uently, are no longer content to accept uch phrases at face value. They rightly nsist that practice must be the acid test f Russian preachings.

Unfortunately the prudence shown by ur diplomats in treating with the Rus- ans seems to be for the most part absent n dealing with the Germans. A case in oint is the way we have approached the lea of European unity in relation to ermany. Of major concern to the United ates, following the end of World War -, was the tremendous damage inflicted the Germans on Western Europe. The onomic and political problems which set the peoples of that decisive area emed to make them easy prey for Com- unist blandishment. Thus, our policy akers concluded that, unless Western uropean unity on a democratic basis was mly established, the tide of Communist pansion would roll on to the Atlantic aboard.

he Same Language, But . . .

The idea of integrating the nations of estern Europe through the relinquish- nt of part of their sovereignty for the mmon welfare won many supporters. the United States this policy of in- gration or federalization of Western rope was regarded as the key to the rman problem. Our leading statesmen, including Secretary of State Dulles, declared that a viable integrated Western Europe which would be strong economically and militarily, would require West Germany's participation. By the same token, the linking of West Germany to a Western European federation would serve as an effective guaranty against the revival of a predatory Germany. Moreover, our statesmen believed, that by implementing this policy, close bonds of friendship would be established between the United States and Western Europe.

U. S. policy makers were jubilant when they learned that the leaders of the Western democracies, including Winston Churchill, were firm adherents to the concept of Western European unity. The former President of France Vincent Auriol declared, "Europe must unite herself if she wishes to recover and live, and if she does not want American assistance to be a gesture without future or a humiliating charity." For the most part the statesmen of Western Europe envisaged a federalized Europe in terms as expressed by M. Auriol. Furthermore, his position was consonant with the expressed views of our own statesmen.

As for the Germans it is a matter of record that their leaders were among the first to welcome the American initiative (see No. 32 of Prevent World War III, 1949, page 7). In his book "War or Peace," Secretary of State Dulles expressed satisfaction that Chancellor Adenauer spoke the "same language" as U. S. leaders. Thus, encouraged by the apparent unanimity of ultimate aims and purposes, the U. S. went about the task of fostering a federated Europe through such generous programs as our Marshal Plan aid. The United States appropriated tens of billions of dollars toward the realization of Western European unity.

Yet, there was one basic flaw in this grandiose plan. While the French, British and the United States spoke the same language as the Germans, their ultimate aims and objectives were as divergent from those of the Germans as the sky is from the earth. In short, we were under the misconception that the same words meant the same things to the Germans as they did to the Western Allies.

Haushofer's "United Europe"

The object of this study is to examine the objectives of a federalized Europe as conceived by present day German leaders. In this connection, familiarization with some of the basic teachings of the late Karl Haushofer, the leading exponent of German geopolitics, is essential. Geopolitics is a coined expression and has been defined as "the science of the earth relationship to political developments. It is based on the broad foundation of geography which is the science of political organisms in space and their structure . . . It guides practical politics to that point where it must take the step into the unknown. Only if inspired by geopolitical knowledge can this step be successful. Geopolitics will and must become the geographical conscience of the state" (Geopolitics at Munich by Russell H. Fifield, State Department 6-24-45).

This rather obscure description of the meaning of "geopolitics," colored by a ponderous verbiage, is characteristic of the writings of the German geopoliticians, particularly Haushofer. Yet, when all of the double talk and pseudo-scientific jargon is boiled down to its essentials, it may be defined in the word of an authority on German geopolitics, Father Edmund A. Wash, S.J., as "an apology for international theft prepared in advance of the event" (Life, 9-16-46).

Prof. Haushofer was the oracle of German geopolitics. According to Father Walsh, his views are found in his 40 published volumes and 400 essays, articles, lectures and reviews. The name Haushofer is little known in the United States but his doctrines and teachings became the very warp and woof of Germany's great strategy for world conquest. Though Haushofer had been a leading officer of the Kaiser's imperial armies during World War I, he transferred his talents to the field of geopolitics after Germany's defeat. In due time, he became one of the leading brain trusters of the secret German General Staff which had been reorganized behind the backs of the Allied occupation authorities.

Haushofer's connections with the industrial war lords of the Ruhr were also important. Thus, his influence in shaping German policy between the two wars is beyond question. It was Haushofer who taught Adolf Hitler geopolitics. He had met Hitler through Rudolf Hess, the Führer's close associate. During Hitler's imprisonment in 1923, Herr Haushofer visited the future Führer and patiently instructed him on the fine points of geopolitics much of which was later embodied in Mein Kampf. Subsequently, Dr. Haushofer introduced Hitler to leading German industrialists including Thyssen, Stinnes, Krupp, Hugenberg, Roechling and Kirdorf. When Hitler came to power, General Haushofer was appointed President of the German Academy and of the Peoples League for Germanism Abroad. Father Walsh notes that he not only became an elder statesman in the field of geopolitical strategy "but developed into a companion and political Nestor of the ruling clique."

It was Haushofer who founded the "Institute for Geopolitics" which attracted leading German scholars, journalists and politicians. His disciples carried his message far and wide as they do today. It is also a fact that Haushofer's "Weltanschauung" influenced the educational system of Germany.

"Lebensraum"

Haushofer conceived of the world as consisting of a number of key spaces. Space was synonymous with power. Hence, to survive, let alone thrive, a state must ceaselessly enlarge its area of control. He had little regard for small nations and minority groupings. These were destined to be absorbed by world power blocs. Haushofer described the state as an organism which required the necessary conditions for expansion. In this context Germany, as the most dynamic state organism, must conquer space without limit. He once wrote, "Geopolitics is a duty to safeguard the right to the soil, to the land in the widest sense, not only the land within the frontiers of the Reich, but the right to the much more extensive folk-and-cultural-land." It was Haushofer who invented the term "Lebensraum" so frequently employed by Hitler in justifying his grabbing of other people's territories.

Prof. Haushofer had studied the works of the eminent British geographer Sir Halford MacKinder. The British scientist had observed that the key to the domination of the world rested ultimately in the control of the Eurasian landmass. He had expressed the view that should such control be exercised by the Germans and/or the Russians, the Western world would be placed in an inferior position strategically that would be most difficult to overcome. Having carefully studied MacKinder's theories, Haushofer sought to apply them on the basis of mutual collaboration between Russia and Germany. As early as 1913 Haushofer wrote: "A community of interests between Japan, Russia and the central European imperial powers would be absolutely unassailable." Following the end of World War I, Haushofer continued to propound this view. This is not to say that Haushofer sympathized with Russian Communism. He believed that indirect methods in handling the Russians would be more effective than the use of force. He advised Hitler to pursue such a policy emphasizing that once Central and Western Europe with its African possessions were firmly under control, the Reich's superiority would then be so overwhelming that the Russian heartland would fall to Germany practically automatically as the result of economic and political penetration. Mr. Fifield writes, "The attitude of Haushofer toward the Soviet Union was motivated by a strong desire to found a combination of powers consisting of Germany, the Soviet Union, Japan, China and India under German leadership."

Berlin-Moscow-Tokyo Axis

It was Haushofer's influence that delayed Hitler's invasion of Russia. Indeed, on the occasion of the Hitler-Stalin Pact, Haushofer hailed it. He spoke of the pact as vindicating his earlier pleas for a Berlin-Moscow-Tokyo-Axis. Such an axis would form a vast transcontinental bloc which would be in a position to counterbalance the United States and Great Britain. "Such an alliance," he wrote, "does not aim at 'world domination' but to be sure of the abolition of the capitalistic rule of Western democracies over the 'have nots' and the establishment of a juster world order free from such exploitation." It is interesting to note that the Nazi successor to Adolf Hitler, Grand Admiral Doenitz, signed a secret memorandum a few weeks before Germany's surrender in which he called for an alliance between the Russians and the Germans. These were his words: "Thus would be formed an alliance between the young Socialist forces against the old entrenched powers of the West."

Following Hitler's invasion of Russia, Haushofer's influence with the Führer began to decline. It was too late to turn back after Hitler had made the fatal error of committing Germany to a two front war. Nevertheless, Prof Haushofer did not despair for the future of his Reich. In 1944, knowing that the Hitler regime was doomed, he published a new essay in his magazine Zeitschrift für Geopolitik, which indicated that he had revised his theories so as to meet the new situation that would flow from Germany's defeat. The Haushofer article was analyzed by Paul Wohl, an expert an Russo-German relations (Christian Science Monitor 10-28-44). Mr. Wohl pointed out that Herr Haushofer no longer believed that world domination would go to that power or powers which controlled Russia and Siberia. According to Mr. Wohl, Prof. Haushofer was now convinced that the real danger of world domination loomed elsewhere—"in America."

The Real Enemy

Previously, General Haushofer felt that the idea of a Germany, dominating Africa and collaborating with the Soviet Union, was the key to world domination. He no longer shared that view. Mr. Wohl quotes Haushofer as stating that the real threat came from the U. S. dominated North-South empire which "already extends rapacious hands to tropical Africa, Iran, India and Australia. By using its Pan-American supremacy as a jumping off point for further expansion East and West, the United States seeks to establish the basis for its world empire and to threaten future opponents with a third world war. This American north-south empire represents the only real danger of imperialistic world domination." Mr. Wohl tells us that in this same article Haushofer deplored the blood shedding between Russia and Germany and inferentially called for a Russo-German understanding to meet the American challenge. In this connection Mr. Wohl reveals that Haushofer's new line has probably alread fashioned the political thinking of the mall circle of men who sooner or later will try again to win the peace for Germany."

It is one of the oddities of the Allied ccupation of Germany that Haushofer hould have escaped prosecution as a war riminal. Whether this was due to the act that Allied officials were ignorant of his writings and activities is open to question. It is true that, when he was interogated by Allied officials, he posed as a misunderstood scientist who had been uped and coerced by the Nazis. He hose his words and expressions with reat care so that they would sound lausible and attractive to his listeners. Germany, he told reporters, needs "a eriod of quiet to get down to work." He added that the Germans especially hould have "a real outlet." The Associated Press reporter wrote that Haus-ofed advocated a federated Europe. He uoted Haushofer as follows: "Confederation is the only way for Europe beuse history has proved that any form of a tyrannous set-up has failed—under Napoleon and Hitler. It should be planned first on an economic basis so that there would be no political resentments involved such as exist now against Germany. Later there would develop political understanding from a logical force. I am very much cheered that the Allies have decided Germany will be treated as an economic unit and that they will not chop up the country" (10-7-45). To those who are advocating western European unity Haushofer's words sounded like music. It seemed like a definite commitment to cooperate with the Western democracies. However, placed in the context of his significant essay of 1944, it is clear that Herr Haushofer's words "like Nature, half reveal and half conceal the soul within."

Adenauer Speaks

By strange coincidence, Haushofer's clarion call for European federation was achieved by other Germans slated to become the pro-Western leaders in Germany. In the forefront was Chancellor Konrad Adenauer.

It goes without saying that Konrad Adenauer's public utterances are never without purpose. He is not one who is apt to make reckless statements. For the most part he embellishes his thoughts with ethical and moral platitudes that have a definite appeal to Western idealism. For Adenauer it is not what is said but how it is said. This brings to mind a lecture on foreign policy delivered by George F. Kennan, one of the architects of our postwar German policy and a student of German geopolitics. He said, "we would do well to learn to think of the conduct of foreign affairs as a problem of style even more than of purpose. Where purpose is dim and questionable, form comes into its own . . ." (delivered in 1951 at Northwestern University).

There are few records of Adenauer's public pronouncements of policy prior to World War II. However, we are indebted to his recently published book "World Indivisible" which does give us

"If you examine the Soviet declarations of policy since Bulganin and Khrushchev became the travelling twins of militant Russian co-existence, you can find no direct conflict with Molotov's bluntly unsubtle attitude here towards German unification.

"Why, then, have we experienced such a sense of outraged indignation, as expressed by Dulles? It appears that only now the Secretary of State is beginning to learn that we were mouse-trapped at the summit. He had been so eager to produce a diplomatic triumph of consequence that he was snared into delusion and, thereby, spread delusion at home and abroad.

"We will not and we cannot have any serious negotiation unless, and until, we are willing to use Germany outside NATO as a negotiable card. The Russians told us so, in public declarations by their highest leaders.

"This conference is another defeat for us, another setback in the Dulles record of unbroken defeat. Sooner or later, probably sooner, the two Germanys will be talking to each other. We cannot prevent that, nor can the doughty, ailing Chancellor Adenauer. So the Russians score.

"A searching reappraisal of American foreign policy is in order."

(Seymour Freidin, New York Post, 11-15-55)

". . . Dr. Adenauer and Herr von Brentano have revealed their own uneasiness by making very defensive speeches since their return (from Moscow). Dr. Adenauer, himself, has been reaffirming Germany's loyalty to its treaties. It is evident that the Chancellor has been greatly impressed in Moscow . . ."

"My God—she's still there."

(France Observateur, Paris)

some idea of his outlook as early as 1930. It should be borne in mind that the year 1930 was one of economic and political crisis for Germany. Hitlerism was on the march. It was during this period too that Haushofer's influence was great not only among the Nazis but also with non-Nazis who dreamt of a Greater Germany but refrained from employing the rather blunt language of Hitler. It was in this year that Adenauer as Lord Mayor of Cologne, developed a program for "world unity." This program said in part: "The land masses and hemispheres have merged into one vast continent upon a unitary planet; the globe has so shrunk that there are no longer any unknown places upon it, no strange lands or strange peoples to be discovered. Man looks for new worlds to conquer in the stratosphere. And so Europe, which used to be the hearth of world history, has become only a part of a historical whole. Germany's task is to make apparent the inherent unity of Europe and the need for a natural division of labor on the Continent. This can be established only if Europe is conceived of as an organism. We must be fully aware of what this means, must grasp all the effects of this new state of affairs and try consistently to bring all its potentialities to fulfillment."

The actual terminology, let alone the concepts, contained in this statement will be familiar to anyone who has bothered to read the works of Haushofer or his disciples. It was a view that could be readily incorporated in Hitler's program for a United Europe. This does not imply that Adenauer supported the Nazis as such. It is to say, however, that the ideas of Haushofer did not merely find their influence among the Nazis alone but were absorbed consciously or unconsciously by all Germans even those who professed to be anti-Nazi. This is the fundamental point that must be borne in mind in order to understand's Adenauer's "United Europe."

Adenauer's Friends

It is significant that the introduction to Adenauer's book was written by Prof. Ernest Jackh, founder and former President of the "Hochschule für Politik" in Berlin. Prof. Jackh declares that the above mentioned program was framed by Adenauer and himself. Haushofer's Institut für Geopolitik had close ties with the Hochschule für Politik. Prof Haushofer's son Albrecht was head of the geopolitical seminar in that school, "a key position in the training of military and civilian officers of state" (German Strategy of World Conquest, by Derwent Whittlesey). Prof. Jackh writes that Theodor Heuss, now President of the Federal Republic, hailed this program. As pointed out in the No. 45 issue of Prevent World War III, Heuss was the intimate collaborator and pupil of Friedrich Naumann, a leading exponent of the idea of a Pan-German Europe. In 1916 Naumann wrote a book "Middle Europe" in which he called for the organization of a European power bloc dominated by Germany.

Methods and Objectives

As mentioned above, Dr. Adenauer has been one of the most ardent advocates of a United Europe since the end of the war. Dr. Adenauer saw in the united Europe the opportunity of attaining two goals, (a) gaining U. S. economic and political support for the rapid revival of Germany's industrial power; (b) Germany's domination over Western Europe whose resources would be employed for the furtherance of Germany's ambitions.

Insofar as the first objective was concerned, Dr. Adenauer knew that the American people would support any plausible proposition which on the surface would do away with some of the causes that have involved American arms and men in European wars. It was his belief that the United States would give special attention to Germany's needs once the Germans were able to convince our policy makers that Germany was the most determined and reliable exponent of the united Europe idea. In a statement before the Bonn Parliament on May 26, 1950, Adenauer admonishes his fellow politicians to champion the concept of Western European integration. "Let us be quite clear about it," the Chancellor said, "if in such an important matter we were to oppose the efforts of the United States to bring about a united Europe, the United States would not maintain in the future her pro-German policy."

The knowledge that the U. S. would go all out in support of such a program made it comparatively easy for the Germans to put across the idea that European integration depended on the rebirth of Germany's power even at the expense of her neighbors. On April 3, 1950, he exclaimed, "If Germany is gone, Europe will be gone." On May 22, 1950, he reiterated this theme, "there will be no strong Europe without Germany."

The implication of Dr. Adenauer's remarks was spelled out in more concrete terms by one of his close associates, Dr Walter Strauss. In a speech on January 7, 1949, he outlined the terms that would create "a better future for the whole of Europe." Toward accomplishing this objective he said, "it should be appreciated that the German claim is for priority to be given to the requirements of the German economy in the interest of a reconstruction of the German economy without which there can be no reconstruction of the European economy." Thus, the united Europe slogan created many opportunities for the Germans. Adenauer recognized that, given the establishment of such institutions as the Coal and Steel Community (the Schuman Plan), all Allied controls over Germany's war potential would be removed. Everything possible must be done, he declared, "to incorporate Western Germany into Western Europe economically and politically" (New York Times 4-3-50). His frequent demands that there should be prompt integration, received the enthusiastic support of Germany's leading industrialists They too shared Adenauer's view that the creation of a continental economic bloc "would enable German heavy industry to escape the consequences of losing the war . . ." (Carolus, The Nation 6-24-50).

For similar reasons Adenauer spared no effort to set up the European Defense Community. However, since Germany was suspected in Europe, Adenauer preferred that this project be sponsored in the first place by others. "Germans could not propose it without risking the impression that it was simply a cunning maneuver to unlock the occupation shackles and revive the Wehrmacht. But when the enemy from across the Rhine proposed it in 1950, Konrad Adenauer could more easily champion it" (Time Magazine 1-4-55). Though the European Defense Community treaty was ultimately defeated, Adenauer succeeded in throwing off the few remaining controls over the German powerhouse. This was the precondition for accomplishing the next objective, i.e., Germany's domination of Western Europe. The idea that an uncontrolled Western Germany would, in a short time, secure hegemony over Western Europe was recognized by Adenauer In a press interview (1-23-49) he stressed the importance of a united wes ern Europe to act as a Third Force between Soviet Russia and the United States. A correspondent for the Overseas News Agency reported that Adenauer "made it quite plain that Germany should in his view be the dominant power of such a coalition.

Adenauer's view that Germany would dominate an integrated Europe seems to have been shared by high officials in the United States. James Reston reported: "It is now recognized in official quarters that the potential economic and military power of Western Germany is so great that it is likely to dominate any purely Western European economic or military organization" (N. Y. Times 4-26-50).

"Reinsurance With the East"

Thus it becomes clear that Adenauer's stumping for a United Europe was but a means to an end. It was not going to create the kind of Europe envisaged by statesmen in the Western democracies. It would not be directed toward cultivating democratic principles and strengthening the bonds of friendship with the U. S. It was going to be a German creation and would be employed to further German end. This was the conclusion reached by Walter Lippmann five years ago when he wrote that by the process of integration "the Germans will acquire such independent power that they can have a foreign policy of their own." He pointed out that such a foreign policy would ultimately involve "a Bismarckian policy of 'reinsurance' with the East" (New York Herald Tribune 5-11-50). Recognizing this danger Mr. Lippmann declared that it would be necessary for Germany's chief partner in such an integration scheme, France, to be kept fully informed with respect to any German negotiations with the East. In 1954 Herr Adenauer viewed this question in another light. By hat time Germany was sure of its trength and reborn power. Therefore, at he Brussels Conference (1954), Aden- uer was able to boast, "in any race for ussian favors Western Germany, not rance, is the likeliest winner."

In conceiving the further development his version of the western unity idea, denauer has insisted that in due time all Europe must be incorporated in order make her "once more a significant mponent in world politics and in the orld economy." Thus, Adenauer's Third rce involved all of Europe from the hannel to the borders of Russia. In the tradition of Haushofer he declared that "the age of national states has come to an end." And in the same tradition he excepted Germany. "A nation like Germany with one of the first seats in mankind's history has a claim to feel along nationalistic lines . . ." (New York Times 8-14-49). The doom of other nations and the shining future of the German nation was described in more precise terms by a member of Adenauer's cabinet, Dr. Hans Seebohm: "Does free Europe want to join Germany? Germany is the heart of Europe and the limbs must adjust themselves to the heart, not the heart to the limbs" (9-15-41).

Adenauer has viewed a federated western Europe as a base upon which all of Europe could be united. He has admitted that this could only be achieved through negotiations with the Soviet Union. This explains his statement of July 1, 1953: "Already today the states of the European Schuman Plan have formed a market of 157 million people. Thus from the point of view of the Russian economy these countries represent a highly interesting trade partner. Years ago there was a time when the economy of Germany and Russia complemented one another in a magnificent way. The economy of an integrated Europe, including Germany, could do vastly more. The greater the economic integration (between Western Europe and Russia), the greater the political security."

The "Third Power"

What could be the basis for a Soviet-German understanding? It is a well known fact that the Soviet Union regards the presence of American troops in Europe as a major obstacle to her own designs. It is also a fact that the Soviets would like to see an independent force in Europe that would make the United States give up its bases. This is precisely what a federated Europe under German aegis would achieve. A federated Europe under those conditions would be an independent force controlling vast resources and hundreds of millions of people. Six years ago, Adenauer stated, "In the face of the two big world powers there is no chance left for Europe if it does not unite to form a Third World Power to meet the massive threats from outside" (St. Louis Post Dispatch 11-6-49). In an article written exclusively for the New York Times, he returned to this point: "In the interest of world peace, it is absolutely necessary for a third power to arise. Only a federated Europe can be that third power. This federated Europe would never be as mighty as Soviet Russia or the United States. And by virtue of its internal structure it could never be an aggressor. The countries that made it up would be unalterably opposed to war, because they have had enough of it. But such a power as a united Europe could throw her weight in favor of peace at crucial moments, when the tensions between the two great powers grow too alarming . . ."

(Fitzpatrick, Courtesy The St. Louis Post Dispatch)

It will be noted that in his concept of a third power to "protect the peace," the United States is regarded as one of the massive threats to Europe. This is made even clearer in a statement by one of Germany's leading newspapers, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (9-4-52): "Western Germany should follow a policy of co-operation with the Western powers. But this must never lead to a situation in which Germany becomes the battlefield and the Germans cannon fodder . . . When, however, against all expectations and reasons, the Americans should start an aggression against the East, disregarding our determination and probably those of other Europeans to stay out of the war, then we should not be forced into participation in a war just for the reason the Americans had helped us in our rearmament. In such a case, the superior strength of Europe should then be automatically directed against any disturbance of peace that comes from the West."

The Bulletin issued by the German Federal Government also speaks about this new "balance of power." It declares that European integration was "of paramount importance"; that "an integrated Europe would not by itself (our italic) threaten Russia. The integration of Europe has become "a necessity for the stabilization of the balance of power urged by the trend of our times: to form supranational communities on the various continents." Here again there is a hint to Russia that a united Europe, independent of the U. S., would not be a threat to the East. This is the only meaningful interpretation of the words "by itself" italicized above. Finally, we can see in this balance of power theory the geopolitical dreams of Prof. Haushofer. In practice, the German concept of a Third Power Bloc would be directed against the United States.

The Climax

The climax of Adenauer's united Europe policy occurred when he undertook unilateral negotiations with the Soviet Union. This was the logical result of his previous policies which had enabled Germany to achieve a paramount position in Western Europe. Thus, in the words of a prominent West German newspaper, the Adenauer mission to Moscow marked the end of "his one-sided pro-Western policy . . ." (New York Times 9-18-55).

That Adenauer is a faithful student of German Realpolitik, the handmaiden of Haushofer's geopolitical theories, will be denied by his admirers. They will point out "unswerving" loyalty to the western cause. They will cite chapter and verse "proving" how Adenauer has fought the unreconstructed nationalists and other foes of western democracy. We must admit that it is difficult to penetrate Adenauer's armor but here and there we have found chinks which, in our opinion, deflate his uncompromising support of democratic concepts and principles.

The same Adenauer who has spoken of his eternal friendship for the Allies, has condemned the Allied denazification policy and the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. Here is what he said: "Germany has been besmirched, insulted and degraded too long. For five years we have been demilitarized and dismantled. For five years we have had war crimes trial. and the German soldier has been maligned and insulted." It was the same Adenauer who once warned the West. "it was the German Army and not the German people that capitulated and this the world had better remember." These are statements which are not at all in line with the Adenauer that the American people are accustomed to hear. The New York Times chief foreign correspondent C. L. Sulzberger once described Adenauer in terms which we believe are realistic and by no means unfair to the old gentleman: "Chancellor Konrad Adenauer has achieved a job of statesmanship which, if it continues to success, will rival that of Talleyrand after Napoleon's defeat. Under the cloak of "Euorpean" concepts and integration with the West. the farsighted and single-minded Chancellor has never forgotten Germany's aspiration to group all Teutons within one border.

"He talks freely about the need to return German emigres to their former homelands in present-day Poland. He wants to achieve his aims peacefully, but this does not mean he does not intend some day to see them accomplished. And what applies to Poland also applies as surely to Czechoslovakia and other lands.

"This old man has seen the disasters that arise from what might be termed the 'Grafenwoehr type of thinking.' He is not in any undue hurry. Aided by ideological jealousies and intra-Allied cleavages, he quietly pursues what is probably the only long-range policy being applied in Germany today, a German policy dictated by Germans, not by foreigners on either side of the curtain."

The Ruhr and Cairo

By WILLIAM RICHARDSON

Responsible observers here believe a powerful neo-Nazi etwork is operating on both sides of the Iron Curtain to elp the Kremlin engineer the Russian-Egyptian arms deal ow threatening Middle East peace.

German generals probably advised Premier Nasser to buy ed arms and Ruhr industrialists working through Egypt and pain—while openly flirting in recent weeks with the Eastern loc—helped clinch the deal.

The facts are these: Shortly after suffering humiliating deat from Israel, ex-King Farouk imported high-ranking Gerian generals and admirals to act as his shadow general staff. hese were full time officers who collected a cadre of several ore technicians, strategists and training experts. Other ex-enerals commute regularly between the Ruhr and Cairo as ilitary consultants—and with business assignments from erman industrialists and import-export firms.

After Farouk many of these officers were retained by Gen. laguib and Nasser. Experts here do not believe there is the ightest doubt these ex-Nazi generals gave at least technical lvice to Nasser on capabilities of Red weapons.

Egypt's reported purchase of Russian motor torpedo boats considered definite proof of this; it is known that ex-Nazi ival officers have long advised Egypt to tighten the naval ockade of Israel. They have even tried with the aid of Geran technicians to manufacture two-man submarines for this urpose as long ago as 1952.

This network extends into South America, Spain and the iddle East. It is particularly strong in Spain where the pillar the German colony is Otto Skorzeny, Hitler's triggerman ho rescued Mussolini and was once assigned in wartime to sassinate Gen. Eisenhower. Skorzeny has close family ties with financial wizard Hjalmar Schacht who lately has turned financial adviser to Middle East governments.

Now, it has been definitely learned only last week that Egypt has been the trading link between Russia and Spain. Russia imported Spanish mercury in return for oil products which were cleared through Egypt. Many economic experts believe neo-Nazis in Spain engineered this. Russian and Spanish embassies last week in Paris began unofficial trade talks.

In recent months Egypt has pushed closer to the Communist orbit. Nasser has signed trade agreements with Russia, Red China, Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Czechoslovakia and Romania. Soviets have been quite open about their intentions to infiltrate the Middle East although the U. S. State Dept. has curiously given this little publicity.

But Kremlin strategy extends beyond the Moslem world. Molotov has told spanish journalists he would not oppose Spain's entry into the U. N. Communist officials in Moscow have openly said they want to extend relations with the Mediterranean bloc—which is an Arab-Spanish affair except in the North—into other Latin countries such as Argentina. It's a long way from Egypt to Argentine, both geographically and ethically, but this Arab-Spanish bloc has a strategic economic continuity—and it has been peentrated by neo-Nazi experts all along the line. A far bigger pattern was beginning to emerge today from this new Soviet move than was first acknowledged. After all, Stalin and Hitler both had the same ambitions to control the oil-rich strategic Middle East as the gateway to wealth and victory. (Courtesy, N. Y. Post)

"The political idea that Germany must ally herself with the East is a very old one in German foreign policy—before and after the Bolshevik revolution.

"The concept was an important factor in Frederick the Great's schemes 200 years ago.

"It figured in Iron Chancellor Bismarck's policy during the second half of the 19th Century, it arose again when Hitler sealed his 1939 bargain with Stalin to protect his back while invading Poland and attacking the West in World War II . . .

"Not only did the German generals aid the Bolsheviks during World War I but they laid the groundwork for the modern Red Army.

"In their machinations to circumvent the disarmament clauses of the Versailles Treaty, the German high command made secret deals whereby German military experts and German munitions men built airplane and tank factories in Russia . . ."

"The West German Border Police let it be known to the Adenauer government that it would allow itself to be incorporated in the new German army solely on its own terms.

"The border police consist of 18,000 men, and its commanders have submitted a memorandum to the government in which four conditions were mentioned as to their integration in the army . . .

"The four points in the conditions submitted by the commanders are:

"1) That all units of the border police must be taken over as complete integral units by the army in their present organizational structure;

"2) That the officers of the border police will in no manner be subjected to political investigation by the Defense Ministry or by the civilian Bundestag committee;

"3) That the officers of the border police must retain their present rank; and

Pan-Germanism Rides Again

Five years ago the former Dean of the House of Representatives, the late Congressman Adolph J. Sabath, charged that he Germans were "trying to make political capital of their expellee problem." Congressman Sabath based his accusations on an analysis of the German refugee problem published in the Summer 1950 issue (No. 35) of Prevent World War II, which he had inserted in the Congressional Record.

From the very beginning, the Society warned that the Germans were deliberately distorting the problems confronting the refugees. In the article cited by Congressman Sabath, we declared that the Germans had aggravated the plight of the refugees "to extort more and more concessions from the American taxpayers."

It goes without saying that the influx n West Germany of these refugees and xpellees created initial difficulties. On he other hand we showed that contrary o the allegations of the German authorities, much could be accomplished in the way of alleviating conditions for the expellees and refugees with the view toward absorbing them in the West German economy. Current reports and analyses ndicate that the refugees have been making a decisive contribution in connection with the rapid recovery of the German conomy. One authority on this subject, rof. H. C. Wallich, writes: "But the refugees did not remain a burden exclusively. It is hardly possible to increase the population of a country by 25 percent without making some impact on production. As time went on, the refugees were bsorbed into the gathering German boom. They were willing to work hard, or low wages and on the roughest jobs. Starting from scratch, they were under desperate pressure to make good. Some f them were aided by special skills, and a few succeeded in quickly rebuilding the enterprises they had lost in their former homes. In the aggregate they greatly raised German national income above what it would have been without them" (The Yale Review, Summer 1955).

Ulterior Motives

In spite of the fact that the German economy has absorbed these people and s benefited thereby, the false propaganda continues. This too confirms what we said five years ago, i.e. that the refugee problem was being played up for ulterior motives: "It is being used to assault every remaining safeguard against the resurgence of Pan-Germanism and neo-Nazism. It is also employed as a weapon to discredit and injure Allied prestige . . ."

Among the more vociferous of the expellee groups are the Sudeten Germans, many of whom were expelled from Czechoslovakia after World War II because of their fifth column work on behalf of the Nazis. The Sudeten Germans are well organized. Their propaganda has spread throughout Western Europe as well as in the United States. It has found its way into the Congressional Record. Indeed, the official organ of this group "Sudeten Bulletin" (July-August 1955) announced that the Federation of Expellee Associations would establish a public relations office in Washington, D. C., not only to represent the expellees' interests but "to combat the many factual misrepresentations which have been so widely disseminated by a number of non-German exile groups."

The announcement mentioned that the man slated to head this outfit in the United States, was Dr. Richard Sallet. Dr. Sallet is known to old newspaper hands as an ardent supporter of the Nazis during the 1930s. As a matter of fact, he conducted an "educational" campaign right here in the U. S. A. designed to create appreciation for "the wonders" that were being accomplished in Germany under Hitler. Dr. Sallet is a Ribbentrop diplomat and was known as a "specialist" on American affairs.

The "Sacred Mission"

Of course, leaders of the Sudeten expellees pose as vigorous anti-Communists but they show little energy in espousing the cause of democracy and respect for the truth. They have little in common with those who are working for the rebirth of genuine democracy in Eastern Europe. On the contrary, as we shall presently see, they have utter contempt for democratic principles. In many respects they operate in a manner that can only give aid and comfort to the present regimes in Eastern Europe. The London Economist once said of these characters, "These are the men who represent a dangerous hotbed of nationalist ideas."

The London Economist was not exaggerating. This can be seen by the speeches and statements made by Sudeten leaders. We have before us the text of an address delivered by a leader of the Sudeten Germans, Rudolf Lodgman von Auen on the occasion of a rally at Nuremberg (the rallying place of so many Nazi get-togethers). Herr von Auen told his cheering audience that Germandom was an irresitable force. "The word 'Reich' means more than princely dominion, kingdom or republic. It embraces a universal and ideological task and is not like the state, dependent on boundaries or frontiers." He alluded to the history of Germany's three Reichs. While he expressed disappointment that Hitler's Reich "toppled after a meager twelve" years, he asserted Germany's sacred mission to reestablish the Reich "even to the point of annexing German territory." Von Auen is purposely vague as to what constitutes "German" territory.

Proceeding from the necessity of recreating a fourth Reich, von Auen launched a bitter tirade against the Czechoslovakian people. He recalled how Hitler had threatened the Czechosovakians and reaffirmed the determination of the Sudeten Germans to revive Hitler's "Drang nach Osten." Germany has a "holy mission" and "we expellees in our unique situation have the special obligation to win our eastern neighbors to the idea of a European Federation . . . ." Before concluding his remarks, von Auen attacked the great democratic leaders of the Czechoslovakian people Thomas Masaryk and Edvard Benes whom he accused of being imperialistic and of having sold out "to Bolshevism."

Von Auen was not the first German to attack the genuine former democratic leaders of Czechoslovakia. Hitler too smeared Masaryk and Benes. His henchman Konrad Henlein, leader of the Nazi party in Czechoslovakia, also denounced the democratic leaders of Czechoslovakia as the "Hussite Bolshevik criminals of Prague."

The idea of browbeating the Czechs did not die with Hitler. Von Auen demonstrates that he has not forgotten the methods of his late Führer. Another article in the Sudeten Bulletin (October 1955) by Albert K. Simon warns the Czechoslovakian people that they can no longer depend upon the Western Powers for protection against the Germans. He further declares that the Czechs must recognize Germany's "rights" in Czechoslovakia.

These are but a sampling of the kind of speeches and articles which are found in the Sudeten Bulletin. They are frank in their hatred of the Czechoslovakian people and equally blunt in the belief that the Czechs as well as all other European nations had better recognize Germany's superior position in Europe—or else!

The "Echos"

As mentioned above, this chauvinistic propaganda extolling the idea of Deutschland über Alles, has been circulating in the United States. The most persistent purveyors of this line are pro-German journalists and important sections of the German language press. The German language paper Nord Amerika is notorious in this respect. Among its contributing writers is Austin J. App. Professor of a college in Texas, he has been exposed in previous issues of this magazine as an apologist for German war criminals. On September 1, 1955, he devoted an entire column to the "injustices" suffered by the Sudeten Germans and accused former President Truman of playing a major role in the expulsion of the Sudetens from Czechoslovakia. "By his (President Truman's) signature," App writes, "the American Government became co-responsible for the greatest crime in history . . ." In a subsequent column devoted to this subject (10-27-55), Professor App delivers an ultimatum to the West. The West, he warns, must turn over all territories claimed by the Germans or "the Germans will have to undertake to end the 'unnatural' quarterings and amputations themselves." Only by acceding to Germany's demands, Mr. App declares, will the world be allowed to live in peace. Concluding his war-like fulminations, App echoes the Pan-German slogan "justice requires a Germany united from the Maas to the Memel and the Etch to the Belt, as the old song says."

Another influential exponent of this hate campaign against Germany's neighbors is the Steuben Society which has already been exposed as a Pan-German outfit. In a telegram (published in the Steuben News, August-September 1955), addressed to the Sudeten rally at Nuremberg mentioned above, the National Council of the Steuben Society affirmed its loyalty to the Sudeten cause. The Council expressed the belief that in the not too distant future the cause would "win out over the infamy of 1945." The "infamy" is not identified. Could it be Germany's defeat? The same telegram discusses in racist terms the "Slav versus Teuton" struggle and hints that the proud Teutons will once again become overlords of Eastern Europe. In the same way as Mr. App denounced the Allied Powers, the Council of the Steuben Society tells their German brethren, "It is to the eternal shame of the Western Powers that they gave their approval to this rape" (Steuben News, August-September 1955).

It is interesting to note that the Steuben Society's slanders against the Western Allies and its Pan-German propaganda does not deter Pentagon officials from appearing as guests at rallies sponsored by this organization.

The "Legal" Approach

Though threats and racist propaganda are a constant feature in the publications of the Sudetens, they try at times to embellish their Hitler-like tirades with arguments that appear to be respectable. In the September 1955 issue of the Sudeten Bulletin such a piece appeared under the heading "Were the Sudeten Germans Disloyal?" The author is anonymous but he is supposed to be "a well

". . . This change in the vocal trends of German public opinion was accompanied by a softening process of newspaper articles about 'Life in Soviet Russia' . . . 'The Russian bear won't eat you,' was the gist of the wishful reports. 'Russia only wants security and protection from the threat of American encirclement. The Americans are the real danger. Look what they did in Yalta. It is they, not the Russians, who ought by right to help us to be reunited.' . . .

"These fantastic notions, disguised as Realpolitik, helped to bring 'reunification' to the forefront as a major psychological and political matter, and it united former Nazis, German nationalists, advocates of a Bismarckian Eastern Re-insurance policy and of a modern Rapallo, intellectuals, industrialists, Socialists and Communists. It was significant of this modern version of German nationalism that, its fighting spirit having expired, it should forge an alliance with pacifism and neutralism . . ."

(Roland Hill, The Tablet-London, 9-3-55)

SUCKERS AGAIN?

"Russia's obdurate scuttling of the Big Four conference is already being countered with a far-reaching plan to speed the rearming of West Germany.

"A major feature of this counter measure is a $2,000,000,000 bond issue to be sold to the public in both the U. S. and Germany . . .

"In addition to these bonds the U. S. would contribute another $3,000,000,000 in direct loans and military aid of various kinds . . .

"The Pentagon report stresses that Bonn expects the U. S. to bear a large portion of the rearmament costs.

"On that the report states significantly: 'The Adenauer government, taking into account only strictly military expenditures, estimates the total for the three-year period at about $15,000,000,000, less than half of which it expects to be paid by the German taxpayer.'

"The summary questions the view of Bonn officials about Germany's inability to pay for rearming. It is pointedly contended this is both underestimated and less than what other NATO countries are providing . . ."

known scholar of international law, eminently versed in Czechoslovak affairs." His dissertation turns out to be a pseudo-scholarly brief which is supposed to prove that the Sudeten Germans were loyal to Czechoslovakia up to the beginning of World War II. Their only crime, according to this authority, is that they endeavored to obtain "national self-determination without bloodshed." The writer does not hesitate to invoke the ideals of the American Revolution to support the Sudetens' cause but as the saying goes, even the devil can quote Scripture.

One who is not conversant with the tate of affairs in Czechoslovakia on the eve of the Munich Pact, may be ensnared by the facile arguments of this "savant" on international law. He devotes many words to legal concepts but he studiously avoids the essence of the question.

Loyalty versus disloyalty to tyranny or the right of a people to self-determination are basically irrelevant to the Sudeten question. In reality that question which brought on the Munich Pact followed by World War II, was manufactured to serve as a smoke screen for Hitler's strategy to conquer Europe and then the world. Talk about self-determination was merely sand to be thrown into the eyes of those people who saw vents from far away and mistook the fifth column work of the Sudeten Germans on behalf of the German General Staff for a democratic revolution comparable to our own Revolution of 1776.

It is fortunate for the cause of democacy that the Allies were able to secure German documentation which exposes the real motives behind the Nazi grab of the Sudetenland. This documentation is available to the public and much of it will be found in the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials documents, excerpts of which we quote below:

The Record

On November 5, 1937, Hitler delivered a lecture to his leading generals and political henchmen. The notes of this super-secret conference reveal Hitler's rategy and ultimate aims. They were faithfully recorded by Oberst Hossbach. The Führer outlined his plans for the izure of all Europe. According to the Nuremberg documents the implementaon of this program would "shorten ermany's frontiers . . . increase its industrial and food reserves . . . and . . . place it in a position both industrially and strategically, from which the Nazis could launch a more ambitious and more devastating campaign of aggression" (Vol. I, p. 515). Toward accomplishing this objective, the subjugation of Czechoslovakia was a "must."

Generals Keitel and Jodl (both hanged at Nuremberg for war crimes) initialed a memorandum dated June 18, 1938, wherein it was stated that in fighting a war against the West it was necessary to start "with the destruction of Czechoslovakia" (Vol. III, p. 326). On November 23, 1939, Hitler told his supreme military commanders that the conquering of Austria was a precondition for the seizure of Czechoslovakia and then Poland. Hitler declared that the successful accomplishment of this strategy would enable the Germans to concentrate their full might on the western front. "For the first time," the Führer boasted, "in 67 years, it must be made clear that we do not have a two front war to wage." He was confident that his recent pact with Russia would simplify Germany's military problems. Of course, the Germans eventually would attend to the Russians but, he said, "we can oppose Russia only when we are free in the West" (Vol. III, pp. 573, 575).

The direction of Hitler's main blow following the defeat of Czechoslovakia and Poland was described by Fritz Wiedemann, Hitler's Adjutant, in a sworn affidavit at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. Wiedemann described a conference between Hitler and the German General Staff on May 28, 1938. Hitler stated, "It is my unshakable will that Czechoslovakia will be wiped off the map . . ." He declared that the Germans would "first tackle the situation in the East, then I will give you 3-4 years time and then we will settle the situation in the West." Wiedemann admitted in his affidavit that the so-called situation in the West "was meant to be the war against England and France" (Vol. I, p. 521).

Czechoslovakia including the Sudeten territory were regarded as having enormous economic and strategic value. The top secret minutes of a conference with Goering in the Air Ministry, held on October 14, 1938—just two weeks after the occupation of the Sudetenland—reported: "The Sudetenland has to be exploited with all the means. General Field Marshal Goering counts upon a complete industrial assimilation of Slovakia. Czechia and Slovakia would become German dominions. Everything possible must be taken out. The Oder-Danube Canal has to be speeded up. Searches for oil and ore have to be conducted in Slovakia, notably by State Secretary Keppler" (Vol. I, p. 580).

"After we get married, mother could come to live with us"
(Lewis in the Milwaukee Journal)

The minutes of another top secret meeting between Goering and leaders of the German High Command (7-27-39) read as follows: "In a rather long statement the Field Marshal explained that the incorporation of Bohemia and Moravia into the German economy had taken place, among other reasons, to increase the German war potential by exploitation of the industry there . . ." (Vol. I, p. 581).

Strategic Real Estate

As will be noted, these top secret meetings do not reveal any concern for the "oppressed" Sudetens. Indeed, like the rest of Czechoslovakia, the Sudetenland was regarded as an important piece of real estate from the point of view of increasing Germany's war potential. The leaders of the Sudeten Germans were aware of their real job. This was admitted by Konrad Henlein, the Nazi chieftain in the Sudetenland. For years the Henlein organization had operated as an agent of the German Government. When the Nazis came to power in Germany, they took over the control of Henlein's party in Czechoslovakia. A secret memorandum from the files of the German Foreign Office dated Berlin, August 19, 1938, discussed the subsidies granted to the Sudeten German party by the German Foreign Office "regularly since 1935 . . ." (Vol. I, p. 549). The Sudeten Germans under Henlein's guidance, pretended that they were free from foreign dictation, but Henlein dispensed with those pretenses in a speech in Vienna, March 4, 1941, in which he said: "In order to protect ourselves against Czech interference, we were compelled to lie and to deny our allegiance to the National Socialist cause. We should have preferred advocating National Socialism openly. However, it is doubtful whether in doing so, we would have been able to perform the task of destroying Czechoslovakia" (Vol. III, p. 659).

The task of the Sudetens was to undermine the democratic system of Cechoslovakia through propaganda, murder, terrorism, espionage and anti-Semitism. In this connection, Jan Papanek, a former Czech diplomat and staunch anti-Communist, quoted Herr Henlein as follows: "In the course of a few years the Sudeten Germans have succeeded in endangering the inner stability of Czechoslovakia so fundamentally and causing such confusion in internal affairs that she was ripe for liquidation. All this was only possible because all the Sudeten Germans had become National Socialists . . . In spite of all that we, the Sudeten Germans, have accomplished by our own efforts we could never have achieved our aim without the intervention of the Fuehrer. His ideas inspired us, his strength held us up, his Germany gave us faith in victory. May history some day pronounce her verdict. The Sudeten Germans have faithfully and willingly done their duty" (Letters to the New York Times, 12-22-45).

It has been said that not all of the Sudeten Germans were willing tools and agents of the Nazi government. This may be true but the overwhelming majority were either actively involved or gave tacit consent to the Nazi plan for the destruction of the democratic institutions of Czechoslovakia. As early as 1935, 65 per cent of the Sudeten Germans had voted for the Nazis although at that time they knew full well what Hitler aimed to do. No one can truthfully state that the Sudeten Germans were compelled to vote that way. Of course, when Hitler's triumph was imminent in 1938, the Sudeten vote for the Henlein party rose to 92 per cent.

Those who allege that Hitler was only interested in saving the "oppressed" Germans in Czechoslovakia ignore Hitler's own statements and program. On March 15, 1939, Hitler admitted that it was his intention "to incorporate Czechoslovakia into the German Reich" (Vol. I, p. 574). To justify this act Hitler signed a declaration on March 16, 1939, alleging that "the Bohemian-Moravian countries belonged for a millenium to the living space of the German people" (Vol. I, p. 577).

The Munich agreement was not regarded by Hitler as the final act in the liberation of his "oppressed" Sudetens. On the contrary, Hitler viewed the cession of the Sudetenland as but the prelude "for the liquidation of the remainder of Czechoslovakia" (Vol. I, p. 560).

A Stepping Stone

Czechoslovakia was a stepping stone on Hitler's road to the conquest of Poland and points West. Munich confirmed Hitler's belief that the West was hopelessly decadent. "Our enemies are little worms," he confided to the German General Staff, "I saw them in Munich (Vol. III, p. 585).

We can go on citing German documents attesting to the fact that the Sudeten question had been deliberately cooked up by the Germans to camouflage their plans for the conquest of Europe These documents are available to all Americans who want the truth. Needless to say, the propaganda of the Sudeten Germans today does not merely try to rewrite history, it hopes to suppress it

Attacking the Democratic Cause

There is still another aspect to the current Sudeten movement which bears watching. It is the attitude of the Sudetens to non-German democrats. Currently, the Sudetens are attacking democratic exile groups of the eastern European countries. Their reason is partially obscure but essentially it stems from the fact that the Sudetens oppose any solution in eastern Europe except one that would guarantee Germany's hegemony It is for this reason that the Sudeten propaganda machine has launched a violent campaign against Radio Free Europe Their leader von Auen charges that Radio Free Europe is "non-constructive and nurtured on completely obsolete ideas." What bothers the Sudeten Germans is simply that Radio Free Europe refuses to propagate Pan-Germanism and insists on encouraging those forces that would bring about an independent democratic Czechoslovakia. Time and again the Sudetens returned to the theme that Radio Free Europe and the democratic exile groups supporting it, are "tools of the Communists."

It is significant that leading circles in the Bonn Government including Chancellor Adenauer are trying to liquidate Radio Free Europe. In this connection West German authorities recently halted the sending of balloons with Bible tracts over the iron curtain countries. This program, according to the U. S. church group which sponsors it, was halted by German authorities on the grounds that the U. S had secretly made an agreement in Geneva (July 1955) to ban this project. The State Department has denied the existence of any such agreement.

It is also a well known fact that the commissars of the Kremlin have bitte tacked Radio Free Europe and the bal-oon sending program. Soviet Foreign inister Molotov told Adenauer to cor-ct this intolerable situation when the hancellor visited Moscow. David Nichol, orrespondent for the St. Louis Post Dis-atch, reported on September 14, 1955, hat there are Germans who "would wel-ome the Soviet complaint for halting he crusade for freedom's balloon launch-g." He continued, "these and the broad-asts of Radio Free Europe to the satellite eoples, Germans say, unnecessarily com-licate their future relationship with their entral European neighbors." The Ger-ans are aware that headlong opposition this program would create suspicions. ence, they revert to their familiar tactic f smearing Radio Free Europe as "Com-unist infiltrated" in order to make their opposition more acceptable in the eyes of Americans.

Counterfeit

The fight against Radio Free Europe is not the first time that Moscow and Bonn have seen eye to eye. Yet, the Sudeten Germans continue to publicize themselves as the most zealous anti-Bolshevist crusaders. The fact is that their anti-Bolshevism is counterfeit. It is a cover-up for their Pan-German activities which are not directed solely against the East by any means. Indeed, it would appear from the lessons of recent history that the Pan-German drive may find a more attractive outlet in the West.

The frightening part of this situation is the silence of the Western Allies. Surely, they cannot believe that the Sudeten Germans represent democracy's hope in Europe. Surely, they cannot believe that by remaining silent they are discouraging the growth of Pan-Germanism. On the contrary, failure to act and to condemn these sinister elements opens the flood gates to those forces which hope to realize the dreams of Bismarck, the Kaiser and Hitler.

Let our statesmen ponder the words of a leading member of Chancellor Adenauer's Cabinet, Jacob Kaiser, the German Minister for Unification: "No real Europe can be formed until the German bloc is reconstituted. I remind you that this bloc includes, in addition to Germany, Austria, a part of Switzerland, the Saar of course, and Alsace-Lorraine. When I think of the Strasbourg Cathedral, my heart hurts."

"If the West Germans could keep the Western Powers bound to strict support of their maximum demands — reunification only with the right for all Germany to enter Nato and no recognition of two German States, failing reunification—they could make any agreement between the West and Moscow and Germany impossible, and keep the gulf between the great Poweres open. If, at the same time, they have their own wire to Moscow, they could hope, at a suitable opportunity, to make their own deal with Moscow at the expense of the West.

"Does the new Soviet-East German Treaty exclude such a deal? One wonders . . ."

(The New Statesman and Nation, 10-1-55)

". . . While they will not express it publicly, since publicly they are committed to reunification, there are many British who take an extremely dim view of the prospect for Germany. One is told in London that American policy has been naive to the point of folly in pushing German recovery so fast and in giving the Germans everything they wanted, and then something more. Seen from this dour perspective, Adenauer is scarcely more than a front man for a group of clever schemers prepared to sell to the highest bidder. If the price is right, Adenauer will make a deal when he goes to Moscow in September and leave the West, and particularly America holding a very empty bag . . ."

Middle East Caldron

By JAMES H. SHELDON

The Middle East is a place where troubles start. It has been such a place ever since dim ages before the Trojan War—because the area lies at the strategic crossroads between Europe, Asia and Africa.

For the same reason that Caesar and Napoleon campaigned around the Nile, so did the Kaiser and his henchmen talk about the "Drive to the East" and concentrate their energies on such projects as the Berlin-to-Baghdad Railroad.

Germany's old-line geo-politicians, and likewise the Nazis of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich, gave top priority to building up their influence in the Middle East—and German industrialists and diplomats of today follow the same line, albeit with different labels attached.

The United States has long been at pains to develop a policy which would achieve the near-impossible objective of reconciling opposing forces there—and when the Russians needed a new political line this year, they found the opportunity ready-made in their offer of arms to Egypt and other Arab states.

One important reason for continued tension in the Middle East can be found in the entrenched position which the Nazi regime so vigorously built for itself there—a position which has been given continued support by post-war German developments.

Back in 1945-6 an entire group of some 17 Nazi army and S. S. (Himmler's dreaded Elite Guard) men were smuggled out of Germany, in spite of the Allied occupation, into Egypt. False passports and like subterfuges were involved. Included were two top men from "Milamt Six" (the secret intelligence section of the S. S., which had been organized by Walter Schellenberg under the direction of the notorious Ernst Kaltenbrunner).

Others were former high ranking experts from the Abwehr (German Army Counter-Intelligence) department formerly under Lt. Gen. Erwin Lahousen. (This was the Abwehr section concerned with "foreign countries, penetration and sabotage"). Still others came from the S. D. (a Gestapo intelligence group operating within the S. S. Corps) and at least two of these early migrants to Egypt had served with the notorious Einsatzkommandos ("Special Service Detachments")—the S. S. extermination units operating in Eastern Europe.

This group of Nazi experts soon became accepted as an all-powerful cadre in Egypt, and proceeded to organize the intelligence and policy-forming units of the Egyptian Army. Every man in this set-up was at the time on the "wanted" list of the Allied commanders, and subject to automatic arrest, had he been caught within the territory of occupied Germany.

Later, they were joined by a considerable body of military experts and seasoned "top sergeants" who had survived the collapse of the Hitler regime. Among these were Lt. Gen. Wilhelm Fahrmbacher, a corps commander in the Nazi Army who had been held for a time by the French as a war criminal, but was released and soon became Gen. Naguib's leading military advisor. Fahrmbacher took along as his deputy Major Gen. Oscar Munzel, well-known in officer circles of the Third Reich, and they were later joined by Gerhard Mertins, who assumed the duty of educating the Egyptians in the techniques of parachute jumping and air attack.

Not long afterward, these military specialists were followed by Dr. Albert Degener—well known to New Yorkers as the pre-war Director of the German-American Board of Trade, one of the most prolific sources of pro-Nazi agitation in America before his presence was officially labeled undesirable by the State Department. Herr Degener's function in Egypt was the same as that which he had once performed in New York: to organize a German-Egyptian Chamber of Commerce.

The extent of his support at home can be gleaned from the frequency with which the German weekly news magazines feature articles on German-Egyptian trade developments.

The extent of this German penetration into Egyptian affairs has since grown alarmingly. As John Gunther puts it in his highly respected book, INSIDE AFRICA, "Bonn is acutely interested in Cairo and vice versa. About 600 German technicians are employed by the Egyptian Government working on several levels—military, engineering, railroads and the like. 'Nasser could never have made his coup without his German advisors,' I heard it said. Probably this is an over-statement but German technical skill has been helpful to the Junta in several conspicuous areas."

As Gunther also points out, a German naval specialist is reported at work on Egyptian naval affairs and a German tank officer is engaged in mechanizing the armed forces. 300 German firms were represented at a recent trade fair in Cairo and a flourishing German-language newspaper has developed in that city. Meanwhile, German universities have set up special arrangements to facilitate the exchange of students from the Middle East.

On October 26, 1955, the West German news magazine DER SPIEGEL, carried a story about the role which a former economic assistant of Hitler played in the arms deal between Egypt and the Communist bloc.

This former Nazi, Dr. Wilhelm Voss, once held a leading position in Hitler's war economy as president of the Skoda Works, a huge armament combine taken over by the Germans after they grabbed Czechoslovakia in 1939.

Evidently, this former Nazi was coached for his role in Egypt by the Bonn Government. DER SPIEGEL reports:

"Dr. Wilhelm Voss, once a prominent leader in the war economy of the Third Reich, started his career in Egypt with the urgent recommendation of the German Federal Government in February 1951. He was appointed in Cairo by General Naguib as head of the Central Planning Board and as such was the chief advisor to the War Ministry in Egypt. Under his command were employed more than 50 German military and armament experts."

The importance of Dr. Voss' role in Egypt is underscored by the fact that the relation of this former Nazi to the Bonn Foreign Office and other Bonn agencies was so intimate ective that in 1954 the German Ambassador in Cairo, Dr. nther Pawelke, also a former Nazi, resigned from his post protest.

According to DER SPIEGEL, Dr. Voss kept intimate con- ts not only with Adenauer's chief diplomatic aides, Dr. ankenhorn and Professor Hallstein, but also with the highest icers in the Blank office, the Bonn War Ministry. These lations were evidently a constant irritation to Ambassador welke, because they meant that certain high circles in the nn Government were closer to the Egyptian advisor, Dr. ss, than to the official Bonn advisor in Cairo.

The report in DER SPIEGEL also reveals the background the recent arms deal between Egypt and Czechoslovakia. cording to this account, the former Nazi and ex-president the Skoda Works, Dr. Voss, "initiated the big armament al with the Czechoslovak agents Prantel, Nobinec and strum, who operated under the facade of being refugees t who in reality are Communist agents."

The foregoing report sheds considerable light on the or- nizers and secret wire-pullers of the present unrest in the ar and Middle East.

Again, as once under Hitler, the German industrialists and ilitarists proceed with their conspiracies according to a ll-known pattern. They sow unrest where it is to Germany's vantage to fish in troubled waters. DER SPIEGEL is not very far from the truth when it comments that "Adenauer's leading diplomats have laid themselves open to the charge that they must share to a considerable extent in the tactical victory gained by Bolsheviks in the Near and Middle East."

ROBBING SMITH FOR SCHMIDT

It would rob Mr. Smith to pay Mr. Schmidt.

German penetration in the Near East is by no means confined to Egypt. The former Wehrmacht Major Gunther Elmar von Hardenberg has long made his headquarters at Beirut in Syria where he heads an "open" organization known as the Association for Christian War Refugees and a secret group called the German Aid Committee for the Near East. When John Roy Carlson visited Beirut in 1950, von Hardenberg said to him: "Whenever a new German comes to Beirut I screen him personally, then register him with the Beirut police as a friend of the Arab cause." "There are already many Germans working with the Syrians as trainers and technicians," von Hardenberg added.

In Damascus, an Arabic group which Hitler youth leader Baldur von Schirach had helped form, was still operating, and was the source of "Boycott U. S. A." posters appearing in Arab shops.

In the same region, Dashnag leaders (the Dashnags were an Armenian Fascist movement allied with the Axis) also continue to exert great influence, moving under the old misleading cry that they are "fighting Communism," while in reality they are bending their primary efforts against the Western cause in the Middle East.

The infiltration of Syria has been repeatedly described by foreign correspondents. The Syrian Government early called in a German military mission, after it was defeated by the Israeli armies. NEWSWEEK reported that "the first to appear in Damascus was a former Gestapo Colonel named Rapp. He revamped Syrian Military Intelligence and is credited with a leading role in Syria's first military coup, when a group of army officers under Colonel Husni Zayim took over the government." Later, a once high-ranking intelligence officer in Hitler's army, General Stutterheim, was installed in a top Syrian army post, assisted by another influential ex-German, Colonel Kuebel.

An important article ("Berlin-Baghdad" Again) appearing in the January, 1953, issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, gives many further details on this phase of German Middle-East penetration.

At the other end of the Mediterranean, a similar situation continues. The leading Hamburg independent daily, DIE WELT, on October 26, 1955, printed a dispatch concerning preparations for the inauguration of a monument at Tobruk, in Libya, commemorating the dead of Hitler's Africa Corps. Said this report: "The West German Government will be represented by the German charge d'affaires in Tripoli . . . The association of the members of the former German Africa Corps have announced group trips for this occasion and have chartered a steamship and special planes."

From another source comes a report that when former members of the Africa Corps met in Heidelberg, with the widow of former Field Marshal Rommel as guest of honor, she was greeted by the old Nazi marching song, "Panzer Rollen in Afrika." (Tanks Rolling in Africa.)

Reciprocating such interests, Arab tobacco companies have been taking full-page advertisements in German news magazines, featuring the portrait of a desert chieftain with rifle in hand, a replica of a cigarette package and the caption: "A Testimony of Friendship."

Most of the German press has been discreetly silent concerning these affairs—but in Italy the journalistic organs of the M. S. I. (a powerful neo-fascist movement advocating return to the corporate-state ideal of Mussolini) have had no such inhibitions and some of their comments—even after making allowance for the source—are of striking significance.

On September 6, 1955, IL SECOLO D'ITALIA (a strong supporter of M. S. I.) carried an elaborate illustrated account of the reception in its office of eight editors of the Egyptian newspaper chain Dar El Goumhourya (publishers of 7 newspapers in Arabic, French and English). The article, adorned with a 4-column photograph of the visiting editors, declares that "Our Egyptian colleagues found in the editorial rooms of IL SECOLO the climate of opinion closest to their views." An adjoining headline declaimed: "Israel Has Violated the Truce with Egypt."

The director of IL SECOLO has just published a book lauding Mussolini.

On July 17, 1955, ASSO DI BASTONI (the recognized voice of the M. S. I. movement) published a long article lauding the Middle East exploits of the Krupp dynasty, with especial praise for Alfred Krupp, the man who served a war criminal's sentence after trial at Nuremberg.

"Alfred Krupp is today the sparkplug of the fantastic German renaissance. He is in close touch with the surviving leaders of the Reich and has placed his agents in all parts of the globe." the article begins. There follows an outline of Krupp's friendship with "heads of government" in the Middle East and elsewhere, and the comment that "the influence of Krupp is particularly important in Pakistan in view of the existence of a group of intelligent Pakistani who were formerly members of the Wehrmacht."

"The gigantic power of revived German industry," adds ASSO DI BASTONI, "extends over the whole world." "Krupp has defeated all the other corporations and is constructing on the Bosphorus a 1600 meter bridge. He has concluded advantageous contracts," the article continues, "with Syria and with the National Government of Egypt."

"The Germans achieved a decisive victory in Saudi-Arabia," says the same article, "when German electric firms obtained contracts for the construction of modern power plants, and in Egypt when the German-Egyptian Chamber of Commerce secured a concession under which German engineers will supervise the tremendous Nile dam project."

"Following up the fine work of Krupp and other perseverant German industrialists," says ASSO, "the influence and prestige of Germany is enormous throughout the Arab world where Otto Skorzeny and other ex-officials of the S. S. supervise the instruction and education of armies and Dr. Hjalmar Schacht is financial advisor." In Iran, Gen. Zahedi (arrested by the English as a collaborationist in 1941) is praised as a factor of great power, and it is pointed out that the mother of "beautiful Soraya" (wife of the Shah) was German. Then continue details of German political and economic penetration in Iran, the Sudan, Lebanon, etc.

"Everywhere the men of Krupp are present and active," says ASSO DI BASTONI, and adds that thanks to this, Egypt today benefits from a German advance of 8,750,000,000 lira. "These colossal figures" of indebtedness are to be "settled by supplies of raw materials," adds this article.

In short, behind the scenes in the Middle East are to be found everywhere the pervasive tentacles of old-line German influence, bolstered up (whether for political or economic reasons does not matter) by the modernized industrialism typified by Krupp, and strengthened by the continual comings and goings of powerful figures such as the "financial wizard" Dr. Hjalmar Schacht.

Underlying all this, are numerous indigenous forces for violence, typified by the hot-heads of the green-shirted Young Moslem League and the fanatic Fadayan Islam (Crusaders of Islam), one of whose agents last week nearly succeeded in an tempt to assassinate Premier Hassein Ala of Iran. Another gent of the same terrorist body was more successful four ears ago, when he destroyed the life of Premier Ali Razmara, ne of Iran's ablest post-war leaders.

When the United Nations voted the partition of Palestine establish the new State of Israel, it was hoped that an ele- ent of Western democratic stability might be injected into is swirling conflict of forces. Failure of the great powers to ursue a firm course in support of the newly established state, owever, left the way open for a kind of "simmering war" continue, under conditions which could boil up into a orld-wide conflict without warning.

The exodus to the Middle East of so many important mili- ry and economic figures from the Third Reich, added to rab intransigence and extremism, has contributed much to revent the effective exercise of influence by the Western lies in efforts to bring about peaceful settlements.

As a result, we find Premier Nasser of Egypt declaring at "Israel is an artificial state which must disappear" (May 3, 1954, as quoted in the Greek newspaper KATHERIENI); d not long ago, the NEW YORK TIMES quoted King ud of Saudi-Arabia as declaring: "Israel is like a cancer to e human body and the only way of remedy is to uproot it."

So violently anti-Jewish have been some of the speeches ade in the U. S. by the Syrian Ambassador, Farid Zeined- ne, that responsible organizations have been led to ask for s recall. Scarcely less inflammatory have been speeches by ohammed Jamali, chairman of the Iraqi delegation to the N. The friendly State of Israel thus finds itself being nounced on American platforms as a "bastard State," and yal United States citizens of Jewish persuasion find them- lves being falsely accused of "dual loyalty," in terms remi- scent of pre-war Nazi propaganda.

"Whoever thinks of making peace with the enemy (Israel) gns the death warrant of all the Arab nations," Jamali once id. And a Syrian President, General Shisekly, was quoted Cairo papers to effect that "The Middle East is not large ough for both Jews and Arabs." (What the Arabs intend do with their vast empty spaces, and their millions of oil llars, he didn't add.) Mohammed Naguib himself said not long ago: "The only solution is Israel's disappearance."

An important background factor in building up this Arab ransigence has been the influence of the former Grand ufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini.

The Grand Mufti was one of Hitler's major henchmen and was a principal influence in determining the policy of wish extermination which Hitler pursued, and especially in king that policy the unbelievably inhuman thing it was in Balkans and Middle East. The Grand Mufti attempted to ganize a Moslem revolt against the British in Iraq at the y outset of the war, and when defeated, was brought to ntinental Europe by Hitler, where at various places he ganized a school for the training of Moslem infiltrators in- ctrinated to spread Nazi ideologies; helped to set up the od-thirsty Moslem Legions in Yugoslavia; and finally, just the War was coming to an end, directed the "Gross-Mufti reau" not far from Hitler's headquarters, from which he s engaged (along with Goebbels, Goering, Vidkun Quis- g and the Nazi puppet of Iraq) in organizing a "World nference on the Jewish Problem." The plans for this "conference" collapsed only because the Allied Armies got to Berlin before Al-Husseini and his cohorts could get their delegates there.

The S. S. Hauptsturmfuerer Dieter von Wisliczeny later declared in a War Crimes Affidavit based on his intimate knowledge of internal Nazi affairs that the Grand Mufti played "an important role" in constantly "inciting" the Nazi powers to more violent measures in their policy of Jewish extermination, particularly in Southeastern Europe.

A study of material emanating from behind Arab boundaries today indicates that much of the basic propaganda line of the anti-Jewish agitation now being pursued by Arab League states has come down unchanged from the days of the Grand Mufti's evil liaison with Hitler.

For example, Antoine Albina, a leading tourist agent (of Syrian extraction) with headquarters in Arab Jerusalem, is currently engaged in bombarding his countrymen—as well as visitors to that part of the world—with multilingual propaganda bearing the imprint of the "World Truth League." The name, significantly enough, is a rough translation of the "Fichte-Bund" once masterminded by Dr. Goebbels.

We need not quote examples of Albina's output at length. It is sufficient to say that Mr. Gerald L. K. Smith, the most notorious of our domestic hate mongers, finds Albina's publications sufficiently inflammatory to be worthy of reprinting in his anti-Jewish monthly, THE CROSS AND THE FLAG —and like-minded hate mongers in England, and even in far-away South Africa, also find Albina's material useful in fanning the flames of bias and bigotry, in those areas.

This exchange of hate propaganda also works in the other direction. We pause to cite but one instance. When an American West Coast agitator named Frank Britton (who a few years ago tried to stir up a boycott against Jewish-owned businesses in Los Angeles) got out a 102-page book misleadingly entitled BEHIND COMMUNISM a prominent Arabic press agency, with offices in Cairo, Baghdad and Beirut, promptly re-issued it in an Arabic version and started circulating it all over the Middle East. Britton's opus, needless to say, had little or nothing to do with the real facts about Communism, but was merely a book-length diatribe against Jews and Judaism, elaborating upon the old canard that "Judaism and Communism are irretrievably bound together."

A dozen pages could be devoted to further examples of the same type of agitation, designed to incite even the most lethargic to violence and guaranteed to help forestall all efforts at peaceful settlements. As a Minister in one Arab cabinet put it the other day: "No member of my government would even dare to talk about peace with Israel."

Of course, the problem of the refugees is being exploited to the utmost by the Arab governments, so that the refugees have become as much a political tool as a relief problem. Relocation funds made available through U. N. agencies have been in large part rejected by the Arab States, who obviously would prefer to keep the refugees confined to their camps, and use them for purposes of political exploitation.

So obvious is this purpose, that Egypt and other Arab countries have actually been collecting customs duties on shipments of relief materials intended for the help of the "refugee victims." A casual inspection of the lurid propaganda leaflets issued by the Arabs in this connection confirms the same conclusion.

So arrogant has this attitude become that the highly responsible Reuters Agency reported on December 1, 1955, that the seven Arab League countries have actually issued a circular addressed to Dutch firms trading in the Middle East, demanding detailed information on their business with Israel and their employment of Jews in their home cities. This astounding circular originated with the "Economical Siege on Israel Office" in Damascus. "The Arab countries," said the circular, "are in a state of war with Israel and for this reason are making an economic siege of that country."

Meanwhile, the East-West controversy added fuel to the fire. Soviet policy, which has on repeated occasions included the persecution of Jews and Zionists (a fact which makes propaganda like the Britton book mentioned above appear particularly ridiculous to the thoughtful reader), now seems to have entered a pro-Arab phase. According to the current Communist line, as reflected in the New York DAILY WORKER (Nov. 16, 1955), Israel is now regarded as "a province in Wall Street's Middle Eastern economic empire." Where this sort of thing may lead to, when coupled with an alarming increase of indigenous anti-Americanism in cities like Cairo, is anybody's guess.

Granting that the Americans, British and French would like to see the Arabs accede to a permanent and peaceful settlement recognizing the just claims of Israel, the Soviets have been playing whichever side of the fence suited their position at a particular time. Currently they seem to have set out to help arm the 45 million Moslems. Should this policy be long continued, the results could be frightening indeed. Add a supply of Russian rifles and jet planes to inflammatory propaganda of the sort outlined above, mix in the aggressive intentions of the Arabs, and you have the makings of a conflagration that could very readily lead to World War III.

A STAIN ON JUSTICE

"The Brooklyn Veterans of Foreign Wars today demanded that Edwin August Plitt be removed as the U. S. member of the International War Crimes Review Board because he voted to release Nazi war criminal Sepp Dietrich.

"Dietrich, convicted of the Malmedy Forest murder of American war prisoners during World War II, was released from prison . . .

"Robert F. Bonagura, Kings County VFW commander, said 'every American should be up in arms' . . ."

(The N. Y. Post, 12-1-55)

Note:
A letter on this subject was sent by the Society to leading newspapers. We reprint below the text as it appeared in the St. Louis Post Dispatch, 11-10-55:

The recent release from a United States prison of the German war criminal, Sepp Dierich, one of Hitler's most trusted SS generals, is shocking news. Dietrich was sentenced to life imprisonment because of his over-all responsibility in the cold-blooded murder of American G. I.s taken prisoner during the Battle of the Bulge.

Altogether between 600 and 700 G. I.s and Belgian civilians were slain in a series of acts of terrorism that came to be known as the Malmedy Massacre.

Dietrich's bloodthirstiness was known throughout Europe. It is difficult to see how the release of this killer will strengthen the United States' efforts to restore respect for law and decency in human affairs. The release of Dietrich has outraged European public opinion and will certainly create a fertile field for all sorts of anti-American propaganda.

In the last analysis, the freeing of Dietrich can only damage America's moral prestige, a factor so frequently mentioned by Secretary Dulles as essential to the successful conduct of our foreign relations.

The Allied officials who recommended the release of Dietrich have grossly misrepresented the views of the American people. They have not kept faith with the millions of American G. I.s, living or dead, who fought the Nazis in defense of American freedom.

President Eisenhower should dismiss these individuals from Government service because they have shown themselves unfit to uphold the sense of justice of the American people.

Fabulous Krupp

"Krupps is going to die. It is going to die now. It is in the process of dying . . . My instructions are to disintegrate this concern and Krupp is going to cease to exist.

"There's a lot of politics behind Krupps and we want to show everybody that we are carrying out our agreements . . .

"The classic mistake which was made here after World War I is not going to be repeated this time."

(E. L. Douglas Fowles, British Controller of the Krupp properties, 8-28-46)

Krupp, the name which made all Europe tremble during two world wars, Saturday night set people dancing at a fabulous ball.

Alfred Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, sole heir to Germany's greatest industrial empire, gave the ball for 640 guests at his home, the monumental Villa Huegel in Essen.

The party, described by the family as a "small affair," employed the services of small armies of waiters, scores of pretty "Krupp girls" in uniform, three orchestras, a fleet of limousines and a special train which brought 150 diplomats from Bonn.

The 48-year-old Krupp and his German wife Vera, a former film actress he married in 1952, received their guests in the immense paneled hall of the villa, hung with priceless Flemish tapestries.

Frau Krupp wore a cocktail-length brocade dress of many shades of brown, gray and green, heavily embroidered with sequins and brilliants. Diamond pendants the size of marbles adorned her ears.

The party, which broke up early just after midnight, was the first social appearance of the famous German munitions-maker since his release from Landsberg prison in Bavaria early in 1951. Then, he had served only three years of a 12-year sentence imposed by the allied war crimes tribunal at Nuremberg in 1948 for employing slave labor in his arms factories during the war.

Before the ball a party of diplomats was taken around some of the Krupp factories at Essen and Rheinhausen. The tour took in the Rheinhausen steel works, the 1,000,000,000-mark (about $232,400,000) plant which Krupp has promised the Allies to sell, with all his coal mines before 1958.

Others of the party came in a special first-class train from Bonn to the private Krupp statio nat Essen being plied liberally with champagne, cocktails, snacks and cigars on the way by "Krupp girls" from the magnate's guest establishment.

Each was also given a silver-plated lighter marked discreetly with three intertwining circles—the trade mark of the firm an ashtray and a bottle of brandy.

ALLIES?

"Upon the initiative of Master Sergeant Clipper, nine sergeants of the British Army decided to petition for their release from the service. The underlying reason for their request was rather unusual. They stated that they had no inclination for serving in an army which might some day find itself fighting shoulder to shoulder with Germans.

"When the regimental colonel requested them to withdraw their petition the master sergeant and his comrades replied that they had spent the last months of the war in Germany and that they could not agree to accept the Germans as allies'."

(Deutsche Volkszeitung, 9-17-55)

SCHOOL DAYS

"At the end of World War II most of the German schools abroad were closed down . . . However, during the last few years the number of German schools in foreign countries expanded considerably and they were able to consolidate their positions. Now, there are German schools again in almost all European countries with the exception of the Iron Curtain countries including China . . .

"If we look at the five continents, we can all be proud of (the existence of) approximately 300 German schools abroad . . ."

(California Staats-Zeitung, 11-18-55)

NAZI STATISTICS

"The Nazis killed a mere 365,000 Jews in Europe and not six million, it was claimed this week by the Wiesbaden neo-fascist monthly 'Die Europaeische Nationale' in an article bearing the title 'The Lie of the Six Million Killed Jews.'

"Edited and published by the notorious neo-nazi organizer Karl Hein Priester, the publication arrived at the 365,000 figure through a juggling of facts."

(WNS, 8-26-55)

> "That East Germany, too, is rearming is not at all discomfiting to the militarists of West Germany. In long-range terms, the more extensive the immediate rearming on both sides of the German dividing line, the more powerful will be the army that one day, they hope, will emerge from a united Germany. And in immediate terms, the Bonn militarists can count on increased help from Washington to counteract developments in Pankow. According to a Bonn spokesman, the Federal Republic's contribution to rearmament will not exceed nine billion marks. This is only a fraction of what the new Wehrmacht will cost. Bonn is relying on the American taxpayer to pay most of the rest."

"A Colony of Spiders"

Why have our policy makers consistently discouraged a thorough re-examination of US policy toward Germany? This question appears with increased frequency in letters addressed to the Society.

We can think of a number of explanations for this standpat attitude, but there is one which seems to stand out above the others. It reminds us of the two lads who were fighting each other furiously. One of the youngsters exhibited fancy footwork while the other boy moved only one foot—the other firmly fixed to the ground. As a result, the immobile boy was receiving a sound thrashing from his opponent who was able to move freely in all directions. A bystander called to the unfortunate youth, "Say, why don't you move your other foot?" The reply, n the midst of a shower of blows, was prompt: 'I can't, my foot is on the quarter we are fighting for!"

Applied to the "high politics" of the German problem, it means that a flexible and fresh approach has been blocked by a "vested interest." The late Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, described t as a "colony of black-widow spiders" which "has been busily weaving webs intended to cost the United States and its allies the fruits of the crushing defeat of Germany. They would restore to those who made Hitler possible the industries of the Ruhr, without which he would not have ventured to commit his depredations against the democratic nations of Europe. Conspicuous among them are members of the Cabinet, congressmen, dipolmats and soldiers, as well as bankers and industrialists who have been ommuting between Wall Street and Washington. n short, American military and civilian officials who are supposed to be solving problems in Germany, preparatory to the State Department assuming jurisdiction and control that, so far, it has timorously evaded, have been rendering yeoman service to Wall Street financiers and German cartelists, preparatory to World War III" (The New Republic, 5-2-49).

Having served under two Presidents, Mr. Ickes was able to observe the maneuvers of this cabal at close hand. Other former government officials have confirmed his charges. For example, Josiah E. DuBois, Jr., former Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, and assigned to many important governmental tasks dealing with the postwar treatment of Germany, wrote: "As early as September 1944, while our GIs were still being killed by the Nazi war machine, there was circulated within the United States Government, at a high level, a memorandum contending, in effect, that as soon as the war was over we should rebuild German power as quickly as possible."

The hopes and plans of this "vested interest" were outlined by Mr. Allen Dulles at a meeting of the American Bankers Association in 1946: "For us it is essential to participate in a leading capacity in the rebuilding of German economy in order to stabilize the economic situation in the United States through control of the German economy and to assure American firms suitable profits."

Even before Mr. Dulles spoke, the "vested interest" had gained control of many strategic positions connected with the formulation and implementation of American policy in Germany. It was a "bipartisan" operation involving such prominent personalities as W. Averell Harriman of the banking firm Brown Brothers Harriman & Co.; James Forrestal and William Draper of the banking house of Dillon, Read and Co.; John J. McCloy, the present Chairman of the Board of the Chase Manhattan Bank; John Foster Dulles, then head of the law firm Sullivan & Cromwell; and former Secretary of the Army Kenneth Royall.

The "bipartisan" character of the operation was firmly sealed when Herbert Hoover was invited by President Truman to report his views on what America should do for Germany. The Hoover mission had the blessings of the "vested interest" which had close ties with Germany's cartel clique. In a sense Mr. Hoover's conclusions had been foreshadowed by Walter Rohland of the German steel trust when he wrote to one of his colleagues on June 15, 1945, that a "good bridge" had been formed with "mutual friends" in the US and in Britain.

Mr. Hoover's findings received strong support from W. Averell Harriman. In 1947, Mr. Harriman submitted a report to the President which had as one of its basic premises the idea that the recovery of Western Europe was dependent on the economic resurgence of Germany: "A rapid increase in the Ruhr's coal, steel, and machinery output would aid the reconstruction of industries in neighboring countries, and lower the general cost of the European recovery program more than any other factor." This passage from the report was quoted in a recent article by Dr. Friedrich Middelhauve, Minister of Economics and Transport for the German State of North Rhine Westphalia ("Commerce in Germany," 4-1-56). Dr. Middelhauve declares that the Harriman report "went far to relieve the hopelessness" of the Ruhr barons.

The spade work of the Hoovers and Harrimans paved the way for the billions of dollars poured into Germany. Propaganda-wise this was publicized as the sure road to the rehabilitation of Western Europe. In reality, it afforded Germany the opportunity to evade the consequences of her crimes and to regain a dominant position in Western Europe. The net result was to commit the American people to a program which was diametrically opposed to the principles for which the war was fought. Yet, the people were not consulted. They were confronted with a fait accompli, executed by a clique of non-elected officials who served the "vested interest." It was a profitable operation for the group described by Secretary Ickes and their cartel friends in Germany, but it tied American policy hand and foot. A gradual transformation occurred and more and more Germany's requirements conditioned Allied policy. The tail began to wag the dog.

The consequences are now apparent to all except to him whose "foot is on the quarter." Weighed down by the German albatross, we have lost the initiative in Europe. The great reservoir of friendship and good will which was ours at the end of the war, has been squandered. Step by step, our Germany policy has produced all of the elements preparatory to a rapproachment between Soviet Russia and the Germans. Truly we are on the "brink" and this has been admitted by outstanding experts on Russo-German relations. Thus, the noted British political commentator, Edward Crankshaw, discussing the dangers of a Russo-German deal, concludes: "While bearing in mind that it takes two to make a Russo-German pact, it is clear that the West will soon be compelled to reconsider its German policy in the light of hard facts" (London Observer, 5-6-56).

These "hard facts" have not budged our policy makers. They prefer the policy of inertia because it profits the "vested interest" even though it is undermining the US position in Europe.

That the United States possesses the brain power and imagination to develop policies which would be truly expressive of the National Interest is beyond doubt. What is necessary is to release that brain power and imagination from the bondage of the "colony of spiders" which has paralyzed our ability to cope with the German problem and the menacing spectre of a Soviet-German deal.

THE ADENAUER CULT

"West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer was effusively welcomed to Washington by John Foster Dulles.

"The Secretary of State headed the official welcoming delegation at the National Airport. He told Dr. Adenauer that there were some things he did that were more duty than joy, 'but to welcome you is unadulterated joy.'

" 'You bring a wisdom that comes from experience, and an idealism that partakes of youth,' he said. 'You are building a new Germany and a new Europe and what we hope will be a new world.' "

(N. Y. Times, 6-12-56)

". . . What can the United States do? The power to unify Germany rests exclusively in Soviet hands . . .

"So Dr. Adenauer's fear that there already exists a tacit settlement based on the division of Germany is to some extent justified by the situation itself . . .

"But the real answer to that question lies not in the United States but in West Germany. Insofar as it can, the United States will continue to work for German unity in freedom, and it would be a rash man who would say that can never come about. If the German people, however, refuse to be patient and insist instead on dangerous short-cuts, then there is no way to help them . . ."

(Wall Street Journal, 6-13-56)

POLITICAL CHAMELEONS

During the Bulganin-Khrushchev visit to Britain a little boy, aged 5, approached Bulganin and asked, "Are you Father Christmas?" Bulganin shook his head in the negative. Whether it was Bulganin's goatee which prompted the lad to put the question, is not of direct concern to us. Yet, with or without the beard, the team of Bulganin-Krushchev has given good cause for people to believe that Santa Claus may not be a myth, after all.

Wherever they go, B & K have only kind words and smiling faces. Regardless of the ulterior motives involved, the diplomacy seems to say "something for everyone." It is a lavish kind of gesture and seems to apply to all peoples—even those who in recent times were regarded as their mortal enemies.

Ten years ago leading Russian propagandists were denouncing the Germans in the most violent uncompromising language. Ilya Ehrenburg, one of their most prolific propagandists, wrote: "Some people think that beaten Germans are less harmful. They are mistaken. Germans remain true to themselves . . . The Germans have not changed much. It is senseless to hope to bring them to reason, to shame them, and then to reform them." On another occasion, Mr. Ehrenburg said: "That is the most terrible thing about the atrocities of the Germans: they slaughtered millions of fine people for nothing at all. And among the millions of Germans there was not to be found a handful of men of science to cry 'halt'."

The theme that the German people, as a whole, were responsible for Hitler's aggressions and the crimes resulting from them, was constantly emphasized by the Soviets. The well known writer and war correspondent Alexei Tolstoy declared: "We will never believe that Germany was deceived and fooled by a gang of Nazis; that she did not want it, poor thing, but was dragged into a predatory war." In less dramatic terms one of Russia's leading jurists, Prof. A. Trainin, wrote: "Who must shoulder the responsibility for war crimes? The answer is perfectly clear, the German State and the German people must certainly bear, and will bear the political and material consequences of Hitlerite aggression and the Hitlerite system of militarized banditry" (Information Bulletin of the Soviet Union, 6-30-45).

However, in this year of 1956, the "something for everyone" diplomacy has changed the Soviet tune. In the Soviet publication New Times (1-12-56) we read an account of a visit by Russian educators to the East zone of Germany. The writer of this piece describes in rapturous language what great "progress" has been achieved in "democratizing" German youth. He tells the story of a Western journalist asking some children at a school in Berlin if they did not want to take revenge on those who had defeated Germany. The children replied: "The war was not caused by the German people, it was launched and lost by the Nazis . . ." The writer confessed that this answer "deeply impressed" him. It left him with the conviction that democracy in Germany "is growing in strength and self-awareness." The writer did not bother to tell his readers that the children's reply is the favorite alibi of Germans, whether they be concealed Hitlerites or professed democrats. Why should this threadbare excuse carry more weight just because it is mouthed by those who are indoctrinated with Communist ideology? Ten years ago this reply would have been denounced by Soviet propagandists—today it is an indication that the so-called German Democratic Republic "is pulsating with life."

The cynicism displayed by Soviet leaders with regard to Germany's war crimes was illustrated last year when Adenauer paid homage to the Kremlin. In his very first public statement the Chancellor pleaded for the return of those Germans who were still in Russian prison camps. The press reported that Bulganin replied with great indignation that there were no longer any German prisoners of war in Russia; the only Germans held were war criminals. These criminals, Bulganin stated, "must be kept in confinement." They are people "who have lost all human vision. They are guilty of violence, arson, murder of women, children and old people." The Russian people, Bulganin shouted, will "never forget" the crimes perpetrated by these "murderers." A few months later, these very same "murderers" were on their way back to Germany. In December 1955 a contingent of these "murderers," returning from a Russian prison camp, raised their right hands and publicly swore "by our dead and the dead of the Soviet Union and by the children who will one day pass judgment on us, we swear that we have not murdered, that we have not raped, that we have not burned and we have not pillaged. If we brought misery and suffering to that land (the Soviet Union) we did so under the law of war and mindful of our soldier's oath" (N. Y. Times, 12-14-55). The Times reported that German officials were disturbed lest this public demonstration offend the Soviets. Actually, the Germans had no cause for fear because the "something for everyone" diplomacy is so generous in concept and execution that even the memories of the Russian war dead can be sacrificed, if necessary. The Germans as well as the Russians would call this Realpolitik.

The attitude toward the revival of German militarism is another example of the new diplomacy. Last year the satellite government in the Soviet zone announced a program for the reconstruction of Potsdam, the hallowed shrine of Prussian militarism. Communist spokesmen attributed the destruction of Potsdam "to unnecessary United States air raids" (N. Y. Times, 2-7-55). The East German government's newspaper, the Tägliche Rundschau, devoted a number of editorials which recalled the days when Prussia and Russia were friends. The Germans were reminded how Prussian generals, like Clausewitz, Scharnhorst and Yorck cooperated with Russian military leaders. The Times dispatch noted that the Russians and the German Communist regime hope to build up a firm alliance through the reawakening of the Prussian pro-Russian spirit. In this connection it is now reported that the East German regime intends to restore the State of Prussia which had been abolished at the end of World War II because it was deemed to be the sinister symbol of German militarism. The Communists hope that the revival of the State of Prussia will have a favorable propaganda effect "especially in rightist circles" in Western Germany (Bulletin on German Questions, 3-1-56).

Soviet publications are devoting a lot of space these days to the past "glories" of Russo-German friendship. The Soviet magazine "International Affairs" (August 1955) carried a detailed article extolling the virtues of Rapallo. Rapallo, of course, refers to the treaty between Russia and Germany in 1922 which formed the basis of close military, political and economic collaboration between the Soviet Government and the Weimar Republic. The German General Staff and leading industrialists gave this treaty special support. The writer of this article points out that by 1921 German political leaders began to veer toward friendship with Communist Russia. Thus, the signing of the Rapallo Treaty, according to this writer, "bore witness to the existence within Germany's ruling classes of forces with a realistic approach to the solution of foreign policy programs." He recalls how the Rapallo Treaty strengthened the ties between Germany and the Soviet Union. He quotes one German writer who alleged that it was through the aid of Soviet orders "that the German engineering and electrical industries were able to keep going during the crisis years of 1930-1933." The article constantly refers to the "imperialist" pressures of the Western powers against Germany which the Germans were able to offset, thanks to the Rapallo Treaty.

According to the writer in "International Affairs" it would appear that no matter how hard the Western powers tried to turn the Germans away from the Rapallo Treaty, "interest in the strengthening of relations with the USSR mounted . . . among Germany's ruling classes." He cannot conceal his pleasure over the former ties between the bigwigs in German industry and the Soviets. To underline his point he quotes a passage from the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung which, he tells the reader, was the "voice of the German monopolies." The Deutsche Allgemeine urged the Germans to maintain close cooperation with the USSR and oppose the attempts of the Western powers to "incite" Germany against Russia. In concluding this study, the writer refers to the famous statement by Stalin who said that the peoples of Germany and Russia have "the greatest potentialities in Europe for carrying out great acts of world importance."

The October 1955 issue of "International Affairs" carries a leading editorial entitled "The Soviet Union and Germany." Here again, many paragraphs are devoted to the "wonderful" future which lies ahead for friendship between Germany and Russia. "The Soviet Union and Germany," the editorial states, "are the biggest industrial countries in Europe with high economic potentials. It naturally follows that good relations between the German and Soviet peoples are the firm guaranty of universal peace in Europe and throughout the world."

In line with the theme that the German people were also victims of the Nazis, the editorial characterizes the Red Army as their "liberator." The editorial further states that the Soviet Union was always in favor of a strong Germany. The Soviet Government opposed those who spread "hatred" against the German people and in this connection the editorial roundly denounces Lord Vansittart, the English diplomat who warned the west of the German danger. Only the Soviet Union, the editorial tells us, fought against the dismemberment of Germany, and it is only the Soviet Union which can solve "the problem of finding markets for West German industrial products." This point, the editorial declares with

". . . Future German foreign-policy decisions will not depend on whether the Adenauer Cabinet remains in power or is replaced by a government based on the budding SPD-FDP alliance. Germany's course will hinge on the relative military and overall strength of the various powers and, to quite some extent, on the record of Soviet performance in the years to come . . ."

(By Otto Kirchheimer, The New Leader, 4-16-56)

confidence, is bound to interest West German industrialists.

The February 1956 issue of "International Affairs" discusses the value of the Eastern markets for the industrial war lords of the Ruhr. The Industriekurier which, according to the Soviet publication, expresses the opinions of the big German industrials and exporters, is bitterly opposed to Allied trade policy vis-à-vis the Soviet bloc. The complaints of the Industriekurier are generally aired and the Soviet publication is happy to be able to report that German publications are also agitating for a "new approach." Summing up these developments, International Affairs dangles the bait: "West German business circles cannot help noticing that the G. D. R. (German Communist regime) is very successful in trade with the countries of the democratic camp, while the trade balance of the G. F. R. (German Federal Republic) clearly shows the disadvantages of the one-sided Bonn policy for the country's economy."

A rather clear cut example of the 180 degree switch in Soviet policy toward Germany may be seen in two articles written by a Russian professor A. Yerusalimsky. Writing in the New Times (9-19-53), the professor warned the peoples of Europe of the German danger. "Furthermore," he wrote, "history has shown that it is not Germany, but her neighbors that need guarantees of security, they having been the victims of German aggression twice in the course of a half century . . . It is upon Germany that the maintenance of peace in Europe mostly depends; for this she has only to renounce her suicidal policy of stirring up wars and armed conflicts." Writing for the New Times about two years later (1-26-56) Prof. Yerusalimsky weeps over the "hard" peace which the Allies planned for Germany. The professor cries that it was the Morgenthau Plan, "sponsored by influential American monopolists" which tried to destroy Germany, but thanks to the Soviet Union this insidious plot of American "imperialists" was unmasked and rendered harmless.

The new Russian propaganda line shows that nothing will be left to chance insofar as relations with Germany are concerned. The Soviets do not intend to be one inch behind the Western powers in the scramble for the hand of the former enemy. We can free a Sepp Dietrich; they too can release German war criminals. We can build up a German army led by former members of Hitler's General Staff; they are doing likewise. Indeed, there seems to be no end to this spectacle. In the process of bidding higher and higher, the moral principles for which millions gave their lives are cast into the shadows. The Bismarckian idea that moral principle is no substitute for brute force and political expediency, seems to have gripped the minds of many statesmen who, only a short while ago, exhorted their peoples to destroy every vestige of German militarism.

HITLER'S ECHO

A favorite "pastime" of the Nazis was the annual Nuremberg rally—scene of Hitler's hysterical harangues. With Teutonic fervor the cry for "blood" would echo through the ranks of the faithful as the Führer shook his fist at the world. It was a moment when the Nazi brass was able to whip up a frenzied hatred which spread fear and terror throughout Europe. Our thoughts return to that spectacle as we read about the annual celebrations of the German expellee groups. These rallies have provided the platform for those unregenerate elements who talk about Germany's "rights" in the same tones of terror as their Nazi forebears. It is also an occasion for the more respectable elements among the Germans to let their hair down, so to speak.

The most recent of these get-togethers was held in May of this year and the top leaders of the German Government participated enthusiastically. Chancellor Adenauer sent a message of greetings. He expressed the hope that the expellees would soon be able "to resume their historic task." Von Brentano, Bonn's Foreign Minister, declared that the Germans would never give up their "lost" territories. Theodor Oberlaender, Federal Minister for Refugees (a former Nazi), noted with great satisfaction that the agitation of the expellees was a great "service" to Europe. Even the leader of the Social Democrats, Erich Ollenhauer, put in his two cents by sending a message of greeting to the Sudeten Germans: He assured them that the Social-Democratic party would support their cause to the end. The Federal Minister for All German Affairs, Jacob Kaiser, promised the Sudetens that the German Government would never "abandon" their rights. Speaking about German "rights," it was the same Herr Kaiser who once said: "No real Europe can be formed until the German bloc is reconstituted. I remind you that this bloc includes, in addition to Germany, Austria, a part of Switzerland, the Saar of course, and Alsace-Lorraine. When I think of the Strasbourg Cathedral, my heart hurts."

"General von Manteuffel, former commander of German forces, present head of the Steel Helmets, is taking every precaution in the world to explain that he never, but never, was a Nazi. Notwithstanding, Hitler himself had given him the insignia of the National Socialist party. This was an unfortunate misunderstanding, explains the former war leader. 'I was invited by Hitler to assist in the distribution of decorations. At the end of the ceremony, Hitler handed me a little case. I believed it to contain a pair of cuff links. Later on I discovered that it was the party insignia. It was too late to refuse . . .'

"The honorable general made a slight mistake. He meant to say: 'It was too early to refuse' . . . He could not foresee how it would all end!"

(Liberation, Paris, 5-5-56)

The voice of Pan-Germanism with its chauvinistic sneers has not been stilled despite the Nazi defeat. Of course, the respectable leaders try to mislead world public opinion by pretending that the expulsion of the Germans from the Sudetenland and from other areas was merely the result of arbitrary decisions by the Allied powers. Apparently, they hope that memories are so short that we no longer recall the Fifth Column work of the Sudetens and other German minority groups which paved the way for Nazi conquests (see Prevent World War III, No. 47, "Pan-Germanism Rides Again," page 39).

In this connection, the same respectable Germans gloss over the fact that the leadership of these expellee groups is infested with pro-Nazi elements. For example, the leader of the Sudeten Germans, Lodgman von Auen, was a notorious Nazi collaborator and was arrested for war crimes. However, under mysterious circumstances he escaped punishment and now is a celebrated figure in Germany. Indeed, the President of the Bonn Government, Theodor Heuss, awarded von Auen the Great Service Cross of the Federal Republic on the occasion of his 75th birthday. It is interesting to recall that it was Herr Heuss who sent the infamous wire to the war criminal von Neurath, acclaiming his martyrdom, the same von Neurath who was found guilty in the persecution of the Czechs under Hitler. Thus, while the so-called respectable leaders, such as Heuss, pose as tried and true friends of democracy, they take advantage of every opportunity to give aid and comfort to the Pan-German ravings of the expellees.

The aims and objectives of the expellees may be couched in anti-Communist slogans, but behind this façade they strive tirelessly to carry out the dream of a Pan-German Europe. They pretend to be friends of the Western Allies but they smear Radio Free Europe; they pretend to be democratic, but they associate and make common cause with other fascistic elements; they pretend to be against the present satellite setup in Eastern Europe but they dream of the day when the Poles and the Czechs and other peoples of Eastern Europe will be satellites of a Fourth Reich.

These expellee groups are endeavoring in every possible way to exploit the cold war to achieve their nefarious goal. They are trying to whip up American public opinion. In this connection mention must be made of their public relations expert in the US, Dr. Richard Sallet. His background was referred to briefly in the issue of Prevent World War III mentioned above. Additional facts show that at one time he was Goebbels' representative in the Germany Embassy in Washington and subsequently an official in Ribbentrop's Foreign Office. Among his tasks was to coordinate pro-Nazi activities in the United States. The aim of this work was to drum up anti-Semitism, to disunite the American people and to create animosity between the USA and her most reliable allies. In this work he had the assistance of a top Nazi agent, Stallforth, who took advantage of his privileges as an American citizen. It may be that it was under Sallet's direction that the German Embassy in Washington recently circulated a map and an accompanying letter among Members of Congress and newspaper editors designed to justify the Pan-German activities of the expellee groups.

It is noteworthy that while the expellees try to curry favor with the USA, they smear Western Allied leaders. Winston Churchill received a taste of this medicine when he visited Germany in May. The violent attacks launched against Churchill made it necessary for the authorities to adopt rigid security precautions so as to protect Churchill's life. One of the leaflets circulated by these expellee gangs, when Churchill spoke at Aachen, read: "Citizens of Aachen! Avoid the ceremony at the market place tomorrow! Keep your windows shut! Don't wave flags! Come instead to the protest demonstration at the war memorial."

This type of agitation is just a foretaste of what is in store for the Allies should the German expellee groups really break loose. All sincere democrats who are just as opposed to Communism as they are to neo-Nazism and Pan-Germanism, should take heed of this development which is a definite threat to security and peace.

"Chancellor Adenauer . . . returned to Germany apparently under the impression that the whole free world desires the reunification of Germany . . . The fact is that there are large segments of the free world . . . that don't really care . . .

"While West Germany was working up oratorical steam on the Day of Unity yesterday, the French were also making speeches. It was the anniversary of the Battle of Verdun. Verdun, President Coty insisted there, was proof that France was not as decadent as people think."

(Theodore Kaghan, N. Y. Post, 6-18-56)

"The only thing except direct attack which might cause Russia to go to war, says General MacArthur, is this: a threat of a reunited Germany once more geared up to its full war potential. He thinks Russia is afraid of a Germany in arms, and predicts:

" 'If we use Germany as a military threat against Russia it will probably precipitate the third World War.'

"In his view, Russia will never permit Germany's reunification unless Germany is neutralized."

(U. S. News & World Report, 4-6-56)

Scapegoat Tactics

The weekly magazine U. S. News & World Report (4-6-56) published an interview with French Prime Minister Guy Mollet which made headline news. Though Mollet was asked to comment on some of the most delicate world problems, his replies were forthright and devoid of platitudes and ambiguities. Of course, Mr. Mollet could have taken the easy way out by flattering the State Department's handling of these vital issues. Perhaps this would have made him a hero in the eyes of our policy makers but, fortunately, Mr. Mollet did not permit himself this luxury, and it is doubtful whether the American people would have benefited by it.

Fawning was never the hallmark of a sincere and reliable ally. In his constructive criticisms Mr. Mollet proved again that the French people are faithful to the common interests of the Western Democracies. Nevertheless, the French Prime Minister has been subjected to a barrage of accusations and innuendoes of a most vicious type. There is no doubt that this storm would not have been so violent, had it not been for the fact that Mollet questioned the soundness of American policy with regard to Germany. His well reasoned criticisms represented one of the rare public occasions when a prominent Allied statesman has taken issue with the "Germany First" policy.

Mr. Mollet declared that the German problem was basically a problem of European security. Thus, he implied that, when the peoples of Europe were assured of their security against the possible resurgence of an aggressive Germany, the German problem would lend itself to a practical solution.

Mollet did not speak for the French alone. He represented the views of the overwhelming majority of the peoples of Europe who have suffered time and again under the heel of the German jackboot. Indeed, the French Prime Minister was merely reaffirming what had been the original policy of the United States at the end of World War II. It is true that American policy has been reversed, but this does not detract from the validity of the principle enunciated by Mr. Mollet.

In a subsequent issue (4-13-56), the U. S. News & World Report carried a selected number of statements supposedly representing public opinion in Europe on the Mollet interview. While many of these carefully selected reactions from abroad were adverse, they were not unanimous. Nevertheless, the U. S. News & World Report captioned its "findings" with these words: "French Premier divides Allies, pleases Russians." The bias displayed in this misleading headline, is not an unusual phenomenon insofar as a large sector of the American press is concerned. Generally speaking, it is a rare thing to read criticisms of the Germans in the American press. On the contrary, ever since the end of the war there has been a steady increase of omissions in the press concerning the real state of affairs in Germany. It is always the French or the British who are accused of sabotaging Western unity and of dealing with the Russians behind the back of the United States. Such charges are seldom made against the Germans and yet, the record of German dealings with Moscow goes back as far as 1945.

It was in 1945 that Marshal Zhukov appointed Count Rudolf Nadolny to the post of special advisor on German questions. Nadolny was an expert on Russian affairs and was Hitler's Ambassador to Moscow. Through his tireless efforts following the end of hostilities, Nadolny brought together a group of ultra-conservative German businessmen and diplomats who sought to find ways and means of promoting rapprochement with the Russians.

Nadolny's circle of friends included such prominent personalities as Fritz von Prittwitz, former German Envoy to Washington, Dr. Hermann Puender, banker Hermann Abs, Dr. Andreas Hermes, former Minister of Agriculture, Prof. Ludwig Erhard, now Minister of Economics in the Bonn cabinet, all close personal friends of Dr. Adenauer and influential co-leaders in the Christian Democratic Union.

The secret Russo-German negotiations, sponsored by Nadolny and his group, were exposed in the European press. Mr. Walter Lippmann devoted an entire column to this development (3-15-49). It is also known that at one of the conferences held by the Nadolny circle, the present Foreign Minister of the Bonn Government, Heinrich von Brentano, warned: "It must be our duty to overcome the deep antagonism of the Russians by eliminating all reasons for distrust against Germany." In this connection he stated that "Germany must not become a satellite of a Western coalition" (Der Spiegel, 6-13-51). The growing activities of this influential group obliged Chancellor Adenauer to call for discretion. "We must move very cautiously," he said. "We ought not to give the impression either in Germany or in the United States, that we shall collaborate in any way with the Russians" (New York Times, 8-17-49).

TEMPTATION STRONG... AND GETTING STRONGER

Chancellor Adenauer's remarks did not dampen the enthusiasm of Nadolny and his friends in high places, and the secret dealings with Moscow continued. Thus, in August, 1952, a "hush-hush" meeting took place between top leaders of the German business community and associates of Anastas Mikoyan, the Soviet Deputy Prime Minister. It is noteworthy that this conference, held in Copenhagen, took place only three months after the general peace contract with Bonn had been drawn up. "The conference was called at West German initiative with the knowledge of the West German Government, presumably Chancellor Adenauer himself" (Christian Science Monitor, 4-17-54).

In the early part of 1954 additional efforts were made by influential Germans to come to some sort of bilateral arrangement with the Russians. The person who was directly associated with this move, was Karl Georg Pfleiderer, a leader of the Free Democratic Party which was part of the Adenauer coalition. A former career diplomat who served in Soviet Russia before World War II, Pfleiderer urged the prompt establishment of diplomatic relations with Moscow. He also favored a kind of East-West "non-aggression pact," similar to that which the Soviets had proposed at the Berlin Conference in February, 1954. According to Marquis Childs, Pfleiderer was said "to have close ties with the powerful Rhineland industrialists who want to expand their sales in both, Russia and China" (9-17-54). Added significance may be given to Pfleiderer's views since he was the foreign affairs expert for the Free Democratic Party whose leadership has long advocated separate negotiations with the Russians. The record shows that Pfleiderer had talks with the Soviet High Commissioner and other Russian officials in the Eastern Zone and it is also a matter of record that Dr. Adenauer secretly encouraged Pfleiderer to visit Moscow and Peiping. However, when Pfleiderer's activities became public knowledge, Adenauer denied that he was in any way responsible.

The fear lest Bonn's hand be exposed prematurely, has impelled German politicians to use all kinds of devious methods in their approach to the Russians. They have even sought to employ intermediary third parties to cloak their designs. When Vice-Chancellor Bluecher arrived in India in January of this year, a delegation from East Germany had also turned up. It is not known whether Herr Bluecher had direct contacts with his East German brethren in New Delhi, but Herr Bluecher told Nehru that "the Federal Republic would in no way consider it an interference into its domestic affairs if India would perform the service, by its good offices, of trying to increase Russian understanding of the difficult German situation" (The Bulletin, a weekly issued by the Bonn Government, 1-26-56).

Incidently, it should be pointed out that Herr Pfleiderer negotiated with Nehru in the Austrian town of Fuschl in the preceding year. The German press reported that the Pfleiderer-Nehru talks preceded secret conversations between Adenauer and Pfleiderer by just a few hours. One press report had the following to say about this bizarre affair: "Of course, a spokesman for the Bonn Government was asked what was going on here? He was prepared with an adequate answer—and was met with bursts of laughter. According to the government spokesman, the important expert on Eastern affairs Pfleiderer met with Nehru, possibly the most active politician in the world today, to report on the economic structure of Baden-Württemberg." Thus, it was on this highly important subject that Nehru came all the way from India!

To return to Bluecher: Herr Bluecher has been quite active in this very sensitive field of Russo-German negotiations. His attitude on how to deal with the Soviets was revealed by the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (8-12-55), i.e., prior to his trip to India. This newspaper reported that Bluecher had already discussed the possibility of a "revision of the Paris Treaties" (release of West Germany from NATO). Bluecher also let it be known that Bonn was prepared to negotiate with the Communist Government in Eastern Germany in order to facilitate reunification. According to Marquis Childs (7-30-54), Bleucher was determined that Germany must deal with the Russians. Childs reported that Bluecher envisaged a policy of co-existence with the Soviets whereby German reunification would come about in return for a guarantee that the West "would respect the present status of Poland and Czechoslovakia."

The Pfleiderer and Bluecher plans to break up NATO as part of a deal with Moscow, seem to have carried great weight with the Bonn Government. Thus, the London Times (5-8-55) reported that the former Ribbentrop diplomat Herr von Herwarth, the present Ambassador to Britain, was expected to propose the exclusion of Germany from NATO in return for Russian agreement to unification, free elections in her Eastern and South-Eastern European satellites and the abandonment of the projected 'Eastern NATO.'"

Another important German leader, Martin Euler, was also an advocate of a direct approach to Moscow at the expense of NATO. The Swiss newspaper Journal de Genève (11-26-55) reported that Euler "wants the Bonn Republic to quit NATO, to arm itself by its own means and, having recaptured freedom supported by force, undertake a démarche towards Moscow." It is true that both Bluecher and Euler have split with the present leadership of the Free Democratic Party, but whether this represents a change of heart with regard to their attitude toward NATO and the need to negotiate with Russians remains to be seen.

As regards Bluecher, it is noteworthy that his right-hand man is a former SS Captain and ex-Ribbentrop diplomat, Dr. G. A. Sonnenhol. Two years ago, the noted British correspondent Sefton Delmer wrote a sensational article for the London Daily Express wherein he revealed the contents of a memorandum on German policy prepared by Dr. Sonnenhol. The main point of the memorandum was the insistence that the cold war between East and West must be kept going by the Germans so that they could play off one bloc against the other, reunify Germany, and reassert and increase the power of the Fatherland. The Sonnenhol memorandum observed that tensions between the victors of 1945 had already been exploited with such success that Germany was becoming sufficiently strong to abandon a policy of absolute reliance on the West and blind obedience to its orders. Sonnenhal boasted that Germany's war potential had become so great that a policy of subservience to the West "is no longer permissible." Stressing the thesis that the cold war had been a windfall to the Germans, the memorandum stated: "Fears in the West of a German-Soviet understanding coupled with the intransigence shown by the Russians at the Berlin Conference, give a strong negotiating position to the government which it can and must exploit." Needless to say, the Sonnenhol "line" has been followed faithfully.

Of course, under the shrewd leadership of Chancellor Adenauer the Germans are always careful not to move in a spectacular way until the proper alibi is found. It will be recalled that, when Adenauer returned from Moscow after having agreed to diplomatic relations with the Soviets, one of his justifications for this turnabout on his part was that the Allies had encouraged the spirit of co-existence at the Geneva Conference. Having established diplomatic relations with the Russians, the Bonn Government was now prepared for the next step but this, too, required a good alibi. Up to the Mollet interview, this was lacking. Even so, the press service of Chancellor Adenauer's party reported that if negotiations at Geneva were not satisfactory to Bonn, bilateral discussions with the Soviet Union on German reunification would be initiated through diplomatic channels (N. Y. Times, 7-22-55). Apparently, the results of the Geneva Conference did not provide sufficient grounds for a Bonn-Moscow deal. On the other hand, the Mollet interview was regarded by the Germans as a godsend.

Shortly after Mollet had expressed his views, von Brentano announced that Bonn would make a direct approach to the Russians. He implied, as did other German officials, that Mollet's remarks amounted to a doublecross, thereby justifying negotiations with the Russians. In this connection, von Brentano warned the West in a tone reminiscent of the best traditions of arrogant German diplomacy: "We do not say we forbid you to make a disarmament agreement that ignores the German question. We warn you not to do so" (A. P., 4-13-56).

So the Germans feigned shock over Mollet's statements and spoke as though they would have never thought of going directly to Moscow, had they not been "betrayed" by the French. However, contrary to the general run of press reports intimating that Mollet's statements were the cause of Bonn's decision, von Brentano himself admitted that the Bonn Government had been dickering with Moscow for some time. He told reporters: "We (the Bonn Government) may be said to be in a phase of continuing initiative although we cannot give periodic explanations which could prejudice the chances of success of our policies" (Manchester Guardian, 4-19-56).

There is additional evidence to show that von Brentano was ndulging in sanctimonious double talk when he implied that he French were warming up to the Russians. Just two months before the Mollet interview, the U. S. News & World Report published a statement by von Brentano wherein he declared hat it was "possible and even probable that the new Soviet Ambassador in Bonn will broach the question of reunification" (2-10-56). Von Brentano indicated that similar talks would go on between the Soviet Government and the newly appointed German Ambassador. He emphasized that diplomatic elations with Russia had been established "as a means of urthering the solution of the question of reunification." Did he U. S. News & World Report rush into print with a bold ace headline reading "German Foreign Minister divides llies, pleases Russians"? Of course, it did not. Indeed, von Brentano's sensational admission went hardly noticed by the press with the notable exception of the Communist Daily Worker which gloated over the Brentano statement and featured it prominently.

In denouncing Mollet as subscribing to views held by the Soviet Union on German reunification, the Bonn Government stated that it had "repeatedly declared that without reunification and the establishment of a security system satisfactory to all countries, it would not be possible to negotiate on disarmament with any hope of success." However, if Mollet has deviated from the straight and narrow path, so did Chancellor Adenauer. As late as June, 1955, Adenauer told the United Press that the United States and Soviet Russia should try to reach an agreement on a program for controlled disarmament. The U. P. reported that Adenauer believed such an agreement on disarmament "would pave the way for a settlement of other problems, like security and Germany." Adenauer's view that disarmament and a general security system would pave the way for the settlement of the German problem was also reported in the New York Times (6-13-55). In a speech delivered before the Geneva Conference took place, Adenauer repeated his view that the "primary and decisive issue" at the Conference must be the question of disarmament. He declared: "By earnestly and resolutely tackling this task, the reunification of Germany in peace and freedom will also be achieved in due course" (The Bulletin, 6-2-55). This speech was praised in an editorial in the next issue of the Bulletin. Adenauer was hailed as a "realist" when he made his "strong bid for disarmament and collective security." The editorial concluded that through the settlement of these problems German reunification would be facilitated.

We have dwelt at length on "L'Affaire Mollet" because it is imperative, from the standpoint of U. S. security, to safeguard the bonds of friendship between France and our country. Only the most inveterate enemies of both, France and the U. S. A., could profit from the suspicions and deliberate distortions which have beclouded the far-sighted views of Mr. Mollet on disarmament, security and German reunification. The moth-eaten picture of France in the role of a cunning villain while the Germans appear as the loyal and betrayed party, is a favorite device of German propaganda. It would seem that two world wars should have immunized us from such deceit.

"So far, the German industrialists have been too busy to bother with politics, though they spent immense sums on election propaganda for the right-wing parties—and paid insurance to the Communist party, too, in the years before NATO blocked the Soviet advance.

"Meanwhile, they are dazzled by the vision of new markets in the Middle East and Asia; their enthusiasm for an Asian Marshall Plan springs strictly from the expectation of profit.

"This materialistic approach to world problems is not confined to the industrialists—it is general in all classes.

". . . But the bad side of German materialism is a cynical selfishness in both domestic and foreign policy—an absolute refusal to make sacrifices for the common good . . ."

(Denis Healey, New Leader, 5-28-56)

Dr. Wilhelm Haas — Ambassador Extraordinary

In defense of his decision to establish diplomatic relations with the Soviet Government, Chancellor Adenauer declared that Germany could not ignore the fact that Russia was one of the world's leading powers. By the same token, it would have been hardly in keeping with the Chancellor's sizing up of the Soviets, had he failed to appoint an individual with stature commensurate with the responsibilities and tasks awaiting the German ambassador to Moscow. Indeed, the Russians, aware of the importance of the new relationship with Bonn, lost no time in appointing one of their top diplomats to the German post. The Russian Ambassador Zorin not only held a high position in the Soviet Foreign Office, but was one of the key manipulators behind the scenes in Czechoslovakia when the Communists took over in 1948.

Renazifying the Foreign Office

Though Bonn's Ambassador to Moscow, Dr. Wilhelm Hass, may not have earned as colorful a reputation as his Russion counterpart, he is by no means a mediocrity. On the contrary, Dr. Haas has had extensive training and experience. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that he is not a well-known figure outside of certain circles in Germany. In deed, the only time the outside world received some special news of his actual existence prior to his latest appointment, was during his sojourn as Chief of the Administrative and Personnel Division of the Bonn Foreign Office.

It was way back in 1950 that Dr. Haas admitted publicly that 14 out of 31 senior members of the "new" German Foreign Office were former Nazis. Dr. Haas told reporters that he saw no objection to the appointment of former Ribbentrip diplomats. He contended that the German Foreign Service could not be rebuilt on an efficient basis without the reemployment of these Hitlerites. Haas did a thorough job in renazifying the Bonn Foreign Office. One of Germany's noted radio commentators, Helmut Hammerschmidt, reported that there were "more Nazis now than the Foreign Ministry had even under Hitler" (A.P. 3-17-52).

Those who protested this scandalous situation, found out very soon that Chancellor Adenauer supported Haas to the hilt. In this connection it is interesting to note that Dr. Haas selected Foreign Office personnel with the help of the personal advice of another Ribbentrop diplomat, Hans Schroeder. It is a fact that Herr Schroeder had been a Nazi party member since 1933 and was also the Landesgruppenleiter of the Nazi regime abroad. The rapidity of Schoeder's rise as Deputy Director of the Personnel Division in the Nazi Foreign Office may be partially explained by the fact that he had very close ties with Rudolf Hess, Hitler's Deputy.

Following Haas' performance in staffing the "new" Foreign Office, Chancellor Adenauer rewarded him with the German Ambassadorship to Turkey. In this capacity, he helped to increase Germany's economic and political influence in that strategic area and in other parts of the Middle East. The German newspapers have praised him highly for his successes in establishing fruitful contracts for the Germans. Thus, his stay in Turkey which lasted for almost three years, proved his ability and paved the way for his still more important assignment in Moscow.

The Beginning of a Career

Like all German diplomats Herr Haas received careful training from the very beginning of his career. It was this special treatment which placed the German Diplomatic Corps and its operations in an elite category immune to the vicissitudes of domestic politics. This has produced a consistency in German foreign policy, regardless of the party in power, which remains intact to the present day.

We are told that Haas entered the diplomatic service in 1922 as a native of the city of Bremen. As a young attaché Haas made the rounds of many of the important foreign chancellories. Besides a tour of duty in Paris and in Addis Ababa, Haas was stationed in the Far East, notably Peking, Shanghai and Tokyo. The Bonn Government's official "Bulletin" (1-5-56) boasts that in Haas "Germany has an acute observer in the Eastern hemisphere." During his first years in the Foreign Office, Haas experienced the signing of the Rapallo Treaty which marked the beginning of postwar cooperation, military and economic, between Russia and Germany. At one time Haas was Secretary of the German Delegation to the League of Nations. He held this post until Germany withdrew from the League. It is stated that following Germany's withdrawal "Ribbentrop did not want to do without Dr. Haas and he appointed him for a period of 3 years (1934-1937) as a trade attaché to the German Embassy in Tokyo (Neue Volkszeitung, 1-7-56).

The "Bulletin" alleges that Haas had to resign from the Foreign Office in 1937 because of his wife's non-Aryan background. Offhand this would appear to imply that Haas was persona non grata with the Nazis. We shall subsequently see that this is far from the truth, but suffice it to say at this point that he was chosen "liaison officer" for I. G. Farben in Peking. While serving in this post to which he was recommended by the I. G. Farben war criminal Max Ilgner, Haas continued to receive his State pension from the Hitler Government, in foreign exchange no less. Haas remained in this position to the end of the war.

I. G. Farben's Record

That Farben performed invaluable services on behalf of the Nazis in their drive to conquer the world, is a matter of record. A study of the documents which were disclosed at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials, indicates that the aims of the Farben empire and those of the Hitler Government were so interrelated as to make it difficult to separate one from the other. Even before the rise of Hitler, Farben was regarded as the "crown jewel" of the Weimar Republic. Stresemann called it his "trump card." On another occasion he said, "Without Farben no foreign policy was possible."

Farben's tie-up with the Nazis was described in detail by one of IG's top officials, Georg von Schnitzler, who was a member of the Board of Directors from 1925-1945 and the head of its important Commercial Committee. In an affidavit dated 3-18-47, von Schnitzler admitted that "the development of IG during the last 12 years cannot be separated from the government's foreign policy." In this same affidavit he confessed: "Thus in acting as it had done, the IG contracted a great responsibility and constituted a stantial and (in the chemical domain) decisive help to Hitler's foreign policy, which led to war and to the ruin of Germany. Thus I must conclude that IG is largely responsible for Hitler's policy." As regards Farben's connection with Hitler's armed forces von Schnitzler said: "Hand in hand with this, the relations between IG and the Wehrmacht became more and more intimate and a continuous union between IG officials on the one side and the Wehrmacht representatives on the other side was the consequence of it." Needless to say, this relationship was very satisfactory to Farben and not only for patriotic reasons. Von Schnitzler tells us: "Practically the whole augmentation in the turnover of IG from a little over 1 billion marks to 3 billions in 1943 is a 100 percent result of the rearmament and the war policy of the German Government."

The cooperation between the German General Staff and IG Farben made it necessary to establish an organization that would work on a continuous basis for the development of Germany's war potential. This was achieved in 1935 when IG set up Vermittlungsstelle W in the Berlin office of Farben. The head of this office, Dr. Karl Krauch, described the function of Vermittlungsstelle W as an organization which was to provide "the establishment of military economy for a systematic cooperation within the IG and particularly for a centralized treatment of questions of military policy and military technics." Another of the Farben war criminals, Hans Kugler, put it more plainly when he said: "The foremost purpose of the Nazi government and IG and all other industrialists was to keep the Wehrmacht all powerful vis-à-vis all other countries, including the USA."

The Espionage Network

The N.W.7 office of Farben in Berlin was also headquarters of the world wide intelligence operations conducted by another key Farben official, Dr. Max Ilgner. His outfit turned out to be indispensable to Germany's preparations for the planning and waging of aggressive war. The Wehrmacht enjoyed particular close relations with this spy organization. Von Schnitzler revealed that after a conference with Wehrmacht intelligence officials in 1936, Ilgner promised to send them "copies of his reports from abroad. In 1937, the Berlin NW 7 office first took the initiative in preparing bombing surveys and then interested the Wehrmacht in them" (The Devil's Chemists by Josiah E. DuBois, page 325). Thus, Farben merged its resources with the Wehrmacht for espionage and military purposes. A conference between Farben officials and representatives of the military intelligence staff of the German High Command took place on May 2, 1941, to develop this cooperation still further. In opening the conference Major Bloch, representing the Counter Intelligence Division of the General Staff, conveyed the thanks of Admiral Canaris, Hitler's Chief of Intelligence, for Farben's valuable cooperation and support shown so far in the field of foreign intelligence service in regard to questions of economy and war economy." In reply, Farben officials assured Major Bloch of their unqualified cooperation. Further assurances were given that all reports from Farben representatives abroad which dealt with matters of concern to the General Staff, would be forwarded to it.

According to the investigations of the Senate Subcommittee, otherwise known as the Kilgore Committee, it was ascertained that the personnel under Ilgner "were working full time for the Wehrmacht" although they were ostensibly paid by Farben. This leads us to one of the key instruments necessary for the proper functioning of the Farben spy network. In 1937, the decisive year for the remilitarization of Germany and the preparation for aggressive war, the so-called Verbindungsmänner or "liaison officers" were appointed by Ilgner. It was in that year that Dr. Haas joined Farben. These so-called Verbindungsmänner cooperated with the Nazis in foreign countries in every possible way. In this connection the Commercial Committee which had overall charge of Farben's personnel abroad, stipulated in September 1937: "Under no circumstance should anybody be assigned to IG Farben agencies abroad who is not a member of the German Labor Front and whose positive attitude to the new era has not been established beyond any doubt. Gentlemen who are sent abroad should be made to realize that it is their special duty to represent National Socialist Germany. They are particularly reminded that as soon as they arrive they are to contact the local or regional group of Germans abroad and are expected to attend regularly their meetings as well as those of the Labor Front."

Again we repeat that this was the year that the present German ambassador to Moscow was appointed as "liaison officer" of the I. G. Farben. The Farben official who was responsible for the coordination of the Verbindungsmänner's activities was Herr Waibel. He was most anxious to maintain friendly relations with the Auslandsorganization, the organization of the Nazi party abroad. It was he who worked out the agreement with the Nazis that all personnel representing Farben in other countries, would cooperate one hundred percent with Nazi organizations including the "German Labor Front." As a result of his responsibilities, Herr Waibel was the recipient of reports prepared by Dr. Haas from China which had little to do with Farben's business problems as such but were of definite concern to the German High Command. "Through the instrumentality of its leading agent abroad, the 'Verbindungsmaenner,' one of whom was located in every major country of the world, Farben received frequent intelligence reports pertaining to economic, political, and military matters. So invaluable were these Vebindungsmaenner that in most cases they were absorbed into the OKW/Abwehr (Military Intelligence Division of the Wehrmacht) and into Nazi Party organizations. In addition, Farben placed on its payroll members of the 'OKW/Abwehr.' Reports received from abroad or compiled by Farben were given to the Wehrwirtschaftstab (Military Economics Staff) of General Thomas, the OKW/Abwehr, and the Auslandsorganisation. These reports were received, analyzed, compiled, and forwarded to the Vorstand and to the various interested agencies of the Third Reich through Farben's Berlin organization known as the 'Berlin N.W.7' office. The Berlin N.W.7 office also prepared special reports and maps for the Wehrmacht identifying and locating strategic factories in countries about to become the victims of German aggression. These maps and reports were used by the Luftwaffe in selecting their bombing targets." (Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, Vol. VII, page 33).

"Bureau Ehrhardt"

To cite a concrete example of how this vast espionage ring operated, we refer to the so-called "Bureau Ehrhardt," the German High Command's wartime intelligence organization in China and in neighboring countries of Asia. The head was Lt. Col. Ludwig Ehrhardt, chief of the Nazi intelligence service in the Orient. Ehrhardt had a very adventurous background having headed the German fifth column in the Balkans before he was sent to China to coordinate the intelligence activities of the German Armed Forces in that country. Ehrhardt was a close and trusted friend of the Fuehrer. "Bureau Ehrhardt" consisted of a number of shady characters including some Japanese who spied on Allied activities in the Far East and reported their findings to the German High Command. Ehrhardt's outfit had established offices in Shanghai, Canton, and Peking.

Information was gathered which led to the sinking of a number of American ships including at least one aircraft carrier, and heavy losses in the early phases of the Okinawa and other Pacific campaigns. The spy ring "authorities reported, was cloaked by German commercial firms in China and was aided by the German Embassy" (U. P. 4-15-46). The same press dispatch noted that those who worked for Bureau Ehrhardt were "all members of a Nazi sponsored werewolf organization that carried on war against the United States and China long after the Reich had surrendered." One of the agents, Wolfgang Schenke, is now the editor of a press service in Hamburg entitled "Realpolitik." He also contemplates the setting up of a so-called neutralist weekly which will be named "Neue Politik." Schenke has a long record of spying for the German High Command in the guise of a German newspaper correspondent. The Soviet publication "International Affairs" (February 1956) called Herr Schenke "the prominent West German Orientalist" and quoted approvingly his views on Asian "neutralism."

Von Puttkamer and Dr. Haas

Another interesting figure of "Bureau Ehrhardt" was Baron Jesco von Puttkamer. In many ways Puttkamer was even more important than Col. Ehrhardt. At one time he was Chief of the German Information Bureau in New York where he performed vital propaganda services for the Nazis. Prior to the war, he was public relations chief for IG Farben. Consequently, the Farben people were well aware of his professional talents and they took full advantage of them. This came about when the German counter-intelligence asked Farben to provide a more efficient spy setup for the German High Command in foreign countries. In a letter dated April 3, 1940, Farben's von Schnitzler wrote to the representative of the German counter-intelligence at IG, that he had recently discussed with Major Bloch, representing Admiral Canaris, "whether and to what extent the OKW (German High Command) wants to use the services of the Association for Sales Promotion which is under the management of Messrs. Kunzler and von Puttkamer." He said that this company was "particularly well suited for the intended camouflaging maneuvers. . . ." The German counter-intelligence welcomed von Schnitzler's suggestion and von Puttkamer was put to work.

On January 26, 1941, von Puttkamer wrote to v. Schnitzler from the German Embassy in Shanghai which itself was a nest of Nazi spies and propagandists. He expressed the hope that v. Schnitzler was satisfied with his work and mentioned that he had the pleasure of meeting "a good number of gentlemen from your company (Farben), among them Mr. Gadow and Mr. von Behring. . . ."

Besides his spy activities v. Puttkamer directed much of the antisemitic propaganda in Japan and in China during the war. It was v. Puttkamer who had posters plastered all over Japanese occupied China showing a wounded Chinese mother (with the rest of the family maimed and dead) in the ruins of their home bombed by an American plane. The poster carried these words "Who did this to you?" Just as he incited hate against "non-Aryans," so this propagandist provoked the Chinese against the Americans. Indeed, it was reported that v. Puttkamer's vicious lies were responsible for lynching of American pilots who had been seized after bombing Japanese concentrations in Hankow.

The Ehrhardt gang was found guilty by the American Tribunal, but apparently the punishment exacted against a number of these spies did not fit their crimes. Von Puttkamer himself received 30 years at hard labor but it was a very peculiar "hard labor"—he was appointed prison librarian. How v. Puttkamer got away with it is not exactly known, but this much was made public, viz, that the present Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, wrote a letter to then Secretary of State Marshall in behalf of v. Puttkamer. Secretary Dulles' letter, dated October 11, 1946, written on the letterhead of the Commission on a Just and Durable Peace, said: "As Chairman of this Commission I have received two communications dealing with the trial of Germans at Shanghai as war criminals. I have no basis for the independent judgment as to the facts reported. But it is my deep concern which I am sure the State Department shares, that in these matters justice rather than vengeance should be done. I am, respectfully, John Foster Dulles."

How does Haas fit into the story? In the first place, he worked on the closest terms with von Puttkamer. It has even been charged that it was Haas who may have been the Farben man in China who supplied von Puttkamer with the necessary funds for his activities. Allied officials who tried to interrogate von Puttkamer after his return to Germany were prevented from doing so—another indication that von Puttkamer had some very influential friends. The fact that von Puttkamer was in close touch with Mr. Gadow, a bigwig in the Farben organization in China, is also of relevance because Mr. Gadow was Haas' boss and Mr. Gadow, too, was one of the few men who was on intimate terms with Admiral Canaris, Chief of the German counter-intelligence. It has been stated that Gadow himself must have been an important member of the Canaris organization in view of his intimacy with the chief. In this connection it has also been pointed out that Haas was very friendly with Richard Sorge, the German who was Russia's top spy in Japan during the war. Prior to the war and even before the Nazis took over, both Sorge and Haas belonged to the circle connected with the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung. Von Puttkamer belonged to the same group.

From the foregoing it is difficult to believe that Haas was obliged to resign from the German Foreign Office because of his wife's "non-Aryan" background. More plausible is the interpretation that his "forced resignation" was just a cover up for his tranfer from the German Foreign Office to the German counter-intelligence under the guise of liaison officer for Farben.

"Displaced Person"

The defeat of Germany created problems for the Farben people and other agents of German big business in China. However, with the help of top Chinese leaders, some of them succeeded in remaining in China, ostensibly as "employees of German firms taken over by the Chinese. This little trick enabled Farben representatives to develop reorganization plans so that IG's interests would remain intact.

These German agents pretended to be friends of the Chinese insisting that Germany's only enemies were "Britain, the United States and Russia." A correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, writing from Shanghai 3-22-46, analyzed the propaganda line and reported that the Germans were saying to the Chinese, "We are still your friends and when Russia and the United States fight, we will be able to help you." In this connection, the same reporter mentioned that among the bigshot Nazis "who still have pipelines to Chinese Government officials, are Martin Fischer, former Consul General of Shanghai, and Karl Gadow" of Farben. We shall have more to say about Fischer but it appears that by 1946 Herr Gadow decided to leave China.

The New York Post correspondent, writing from Shanghai (4-9-47), revealed that Gadow and one of his henchmen had "peacefully left China for Germany on a repatriation ship." He also disclosed that "Dr. Wilhelm Haas, well known Nazi collaborator who was a DEFAG (Farben) advisor throughout the war, sailed for Switzerland as a 'displaced person'." The category "displaced person" served to enable persons like Haas to escape Allied control. According to the China Weekly Review (6-7-47), Gadow was said to have "carried with him blueprints for the reorganization of the IG trust into a streamlined world cartel with most operating bases outside Germany in neutral countries." This same weekly noted that shortly after Gadow had left in the summer of 1946, Dr. Haas, IG's "liaison officer" in North China, sailed for Switzerland. While the Farben agents who remained in China, worked to protect IG's interests in that country, their colleagues scurried back to Europe to protect Farben's world wide interests.

A similar report concerning the strange doings of Gadow and Haas was released by King Features Syndicate (7-27-47). Their correspondent in China, James R. Young, confirmed earlier reports that Farben agents were reorganizing its assets in China in defiance of Allied interests. He stated, "The IG Farben industry group . . . are planning to make Shanghai their headquarters, a part of the Nazi postwar plan to create a new world wide cartel with headquarters in China and branches in neutral or friendly countries. The gang includes . . . Karl Gadow, a Farben executive and Dr. Wilhelm Haas, who specializes in North China affairs."

German Interests in China

At this point it is important to note that Germany had considerable interests in the Far East before the advent of Hitler. It was in 1871 that merchants of Bremen, Haas' home town, demanded that in negotiating peace with France, Germany should insist upon the cession of French Far Eastern and Pacific possessions. Bismarck sympathized with the merchants of Bremen but had to forego the opportunity to grab these areas because he felt that Germany was not yet in the position to embark on an ambitious colonial expansion. Nevertheless, German commercial interests began to grow in China so that by 1914, on the eve of World War I, total German investments in China were approximately 1 billion marks. The steady growth was interrupted by the outbreak of war but following the end of hostilities German financial and economic interests revived their activities with the enthusiastic support of the Chinese Government.

Alongside of these economic ties there developed military cooperation. This phase of German-Chinese relations was initiated by Col. Walter Bauer, one of General von Ludendorff's chief assistants and a friend of Adolf Hitler. The Bauer mission to China marked the beginning of an era of secret industrial diplomacy aimed at securing for Germany preferential advantages in the Chinese market. It was supported by the same enocomic interests which were bent on gaining supreme influence in the domestic policy of Germany. The Bauer mission turned out to be an embarrassment to the Weimar Government when certain Chinese leaders revealed that great quantities of war material were being shipped to China in violation of the Versailles Treaty. The Weimar Government sought to absolve itself of responsibility, but that is an old story for the Weimar politicians. Pretending that the left hand did not know what the right hand was doing was a way for the German Government to avoid an Allied probe. How much credence can be placed on these denials of complicity can be seen from the fact that the Weimar Government cooperated secretly with the German General Staff as far back as 1919.

When Bauer died in 1929, his post in China was assumed by Col. Hans Kriebel, one of the first members of the Nazi Party. Kriebel was subsequently appointed by Ribbentrop to take over the Personnel Division of Hitler's Foreign Office. It was Kriebel, regarded as "an old China hand" who appointed Hans Schroeder as his deputy. As mentioned in the earlier part of this article, Schroeder was a good friend of Dr. Haas and gave him invaluable assistance in setting up the Bonn Foreign Office.

Needless to say, the chemical industry of China received special attention in the German Government's relations with China. Thus, when the Germans signed a commercial treaty with Japan in 1927, it turned out that the agreement offered great opportunities to Farben in the Chinese markets.

In the 1930s German industrialists continued to press for a greater share in the markets of the Far East. The German Government's policy was carefully oriented along the lines spelled out by the China Studien Gesellschaft, a branch of the German National Manufacturers Association. Certain leaders in the Chinese Government facilitated these efforts and it was during this period that one of Germany's leading steel merchants, Otto Wolff (Cologne), established an office in Shanghai to secure railway orders from the Chinese Government. It was the same firm which played an important part in the arrangement of German sales to the Soviet Union. With such firms as Otto Wolff, Carlowitz & Co. representing Krupp, and financial institutions like the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank, much was accomplished in the way of increasing German economic penetration in China. The close financial and economic ties between China and Germany are indicated by the friendly relations between H. H. Kung, a top financier for the Chinese Government, and Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's chief advisor. At a state banquet dinner given in honor of Mr. Kung in Berlin (1937), Herr Schacht spoke in glowing terms over the great future for Chinese-German relations: "Just as the political relations between Germany and China are based on friendship, so we can notice that our economic relations have been very pleasant and free of impediments. . . . Germany, being one of the world's great manufacturing nations, could help China along these lines by her advice and by her material resources. Please be assured that I shall do whatever I can to contribute to continuous Sino-German economic cooperation. . . ." In reply Dr. Kung assured his German friends that Herr Schacht's hopes were shared by the Chinese. "China considers Germany to be her closest friend, not only because of the cultural and intellectual bonds between Germany and China, but also because of the close economic relations between China and Germany. . . ."

Trading With Red China

As would be expected the Germans today are trying to regain the glories of yesterday. The markets of the Far East, particularly China, are an important factor in the calculations of German industrialists and the Bonn Government. Thus, even during the Korean war, when Communist China sought to destroy United Nations forces, Western Germany was carrying on a brisk trade with the Red regime. The N. Y. Herald Tribune (6-14-51) reported that the U. S. Government was alarmed over the flow of war supplies from Western Germany to Communist China. It was determined that during the first six months of the Korean war, legal West German trade with Red China increased 27-fold. It was also discovered that illegal trade amounted to at least 8 million. Significantly, German shipments of chemicals to China jumped from $233,000 for the first nine months of 1950 to $3,843,000 for the full year. U. S. officials were quoted as stating that there had been great improvement in limiting trade with Communist China by all nations "except West Germany." The Chicago Tribune (7-7-52) reported that West German businessmen had signed a trade agreement in East Berlin with Chinese trade representatives calling for the exchange of $37,500,000 in goods.

Thus, in spite of the alarms of the U. S. Government, Western Germany continued to develop its profitable trade with Red China. This agreement was followed by the organization of the so-called East Committee. The New York Times (12-19-52) reported that the top members of the committee included two leading Farben officials, W. A. Menne and Hermann J. Abs. One month later Hjalmar Schacht, speaking on the occasion of the opening of his new bank, declared that Germany would find more profit in trading with the East. "Germany," he declared, "should look to the Orient, especially China" (N. Y. World Telegram and Sun, 1-15-53).

The support of the East Committee and the prodding of Schacht were most rewarding. Trade with the Soviet bloc including Communist China, increased 44 percent during the first nine months of 1953. Exports to China in that period were valued at over $23 million as compared to about $10 million during the same period in 1952. The following year, German industrialists voiced stronger demands for trading with the Soviet bloc. The New York Herald Tribune (3-21-54) reported that German industrialists regarded the market of Red China "as of special importance." A leading economic journal of the Ruhr "Handelsblatt" stated that many German businessmen viewed the Chinese mainland as "the greatest future market in the world." The New York Times (4-4-54) reported that the Chinese Communist Government was planning "to use the Transsiberian railroad to move machinery and precision instruments purchased in West Germany . . ." In this connection East Germany became a very convenient zone for German-Chinese negotiations. As reported by the Christian Science Monitor (4-17-54), "West German spokesmen point with a certain pride to the fact that Communist China's only foreign trade representation in the Western world, the China Export-Import Cooperation Agency, is located in Berlin, Leipzigerstrasse 12, in the Soviet sector."

Of course, the Germans tried to assuage the feelings of American officials. They put out propaganda to the effect that unless the West begins to trade heavily with Communist China, the Chinese will become more dependent on the Russians. A report to the Washington Post (7-24-54) notes that "the Chinese trade lobby in West Germany has perfected its arguments to the extent of claiming that the Germans want to help the worldwide fight against Communism by building up Peiping's industry. The United States, it is said, is just hampering this laudable objective." Apparently this was said with a straight face.

In June, 1954, when the Allies met with the Soviet Union and China on the Indo-China question, German representatives popped up. Among those who "vacationed" in Switzerland at this time, was Martin Fischer, referred to earlier in this article. In the years before the war, Herr Fischer worked out of the German Embassy in China and was well acquainted with Gadow, von Puttkamer and Dr. Haas. Herr Fischer, however, was not the only German who happened to be in Switzerland. Some of Germany's leading businessmen turned up and had talks with the Chinese Vice Minister for Foreign Trade. Included in this delegation was a representative of the East Asia Union of Hamburg as well as a spokesman for Farben. The New York Herald Tribune reported (6-4-54) that this group came "with the knowledge of the Adenauer Government . . ."

It is interesting to note that much of this agitation for trade with China and other countries of the Soviet bloc has been particularly strong in Hamburg and Bremen. These cities are Germany's leading ports which in the past have enjoyed a lucrative trade with the Far East. Bremen has made much progress in reconstructing its port. The Christian Science Monitor (1-23-56) points out that Bremen "is watching the East West conflict keenly hoping for the opening of the iron curtain borders since this would restore transit trade, once one of the mainstays of the German port." In anticipation of realizing this fond hope, two of Germany's largest shipping companies have established a joint shipping company to serve Red China. The well known Social Democrat and President of the Bremen Senate Wilhelm Kaisen joined the growing clamor for the revival of trade with the Far East. He expressed his support to a cheering group of 700 West German businessmen at the annual dinner of the East Asia Union. As reported by the New York Herald Tribune (3-14-55), the implication of Kaisen's remarks was that "the West Germans should become the Peking Government's best commercial friends in the West."

It so happened that Herr Haas, following his return to Germany from Switzerland, served as Chief of the Presidential Chancellory in the town of Bremen. In that position Haas "became a close coworker of the President of the Senate, Kaisen" (Neue Volkszeitung, 1-7-56).

More recently it was reported that West Germany had increased its trade with Communist China from about $58 million in 1954 to $72 million in 1955. This development was endorsed by Walter Hallstein, Adenauer's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in an address to the East Asia Union in Hamburg. Of course, the above figures do not tell the whole story because no one (except the Germans) knows the exact value of West German exports to China. There is no doubt that a portion of West German exports to that country has been camouflaged as coming from East Germany or other countries. The growing protests over restrictions limiting trade with Red China, are reflected in many articles appearing in the German newspapers. There is a great deal of resentment over the fact that some of this trade has to go through "third countries." The Germans feel that they will not reap the full profit until they are able to trade directly with China and this is precisely what they hope to achieve.

None other than Otto Wolff representing the Wolff concern which enjoyed such lush profits in trading with China and the Soviet Union in the past, has publicly attacked U. S. policy. Wolff himself is head of the Russian branch of the East Committee. However, in his denunciation of the United States, he laid particular stress on the need to resume large scale trade with Red China. His criticism, it was noted, followed "exactly a month after the Adenauer regime in effect endorsed the persistent effort of methods of his late Führer. Another article in the Sudeten Bulletin (October 1955) by Albert K. Simon warns the Czechoslovakian people that they can no longer depend upon the Western Powers for protection against the Germans. He further declares that the Czechs must recognize Germany's "rights" in Czechoslovakia.

These are but a sampling of the kind of speeches and articles which are found in the Sudeten Bulletin. They are frank in their hatred of the Czechoslovakian people and equally blunt in the belief that the Czechs as well as all other European nations had better recognize Germany's superior position in Europe—or else!

The "Echos"

As mentioned above, this chauvinistic propaganda extolling the idea of Deutschland über Alles, has been circulating in the United States. The most persistent purveyors of this line are pro-German journalists and important sections of the German language press. The German language paper Nord Amerika is notorious in this respect. Among its contributing writers is Austin J. App. Professor of a college in Texas, he has been exposed in previous issues of this magazine as an apologist for German war criminals. On September 1, 1955, he devoted an entire column to the "injustices" suffered by the Sudeten Germans and accused former President Truman of playing a major role in the expulsion of the Sudetens from Czechoslovakia. "By his (President Truman's) signature," App writes, "the American Government became co-responsible for the greatest crime in history . . ." In a subsequent column devoted to this subject (10-27-55), Professor App delivers an ultimatum to the West. The West, he warns, must turn over all territories claimed by the Germans or "the Germans will have to undertake to end the 'unnatural' quarterings and amputations themselves." Only by acceding to Germany's demands, Mr. App declares, will the world be allowed to live in peace. Concluding his war-like fulminations, App echoes the Pan-German slogan "justice requires a Germany united from the Maas to the Memel and the Etch to the Belt, as the old song says."

Another influential exponent of this hate campaign against Germany's neighbors is the Steuben Society which has already been exposed as a Pan-German outfit. In a telegram (published in the Steuben News, August-September 1955), addressed to the Sudeten rally at Nuremberg mentioned above, the National Council of the Steuben Society affirmed its loyalty to the Sudeten cause. The Council expressed the belief that in the not too distant future the cause would "win out over the infamy of 1945." The "infamy" is not identified. Could it be Germany's defeat? The same telegram discusses in racist terms the "Slav versus Teuton" struggle and hints that the proud Teutons will once again become overlords of Eastern Europe. In the same way as Mr. App denounced the Allied Powers, the Council of the Steuben Society tells their German brethren, "It is to the eternal shame of the Western Powers that they gave their approval to this rape" (Steuben News, August-September 1955).

It is interesting to note that the Steuben Society's slanders against the Western Allies and its Pan-German propaganda does not deter Pentagon officials from appearing as guests at rallies sponsored by this organization.

The "Legal" Approach

Though threats and racist propaganda are a constant feature in the publications of the Sudetens, they try at times to embellish their Hitler-like tirades with arguments that appear to be respectable. In the September 1955 issue of the Sudeten Bulletin such a piece appeared under the heading "Were the Sudeten Germans Disloyal?" The author is anonymous but he is supposed to be "a well

". . . This change in the vocal trends of German public opinion was accompanied by a softening process of newspaper articles about 'Life in Soviet Russia' . . . 'The Russian bear won't eat you,' was the gist of the wishful reports. 'Russia only wants security and protection from the threat of American encirclement. The Americans are the real danger. Look what they did in Yalta. It is they, not the Russians, who ought by right to help us to be reunited.' . . .

"These fantastic notions, disguised as Realpolitik, helped to bring 'reunification' to the forefront as a major psychological and political matter, and it united former Nazis, German nationalists, advocates of a Bismarckian Eastern Re-insurance policy and of a modern Rapallo, intellectuals, industrialists, Socialists and Communists. It was significant of this modern version of German nationalism that, its fighting spirit having expired, it should forge an alliance with pacifism and neutralism . . ."

(Roland Hill, The Tablet-London, 9-3-55)

SUCKERS AGAIN?

"Russia's obdurate scuttling of the Big Four conference is already being countered with a far-reaching plan to speed the rearming of West Germany.

"A major feature of this counter measure is a $2,000,000,000 bond issue to be sold to the public in both the U. S. and Germany . . .

"In addition to these bonds the U. S. would contribute another $3,000,000,000 in direct loans and military aid of various kinds . . .

"The Pentagon report stresses that Bonn expects the U. S. to bear a large portion of the rearmament costs.

"On that the report states significantly: 'The Adenauer government, taking into account only strictly military expenditures, estimates the total for the three-year period at about $15,000,-000,000, less than half of which it expects to be paid by the German taxpayer.'

"The summary questions the view of Bonn officials about Germany's inability to pay for rearming. It is pointedly contended this is both underestimated and less than what other NATO countries are providing . . ."

known scholar of international law, eminently versed in Czechoslovak affairs." His dissertation turns out to be a pseudo-scholarly brief which is supposed to prove that the Sudeten Germans were loyal to Czechoslovakia up to the beginning of World War II. Their only crime, according to this authority, is that they endeavored to obtain "national self-determination without bloodshed." The writer does not hesitate to invoke the ideals of the American Revolution to support the Sudetens' cause but as the saying goes, even the devil can quote Scripture.

One who is not conversant with the state of affairs in Czechoslovakia on the eve of the Munich Pact, may be ensnared by the facile arguments of this "savant" on international law. He devotes many words to legal concepts but he studiously avoids the essence of the question.

Loyalty versus disloyalty to tyranny or the right of a people to self-determination are basically irrelevant to the Sudeten question. In reality that question which brought on the Munich Pact followed by World War II, was manufactured to serve as a smoke screen for Hitler's strategy to conquer Europe and then the world. Talk about self-determination was merely sand to be thrown into the eyes of those people who saw events from far away and mistook the fifth column work of the Sudeten Germans on behalf of the German General Staff for a democratic revolution comparable to our own Revolution of 1776.

It is fortunate for the cause of democracy that the Allies were able to secure German documentation which exposes the real motives behind the Nazi grab of the Sudetenland. This documentation is available to the public and much of it will be found in the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials documents, excerpts of which we quote below:

The Record

On November 5, 1937, Hitler delivered a lecture to his leading generals and political henchmen. The notes of this super-secret conference reveal Hitler's strategy and ultimate aims. They were faithfully recorded by Oberst Hossbach. The Führer outlined his plans for the seizure of all Europe. According to the Nuremberg documents the implementation of this program would "shorten Germany's frontiers . . . increase its industrial and food reserves . . . and . . . place it in a position both industrially and strategically, from which the Nazis could launch a more ambitious and more devastating campaign of aggression" (Vol. I, p. 515). Toward accomplishing this objective, the subjugation of Czechoslovakia was a "must."

Generals Keitel and Jodl (both hanged at Nuremberg for war crimes) initialed a memorandum dated June 18, 1938, wherein it was stated that in fighting a war against the West it was necessary to start "with the destruction of Czechoslovakia" (Vol. III, p. 326). On November 23, 1939, Hitler told his supreme military commanders that the conquering of Austria was a precondition for the seizure of Czechoslovakia and then Poland. Hitler declared that the successful accomplishment of this strategy would enable the Germans to concentrate their full might on the western front. "For the first time," the Führer boasted, "in 67 years, it must be made clear that we do not have a two front war to wage." He was confident that his recent pact with Russia would simplify Germany's military problems. Of course, the Germans eventually would attend to the Russians but, he said, "we can oppose Russia only when we are free in the West" (Vol. III, pp. 573, 575).

The direction of Hitler's main blow following the defeat of Czechoslovakia and Poland was described by Fritz Wiedemann, Hitler's Adjutant, in a sworn affidavit at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. Wiedemann described a conference between Hitler and the German General Staff on May 28, 1938. Hitler stated, "It is my unshakable will that Czechoslovakia will be wiped off the map . . ." He declared that the Germans would "first tackle the situation in the East, then I will give you 3-4 years time and then we will settle the situation in the West." Wiedemann admitted in his affidavit that the so-called situation in the West "was meant to be the war against England and France" (Vol. I, p. 521).

Czechoslovakia including the Sudeten territory were regarded as having enormous economic and strategic value. The top secret minutes of a conference with Goering in the Air Ministry, held on October 14, 1938—just two weeks after the occupation of the Sudetenland—reported: "The Sudetenland has to be exploited with all the means. General Field Marshal Goering counts upon a complete industrial assimilation of Slovakia. Czechia and Slovakia would become German dominions. Everything possible must be taken out. The Oder-Danube Canal has to be speeded up. Searches for oil and ore have to be conducted in Slovakia, notably by State Secretary Keppler" (Vol. I, p. 580).

"After we get married, mother could come to live with us"

The minutes of another top secret meeting between Goering and leaders of the German High Command (7-27-39) read as follows: "In a rather long statement the Field Marshal explained that the incorporation of Bohemia and Moravia into the German economy had taken place, among other reasons, to increase the German war potential by exploitation of the industry there . . ." (Vol. I, p. 581).

Strategic Real Estate

As will be noted, these top secret meetings do not reveal any concern for the "oppressed" Sudetens. Indeed, like the rest of Czechoslovakia, the Sudetenland was regarded as an important piece of real estate from the point of view of increasing Germany's war potential. The leaders of the Sudeten Germans were aware of their real job. This was admitted by Konrad Henlein, the Nazi chieftain in the Sudetenland. For years the Henlein organization had operated as an agent of the German Government. When the Nazis came to power in Germany, they took over the control of Henlein's party in Czechoslovakia. A secret memorandum from the files of the German Foreign Office dated Berlin, August 19, 1938, discussed the subsidies granted to the Sudeten German party by the German Foreign Office "regularly since 1935 . . ." (Vol. I, p. 549). The Sudeten Germans under Henlein's guidance, pretended that they were free from foreign dictation, but Henlein dispensed with those pretenses in a speech in Vienna, March 4, 1941, in which he said: "In order to protect ourselves against Czech interference, we were compelled to lie and to deny our allegiance to the National Socialist cause. We should have preferred advocating National Socialism openly. However, it is doubtful whether in doing so, we would have been able to perform the task of destroying Czechoslovakia" (Vol. III, p. 659).

The task of the Sudetens was to undermine the democratic system of Cechoslovakia through propaganda, murder, terrorism, espionage and anti-Semitism. In this connection, Jan Papanek, a former Czech diplomat and staunch anti-Communist, quoted Herr Henlein as follows: "In the course of a few years the Sudeten Germans have succeeded in endangering the inner stability of Czechoslovakia so fundamentally and causing such confusion in internal affairs that she was ripe for liquidation. All this was only possible because all the Sudeten Germans had become National Socialists . . . In spite of all that we, the Sudeten Germans, have accomplished by our own efforts we could never have achieved our aim without the intervention of the Fuehrer. His ideas inspired us, his strength held us up, his Germany gave us faith in victory. May history some day pronounce her verdict. The Sudeten Germans have faithfully and willingly done their duty" (Letters to the New York Times, 12-22-45).

It has been said that not all of the Sudeten Germans were willing tools and agents of the Nazi government. This may be true but the overwhelming majority were either actively involved or gave tacit consent to the Nazi plan for the destruction of the democratic institutions of Czechoslovakia. As early as 1935, 65 per cent of the Sudeten Germans had voted for the Nazis although at that time they knew full well what Hitler aimed to do. No one can truthfully state that the Sudeten Germans were compelled to vote that way. Of course, when Hitler's triumph was imminent in 1938, the Sudeten vote for the Henlein party rose to 92 per cent.

Those who allege that Hitler was only interested in saving the "oppressed" Germans in Czechoslovakia ignore Hitler's own statements and program. On March 15, 1939, Hitler admitted that it was his intention "to incorporate Czechoslovakia into the German Reich" (Vol. I, p. 574). To justify this act Hitler signed a declaration on March 16, 1939, alleging that "the Bohemian-Moravian countries belonged for a millenium to the living space of the German people" (Vol. I, p. 577).

The Munich agreement was not regarded by Hitler as the final act in the liberation of his "oppressed" Sudetens. On the contrary, Hitler viewed the cession of the Sudetenland as but the prelude "for the liquidation of the remainder of Czechoslovakia" (Vol. I, p. 560).

A Stepping Stone

Czechoslovakia was a stepping stone on Hitler's road to the conquest of Poland and points West. Munich confirmed Hitler's belief that the West was hopelessly decadent. "Our enemies are little worms," he confided to the German General Staff, "I saw them in Munich (Vol. III, p. 585).

We can go on citing German documents attesting to the fact that the Sudeten question had been deliberately cooked up by the Germans to camouflage their plans for the conquest of Europe. These documents are available to all Americans who want the truth. Needless to say, the propaganda of the Sudeten Germans today does not merely try to rewrite history, it hopes to suppress it.

Attacking the Democratic Cause

There is still another aspect to the current Sudeten movement which bears watching. It is the attitude of the Sudetens to non-German democrats. Currently, the Sudetens are attacking democratic exile groups of the eastern European countries. Their reason is partially obscure but essentially it stems from the fact that the Sudetens oppose any solution in eastern Europe except one that would guarantee Germany's hegemony. It is for this reason that the Sudeten propaganda machine has launched a violent campaign against Radio Free Europe. Their leader von Auen charges that Radio Free Europe is "non-constructive and nurtured on completely obsolete ideas." What bothers the Sudeten Germans is simply that Radio Free Europe refuses to propagate Pan-Germanism and insists on encouraging those forces that would bring about an independent democratic Czechoslovakia. Time and again the Sudetens returned to the theme that Radio Free Europe and the democratic exile groups supporting it, are "tools of the Communists."

It is significant that leading circles in the Bonn Government including Chancellor Adenauer are trying to liquidate Radio Free Europe. In this connection. West German authorities recently halted the sending of balloons with Bible tracts over the iron curtain countries. This program, according to the U. S. church group which sponsors it, was halted by German authorities on the grounds that the U. S. had secretly made an agreement in Geneva (July 1955) to ban this project. The State Department has denied the existence of any such agreement.

It is also a well known fact that the commissars of the Kremlin have bitterly tacked Radio Free Europe and the baloon sending program. Soviet Foreign inister Molotov told Adenauer to corect this intolerable situation when the hancellor visited Moscow. David Nichol, orrespondent for the St. Louis Post Disatch, reported on September 14, 1955, at there are Germans who "would welome the Soviet complaint for halting e crusade for freedom's balloon launchg." He continued, "these and the broadasts of Radio Free Europe to the satellite eoples, Germans say, unnecessarily comlicate their future relationship with their entral European neighbors." The Gerans are aware that headlong opposition o this program would create suspicions. Hence, they revert to their familiar tactic f smearing Radio Free Europe as "Comunist infiltrated" in order to make their opposition more acceptable in the eyes of Americans.

Counterfeit

The fight against Radio Free Europe is not the first time that Moscow and Bonn have seen eye to eye. Yet, the Sudeten Germans continue to publicize themselves as the most zealous anti-Bolshevist crusaders. The fact is that their anti-Bolshevism is counterfeit. It is a cover-up for their Pan-German activities which are not directed solely against the East by any means. Indeed, it would appear from the lessons of recent history that the Pan-German drive may find a more attractive outlet in the West.

The frightening part of this situation is the silence of the Western Allies. Surely, they cannot believe that the Sudeten Germans represent democracy's hope in Europe. Surely, they cannot believe that by remaining silent they are discouraging the growth of Pan-Germanism. On the contrary, failure to act and to condemn these sinister elements opens the flood gates to those forces which hope to realize the dreams of Bismarck, the Kaiser and Hitler.

Let our statesmen ponder the words of a leading member of Chancellor Adenauer's Cabinet, Jacob Kaiser, the German Minister for Unification: "No real Europe can be formed until the German bloc is reconstituted. I remind you that this bloc includes, in addition to Germany, Austria, a part of Switzerland, the Saar of course, and Alsace-Lorraine. When I think of the Strasbourg Cathedral, my heart hurts."

"If the West Germans could keep the Western Powers bound to strict support of their maximum demands — reunification only with the right for all Germany to enter Nato and no recognition of two German States, failing reunification—they could make any agreement between the West and Moscow and Germany impossible, and keep the gulf between the great Poweres open. If, at the same time, they have their own wire to Moscow, they could hope, at a suitable opportunity, to make their own deal with Moscow at the expense of the West.

"Does the new Soviet-East German Treaty exclude such a deal? One wonders . . ."

(The New Statesman and Nation, 10-1-55)

". . . While they will not express it publicly, since publicly they are committed to reunification, there are many British who take an extremely dim view of the prospect for Germany. One is told in London that American policy has been naive to the point of folly in pushing German recovery so fast and in giving the Germans everything they wanted, and then something more. Seen from this dour perspective, Adenauer is scarcely more than a front man for a group of clever schemers prepared to sell to the highest bidder. If the price is right, Adenauer will make a deal when he goes to Moscow in September and leave the West, and particularly America holding a very empty bag . . ."

Middle East Caldron

By JAMES H. SHELDON

The Middle East is a place where troubles start. It has been such a place ever since dim ages before the Trojan War —because the area lies at the strategic crossroads between Europe, Asia and Africa.

For the same reason that Caesar and Napoleon campaigned around the Nile, so did the Kaiser and his henchmen talk about the "Drive to the East" and concentrate their energies on such projects as the Berlin-to-Baghdad Railroad.

Germany's old-line geo-politicians, and likewise the Nazis of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich, gave top priority to building up their influence in the Middle East—and German industrialists and diplomats of today follow the same line, albeit with different labels attached.

The United States has long been at pains to develop a policy which would achieve the near-impossible objective of reconciling opposing forces there—and when the Russians needed a new political line this year, they found the opportunity ready-made in their offer of arms to Egypt and other Arab states.

One important reason for continued tension in the Middle East can be found in the entrenched position which the Nazi regime so vigorously built for itself there—a position which has been given continued support by post-war German developments.

Back in 1945-6 an entire group of some 17 Nazi army and S. S. (Himmler's dreaded Elite Guard) men were smuggled out of Germany, in spite of the Allied occupation, into Egypt. False passports and like subterfuges were involved. Included were two top men from "Milamt Six" (the secret intelligence section of the S. S., which had been organized by Walter Schellenberg under the direction of the notorious Ernst Kaltenbrunner).

Others were former high ranking experts from the Abwehr (German Army Counter-Intelligence) department formerly under Lt. Gen. Erwin Lahousen. (This was the Abwehr section concerned with "foreign countries, penetration and sabotage"). Still others came from the S. D. (a Gestapo intelligence group operating within the S. S. Corps) and at least two of these early migrants to Egypt had served with the notorious Einsatzkommandos ("Special Service Detachments") —the S. S. extermination units operating in Eastern Europe.

This group of Nazi experts soon became accepted as an all-powerful cadre in Egypt, and proceeded to organize the intelligence and policy-forming units of the Egyptian Army. Every man in this set-up was at the time on the "wanted" list of the Allied commanders, and subject to automatic arrest, had he been caught within the territory of occupied Germany.

Later, they were joined by a considerable body of military experts and seasoned "top sergeants" who had survived the collapse of the Hitler regime. Among these were Lt. Gen. Wilhelm Fahrmbacher, a corps commander in the Nazi Army who had been held for a time by the French as a war criminal, but was released and soon became Gen. Naguib's leading military advisor. Fahrmbacher took along as his deputy Major Gen. Oscar Munzel, well-known in officer circles of the Third Reich, and they were later joined by Gerhard Mertins, who assumed the duty of educating the Egyptians in the techniques of parachute jumping and air attack.

Not long afterward, these military specialists were followed by Dr. Albert Degener—well known to New Yorkers as the pre-war Director of the German-American Board of Trade, one of the most prolific sources of pro-Nazi agitation in America before his presence was officially labeled undesirable by the State Department. Herr Degener's function in Egypt was the same as that which he had once performed in New York: to organize a German-Egyptian Chamber of Commerce.

The extent of his support at home can be gleaned from the frequency with which the German weekly news magazines feature articles on German-Egyptian trade developments.

The extent of this German penetration into Egyptian affairs has since grown alarmingly. As John Gunther puts it in his highly respected book, INSIDE AFRICA, "Bonn is acutely interested in Cairo and vice versa. About 600 German technicians are employed by the Egyptian Government working on several levels—military, engineering, railroads and the like. 'Nasser could never have made his coup without his German advisors,' I heard it said. Probably this is an overstatement but German technical skill has been helpful to the Junta in several conspicuous areas."

As Gunther also points out, a German naval specialist is reported at work on Egyptian naval affairs and a German tank officer is engaged in mechanizing the armed forces. 300 German firms were represented at a recent trade fair in Cairo and a flourishing German-language newspaper has developed in that city. Meanwhile, German universities have set up special arrangements to facilitate the exchange of students from the Middle East.

On October 26, 1955, the West German news magazine, DER SPIEGEL, carried a story about the role which a former economic assistant of Hitler played in the arms deal between Egypt and the Communist bloc.

This former Nazi, Dr. Wilhelm Voss, once held a leading position in Hitler's war economy as president of the Skoda Works, a huge armament combine taken over by the Germans after they grabbed Czechoslovakia in 1939.

Evidently, this former Nazi was coached for his role in Egypt by the Bonn Government. DER SPIEGEL reports:

"Dr. Wilhelm Voss, once a prominent leader in the war economy of the Third Reich, started his career in Egypt with the urgent recommendation of the German Federal Government in February 1951. He was appointed in Cairo by General Naguib as head of the Central Planning Board and as such was the chief advisor to the War Ministry in Egypt. Under his command were employed more than 50 German military and armament experts."

The importance of Dr. Voss' role in Egypt is underscored by the fact that the relation of this former Nazi to the Bonn Foreign Office and other Bonn agencies was so intimate and ective that in 1954 the German Ambassador in Cairo, Dr. ınther Pawelke, also a former Nazi, resigned from his post protest.

According to DER SPIEGEL, Dr. Voss kept intimate con- ts not only with Adenauer's chief diplomatic aides, Dr. ankenhorn and Professor Hallstein, but also with the highest icers in the Blank office, the Bonn War Ministry. These lations were evidently a constant irritation to Ambassador .welke, because they meant that certain high circles in the ɔnn Government were closer to the Egyptian advisor, Dr. ɔss, than to the official Bonn advisor in Cairo.

The report in DER SPIEGEL also reveals the background the recent arms deal between Egypt and Czechoslovakia. ccording to this account, the former Nazi and ex-president the Skoda Works, Dr. Voss, "initiated the big armament al with the Czechoslovak agents Prantel, Nobinec and ostrum, who operated under the facade of being refugees it who in reality are Communist agents."

The foregoing report sheds considerable light on the or- nizers and secret wire-pullers of the present unrest in the ear and Middle East.

Again, as once under Hitler, the German industrialists and ilitarists proceed with their conspiracies according to a ell-known pattern. They sow unrest where it is to Germany's lvantage to fish in troubled waters. DER SPIEGEL is not very far from the truth when it comments that "Adenauer's leading diplomats have laid themselves open to the charge that they must share to a considerable extent in the tactical victory gained by Bolsheviks in the Near and Middle East."

ROBBING SMITH FOR SCHMIDT

"Congress now has before it several proposals the effect of which would be to shift from the shoulders of German taxpayers to the shoulders of American taxpayers the burden of compensating Germans for their assets seized in the United States during the war. From the German point of view, this would obviously be an admirable shift. From the American point of view, it seems to us to be neither sensible nor just. It would rob Mr. Smith to pay Mr. Schmidt.

"The most offensive of these giveaways, sponsored by Senator Dirksen, would turn back all the German assets seized here, including those belonging to giant corporations and international cartels; the value of these has increased since the war to an estimated $450 million. The least offensive of the giveaway schemes, supported by the State Department and the Justice Department, would compensate only the individual owners of vested property —and these only up to $10,000 each. The principal argument for the partial giveaway seems to be that it will avert the total giveaway desired by Senator Dirksen. We think there is no warrant whatever for either . . .

"The assets in question were private in appearance much more than in fact. They were rigidly controlled by the Nazi government and used by that government for the advancement of German objectives . . ."

(Editorial, The Washington Post, 7-15-55)

German penetration in the Near East is by no means confined to Egypt. The former Wehrmacht Major Gunther Elmar von Hardenberg has long made his headquarters at Beirut in Syria where he heads an "open" organization known as the Association for Christian War Refugees and a secret group called the German Aid Committee for the Near East. When John Roy Carlson visited Beirut in 1950, von Hardenberg said to him: "Whenever a new German comes to Beirut I screen him personally, then register him with the Beirut police as a friend of the Arab cause." "There are already many Germans working with the Syrians as trainers and technicians," von Hardenberg added.

In Damascus, an Arabic group which Hitler youth leader Baldur von Schirach had helped form, was still operating, and was the source of "Boycott U. S. A." posters appearing in Arab shops.

In the same region, Dashnag leaders (the Dashnags were an Armenian Fascist movement allied with the Axis) also continue to exert great influence, moving under the old misleading cry that they are "fighting Communism," while in reality they are bending their primary efforts against the Western cause in the Middle East.

The infiltration of Syria has been repeatedly described by foreign correspondents. The Syrian Government early called in a German military mission, after it was defeated by the Israeli armies. NEWSWEEK reported that "the first to appear in Damascus was a former Gestapo Colonel named Rapp. He revamped Syrian Military Intelligence and is credited with a leading role in Syria's first military coup, when a group of army officers under Colonel Husni Zayim took over the government." Later, a once high-ranking intelligence officer in Hitler's army, General Stutterheim, was installed in ". . . Right after the Geneva conference ended, Adenauer, from his own summit, told how grateful he was that the Western powers honored their obligations to West Germany during the talks.

"Use of the term, 'obligations,' is an interesting one. Perhaps it was a slip of the tongue, a subconscious reference. But it stands as the overall concept of the Federal Republic's attitude towards the Western powers.

"We are under obligation, the thinking goes, to advance the cause of West Germany above and beyond all other measures of European policy. If we don't, the corollary follows, there may be other roads to which West Germany can turn. Draw your own conclusions. After all, Adenauer goes to Khrushchev and the rest of Soviet collective leadership.

"The curious aspect of 'obligation' does not seem to infer on the West German side any substantive obligation to us . . ."

(Seymour Freidin, N. Y. Post, 8-2-55)

a top Syrian army post, assisted by another influential ex-German, Colonel Kriebel.

An important article ("Berlin-Baghdad" Again) appearing in the January, 1953, issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, gives many further details on this phase of German Middle-East penetration.

At the other end of the Mediterranean, a similar situation continues. The leading Hamburg independent daily, DIE WELT, on October 26, 1955, printed a dispatch concerning preparations for the inauguration of a monument at Tobruk, in Libya, commemorating the dead of Hitler's Africa Corps. Said this report: "The West German Government will be represented by the German charge d'affaires in Tripoli . . . The association of the members of the former German Africa Corps have announced group trips for this occasion and have chartered a steamship and special planes."

From another source comes a report that when former members of the Africa Corps met in Heidelberg, with the widow of former Field Marshal Rommel as guest of honor, she was greeted by the old Nazi marching song, "Panzer Rollen in Afrika." (Tanks Rolling in Africa.)

Reciprocating such interests, Arab tobacco companies have been taking full-page advertisements in German news magazines, featuring the portrait of a desert chieftain with rifle in hand, a replica of a cigarette package and the caption: "A Testimony of Friendship."

Most of the German press has been discreetly silent concerning these affairs—but in Italy the journalistic organs of the M. S. I. (a powerful neo-fascist movement advocating return to the corporate-state ideal of Mussolini) have had no such inhibitions and some of their comments—even after making allowance for the source—are of striking significance.

On September 6, 1955, IL SECOLO D'ITALIA (a strong supporter of M. S. I.) carried an elaborate illustrated account of the reception in its office of eight editors of the Egyptian newspaper chain Dar El Goumhourya (publishers of 7 newspapers in Arabic, French and English). The article, adorned with a 4-column photograph of the visiting editors, declares that "Our Egyptian colleagues found in the editorial rooms of IL SECOLO the climate of opinion closest to their views." An adjoining headline declaimed: "Israel Has Violated the Truce with Egypt."

The director of IL SECOLO has just published a book lauding Mussolini.

On July 17, 1955, ASSO DI BASTONI (the recognized voice of the M. S. I. movement) published a long article lauding the Middle East exploits of the Krupp dynasty, with especial praise for Alfred Krupp, the man who served a war criminal's sentence after trial at Nuremberg.

"Alfred Krupp is today the sparkplug of the fantastic German renaissance. He is in close touch with the surviving leaders of the Reich and has placed his agents in all parts of the globe," the article begins. There follows an outline of Krupp's friendship with "heads of government" in the Middle East and elsewhere, and the comment that "the influence of Krupp is particularly important in Pakistan in view of the existence of a group of intelligent Pakistani who were formerly members of the Wehrmacht."

"The gigantic power of revived German industry," adds ASSO DI BASTONI, "extends over the whole world." "Krupp has defeated all the other corporations and is constructing on the Bosphorus a 1600 meter bridge. He has concluded advantageous contracts," the article continues, "with Syria and with the National Government of Egypt."

"The Germans achieved a decisive victory in Saudi-Arabia," says the same article, "when German electric firms obtained contracts for the construction of modern power plants, and in Egypt when the German-Egyptian Chamber of Commerce secured a concession under which German engineers will supervise the tremendous Nile dam project."

"Following up the fine work of Krupp and other perseverant German industrialists," says ASSO, "the influence and prestige of Germany is enormous throughout the Arab world where Otto Skorzeny and other ex-officials of the S. S. supervise the instruction and education of armies and Dr. Hjalmar Schacht is financial advisor." In Iran, Gen. Zahedi (arrested by the English as a collaborationist in 1941) is praised as a factor of great power, and it is pointed out that the mother of "beautiful Soraya" (wife of the Shah) was German. Then continue details of German political and economic penetration in Iran, the Sudan, Lebanon, etc.

"Everywhere the men of Krupp are present and active," says ASSO DI BASTONI, and adds that thanks to this, Egypt today benefits from a German advance of 8,750,000,000 lira. "These colossal figures" of indebtedness are to be "settled" by supplies of raw materials," adds this article.

In short, behind the scenes in the Middle East are to be found everywhere the pervasive tentacles of old-line German influence, bolstered up (whether for political or economic reasons does not matter) by the modernized industrialism typified by Krupp, and strengthened by the continual comings and goings of powerful figures such as the "financial wizard" Dr. Hjalmar Schacht.

Underlying all this, are numerous indigenous forces for violence, typified by the hot-heads of the green-shirted Young Moslem League and the fanatic Fadayan Islam (Crusaders of Islam), one of whose agents last week nearly succeeded in an attempt to assassinate Premier Hassein Ala of Iran. Another agent of the same terrorist body was more successful four years ago, when he destroyed the life of Premier Ali Razmara, one of Iran's ablest post-war leaders.

When the United Nations voted the partition of Palestine to establish the new State of Israel, it was hoped that an element of Western democratic stability might be injected into this swirling conflict of forces. Failure of the great powers to pursue a firm course in support of the newly established state, however, left the way open for a kind of "simmering war" to continue, under conditions which could boil up into a world-wide conflict without warning.

The exodus to the Middle East of so many important military and economic figures from the Third Reich, added to Arab intransigence and extremism, has contributed much to prevent the effective exercise of influence by the Western Allies in efforts to bring about peaceful settlements.

As a result, we find Premier Nasser of Egypt declaring that "Israel is an artificial state which must disappear" (May 28, 1954, as quoted in the Greek newspaper KATHERIENI); and not long ago, the NEW YORK TIMES quoted King Saud of Saudi-Arabia as declaring: "Israel is like a cancer to the human body and the only way of remedy is to uproot it."

So violently anti-Jewish have been some of the speeches made in the U. S. by the Syrian Ambassador, Farid Zeineddine, that responsible organizations have been led to ask for his recall. Scarcely less inflammatory have been speeches by Mohammed Jamali, chairman of the Iraqi delegation to the U. N. The friendly State of Israel thus finds itself being denounced on American platforms as a "bastard State," and loyal United States citizens of Jewish persuasion find themselves being falsely accused of "dual loyalty," in terms reminiscent of pre-war Nazi propaganda.

"Whoever thinks of making peace with the enemy (Israel) signs the death warrant of all the Arab nations," Jamali once said. And a Syrian President, General Shisekly, was quoted in Cairo papers to effect that "The Middle East is not large enough for both Jews and Arabs." (What the Arabs intend to do with their vast empty spaces, and their millions of oil dollars, he didn't add.) Mohammed Naguib himself said not so long ago: "The only solution is Israel's disappearance."

An important background factor in building up this Arab intransigence has been the influence of the former Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini.

The Grand Mufti was one of Hitler's major henchmen —and was a principal influence in determining the policy of Jewish extermination which Hitler pursued, and especially in making that policy the unbelievably inhuman thing it was in the Balkans and Middle East. The Grand Mufti attempted to organize a Moslem revolt against the British in Iraq at the very outset of the war, and when defeated, was brought to continental Europe by Hitler, where at various places he organized a school for the training of Moslem infiltrators indoctrinated to spread Nazi ideologies; helped to set up the blood-thirsty Moslem Legions in Yugoslavia; and finally, just as the War was coming to an end, directed the "Gross-Mufti Bureau" not far from Hitler's headquarters, from which he was engaged (along with Goebbels, Goering, Vidkun Quisling and the Nazi puppet of Iraq) in organizing a "World Conference on the Jewish Problem." The plans for this "conference" collapsed only because the Allied Armies got to Berlin before Al-Husseini and his cohorts could get their delegates there.

The S. S. Hauptsturmfuerer Dieter von Wisliczeny later declared in a War Crimes Affidavit based on his intimate knowledge of internal Nazi affairs that the Grand Mufti played "an important role" in constantly "inciting" the Nazi powers to more violent measures in their policy of Jewish extermination, particularly in Southeastern Europe.

A study of material emanating from behind Arab boundaries today indicates that much of the basic propaganda line of the anti-Jewish agitation now being pursued by Arab League states has come down unchanged from the days of the Grand Mufti's evil liaison with Hitler.

For example, Antoine Albina, a leading tourist agent (of Syrian extraction) with headquarters in Arab Jerusalem, is currently engaged in bombarding his countrymen—as well as visitors to that part of the world—with multilingual propaganda bearing the imprint of the "World Truth League." The name, significantly enough, is a rough translation of the "Fichte-Bund" once masterminded by Dr. Goebbels.

We need not quote examples of Albina's output at length. It is sufficient to say that Mr. Gerald L. K. Smith, the most notorious of our domestic hate mongers, finds Albina's publications sufficiently inflammatory to be worthy of reprinting in his anti-Jewish monthly, THE CROSS AND THE FLAG —and like-minded hate mongers in England, and even in far-away South Africa, also find Albina's material useful in fanning the flames of bias and bigotry, in those areas.

This exchange of hate propaganda also works in the other direction. We pause to cite but one instance. When an American West Coast agitator named Frank Britton (who a few years ago tried to stir up a boycott against Jewish-owned businesses in Los Angeles) got out a 102-page book misleadingly entitled BEHIND COMMUNISM a prominent Arabic press agency, with offices in Cairo, Baghdad and Beirut, promptly re-issued it in an Arabic version and started circulating it all over the Middle East. Britton's opus, needless to say, had little or nothing to do with the real facts about Communism, but was merely a book-length diatribe against Jews and Judaism, elaborating upon the old canard that "Judaism and Communism are irretrievably bound together."

A dozen pages could be devoted to further examples of the same type of agitation, designed to incite even the most lethargic to violence and guaranteed to help forestall all efforts at peaceful settlements. As a Minister in one Arab cabinet put it the other day: "No member of my government would even dare to talk about peace with Israel."

Of course, the problem of the refugees is being exploited to the utmost by the Arab governments, so that the refugees have become as much a political tool as a relief problem. Relocation funds made available through U. N. agencies have been in large part rejected by the Arab States, who obviously would prefer to keep the refugees confined to their camps, and use them for purposes of political exploitation.

So obvious is this purpose, that Egypt and other Arab countries have actually been collecting customs duties on shipments of relief materials intended for the help of the "refugee victims." A casual inspection of the lurid propaganda leaflets issued by the Arabs in this connection confirms the same conclusion.

So arrogant has this attitude become that the highly responsible Reuters Agency reported on December 1, 1955, that the seven Arab League countries have actually issued a circular addressed to Dutch firms trading in the Middle East, demanding detailed information on their business with Israel and their employment of Jews in their home cities. This astounding circular originated with the "Economical Siege on Israel Office" in Damascus. "The Arab countries," said the circular, "are in a state of war with Israel and for this reason are making an economic siege of that country."

Meanwhile, the East-West controversy added fuel to the fire.

Soviet policy, which has on repeated occasions included the persecution of Jews and Zionists (a fact which makes propaganda like the Britton book mentioned above appear particularly ridiculous to the thoughtful reader), now seems to have entered a pro-Arab phase. According to the current Communist line, as reflected in the New York DAILY WORKER (Nov. 16, 1955), Israel is now regarded as "a province in Wall Street's Middle Eastern economic empire." Where this sort of thing may lead to, when coupled with an alarming increase of indigenous anti-Americanism in cities like Cairo, is anybody's guess.

Granting that the Americans, British and French would like to see the Arabs accede to a permanent and peaceful settlement recognizing the just claims of Israel, the Soviets have been playing whichever side of the fence suited their position at a particular time. Currently they seem to have set out to help arm the 45 million Moslems. Should this policy be long continued, the results could be frightening indeed. Add a supply of Russian rifles and jet planes to inflammatory propaganda of the sort outlined above, mix in the aggressive intentions of the Arabs, and you have the makings of a conflagration that could very readily lead to World War III.

A STAIN ON JUSTICE

"The Brooklyn Veterans of Foreign Wars today demanded that Edwin August Plitt be removed as the U. S. member of the International War Crimes Review Board because he voted to release Nazi war criminal Sepp Dietrich.

"Dietrich, convicted of the Malmedy Forest murder of American war prisoners during World War II, was released from prison . . .

"Robert F. Bonagura, Kings County VFW commander, said 'every American should be up in arms' . . ."

(The N. Y. Post, 12-1-55)

Note:
A letter on this subject was sent by the Society to leading newspapers. We reprint below the text as it appeared in the St. Louis Post Dispatch, 11-10-55:

The recent release from a United States prison of the German war criminal, Sepp Dierich, one of Hitler's most trusted SS generals, is shocking news. Dietrich was sentenced to life imprisonment because of his over-all responsibility in the cold-blooded murder of American G. I.s taken prisoner during the Battle of the Bulge.

Altogether between 600 and 700 G. I.s and Belgian civilians were slain in a series of acts of terrorism that came to be known as the Malmedy Massacre.

Dietrich's bloodthirstiness was known throughout Europe. It is difficult to see how the release of this killer will strengthen the United States' efforts to restore respect for law and decency in human affairs. The release of Dietrich has outraged European public opinion and will certainly create a fertile field for all sorts of anti-American propaganda.

In the last analysis, the freeing of Dietrich can only damage America's moral prestige, a factor so frequently mentioned by Secretary Dulles as essential to the successful conduct of our foreign relations.

The Allied officials who recommended the release of Dietrich have grossly misrepresented the views of the American people. They have not kept faith with the millions of American G. I.s, living or dead, who fought the Nazis in defense of American freedom.

President Eisenhower should dismiss these individuals from Government service because they have shown themselves unfit to uphold the sense of justice of the American people.

Fabulous Krupp

Krupp, the name which made all Europe tremble during two world wars, Saturday night set people dancing at a fabulous ball.

Alfred Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, sole heir to Germany's greatest industrial empire, gave the ball for 640 guests at his home, the monumental Villa Huegel in Essen.

The party, described by the family as a "small affair," employed the services of small armies of waiters, scores of pretty "Krupp girls" in uniform, three orchestras, a fleet of limousines and a special train which brought 150 diplomats from Bonn.

The 48-year-old Krupp and his German wife Vera, a former film actress he married in 1952, received their guests in the immense paneled hall of the villa, hung with priceless Flemish tapestries.

Frau Krupp wore a cocktail-length brocade dress of many shades of brown, gray and green, heavily embroidered with sequins and brilliants. Diamond pendants the size of marbles adorned her ears.

The party, which broke up early just after midnight, was the first social appearance of the famous German munitions-maker since his release from Landsberg prison in Bavaria early in 1951. Then, he had served only three years of a 12-year sentence imposed by the allied war crimes tribunal at Nuremberg in 1948 for employing slave labor in his arms factories during the war.

Before the ball a party of diplomats was taken around some of the Krupp factories at Essen and Rheinhausen. The tour took in the Rheinhausen steel works, the 1,000,000,000-mark (about $232,400,000) plant which Krupp has promised the Allies to sell, with all his coal mines before 1958.

Others of the party came in a special first-class train from Bonn to the private Krupp statio nat Essen being plied liberally with champagne, cocktails, snacks and cigars on the way by "Krupp girls" from the magnate's guest establishment.

Each was also given a silver-plated lighter marked discreetly with three intertwining circles—the trade mark of the firm an ashtray and a bottle of brandy.

ALLIES?

"Upon the initiative of Master Sergeant Clipper, nine sergeants of the British Army decided to petition for their release from the service. The underlying reason for their request was rather unusual. They stated that they had no inclination for serving in an army which might some day find itself fighting shoulder to shoulder with Germans.

"When the regimental colonel requested them to withdraw their petition the master sergeant and his comrades replied that they had spent the last months of the war in Germany and that they could not agree to accept the Germans as allies'."

SCHOOL DAYS

"At the end of World War II most of the German schools abroad were closed down . . . However, during the last few years the number of German schools in foreign countries expanded considerably and they were able to consolidate their positions. Now, there are German schools again in almost all European countries with the exception of the Iron Curtain countries including China . . .

"If we look at the five continents, we can all be proud of (the existence of) approximately 300 German schools abroad . . ."

NAZI STATISTICS

"The Nazis killed a mere 365,000 Jews in Europe and not six million, it was claimed this week by the Wiesbaden neo-fascist monthly 'Die Europaeische Nationale' in an article bearing the title 'The Lie of the Six Million Killed Jews.'

"Edited and published by the notorious neo-nazi organizer Karl Hein Priester, the publication arrived at the 365,000 figure through a juggling of facts."

(WNS, 8-26-55)

> "That East Germany, too, is rearming is not at all discomfiting to the militarists of West Germany. In long-range terms, the more extensive the immediate rearming on both sides of the German dividing line, the more powerful will be the army that one day, they hope, will emerge from a united Germany. And in immediate terms, the Bonn militarists can count on increased help from Washington to counteract developments in Pankow. According to a Bonn spokesman, the Federal Republic's contribution to rearmament will not exceed nine billion marks. This is only a fraction of what the new Wehrmacht will cost. Bonn is relying on the American taxpayer to pay most of the rest."

"A Colony of Spiders"

Why have our policy makers consistently discouraged a thorough re-examination of US policy toward Germany? This question appears with increased frequency in letters addressed to the Society.

We can think of a number of explanations for this standpat attitude, but there is one which seems to stand out above the others. It reminds us of the two lads who were fighting each other furiously. One of the youngsters exhibited fancy footwork while the other boy moved only one foot—the other firmly fixed to the ground. As a result, the immobile boy was receiving a sound thrashing from his opponent who was able to move freely in all directions. A bystander called to the unfortunate youth, "Say, why don't you move your other foot?" The reply, in the midst of a shower of blows, was prompt: "I can't, my foot is on the quarter we are fighting for!"

Applied to the "high politics" of the German problem, it means that a flexible and fresh approach has been blocked by a "vested interest." The late Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, described it as a "colony of black-widow spiders" which "has been busily weaving webs intended to cost the United States and its allies the fruits of the crushing defeat of Germany. They would restore to those who made Hitler possible the industries of the Ruhr, without which he would not have ventured to commit his depredations against the democratic nations of Europe. Conspicuous among them are members of the Cabinet, congressmen, dipolmats and soldiers, as well as bankers and industrialists who have been commuting between Wall Street and Washington. In short, American military and civilian officials who are supposed to be solving problems in Germany, preparatory to the State Department assuming a jurisdiction and control that, so far, it has timorously evaded, have been rendering yeoman service to Wall Street financiers and German cartelists, preparatory to World War III" (The New Republic, 5-2-49).

Having served under two Presidents, Mr. Ickes was able to observe the maneuvers of this cabal at close hand. Other former government officials have confirmed his charges. For example, Josiah E. DuBois, Jr., former Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, and assigned to many important governmental tasks dealing with the postwar treatment of Germany, wrote: "As early as September 1944, while our GIs were still being killed by the Nazi war machine, there was circulated within the United States Government, at a high level, a memorandum contending, in effect, that as soon as the war was over we should rebuild German power as quickly as possible."

The hopes and plans of this "vested interest" were outlined by Mr. Allen Dulles at a meeting of the American Bankers Association in 1946: "For us it is essential to participate in a leading capacity in the rebuilding of German economy in order to stabilize the economic situation in the United States through control of the German economy and to assure American firms suitable profits."

Even before Mr. Dulles spoke, the "vested interest" had gained control of many strategic positions connected with the formulation and implementation of American policy in Germany. It was a "bipartisan" operation involving such prominent personalities as W. Averell Harriman of the banking firm Brown Brothers Harriman & Co.; James Forrestal and William Draper of the banking house of Dillon, Read and Co.; John J. McCloy, the present Chairman of the Board of the Chase Manhattan Bank; John Foster Dulles, then head of the law firm Sullivan & Cromwell; and former Secretary of the Army Kenneth Royall.

The "bipartisan" character of the operation was firmly sealed when Herbert Hoover was invited by President Truman to report his views on what America should do for Germany. The Hoover mission had the blessings of the "vested interest" which had close ties with Germany's cartel clique. In a sense Mr. Hoover's conclusions had been foreshadowed by Walter Rohland of the German steel trust when he wrote to one of his colleagues on June 15, 1945, that a "good bridge" had been formed with "mutual friends" in the US and in Britain.

Mr. Hoover's findings received strong support from W. Averell Harriman. In 1947, Mr. Harriman submitted a report to the President which had as one of its basic premises the idea that the recovery of Western Europe was dependent on the economic resurgence of Germany: "A rapid increase in the Ruhr's coal, steel, and machinery output would aid the reconstruction of industries in neighboring countries, and lower the general cost of the European recovery program more than any other factor." This passage from the report was quoted in a recent article by Dr. Friedrich Middelhauve, Minister of Economics and Transport for the German State of North Rhine Westphalia ("Commerce in Germany," 4-1-56). Dr. Middelhauve declares that the Harriman report "went far to relieve the hopelessness" of the Ruhr barons.

The spade work of the Hoovers and Harrimans paved the way for the billions of dollars poured into Germany. Propaganda-wise this was publicized as the sure road to the rehabilitation of Western Europe. In reality, it afforded Germany the opportunity to evade the consequences of her crimes and to regain a dominant position in Western Europe. The net result was to commit the American people to a program which was diametrically opposed to the principles for which the war was fought. Yet, the people were not consulted. They were confronted with a fait accompli, executed by a clique of non-elected officials who served the "vested interest." It was a profitable operation for the group described by Secretary Ickes and their cartel friends in Germany, but it tied American policy hand and foot. A gradual transformation occurred and more and more Germany's requirements conditioned Allied policy. The tail began to wag the dog.

The consequences are now apparent to all except to him whose "foot is on the quarter." Weighed down by the German albatross, we have lost the initiative in Europe. The great reservoir of friendship and good will which was ours at the end of the war, has been squandered. Step by step, our Germany policy has produced all of the elements preparatory to a rapproachment between Soviet Russia and the Germans. Truly we are on the "brink" and this has been admitted by outstanding experts on Russo-German relations. Thus, the noted British political commentator, Edward Crankshaw, discussing the dangers of a Russo-German deal, concludes: "While bearing in mind that it takes two to make a Russo-German pact, it is clear that the West will soon be compelled to reconsider its German policy in the light of hard facts" (London Observer, 5-6-56).

These "hard facts" have not budged our policy makers. They prefer the policy of inertia because it profits the "vested interest" even though it is undermining the US position in Europe.

That the United States possesses the brain power and imagination to develop policies which would be truly expressive of the National Interest is beyond doubt. What is necessary is to release that brain power and imagination from the bondage of the "colony of spiders" which has paralyzed our ability to cope with the German problem and the menacing spectre of a Soviet-German deal.

THE ADENAUER CULT

"West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer was effusively welcomed to Washington by John Foster Dulles.

"The Secretary of State headed the official welcoming delegation at the National Airport. He told Dr. Adenauer that there were some things he did that were more duty than joy, 'but to welcome you is unadulterated joy.'

" 'You bring a wisdom that comes from experience, and an idealism that partakes of youth,' he said. 'You are building a new Germany and a new Europe and what we hope will be a new world.' "

(N. Y. Times, 6-12-56)

". . . What can the United States do? The power to unify Germany rests exclusively in Soviet hands . . .

"So Dr. Adenauer's fear that there already exists a tacit settlement based on the division of Germany is to some extent justified by the situation itself . . .

"But the real answer to that question lies not in the United States but in West Germany. Insofar as it can, the United States will continue to work for German unity in freedom, and it would be a rash man who would say that can never come about. If the German people, however, refuse to be patient and insist instead on dangerous short-cuts, then there is no way to help them . . ."

POLITICAL CHAMELEONS

During the Bulganin-Khrushchev visit to Britain a little boy, aged 5, approached Bulganin and asked, "Are you Father Christmas?" Bulganin shook his head in the negative. Whether it was Bulganin's goatee which prompted the lad to put the question, is not of direct concern to us. Yet, with or without the beard, the team of Bulganin-Krushchev has given good cause for people to believe that Santa Claus may not be a myth, after all.

Wherever they go, B & K have only kind words and smiling faces. Regardless of the ulterior motives involved, the diplomacy seems to say "something for everyone." It is a lavish kind of gesture and seems to apply to all peoples—even those who in recent times were regarded as their mortal enemies.

Ten years ago leading Russian propagandists were denouncing the Germans in the most violent uncompromising language. Ilya Ehrenburg, one of their most prolific propagandists, wrote: "Some people think that beaten Germans are less harmful. They are mistaken. Germans remain true to themselves . . . The Germans have not changed much. It is senseless to hope to bring them to reason, to shame them, and then to reform them." On another occasion, Mr. Ehrenburg said: "That is the most terrible thing about the atrocities of the Germans: they slaughtered millions of fine people for nothing at all. And among the millions of Germans there was not to be found a handful of men of science to cry 'halt'."

The theme that the German people, as a whole, were responsible for Hitler's aggressions and the crimes resulting from them, was constantly emphasized by the Soviets. The well known writer and war correspondent Alexei Tolstoy declared: "We will never believe that Germany was deceived and fooled by a gang of Nazis; that she did not want it, poor thing, but was dragged into a predatory war." In less dramatic terms one of Russia's leading jurists, Prof. A. Trainin, wrote: "Who must shoulder the responsibility for war crimes? The answer is perfectly clear, the German State and the German people must certainly bear, and will bear the political and material consequences of Hitlerite aggression and the Hitlerite system of militarized banditry" (Information Bulletin of the Soviet Union, 6-30-45).

However, in this year of 1956, the "something for everyone" diplomacy has changed the Soviet tune. In the Soviet publication New Times (1-12-56) we read an account of a visit by Russian educators to the East zone of Germany. The writer of this piece describes in rapturous language what great "progress" has been achieved in "democratizing" German youth. He tells the story of a Western journalist asking some children at a school in Berlin if they did not want to take revenge on those who had defeated Germany. The children replied: "The war was not caused by the German people, it was launched and lost by the Nazis . . ." The writer confessed that this answer "deeply impressed" him. It left him with the conviction that democracy in Germany "is growing in strength and self-awareness." The writer did not bother to tell his readers that the children's reply is the favorite alibi of Germans, whether they be concealed Hitlerites or professed democrats. Why should this threadbare excuse carry more weight just because it is mouthed by those who are indoctrinated with Communist ideology? Ten years ago this reply would have been denounced by Soviet propagandists—today it is an indication that the so-called German Democratic Republic "is pulsating with life."

The cynicism displayed by Soviet leaders with regard to Germany's war crimes was illustrated last year when Adenauer paid homage to the Kremlin. In his very first public statement the Chancellor pleaded for the return of those Germans who were still in Russian prison camps. The press reported that Bulganin replied with great indignation that there were no longer any German prisoners of war in Russia; the only Germans held were war criminals. These criminals, Bulganin stated, "must be kept in confinement." They are people "who have lost all human vision. They are guilty of violence, arson, murder of women, children and old people." The Russian people, Bulganin shouted, will "never forget" the crimes perpetrated by these "murderers." A few months later, these very same "murderers" were on their way back to Germany. In December 1955 a contingent of these "murderers," returning from a Russian prison camp, raised their right hands and publicly swore "by our dead and the dead of the Soviet Union and by the children who will one day pass judgment on us, we swear that we have not murdered, that we have not raped, that we have not burned and we have not pillaged. If we brought misery and suffering to that land (the Soviet Union) we did so under the law of war and mindful of our soldier's oath" (N. Y. Times, 12-14-55). The Times reported that German officials were disturbed lest this public demonstration offend the Soviets. Actually, the Germans had no cause for fear because the "something for everyone" diplomacy is so generous in concept and execution that even the memories of the Russian war dead can be sacrificed, if necessary. The Germans as well as the Russians would call this Realpolitik.

The attitude toward the revival of German militarism is another example of the new diplomacy. Last year the satellite government in the Soviet zone announced a program for the reconstruction of Potsdam, the hallowed shrine of Prussian militarism. Communist spokesmen attributed the destruction of Potsdam "to unnecessary United States air raids" (N. Y. Times, 2-7-55). The East German government's newspaper, the Tägliche Rundschau, devoted a number of editorials which recalled the days when Prussia and Russia were friends. The Germans were reminded how Prussian generals, like Clausewitz, Scharnhorst and Yorck cooperated with Russian military leaders. The Times dispatch noted that the Russians and the German Communist regime hope to build up a firm alliance through the reawakening of the Prussian pro-Russian spirit. In this connection it is now reported that the East German regime intends to restore the State of Prussia which had been abolished at the end of World War II because it was deemed to be the sinister symbol of German militarism. The Communists hope that the revival of the State of Prussia will have a favorable propaganda effect "especially in rightist circles" in Western Germany (Bulletin on German Questions, 3-1-56).

Soviet publications are devoting a lot of space these days to the past "glories" of Russo-German friendship. The Soviet magazine "International Affairs" (August 1955) carried a detailed article extolling the virtues of Rapallo. Rapallo, of course, refers to the treaty between Russia and Germany in 1922 which formed the basis of close military, political and economic collaboration between the Soviet Government and the Weimar Republic. The German General Staff and leading industrialists gave this treaty special support. The writer of this article points out that by 1921 German political leaders began to veer toward friendship with Communist Russia. Thus, the signing of the Rapallo Treaty, according to this writer, "bore witness to the existence within Germany's ruling classes of forces with a realistic approach to the solution of foreign policy programs." He recalls how the Rapallo Treaty strengthened the ties between Germany and the Soviet Union. He quotes one German writer who alleged that it was through the aid of Soviet orders "that the German engineering and electrical industries were able to keep going during the crisis years of 1930-1933." The article constantly refers to the "imperialist" pressures of the Western powers against Germany which the Germans were able to offset, thanks to the Rapallo Treaty.

According to the writer in "International Affairs" it would appear that no matter how hard the Western powers tried to turn the Germans away from the Rapallo Treaty, "interest in the strengthening of relations with the USSR mounted . . . among Germany's ruling classes." He cannot conceal his pleasure over the former ties between the bigwigs in German industry and the Soviets. To underline his point he quotes a passage from the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung which, he tells the reader, was the "voice of the German monopolies." The Deutsche Allgemeine urged the Germans to maintain close cooperation with the USSR and oppose the attempts of the Western powers to "incite" Germany against Russia. In concluding this study, the writer refers to the famous statement by Stalin who said that the peoples of Germany and Russia have "the greatest potentialities in Europe for carrying out great acts of world importance."

The October 1955 issue of "International Affairs" carries a leading editorial entitled "The Soviet Union and Germany." Here again, many paragraphs are devoted to the "wonderful" future which lies ahead for friendship between Germany and Russia. "The Soviet Union and Germany," the editorial states, "are the biggest industrial countries in Europe with high economic potentials. It naturally follows that good relations between the German and Soviet peoples are the firm guaranty of universal peace in Europe and throughout the world."

In line with the theme that the German people were also victims of the Nazis, the editorial characterizes the Red Army as their "liberator." The editorial further states that the Soviet Union was always in favor of a strong Germany. The Soviet Government opposed those who spread "hatred" against the German people and in this connection the editorial roundly denounces Lord Vansittart, the English diplomat who warned the west of the German danger. Only the Soviet Union, the editorial tells us, fought against the dismemberment of Germany, and it is only the Soviet Union which can solve "the problem of finding markets for West German industrial products." This point, the editorial declares with

> ". . . Future German foreign-policy decisions will not depend on whether the Adenauer Cabinet remains in power or is replaced by a government based on the budding SPD-FDP alliance. Germany's course will hinge on the relative military and overall strength of the various powers and, to quite some extent, on the record of Soviet performance in the years to come . . ."

confidence, is bound to interest West German industrialists.

The February 1956 issue of "International Affairs" discusses the value of the Eastern markets for the industrial war lords of the Ruhr. The Industriekurier which, according to the Soviet publication, expresses the opinions of the big German industrials and exporters, is bitterly opposed to Allied trade policy vis-à-vis the Soviet bloc. The complaints of the Industriekurier are generally aired and the Soviet publication is happy to be able to report that German publications are also agitating for a "new approach." Summing up these developments, International Affairs dangles the bait: "West German business circles cannot help noticing that the G. D. R. (German Communist regime) is very successful in trade with the countries of the democratic camp, while the trade balance of the G. F. R. (German Federal Republic) clearly shows the disadvantages of the one-sided Bonn policy for the country's economy."

A rather clear cut example of the 180 degree switch in Soviet policy toward Germany may be seen in two articles written by a Russian professor A. Yerusalimsky. Writing in the New Times (9-19-53), the professor warned the peoples of Europe of the German danger. "Furthermore," he wrote, "history has shown that it is not Germany, but her neighbors that need guarantees of security, they having been the victims of German aggression twice in the course of a half century . . . It is upon Germany that the maintenance of peace in Europe mostly depends; for this she has only to renounce her suicidal policy of stirring up wars and armed conflicts." Writing for the New Times about two years later (1-26-56) Prof. Yerusalimsky weeps over the "hard" peace which the Allies planned for Germany. The professor cries that it was the Morgenthau Plan, "sponsored by influential American monopolists" which tried to destroy Germany, but thanks to the Soviet Union this insidious plot of American "imperialists" was unmasked and rendered harmless.

The new Russian propaganda line shows that nothing will be left to chance insofar as relations with Germany are concerned. The Soviets do not intend to be one inch behind the Western powers in the scramble for the hand of the former enemy. We can free a Sepp Dietrich; they too can release German war criminals. We can build up a German army led by former members of Hitler's General Staff; they are doing likewise. Indeed, there seems to be no end to this spectacle. In the process of bidding higher and higher, the moral principles for which millions gave their lives are cast into the shadows. The Bismarckian idea that moral principle is no substitute for brute force and political expediency, seems to have gripped the minds of many statesmen who, only a short while ago, exhorted their peoples to destroy every vestige of German militarism.

HITLER'S ECHO

A favorite "pastime" of the Nazis was the annual Nuremberg rally—scene of Hitler's hysterical harangues. With Teutonic fervor the cry for "blood" would echo through the ranks of the faithful as the Führer shook his fist at the world. It was a moment when the Nazi brass was able to whip up a frenzied hatred which spread fear and terror throughout Europe. Our thoughts return to that spectacle as we read about the annual celebrations of the German expellee groups. These rallies have provided the platform for those unregenerate elements who talk about Germany's "rights" in the same tones of terror as their Nazi forebears. It is also an occasion for the more respectable elements among the Germans to let their hair down, so to speak.

The most recent of these get-togethers was held in May of this year and the top leaders of the German Government participated enthusiastically. Chancellor Adenauer sent a message of greetings. He expressed the hope that the expellees would soon be able "to resume their historic task." Von Brentano, Bonn's Foreign Minister, declared that the Germans would never give up their "lost" territories. Theodor Oberlaender, Federal Minister for Refugees (a former Nazi), noted with great satisfaction that the agitation of the expellees was a great "service" to Europe. Even the leader of the Social Democrats, Erich Ollenhauer, put in his two cents by sending a message of greeting to the Sudeten Germans: He assured them that the Social-Democratic party would support their cause to the end. The Federal Minister for All German Affairs, Jacob Kaiser, promised the Sudetens that the German Government would never "abandon" their rights. Speaking about German "rights," it was the same Herr Kaiser who once said: "No real Europe can be formed until the German bloc is reconstituted. I remind you that this bloc includes, in addition to Germany, Austria, a part of Switzerland, the Saar of course, and Alsace-Lorraine. When I think of the Strasbourg Cathedral, my heart hurts."

"General von Manteuffel, former commander of German forces, present head of the Steel Helmets, is taking every precaution in the world to explain that he never, but never, was a Nazi. Notwithstanding, Hitler himself had given him the insignia of the National Socialist party. This was an unfortunate misunderstanding, explains the former war leader. 'I was invited by Hitler to assist in the distribution of decorations. At the end of the ceremony, Hitler handed me a little case. I believed it to contain a pair of cuff links. Later on I discovered that it was the party insignia. It was too late to refuse . . .'

"The honorable general made a slight mistake. He meant to say: 'It was too early to refuse' . . . He could not foresee how it would all end!"

(Liberation, Paris, 5-5-56)

The voice of Pan-Germanism with its chauvinistic sneers has not been stilled despite the Nazi defeat. Of course, the respectable leaders try to mislead world public opinion by pretending that the expulsion of the Germans from the Sudetenland and from other areas was merely the result of arbitrary decisions by the Allied powers. Apparently, they hope that memories are so short that we no longer recall the Fifth Column work of the Sudetens and other German minority groups which paved the way for Nazi conquests (see Prevent World War III, No. 47, "Pan-Germanism Rides Again," page 39).

In this connection, the same respectable Germans gloss over the fact that the leadership of these expellee groups is infested with pro-Nazi elements. For example, the leader of the Sudeten Germans, Lodgman von Auen, was a notorious Nazi collaborator and was arrested for war crimes. However, under mysterious circumstances he escaped punishment and now is a celebrated figure in Germany. Indeed, the President of the Bonn Government, Theodor Heuss, awarded von Auen the Great Service Cross of the Federal Republic on the occasion of his 75th birthday. It is interesting to recall that it was Herr Heuss who sent the infamous wire to the war criminal von Neurath, acclaiming his martyrdom, the same von Neurath who was found guilty in the persecution of the Czechs under Hitler. Thus, while the so-called respectable leaders, such as Heuss, pose as tried and true friends of democracy, they take advantage of every opportunity to give aid and comfort to the Pan-German ravings of the expellees.

The aims and objectives of the expellees may be couched in anti-Communist slogans, but behind this façade they strive tirelessly to carry out the dream of a Pan-German Europe. They pretend to be friends of the Western Allies but they smear Radio Free Europe; they pretend to be democratic, but they associate and make common cause with other fascistic elements; they pretend to be against the present satellite setup in Eastern Europe but they dream of the day when the Poles and the Czechs and other peoples of Eastern Europe will be satellites of a Fourth Reich.

These expellee groups are endeavoring in every possible way to exploit the cold war to achieve their nefarious goal. They are trying to whip up American public opinion. In this connection mention must be made of their public relations expert in the US, Dr. Richard Sallet. His background was referred to briefly in the issue of Prevent World War III mentioned above. Additional facts show that at one time he was Goebbels' representative in the Germany Embassy in Washington and subsequently an official in Ribbentrop's Foreign Office. Among his tasks was to coordinate pro-Nazi activities in the United States. The aim of this work was to drum up anti-Semitism, to disunite the American people and to create animosity between the USA and her most reliable allies. In this work he had the assistance of a top Nazi agent, Stallforth, who took advantage of his privileges as an American citizen. It may be that it was under Sallet's direction that the German Embassy in Washington recently circulated a map and an accompanying letter among Members of Congress and newspaper editors designed to justify the Pan-German activities of the expellee groups.

It is noteworthy that while the expellees try to curry favor with the USA, they smear Western Allied leaders. Winston Churchill received a taste of this medicine when he visited Germany in May. The violent attacks launched against Churchill made it necessary for the authorities to adopt rigid security precautions so as to protect Churchill's life. One of the leaflets circulated by these expellee gangs, when Churchill spoke at Aachen, read: "Citizens of Aachen! Avoid the ceremony at the market place tomorrow! Keep your windows shut! Don't wave flags! Come instead to the protest demonstration at the war memorial."

This type of agitation is just a foretaste of what is in store for the Allies should the German expellee groups really break loose. All sincere democrats who are just as opposed to Communism as they are to neo-Nazism and Pan-Germanism, should take heed of this development which is a definite threat to security and peace.

"Chancellor Adenauer . . . returned to Germany apparently under the impression that the whole free world desires the reunification of Germany . . . The fact is that there are large segments of the free world . . . that don't really care . . .

"While West Germany was working up oratorical steam on the Day of Unity yesterday, the French were also making speeches. It was the anniversary of the Battle of Verdun. Verdun, President Coty insisted there, was proof that France was not as decadent as people think."

(Theodore Kaghan, N. Y. Post, 6-18-56)

"The only thing except direct attack which might cause Russia to go to war, says General MacArthur, is this: a threat of a reunited Germany once more geared up to its full war potential. He thinks Russia is afraid of a Germany in arms, and predicts:

" 'If we use Germany as a military threat against Russia it will probably precipitate the third World War.'

"In his view, Russia will never permit Germany's reunification unless Germany is neutralized."

(U. S. News & World Report, 4-6-56)

Scapegoat Tactics

The weekly magazine U. S. News & World Report (4-6-56) published an interview with French Prime Minister Guy Mollet which made headline news. Though Mollet was asked to comment on some of the most delicate world problems, his replies were forthright and devoid of platitudes and ambiguities. Of course, Mr. Mollet could have taken the easy way out by flattering the State Department's handling of these vital issues. Perhaps this would have made him a hero in the eyes of our policy makers but, fortunately, Mr. Mollet did not permit himself this luxury, and it is doubtful whether the American people would have benefited by it.

Fawning was never the hallmark of a sincere and reliable ally. In his constructive criticisms Mr. Mollet proved again that the French people are faithful to the common interests of the Western Democracies. Nevertheless, the French Prime Minister has been subjected to a barrage of accusations and innuendoes of a most vicious type. There is no doubt that this storm would not have been so violent, had it not been for the fact that Mollet questioned the soundness of American policy with regard to Germany. His well reasoned criticisms represented one of the rare public occasions when a prominent Allied statesman has taken issue with the "Germany First" policy.

Mr. Mollet declared that the German problem was basically a problem of European security. Thus, he implied that, when the peoples of Europe were assured of their security against the possible resurgence of an aggressive Germany, the German problem would lend itself to a practical solution.

Mollet did not speak for the French alone. He represented the views of the overwhelming majority of the peoples of Europe who have suffered time and again under the heel of the German jackboot. Indeed, the French Prime Minister was merely reaffirming what had been the original policy of the United States at the end of World War II. It is true that American policy has been reversed, but this does not detract from the validity of the principle enunciated by Mr. Mollet.

In a subsequent issue (4-13-56), the U. S. News & World Report carried a selected number of statements supposedly representing public opinion in Europe on the Mollet interview. While many of these carefully selected reactions from abroad were adverse, they were not unanimous. Nevertheless, the U. S. News & World Report captioned its "findings" with these words: "French Premier divides Allies, pleases Russians." The bias displayed in this misleading headline, is not an unusual phenomenon insofar as a large sector of the American press is concerned. Generally speaking, it is a rare thing to read criticisms of the Germans in the American press. On the contrary, ever since the end of the war there has been a steady increase of omissions in the press concerning the real state of affairs in Germany. It is always the French or the British who are accused of sabotaging Western unity and of dealing with the Russians behind the back of the United States. Such charges are seldom made against the Germans and yet, the record of German dealings with Moscow goes back as far as 1945.

It was in 1945 that Marshal Zhukov appointed Count Rudolf Nadolny to the post of special advisor on German questions. Nadolny was an expert on Russian affairs and was Hitler's Ambassador to Moscow. Through his tireless efforts following the end of hostilities, Nadolny brought together a group of ultra-conservative German businessmen and diplomats who sought to find ways and means of promoting rapprochement with the Russians.

Nadolny's circle of friends included such prominent personalities as Fritz von Prittwitz, former German Envoy to Washington, Dr. Hermann Puender, banker Hermann Abs, Dr. Andreas Hermes, former Minister of Agriculture, Prof. Ludwig Erhard, now Minister of Economics in the Bonn cabinet, all close personal friends of Dr. Adenauer and influential co-leaders in the Christian Democratic Union.

The secret Russo-German negotiations, sponsored by Nadolny and his group, were exposed in the European press. Mr. Walter Lippmann devoted an entire column to this development (3-15-49). It is also known that at one of the conferences held by the Nadolny circle, the present Foreign Minister of the Bonn Government, Heinrich von Brentano, warned: "It must be our duty to overcome the deep antagonism of the Russians by eliminating all reasons for distrust against Germany." In this connection he stated that "Germany must not become a satellite of a Western coalition" (Der Spiegel, 6-13-51). The growing activities of this influential group obliged Chancellor Adenauer to call for discretion. "We must move very cautiously," he said. "We ought not to give the impression either in Germany or in the United States, that we shall collaborate in any way with the Russians" (New York Times, 8-17-49).

TEMPTATION STRONG . . . AND GETTING STRONGER

Chancellor Adenauer's remarks did not dampen the enthusiasm of Nadolny and his friends in high places, and the secret dealings with Moscow continued. Thus, in August, 1952, a "hush-hush" meeting took place between top leaders of the German business community and associates of Anastas Mikoyan, the Soviet Deputy Prime Minister. It is noteworthy that this conference, held in Copenhagen, took place only three months after the general peace contract with Bonn had been drawn up. "The conference was called at West German initiative with the knowledge of the West German Government, presumably Chancellor Adenauer himself" (Christian Science Monitor, 4-17-54).

In the early part of 1954 additional efforts were made by influential Germans to come to some sort of bilateral arrangement with the Russians. The person who was directly associated with this move, was Karl Georg Pfleiderer, a leader of the Free Democratic Party which was part of the Adenauer coalition. A former career diplomat who served in Soviet Russia before World War II, Pfleiderer urged the prompt establishment of diplomatic relations with Moscow. He also favored a kind of East-West "non-aggression pact," similar to that which the Soviets had proposed at the Berlin Conference in February, 1954. According to Marquis Childs, Pfleiderer was said "to have close ties with the powerful Rhineland industrialists who want to expand their sales in both, Russia and China" (9-17-54). Added significance may be given to Pfleiderer's views since he was the foreign affairs expert for the Free Democratic Party whose leadership has long advocated separate negotiations with the Russians. The record shows that Pfleiderer had talks with the Soviet High Commissioner and other Russian officials in the Eastern Zone and it is also a matter of record that Dr. Adenauer secretly encouraged Pfleiderer to visit Moscow and Peiping. However, when Pfleiderer's activities became public knowledge, Adenauer denied that he was in any way responsible.

The fear lest Bonn's hand be exposed prematurely, has impelled German politicians to use all kinds of devious methods in their approach to the Russians. They have even sought to employ intermediary third parties to cloak their designs. When Vice-Chancellor Bluecher arrived in India in January of this year, a delegation from East Germany had also turned up. It is not known whether Herr Bluecher had direct contacts with his East German brethren in New Delhi, but Herr Bluecher told Nehru that "the Federal Republic would in no way consider it an interference into its domestic affairs if India would perform the service, by its good offices, of trying to increase Russian understanding of the difficult German situation" (The Bulletin, a weekly issued by the Bonn Government, 1-26-56).

Incidentally, it should be pointed out that Herr Pfleiderer negotiated with Nehru in the Austrian town of Fuschl in the preceding year. The German press reported that the Pfleiderer-Nehru talks preceded secret conversations between Adenauer and Pfleiderer by just a few hours. One press report had the following to say about this bizarre affair: "Of course, a spokesman for the Bonn Government was asked what was going on here? He was prepared with an adequate answer—and was met with bursts of laughter. According to the government spokesman, the important expert on Eastern affairs Pfleiderer met with Nehru, possibly the most active politician in the world today, to report on the economic structure of Baden-Württemberg." Thus, it was on this highly important subject that Nehru came all the way from India!

To return to Bluecher: Herr Bluecher has been quite active in this very sensitive field of Russo-German negotiations. His attitude on how to deal with the Soviets was revealed by the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (8-12-55), i.e., prior to his trip to India. This newspaper reported that Bluecher had already discussed the possibility of a "revision of the Paris Treaties" (release of West Germany from NATO). Bluecher also let it be known that Bonn was prepared to negotiate with the Communist Government in Eastern Germany in order to facilitate reunification. According to Marquis Childs (7-30-54), Bleucher was determined that Germany must deal with the Russians. Childs reported that Bluecher envisaged a policy of co-existence with the Soviets whereby German reunification would come about in return for a guarantee that the West "would respect the present status of Poland and Czechoslovakia."

The Pfleiderer and Bluecher plans to break up NATO as part of a deal with Moscow, seem to have carried great weight with the Bonn Government. Thus, the London Times (5-8-55) reported that the former Ribbentrop diplomat Herr von Herwarth, the present Ambassador to Britain, was expected to propose the exclusion of Germany from NATO in return for Russian agreement to unification, free elections in her Eastern and South-Eastern European satellites and the abandonment of the projected 'Eastern NATO.'"

Another important German leader, Martin Euler, was also an advocate of a direct approach to Moscow at the expense of NATO. The Swiss newspaper Journal de Genève (11-26-55) reported that Euler "wants the Bonn Republic to quit NATO, to arm itself by its own means and, having recaptured freedom supported by force, undertake a démarche towards Moscow." It is true that both Bluecher and Euler have split with the present leadership of the Free Democratic Party, but whether this represents a change of heart with regard to their attitude toward NATO and the need to negotiate with Russians remains to be seen.

As regards Bluecher, it is noteworthy that his right-hand man is a former SS Captain and ex-Ribbentrop diplomat, Dr. G. A. Sonnenhol. Two years ago, the noted British correspondent Sefton Delmer wrote a sensational article for the London Daily Express wherein he revealed the contents of a memorandum on German policy prepared by Dr. Sonnenhol. The main point of the memorandum was the insistence that the cold war between East and West must be kept going by the Germans so that they could play off one bloc against the other, reunify Germany, and reassert and increase the power of the Fatherland. The Sonnenhol memorandum observed that tensions between the victors of 1945 had already been exploited with such success that Germany was becoming sufficiently strong to abandon a policy of absolute reliance on the West and blind obedience to its orders. Sonnenhal boasted that Germany's war potential had become so great that a policy of subservience to the West "is no longer permissible." Stressing the thesis that the cold war had been a windfall to the Germans, the memorandum stated: "Fears in the West of a German-Soviet understanding coupled with the intransigence shown by the Russians at the Berlin Conference, give a strong negotiating position to the government which it can and must exploit." Needless to say, the Sonnenhol "line" has been followed faithfully.

Of course, under the shrewd leadership of Chancellor Adenauer the Germans are always careful not to move in a spectacular way until the proper alibi is found. It will be recalled that, when Adenauer returned from Moscow after having agreed to diplomatic relations with the Soviets, one of his justifications for this turnabout on his part was that the Allies had encouraged the spirit of co-existence at the Geneva Conference. Having established diplomatic relations with the Russians, the Bonn Government was now prepared for the next step but this, too, required a good alibi. Up to the Mollet interview, this was lacking. Even so, the press service of Chancellor Adenauer's party reported that if negotiations at Geneva were not satisfactory to Bonn, bilateral discussions with the Soviet Union on German reunification would be initiated through diplomatic channels (N. Y. Times, 7-22-55). Apparently, the results of the Geneva Conference did not provide sufficient grounds for a Bonn-Moscow deal. On the other hand, the Mollet interview was regarded by the Germans as a godsend.

Shortly after Mollet had expressed his views, von Brentano announced that Bonn would make a direct approach to the Russians. He implied, as did other German officials, that Mollet's remarks amounted to a doublecross, thereby justifying negotiations with the Russians. In this connection, von Brentano warned the West in a tone reminiscent of the best traditions of arrogant German diplomacy: "We do not say we forbid you to make a disarmament agreement that ignores the German question. We warn you not to do so" (A. P., 4-13-56).

So the Germans feigned shock over Mollet's statements and spoke as though they would have never thought of going directly to Moscow, had they not been "betrayed" by the French. However, contrary to the general run of press reports ntimating that Mollet's statements were the cause of Bonn's decision, von Brentano himself admitted that the Bonn Government had been dickering with Moscow for some time. He old reporters: "We (the Bonn Government) may be said to be in a phase of continuing initiative although we cannot give periodic explanations which could prejudice the chances of uccess of our policies" (Manchester Guardian, 4-19-56).

There is additional evidence to show that von Brentano was ndulging in sanctimonious double talk when he implied that he French were warming up to the Russians. Just two months efore the Mollet interview, the U. S. News & World Report ublished a statement by von Brentano wherein he declared hat it was "possible and even probable that the new Soviet Ambassador in Bonn will broach the question of reunification" 2-10-56). Von Brentano indicated that similar talks would o on between the Soviet Government and the newly apointed German Ambassador. He emphasized that diplomatic elations with Russia had been established "as a means of urthering the solution of the question of reunification." Did he U. S. News & World Report rush into print with a bold ace headline reading "German Foreign Minister divides Allies, pleases Russians"? Of course, it did not. Indeed, von Brentano's sensational admission went hardly noticed by the press with the notable exception of the Communist Daily Worker which gloated over the Brentano statement and featured it prominently.

In denouncing Mollet as subscribing to views held by the Soviet Union on German reunification, the Bonn Government stated that it had "repeatedly declared that without reunification and the establishment of a security system satisfactory to all countries, it would not be possible to negotiate on disarmament with any hope of success." However, if Mollet has deviated from the straight and narrow path, so did Chancellor Adenauer. As late as June, 1955, Adenauer told the United Press that the United States and Soviet Russia should try to reach an agreement on a program for controlled disarmament. The U. P. reported that Adenauer believed such an agreement on disarmament "would pave the way for a settlement of other problems, like security and Germany." Adenauer's view that disarmament and a general security system would pave the way for the settlement of the German problem was also reported in the New York Times (6-13-55). In a speech delivered before the Geneva Conference took place, Adenauer repeated his view that the "primary and decisive issue" at the Conference must be the question of disarmament. He declared: "By earnestly and resolutely tackling this task, the reunification of Germany in peace and freedom will also be achieved in due course" (The Bulletin, 6-2-55). This speech was praised in an editorial in the next issue of the Bulletin. Adenauer was hailed as a "realist" when he made his "strong bid for disarmament and collective security." The editorial concluded that through the settlement of these problems German reunification would be facilitated.

We have dwelt at length on "L'Affaire Mollet" because it is imperative, from the standpoint of U. S. security, to safeguard the bonds of friendship between France and our country. Only the most inveterate enemies of both, France and the U. S. A., could profit from the suspicions and deliberate distortions which have beclouded the far-sighted views of Mr. Mollet on disarmament, security and German reunification. The moth-eaten picture of France in the role of a cunning villain while the Germans appear as the loyal and betrayed party, is a favorite device of German propaganda. It would seem that two world wars should have immunized us from such deceit.

"So far, the German industrialists have been too busy to bother with politics, though they spent immense sums on election propaganda for the right-wing parties—and paid insurance to the Communist party, too, in the years before NATO blocked the Soviet advance.

"Meanwhile, they are dazzled by the vision of new markets in the Middle East and Asia; their enthusiasm for an Asian Marshall Plan springs strictly from the expectation of profit.

"This materialistic approach to world problems is not confined to the industrialists—it is general in all classes.

". . . But the bad side of German materialism is a cynical selfishness in both domestic and foreign policy—an absolute refusal to make sacrifices for the common good . . ."

(Denis Healey, New Leader, 5-28-56)

Dr. Wilhelm Haas — Ambassador Extraordinary

In defense of his decision to establish diplomatic relations with the Soviet Government, Chancellor Adenauer declared that Germany could not ignore the fact that Russia was one of the world's leading powers. By the same token, it would have been hardly in keeping with the Chancellor's sizing up of the Soviets, had he failed to appoint an individual with stature commensurate with the responsibilities and tasks awaiting the German ambassador to Moscow. Indeed, the Russians, aware of the importance of the new relationship with Bonn, lost no time in appointing one of their top diplomats to the German post. The Russian Ambassador Zorin not only held a high position in the Soviet Foreign Office, but was one of the key manipulators behind the scenes in Czechoslovakia when the Communists took over in 1948.

Renazifying the Foreign Office

Though Bonn's Ambassador to Moscow, Dr. Wilhelm Hass, may not have earned as colorful a reputation as his Russion counterpart, he is by no means a mediocrity. On the contrary, Dr. Haas has had extensive training and experience. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that he is not a well-known figure outside of certain circles in Germany. Indeed, the only time the outside world received some special news of his actual existence prior to his latest appointment, was during his sojourn as Chief of the Administrative and Personnel Division of the Bonn Foreign Office.

It was way back in 1950 that Dr. Haas admitted publicly that 14 out of 31 senior members of the "new" German Foreign Office were former Nazis. Dr. Haas told reporters that he saw no objection to the appointment of former Ribbentrip diplomats. He contended that the German Foreign Service could not be rebuilt on an efficient basis without the reemployment of these Hitlerites. Haas did a thorough job in renazifying the Bonn Foreign Office. One of Germany's noted radio commentators, Helmut Hammerschmidt, reported that there were "more Nazis now than the Foreign Ministry had even under Hitler" (A.P. 3-17-52).

Those who protested this scandalous situation, found out very soon that Chancellor Adenauer supported Haas to the hilt. In this connection it is interesting to note that Dr. Haas selected Foreign Office personnel with the help of the personal advice of another Ribbentrop diplomat, Hans Schroeder. It is a fact that Herr Schroeder had been a Nazi party member since 1933 and was also the Landesgruppenleiter of the Nazi regime abroad. The rapidity of Schoeder's rise as Deputy Director of the Personnel Division in the Nazi Foreign Office may be partially explained by the fact that he had very close ties with Rudolf Hess, Hitler's Deputy.

Following Haas' performance in staffing the "new" Foreign Office, Chancellor Adenauer rewarded him with the German Ambassadorship to Turkey. In this capacity, he helped to increase Germany's economic and political influence in that strategic area and in other parts of the Middle East. The German newspapers have praised him highly for his successes in establishing fruitful contracts for the Germans. Thus, his stay in Turkey which lasted for almost three years, proved his ability and paved the way for his still more important assignment in Moscow.

The Beginning of a Career

Like all German diplomats Herr Haas received careful training from the very beginning of his career. It was this special treatment which placed the German Diplomatic Corps and its operations in an elite category immune to the vicissitudes of domestic politics. This has produced a consistency in German foreign policy, regardless of the party in power, which remains intact to the present day.

We are told that Haas entered the diplomatic service in 1922 as a native of the city of Bremen. As a young attaché Haas made the rounds of many of the important foreign chancellories. Besides a tour of duty in Paris and in Addis Ababa, Haas was stationed in the Far East, notably Peking, Shanghai and Tokyo. The Bonn Government's official "Bulletin" (1-5-56) boasts that in Haas "Germany has an acute observer in the Eastern hemisphere." During his first years in the Foreign Office, Haas experienced the signing of the Rapallo Treaty which marked the beginning of postwar cooperation, military and economic, between Russia and Germany. At one time Haas was Secretary of the German Delegation to the League of Nations. He held this post until Germany withdrew from the League. It is stated that following Germany's withdrawal "Ribbentrop did not want to do without Dr. Haas and he appointed him for a period of 3 years (1934-1937) as a trade attaché to the German Embassy in Tokyo (Neue Volkszeitung, 1-7-56).

The "Bulletin" alleges that Haas had to resign from the Foreign Office in 1937 because of his wife's non-Aryan background. Offhand this would appear to imply that Haas was persona non grata with the Nazis. We shall subsequently see that this is far from the truth, but suffice it to say at this point that he was chosen "liaison officer" for I. G. Farben in Peking. While serving in this post to which he was recommended by the I. G. Farben war criminal Max Ilgner, Haas continued to receive his State pension from the Hitler Government, in foreign exchange no less. Haas remained in this position to the end of the war.

I. G. Farben's Record

That Farben performed invaluable services on behalf of the Nazis in their drive to conquer the world, is a matter of record. A study of the documents which were disclosed at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials, indicates that the aims of the Farben empire and those of the Hitler Government were so interrelated as to make it difficult to separate one from the other. Even before the rise of Hitler, Farben was regarded as the "crown jewel" of the Weimar Republic. Stresemann called it his "trump card." On another occasion he said, "Without Farben no foreign policy was possible."

Farben's tie-up with the Nazis was described in detail by one of IG's top officials, Georg von Schnitzler, who was a member of the Board of Directors from 1925-1945 and the head of its important Commercial Committee. In an affidavit dated 3-18-47, von Schnitzler admitted that "the development of IG during the last 12 years cannot be separated from the government's foreign policy." In this same affidavit he confessed: "Thus in acting as it had done, the IG contracted great responsibility and constituted a sub stantial and (in the chemical domain) decisive help to Hitler's foreign policy, which led to war and to the ruin of Germany. Thus I must conclude that IG is largely responsible for Hitler's policy." As regards Farben's connection with Hitler's armed forces von Schnitzler said: "Hand in hand with this, the relations between IG and the Wehrmacht became more and more intimate and a continuous union between IG officials on the one side and the Wehrmacht representatives on the other side was the consequence of it." Needless to say, this relationship was very satisfactory to Farben and not only for patriotic reasons. Von Schnitzler tells us: "Practically the whole augmentation in the turnover of IG from a little over 1 billion marks to 3 billions in 1943 is a 100 percent result of the rearmament and the war policy of the German Government."

The cooperation between the German General Staff and IG Farben made it necessary to establish an organization that would work on a continuous basis for the development of Germany's war potential. This was achieved in 1935 when IG set up Vermittlungsstelle W in the Berlin office of Farben. The head of this office, Dr. Karl Krauch, described the function of Vermittlungsstelle W as an organization which was to provide "the establishment of military economy for a systematic cooperation within the IG and particularly for a centralized treatment of questions of military policy and military technics." Another of the Farben war criminals, Hans Kugler, put it more plainly when he said: "The foremost purpose of the Nazi government and IG and all other industrialists was to keep the Wehrmacht all powerful vis-à-vis all other countries, including the USA."

The Espionage Network

The N.W.7 office of Farben in Berlin was also headquarters of the world wide intelligence operations conducted by another key Farben official, Dr. Max Ilgner. His outfit turned out to be indispensable to Germany's preparations for the planning and waging of aggressive war. The Wehrmacht enjoyed particular close relations with this spy organization. Von Schnitzler revealed that after a conference with Wehrmacht intelligence officials in 1936, Ilgner promised to send them "copies of his reports from abroad. In 1937, the Berlin NW 7 office first took the initiative in preparing bombing surveys and then interested the Wehrmacht in them" (The Devil's Chemists by Josiah E. DuBois, page 325). Thus, Farben merged its resources with the Wehrmacht for espionage and military purposes. A conference between Farben officials and representatives of the military intelligence staff of the German High Command took place on May 2, 1941, to develop this cooperation still further. In opening the conference Major Bloch, representing the Counter Intelligence Division of the General Staff, conveyed the thanks of Admiral Canaris, Hitler's Chief of Intelligence, for Farben's valuable cooperation and support shown so far in the field of foreign intelligence service in regard to questions of economy and war economy." In reply, Farben officials assured Major Bloch of their unqualified cooperation. Further assurances were given that all reports from Farben representatives abroad which dealt with matters of concern to the General Staff, would be forwarded to it.

According to the investigations of the Senate Subcommittee, otherwise known as the Kilgore Committee, it was ascertained that the personnel under Ilgner "were working full time for the Wehrmacht" although they were ostensibly paid by Farben. This leads us to one of the key instruments necessary for the proper functioning of the Farben spy network. In 1937, the decisive year for the remilitarization of Germany and the preparation for aggressive war, the so-called Verbindungsmänner or "liaison officers" were appointed by Ilgner. It was in that year that Dr. Haas joined Farben. These so-called Verbindungsmänner cooperated with the Nazis in foreign countries in every possible way. In this connection the Commercial Committee which had overall charge of Farben's personnel abroad, stipulated in September 1937: "Under no circumstance should anybody be assigned to IG Farben agencies abroad who is not a member of the German Labor Front and whose positive attitude to the new era has not been established beyond any doubt. Gentlemen who are sent abroad should be made to realize that it is their special duty to represent National Socialist Germany. They are particularly reminded that as soon as they arrive they are to contact the local or regional group of Germans abroad and are expected to attend regularly their meetings as well as those of the Labor Front."

Again we repeat that this was the year that the present German ambassador to Moscow was appointed as "liaison officer" of the I. G. Farben. The Farben official who was responsible for the coordination of the Verbindungsmänner's activities was Herr Waibel. He was most anxious to maintain friendly relations with the Auslandsorganization, the organization of the Nazi party abroad. It was he who worked out the agreement with the Nazis that all personnel representing Farben in other countries, would cooperate one hundred percent with Nazi organizations including the "German Labor Front." As a result of his responsibilities, Herr Waibel was the recipient of reports prepared by Dr. Haas from China which had little to do with Farben's business problems as such but were of definite concern to the German High Command. "Through the instrumentality of its leading agent abroad, the 'Verbindungsmaenner,' one of whom was located in every major country of the world, Farben received frequent intelligence reports pertaining to economic, political, and military matters. So invaluable were these Vebindungsmaenner that in most cases they were absorbed into the OKW/Abwehr (Military Intelligence Division of the Wehrmacht) and into Nazi Party organizations. In addition, Farben placed on its payroll members of the 'OKW/Abwehr.' Reports received from abroad or compiled by Farben were given to the Wehrwirtschaftstab (Military Economics Staff) of General Thomas, the OKW/Abwehr, and the Auslandsorganisation. These reports were received, analyzed, compiled, and forwarded to the Vorstand and to the various interested agencies of the Third Reich through Farben's Berlin organization known as the 'Berlin N.W.7' office. The Berlin N.W.7 office also prepared special reports and maps for the Wehrmacht identifying and locating strategic factories in countries about to become the victims of German aggression. These maps and reports were used by the Luftwaffe in selecting their bombing targets." (Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, Vol. VII, page 33).

"Bureau Ehrhardt"

To cite a concrete example of how this vast espionage ring operated, we refer to the so-called "Bureau Ehrhardt," the German High Command's wartime intelligence organization in China and in neighboring countries of Asia. The head was Lt. Col. Ludwig Ehrhardt, chief of the Nazi intelligence service in the Orient. Ehrhardt had a very adventurous background having headed the German fifth column in the Balkans before he was sent to China to coordinate the intelligence activities of the German Armed Forces in that country. Ehrhardt was a close and trusted friend of the Fuehrer. "Bureau Ehrhardt" consisted of a number of shady characters including some Japanese who spied on Allied activities in the Far East and reported their findings to the German High Command. Ehrhardt's outfit had established offices in Shanghai, Canton, and Peking.

Information was gathered which led to the sinking of a number of American ships including at least one aircraft carrier, and heavy losses in the early phases of the Okinawa and other Pacific campaigns. The spy ring "authorities reported, was cloaked by German commercial firms in China and was aided by the German Embassy" (U. P. 4-15-46). The same press dispatch noted that those who worked for Bureau Ehrhardt were "all members of a Nazi sponsored werewolf organization that carried on war against the United States and China long after the Reich had surrendered." One of the agents, Wolfgang Schenke, is now the editor of a press service in Hamburg entitled "Realpolitik." He also contemplates the setting up of a so-called neutralist weekly which will be named "Neue Politik." Schenke has a long record of spying for the German High Command in the guise of a German newspaper correspondent. The Soviet publication "International Affairs" (February 1956) called Herr Schenke "the prominent West German Orientalist" and quoted approvingly his views on Asian "neutralism."

Von Puttkamer and Dr. Haas

Another interesting figure of "Bureau Ehrhardt" was Baron Jesco von Puttkamer. In many ways Puttkamer was even more important than Col. Ehrhardt. At one time he was Chief of the German Information Bureau in New York where he performed vital propaganda services for the Nazis. Prior to the war, he was public relations chief for IG Farben. Consequently, the Farben people were well aware of his professional talents and they took full advantage of them. This came about when the German counter-intelligence asked Farben to provide a more efficient spy setup for the German High Command in foreign countries. In a letter dated April 3, 1940, Farben's von Schnitzler wrote to the representative of the German counter-intelligence at IG, that he had recently discussed with Major Bloch, representing Admiral Canaris, "whether and to what extent the OKW (German High Command) wants to use the services of the Association for Sales Promotion which is under the management of Messrs. Kunzler and von Puttkamer." He said that this company was "particularly well suited for the intended camouflaging maneuvers. . . ." The German counter-intelligence welcomed von Schnitzler's suggestion and von Puttkamer was put to work.

On January 26, 1941, von Puttkamer wrote to v. Schnitzler from the German Embassy in Shanghai which itself was a nest of Nazi spies and propagandists. He expressed the hope that v. Schnitzler was satisfied with his work and mentioned that he had the pleasure of meeting "a good number of gentlemen from your company (Farben), among them Mr. Gadow and Mr. von Behring. . . ."

Besides his spy activities v. Puttkamer directed much of the antisemitic propaganda in Japan and in China during the war. It was v. Puttkamer who had posters plastered all over Japanese occupied China showing a wounded Chinese mother (with the rest of the family maimed and dead) in the ruins of their home bombed by an American plane. The poster carried these words "Who did this to you?" Just as he incited hate against "non-Aryans," so this propagandist provoked the Chinese against the Americans. Indeed, it was reported that v. Puttkamer's vicious lies were responsible for lynching of American pilots who had been seized after bombing Japanese concentrations in Hankow.

The Ehrhardt gang was found guilty by the American Tribunal, but apparently the punishment exacted against a number of these spies did not fit their crimes. Von Puttkamer himself received 30 years at hard labor but it was a very peculiar "hard labor"—he was appointed prison librarian. How v. Puttkamer got away with it is not exactly known, but this much was made public, viz, that the present Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, wrote a letter to then Secretary of State Marshall in behalf of v. Puttkamer. Secretary Dulles' letter, dated October 11, 1946, written on the letterhead of the Commission on a Just and Durable Peace, said: "As Chairman of this Commision I have received two communications dealing with the trial of Germans at Shanghai as war criminals. I have no basis for the independent judgment as to the facts reported. But it is my deep concern which I am sure the State Department shares. that in these matters justice rather than vengeance should be done. I am, respectfully, John Foster Dulles."

How does Haas fit into the story? In the first place, he worked on the closest terms with von Puttkamer. It has even been charged that it was Haas who may have been the Farben man in China who supplied von Puttkamer with the necessary funds for his activities. Allied officials who tried to interrogate von Puttkamer after his return to Germany were prevented from doing so—another indication that von Puttkamer had some very influential friends. The fact that von Puttkamer was in close touch with Mr. Gadow, a bigwig in the Farben organization in China, is also of relevance because Mr. Gadow was Haas' boss and Mr. Gadow, too, was one of the few men who was on intimate terms with Admiral Canaris, Chief of the German counter-intelligence. It has been stated that Gadow himself must have been an important member of the Canaris organization in view of his intimacy with the chief. In this connection it has also been pointed out that Haas was very friendly with Richard Sorge, the German who was Russia's top spy in Japan during the war. Prior to the war and even before the Nazis took over, both Sorge and Haas belonged to the circle connected with the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung. Von Puttkamer belonged to the same group.

From the foregoing it is difficult to believe that Haas was obliged to resign from the German Foreign Office because of his wife's "non-Aryan" background. More plausible is the interpretation that his "forced resignation" was just a cover up for his tranfer from the German Foreign Office to the German counter-intelligence under the guise of liaison officer for Farben.

"Displaced Person"

The defeat of Germany created problems for the Farben people and other agents of German big business in China. However, with the help of top Chinese leaders, some of them succeeded in remaining in China, ostensibly as "employees of German firms taken over by the Chinese. This little trick enabled Farben representatives to develop reorganization plans so that IG's interests would remain intact.

These German agents pretended to be friends of the Chinese insisting that Germany's only enemies were "Britain, the United States and Russia." A correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, writing from Shanghai 3-22-46, analyzed the propaganda line and reported that the Germans were saying to the Chinese, "We are still your friends and when Russia and the United States fight, we will be able to help you." In this connection, the same reporter mentioned that among the bigshot Nazis "who still have pipelines to Chinese Government officials, are Martin Fischer, former Consul General of Shanghai, and Karl Gadow" of Farben. We shall have more to say about Fischer but it appears that by 1946 Herr Gadow decided to leave China.

The New York Post correspondent, writing from Shanghai (4-9-47), revealed that Gadow and one of his henchmen had "peacefully left China for Germany on a repatriation ship." He also disclosed that "Dr. Wilhelm Haas, well known Nazi collaborator who was a DEFAG (Farben) advisor throughout the war, sailed for Switzerland as a 'displaced person'." The category "displaced person" served to enable persons like Haas to escape Allied control. According to the China Weekly Review (6-7-47), Gadow was said to have "carried with him blueprints for the reorganization of the IG trust into a streamlined world cartel with most operating bases outside Germany in neutral countries." This same weekly noted that shortly after Gadow had left in the summer of 1946, Dr. Haas, IG's "liaison officer" in North China, sailed for Switzerland. While the Farben agents who remained in China, worked to protect IG's interests in that country, their colleagues scurried back to Europe to protect Farben's world wide interests.

A similar report concerning the strange doings of Gadow and Haas was released by King Features Syndicate (7-27-47). Their correspondent in China, James R. Young, confirmed earlier reports that Farben agents were reorganizing its assets in China in defiance of Allied interests. He stated, "The IG Farben industry group . . . are planning to make Shanghai their headquarters, a part of the Nazi postwar plan to create a new world wide cartel with headquarters in China and branches in neutral or friendly countries. The gang includes . . . Karl Gadow, a Farben executive and Dr. Wilhelm Haas, who specializes in North China affairs."

German Interests in China

At this point it is important to note that Germany had considerable interests in the Far East before the advent of Hitler. It was in 1871 that merchants of Bremen, Haas' home town, demanded that in negotiating peace with France, Germany should insist upon the cession of French Far Eastern and Pacific possessions. Bismarck sympathized with the merchants of Bremen but had to forego the opportunity to grab these areas because he felt that Germany was not yet in the position to embark on an ambitious colonial expansion. Nevertheless, German commercial interests began to grow in China so that by 1914, on the eve of World War I, total German investments in China were approximately 1 billion marks. The steady growth was interrupted by the outbreak of war but following the end of hostilities German financial and economic interests revived their activities with the enthusiastic support of the Chinese Government.

Alongside of these economic ties there developed military cooperation. This phase of German-Chinese relations was initiated by Col. Walter Bauer, one of General von Ludendorff's chief assistants and a friend of Adolf Hitler. The Bauer mission to China marked the beginning of an era of secret industrial diplomacy aimed at securing for Germany preferential advantages in the Chinese market. It was supported by the same enocomic interests which were bent on gaining supreme influence in the domestic policy of Germany. The Bauer mission turned out to be an embarrassment to the Weimar Government when certain Chinese leaders revealed that great quantities of war material were being shipped to China in violation of the Versailles Treaty. The Weimar Government sought to absolve itself of responsibility, but that is an old story for the Weimar politicians. Pretending that the left hand did not know what the right hand was doing was a way for the German Government to avoid an Allied probe. How much credence can be placed on these denials of complicity can be seen from the fact that the Weimar Government cooperated secretly with the German General Staff as far back as 1919.

When Bauer died in 1929, his post in China was assumed by Col. Hans Kriebel, one of the first members of the Nazi Party. Kriebel was subsequently appointed by Ribbentrop to take over the Personnel Division of Hitler's Foreign Office. It was Kriebel, regarded as "an old China hand" who appointed Hans Schroeder as his deputy. As mentioned in the earlier part of this article, Schroeder was a good friend of Dr. Haas and gave him invaluable assistance in setting up the Bonn Foreign Office.

Needless to say, the chemical industry of China received special attention in the German Government's relations with China. Thus, when the Germans signed a commercial treaty with Japan in 1927, it turned out that the agreement offered great opportunities to Farben in the Chinese markets.

In the 1930s German industrialists continued to press for a greater share in the markets of the Far East. The German Government's policy was carefully oriented along the lines spelled out by the China Studien Gesellschaft, a branch of the German National Manufacturers Association. Certain leaders in the Chinese Government facilitated these efforts and it was during this period that one of Germany's leading steel merchants, Otto Wolff (Cologne), established an office in Shanghai to secure railway orders from the Chinese Government. It was the same firm which played an important part in the arrangement of German sales to the Soviet Union. With such firms as Otto Wolff, Carlowitz & Co. representing Krupp, and financial institutions like the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank, much was accomplished in the way of increasing German economic penetration in China. The close financial and economic ties between China and Germany are indicated by the friendly relations between H. H. Kung, a top financier for the Chinese Government, and Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's chief advisor. At a state banquet dinner given in honor of Mr. Kung in Berlin (1937), Herr Schacht spoke in glowing terms over the great future for Chinese-German relations: "Just as the political relations between Germany and China are based on friendship, so we can notice that our economic relations have been very pleasant and free of impediments. . . . Germany, being one of the world's great manufacturing nations, could help China along these lines by her advice and by her material resources. Please be assured that I shall do whatever I can to contribute to continuous Sino-German economic cooperation. . . ." In reply Dr. Kung assured his German friends that Herr Schacht's hopes were shared by the Chinese. "China considers Germany to be her closest friend, not only because of the cultural and intellectual bonds between Germany and China, but also because of the close economic relations between China and Germany. . . ."

Trading With Red China

As would be expected the Germans today are trying to regain the glories of yesterday. The markets of the Far East, particularly China, are an important factor in the calculations of German industrialists and the Bonn Government. Thus, even during the Korean war, when Communist China sought to destroy United Nations forces, Western Germany was carrying on a brisk trade with the Red regime. The N. Y. Herald Tribune (6-14-51) reported that the U. S. Government was alarmed over the flow of war supplies from Western Germany to Communist China. It was determined that during the first six months of the Korean war, legal West German trade with Red China increased 27-fold. It was also discovered that illegal trade amounted to at least 8 million. Significantly, German shipments of chemicals to China jumped from $233,000 for the first nine months of 1950 to $3,843,000 for the full year. U. S. officials were quoted as stating that there had been great improvement in limiting trade with Communist China by all nations "except West Germany." The Chicago Tribune (7-7-52) reported that West German businessmen had signed a trade agreement in East Berlin with Chinese trade representatives calling for the exchange of $37,500,000 in goods.

Thus, in spite of the alarms of the U. S. Government, Western Germany continued to develop its profitable trade with Red China. This agreement was followed by the organization of the so-called East Committee. The New York Times (12-19-52) reported that the top members of the committee included two leading Farben officials, W. A. Menne and Hermann J. Abs. One month later Hjalmar Schacht, speaking on the occasion of the opening of his new bank, declared that Germany would find more profit in trading with the East. "Germany," he declared, "should look to the Orient, especially China" (N. Y. World Telegram and Sun, 1-15-53).

The support of the East Committee and the prodding of Schacht were most rewarding. Trade with the Soviet bloc including Communist China, increased 44 percent during the first nine months of 1953. Exports to China in that period were valued at over $23 million as compared to about $10 million during the same period in 1952. The following year, German industrialists voiced stronger demands for trading with the Soviet bloc. The New York Herald Tribune (3-21-54) reported that German industrialists regarded the market of Red China "as of special importance." A leading economic journal of the Ruhr "Handelsblatt" stated that many German businessmen viewed the Chinese mainland as "the greatest future market in the world." The New York Times (4-4-54) reported that the Chinese Communist Government was planning "to use the Transsiberian railroad to move machinery and precision instruments purchased in West Germany . . ." In this connection East Germany became a very convenient zone for German-Chinese negotiations. As reported by the Christian Science Monitor (4-17-54), "West German spokesmen point with a certain pride to the fact that Communist China's only foreign trade representation in the Western world, the China Export-Import Cooperation Agency, is located in Berlin, Leipzigerstrasse 12, in the Soviet sector."

Of course, the Germans tried to assuage the feelings of American officials. They put out propaganda to the effect that unless the West begins to trade heavily with Communist China, the Chinese will become more dependent on the Russians. A report to the Washington Post (7-24-54) notes that "the Chinese trade lobby in West Germany has perfected its arguments to the extent of claiming that the Germans want to help the worldwide fight against Communism by building up Peiping's industry. The United States, it is said, is just hampering this laudable objective." Apparently this was said with a straight face.

In June, 1954, when the Allies met with the Soviet Union and China on the Indo-China question, German representatives popped up. Among those who "vacationed" in Switzerland at this time, was Martin Fischer, referred to earlier in this article. In the years before the war, Herr Fischer worked out of the German Embassy in China and was well acquainted with Gadow, von Puttkamer and Dr. Haas. Herr Fischer, however, was not the only German who happened to be in Switzerland. Some of Germany's leading businessmen turned up and had talks with the Chinese Vice Minister for Foreign Trade. Included in this delegation was a representative of the East Asia Union of Hamburg as well as a spokesman for Farben. The New York Herald Tribune reported (6-4-54) that this group came "with the knowledge of the Adenauer Government . . ."

It is interesting to note that much of this agitation for trade with China and other countries of the Soviet bloc has been particularly strong in Hamburg and Bremen. These cities are Germany's leading ports which in the past have enjoyed a lucrative trade with the Far East. Bremen has made much progress in reconstructing its port. The Christian Science Monitor (1-23-56) points out that Bremen "is watching the East West conflict keenly hoping for the opening of the iron curtain borders since this would restore transit trade, once one of the mainstays of the German port." In anticipation of realizing this fond hope, two of Germany's largest shipping companies have established a joint shipping company to serve Red China. The well known Social Democrat and President of the Bremen Senate Wilhelm Kaisen joined the growing clamor for the revival of trade with the Far East. He expressed his support to a cheering group of 700 West German businessmen at the annual dinner of the East Asia Union. As reported by the New York Herald Tribune (3-14-55), the implication of Kaisen's remarks was that "the West Germans should become the Peking Government's best commercial friends in the West."

It so happened that Herr Haas, following his return to Germany from Switzerland, served as Chief of the Presidential Chancellory in the town of Bremen. In that position Haas "became a close coworker of the President of the Senate, Kaisen" (Neue Volkszeitung, 1-7-56).

More recently it was reported that West Germany had increased its trade with Communist China from about $58 million in 1954 to $72 million in 1955. This development was endorsed by Walter Hallstein, Adenauer's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in an address to the East Asia Union in Hamburg. Of course, the above figures do not tell the whole story because no one (except the Germans) knows the exact value of West German exports to China. There is no doubt that a portion of West German exports to that country has been camouflaged as coming from East Germany or other countries. The growing protests over restrictions limiting trade with Red China, are reflected in many articles appearing in the German newspapers. There is a great deal of resentment over the fact that some of this trade has to go through "third countries." The Germans feel that they will not reap the full profit until they are able to trade directly with China and this is precisely what they hope to achieve.

None other than Otto Wolff representing the Wolff concern which enjoyed such lush profits in trading with China and the Soviet Union in the past, has publicly attacked U. S. policy. Wolff himself is head of the Russian branch of the East Committee. However, in his denunciation of the United States, he laid particular stress on the need to resume large scale trade with Red China. His criticism, it was noted, followed "exactly a month after the Adenauer regime in effect endorsed the persistent effort of West German business to increase trade with Communist China" (N. Y. Herald Tribune, 5-3-56). Forty-eight hours after Herr Wolff bitterly criticized the United States, a delegation representing the Chinese Import and Export Corporation with permanent headquarters in East Berlin, was wined and dined as the guest of the East Committee.

(London Daily Express)

I. G. Farben's Men at Work

As one might expect, the influence of Farben in this all-out drive to embrace Red China is of decisive importance. Indeed, we find that one of the hosts at the reception in honor of the Chinese delegation was Hans Koehler, a top Farben official who is also the head of the East Committee's China branch. Mention has been made of Abs and Menne, two other Farben bigwigs who have been trying to expand Farben's possibilities in China. Another Farben official who is in a key spot to influence government policy, is Ulrich Haberland. Herr Haberland who lent his talents to the Hitler regime, is now a dedicated supporter of the Adenauer Government. He is a member of the Foreign Policy Council of the Federal Ministry for Economics. Needless to say, this strategic post enables Haberland to exercise a very strong influence in the formulation of government policy. As in the past, Farben has once again been able to place its agents in key positions, both public and private. Their influence is strengthened by the fact that IG has reached the point where it is only outranked by DuPont and Union Carbide at the present time.

It is these developments which lend additional significance to Haas' assignment in Moscow. German newspapers have played down the Haas appointment. However, here and there we do find expressions which shed light on his mission. Thus, the Neue Volkszeitung notes that Haas is considered an East Asian specialist. He is an expert at "decisive conferences" with regard to economic questions "on the highest level." "West German industrial circles, especially, which are interested in a broadening of their exports to the East and in supplying their old customers in the Soviet Union, anticipate, as do all Germans who hope for friendly relations, that the mission of the West German ambassador in Moscow will lead to the realization of their so far unfulfilled aspirations" (1-7-56). The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, although careful in its evaluation of Haas' assignment, notes that he is an experienced diplomat, "an intelligent, quiet man of character . . . Ambassador Haas will take with him training in a field sorely lacking with our first-class diplomats: his knowledge of economics . . . Inauguration of a new era of big business with Russia will hardly be a task for a new German ambassador. However, it is quite feasible for situations to arise in the economic field in which he could achieve what could be possible . . . The ability to gain and hold personal confidence has ever been considered a requisite of the real diplomat. This man possesses that quality. The Federal Republic thus has a man in the capital of the Eastern hemisphere who is equipped with knowledge, who is careful and an intelligent observer. A man who will represent us in this most exposed and most delicate post, our only diplomat representation behind the iron curtain, with natural dignity . . . No one will recognize the responsibility of such a position as he; no one will show more humility in the shadows of the great men who in past times have held this post" (12-29-55).

Two days before the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung described Haas' capabilities, it devoted an article on the prospects of the German-Chinese trade. Unfortunately, space does not permit reproduction of the entire piece. But it is a clear exposition of what the Germans hope to achieve. Several excerpts from this article will make this clear: "All efforts to lessen the China embargo have thus far failed due to the resistance of the United States . . . Today, China's biggest Western Europe customer is the Federal Republic. As a matter of fact, the exchange of goods between the Federal Republic and China shows a steadily mounting tendency . . . It is self-evident that the predominating manner of conducting German-Chinese trade via third countries is detrimental to both parties. The important outcome of this situation as far as the Federal Republic is concerned, is that our considerable imports of Chinese merchandise do not favor German export possibilities to China but are solely of advantage to the intermediary countries. It would, therefore, be well to hope that the difficulties which, as of today, still impede the direct German-Chinese exchange of trade, could be eliminated. In the long run, even without succumbing to exaggerated expectations. China is a market with a tremendous future, especially for those investment goods (production type goods, such as machinery) for which German export trade is so well geared" (12-27-56).

Be Vigilant!

ERICH MARIA REMARQUE

Erich Maria Remarque is an outstanding German writer whose book "All Quiet On The Western Front" won him international acclaim for its passionate denunciation of militarism. Remarque chose to leave Germany rather than to submit to the Nazi terror. Thus, the Nazis failed to silence his voice. Hitler's downfall has not blinded Remarque from the dangers which still lurk in Germany. In this connection he has completed the writing of a film "Ten Days To Die" which depicts the last wretched days of Hitler in his Berlin bunker. The film is not only a historical account of the meaning of Hitlerism but it is intended as a sharp warning to all that the roots of this pernicious idea are still alive. The London Daily Express published an article by Mr. Remarque telling the reasons which impelled him to write this story. The Society has reprinted below a condensed version of his observations.

The Nazis did not come from some strange planet to enslave Germany.

They grew up within Germany itself; and it was not only the economic crisis, the unemployment, which drove the masses into their arms and induced them to fight for them to the point of self-annihilation: there was something else as well.

That was the centuries-old inculcation of unconditional obedience which found in Germany particularly fertile soil.

The maxim "Orders are orders" was constantly preached as the first of the soldierly virtues and it was this maxim that had such dire consequences.

It was a comfortable slogan; there was no need to think or to take decisions for oneself—above all a man had no personal responsibility if he heeded this precept.

It was the slogan by which the murders in the concentration camps were justified; and to the dismayed astonishment of the entire world it was the precept by which even field-marshals and generals sought at Nuremberg to justify their acts because they believed in all seriousness that it was enough to exonerate them from all responsibility for the shooting of hostages, offences against international law, and the murder of civilians.

No one mentioned conscience. Conscience was dead—killed by this slogan, the slogan of all dictatorships.

How alive, how dangerous is THAT Germany today?—How does it show itself?

Before me lies an appeal from the Anti-Nazi Association of Berlin—Charlottenburg.

It reports that in Western Germany more than a hundred organisations with openly Nazi aims are again in existence and that more than 40 Nazi periodicals are being published.

In 1945 the great work of rehabilitating victims of the Nazis was to begin. That seemed self-evident. But what did the Nationalzeitung of Basle, a serious paper, have to say about this at the end of 1954 under the title "The Bonn Rehabilitation Scandal"?

- "About 85 per cent of the middle and upper dignitaries of the N. S. D. A. P. (the Nazi Party) and of the S. A. and S. S. who were already in office before 1933, are today receiving their full pension.
- "In approximately half of their cases the pension amounts to 1,000 marks a month.

". . . Germany's Newest Recruit.

"He has been in the new Army one month.

"His name is Wolfgang Doernbrack. He is a volunteer; he speaks very good English; he has a Diploma in Economics and he gave up an excellent job at £700 a year to be a private at about fifty bob a week.

"I asked Doernbrack if he was proud of the German Army—and its history. The answer was a fervent 'YES.'

"Was he ashamed of any part of it? The answer was an indignant 'NO!'

"Was he pleased with his new uniform?

"He was not.

"What was wrong? The helmet was too American and the boots, which were similar to those of the British Army, were not suitable.

"What kind of boots then did he favour? Answer: 'Jackboots.'

"All these young men were enthusiastic. They had joined the German Army to be part of it. Part of its past—Nazi, Hohenzollern and Bismarckian alike. And, above all, to be the hope of its future."

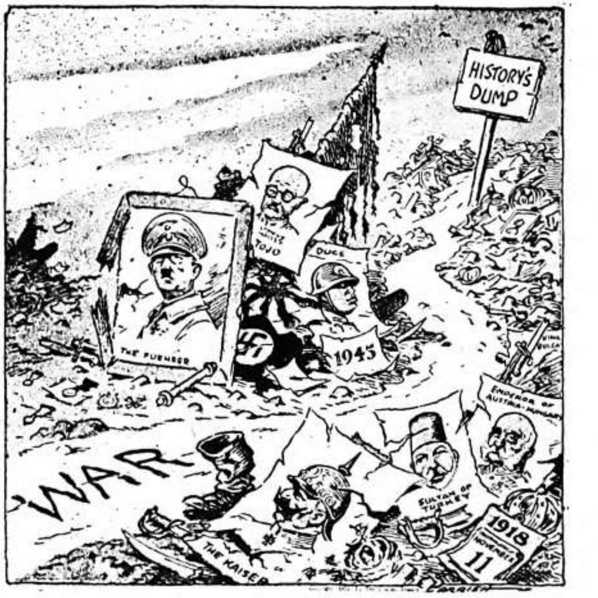
THE GLORY ROAD



(Chicago Tribune)

- "Orphans of parents murdered by the Nazis, if they are lucky enough to have their cases investigated at all, get 100 marks. But this is forfeited if they earn more than 75 marks.
- "The founder and sometime chief of the Gestapo, Dirls, is similarly receiving his full pension, as is also the widow of the arch-butcher Heydrich, while tens of thousands of dependents of murdered people are still not receiving a farthing."

Let us look at other cases. . . .

- In 1945 a colonel was sentenced to 15 years' penal servitude because a few days before the Americans occupied the little town of Penzberg he had the mayor and six inhabitants shot because they wished to save the mine near the town from being senselessly blown up by the Nazis.

The colonel appealed. In 1956 he was acquitted in Munich—he had only been carrying out orders. Acquittals of this kind are becoming more common.

- Hitler's hated Public Prosecutor who gave the order that the men of July 20 were not to be shot but hanged, and who watched the hanging, is living comfortably on his full pension.
- The city of Kiel, which in 1945 withdrew its freedom from Admiral Raeder who has been condemned as a war criminal, offered him it back again in 1956. On their release war criminals are being feted as martyrs by the ringing of church bells and with bouquets and speeches.
- The commandant of the notorious concentration camp at Strutthof was recently sentenced to a full five years' penal servitude for 150 murders. A simple calculation shows the scale of punishment: ten days penal servitude per murder.
- A few weeks ago the naval representative in the new German armed forces made a speech at the naval training dep at Wilhelmshaven in which he set up Admirals Doenitz an Raeder, earlier condemned as war criminals, as examples, e plaining that "There is no stain upon the person of ou former Commander-in-Chief."

What was that? Yes, you have read aright—that was th leader of the navy department of the new democratic federa armed forces in the Blanck Bureau.

Fortunately the storm of indignation aroused in the Federal Diet was enough to secure the dismissal of this somewhat too zealous gentleman. But how did he come to occupy so important a post?

What then is the outlook in Germany?

The great part of the German people want peace and democracy and have had enough of Hitler and his associates; nonetheless, the forces of reaction are not dead.

They are agitating and working and waiting their chance, and they do not consist solely of former Nazis; they also include those circles which helped the Nazis to power; which did nothing to check them when they could still have been stopped, which put false patriotism above the concept of personality and responsibility, and which worked hand in hand with the Nazis for their own ends.

Let us hope that God will never allow them to come back to power.

But simply hoping is not enough. Education in active democracy is more important. Twelve years of education in intolerance and a couple of hundred years of training in blind obedience cannot so easily be eradicated.

That is why this film was made.

That is why its last words are: Be Vigilant.

"The Minister spoke in his introduction about the German tactical airforce. Do the Government really think that it is wise to bring German pilots, who shot down British and Allied machines in the last war, to train in this country? . . . We are so short of pilots that we are now employing the murderers—at least that is what they were in the last war . . .

"What guarantee do the Government have that these men, when trained in modern aircraft, modern jets and modern bombers will not be used again to shoot down British pilots, or perhaps drop the atomic bomb on this country? How can we be sure that Germany will be on our side in 10 or 15 years? When this sort of publicity (German pilots training in Allied countries) is spread throughout the world—it has been in British and American newspapers—it is an insult to the people still mourning the dead of the last war . . .

"How can we say that these pilots—and the Germans are now moving towards their own independent line in foreign affairs—will not be manning the new airforce, the tactical airforce, of a new Nazi Germany in another 5 or 10 years? . . ."

(Emrys Hughes, British M.P., House of Commons, 3-5-56)

Supposedly the U. S.-trained Germans have been carefully screened by the Adenauer government as to their political affiliations. Supposedly they never entertained Nazi sympathies—though all fought for Germany in World War II and all swore fealty to Adolf Hitler. . . .

Some observers feel that once Konrad Adenauer dies (he is now 80), Germany may turn from the U. S. Already German politicians are demanding bilateral negotiations with the Russians. German businessmen want to trade with Russia more than ever, and practically everyone in West Germany realizes that reunification of their country awaits negotiations with the Soviets. In the course of negotiations all manner of deals are made.

Recently, in Hamburg, I asked a cab-driver on whose side he thought most Germans would fight in the event of a U. S.-Russian war. "The Russian side, of course," he said.

"Why?" I asked. "You all hate the Russians."

"Of course we like you Americans better," he explained. "After all, you saved our country. But it would be safer for us to fight with the Russians. If they won the war we would be the victors. If they lost, the Americans would soon forgive us. You Americans are the best forgivers in the whole world." . . .

From War Criminal to World Savior?

Cavalry Tactics

As avid students of the art of warfare, Prussian strategists valued highly the role of the cavalry. They found that an objective which could not be seized by frontal assault, might be more susceptible to capture by the outflanking maneuvers of the cavalry.

Judging from the methods employed by present day German statesmen, it would seem that they have been applying the lessons of Prussian military tactics to the field of politics. The imperative need "to overcome the catastrophe of 1945" and to reinvigorate the German powerhouse, required deftness and flexibility. A head-on attack against the policies proclaimed by the Allies at end of the war, would have been a hazardous undertaking. Consequently, German leaders "brought up the cavalry." The results were successful beyond all expectations.

Thus, when the Germans decided to undermine the policy of reparations, they began to spread stories about mass starvation in Germany. They knew that if these tales were accepted as the gospel truth, they could plead that only the scuttling of reparations would enable German industry to export in sufficient quantities in order to import necessary foodstuffs. It worked.

When the Germans decided that the time had come to rearm, they resorted to the device of the "European Defense Community." Time Magazine (1-4-54) noted that the EDC idea came "providentially" from France. "Germans could not propose it without risking the impression that it was simply a cunning maneuver to unlock the occupation shackles and revive the Wehrmacht. But when the enemy from across the Rhine proposed it in 1950, Konrad Adenauer could more easily champion it."

We find the Germans employing similar tactics when they sought to liquidate the decartelization and decentralization program. The instrument which played a major role in bringing this about, was the Schuman Plan which was also initiated by the French. Yet, as to the origins of the Schuman Plan idea, the authoritative magazine Business Week (5-20-50) reported: "The story going the rounds among French businessmen is this: The Schuman pool project is really a German scheme. It was first sold to Secretary Acheson and then forced down the throat of the French government in exchange for a promise of U. S. aid to Indo-China. The scheme gives the Saar back to Germany."

Schacht's Blueprint

Recent developments indicate that the Germans are about to employ the "cavalry" again, this time in their quest for a decisive role in the markets of the colonial world. A hint that this was the next major item on the German agenda, can be found in a little publicized book called "Gold For Europe," written by Hjalmar Schacht in 1950. Schacht, Hitler's financial expert on rearmament and an articulate spokesman for Germany's overseas ambitions, suggested that Germany should play a leading part in the underdeveloped countries of the world. He said that the number of tasks to be performed in such countries were practically unlimited "and it would be easy to give Germany a special task in the development of one of them." To make this scheme of German penetration more acceptable, Schacht magnanimously proposed that "the industrial nations would have to carry out such work in common, or split it up between themselves geographically or by quotas." He assured his readers, as if to sugar-coat the pill, that Germany's activities would not be imperialistic and could be controlled by the UN, if necessary. The Schachtian concept seems to have prepared the groundwork for recent developments.

Writing from Berlin (11-28-55), the chief foreign correspondent of the New York Times, Mr. C. L. Sulzberger, warned the West that Chancellor Adenauer's leadership was being subjected to severe pressures by those who wanted to do business with the Russians even at the expense of West Germany's present ties with the West. He painted a dark picture of Soviet blandishments and tempting offers to the Ruhr. He admonished his readers that German big business might fall in with the proposition to participate in developing the markets of the Soviet bloc including Communist China. This great danger, Mr. Sulzberger declared, must be counteracted vigorously. In his opinion this could be done by increasing Bonn's role in the potential development of free Asia. "The Western powers," he wrote, "have not yet faced up to the necessity of coordinated economic action in that "... When John Foster Dulles was retained by New York banks and bond houses in the 1920's he made several trips to Germany and each time he stepped off the boat on his return he made learned statements to the press that Germany was a sound investment, perfectly safe for American bondholders.

"After every such statement more American money was poured into Germany—eventually to go down the drain.

"... At any rate, Dulles kept on making bullish statements about Germany.

" 'Our bankers have performed a great service, both to this country and to the world,' he announced in 1928.

" ' Germany has made great progress,' he said again on Oct. 21, 1930. 'Her national income and government income have grown to a point where the reparations charge constitutes a readily bearable percentage.'

"End result of this investment splurge and Dulles' encouragement of it was that the American people helped to finance Hitler for World War II ..."

(Drew Pearson, 5-26-56)

vast area." Mr. Sulzberger observed that it was high time to enlist Bonn in this project because "any West German share in an Allied program to raise Asian living standards should be far more profitable than politically controlled trade with China." Concluding his analysis, he noted that since Moscow approached the German problem on a long-range Eurasian basis, "it is time we approach it (the German problem) on a world basis." It therefore follows, according to Mr. Sulzberger, that "a specific share in global economic development should be offered to this industrious nation."

Mr. Sulzberger's thesis was in substance reaffirmed in a special editorial published in the New York Telegram (11-30-55). Once again we are told that Germany may be lured into the Soviet camp. The solution? "Finding a plan for West Germany to participate in some of the Western world's global problems—economic aid, free world trade, technical assistance. Germany has the resources and skills to contribute to such projects." Only by reassuring the West Germans that "we will stand with them," can we be sure that Germany will stand with us.

Bonn Reacts

While articles of this kind were beginning to appear more frequently in the American press, the Germans, too, were thinking out loud. For example, Business Week (12-24-55) reported that Foreign Minister von Brentano was "unofficially advocating that the West European members of NATO should consider an integrated aid program for Asia and Africa." According to this same report, the German Foreign Minister was anxious to tie up this proposition with British and U. S. foreign aid programs. On January 14, 1956, the New York Times reported that von Brentano had succeeded in winning a group of German leading industrialists to support his long-range foreign plans." In that connection the Times stated that the Bonn Government was "giving full support to a proposal submitted at the last meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Paris for joint commercial and financial policies" vis-à-vis the uncommitted countries of Asia. A subsequent dispatch to the Times (2-1-56) elaborated still further on this subject. It noted that leading Ruhr industrialists were enthusiastic and had very definite ideas as to how this so-called aid project could be implemented: "One of the leading industrial figures in the Ruhr said, he thought the economic program should be in the nature of a vast Marshall plan to which all the members of the Atlantic Alliance would contribute part of their production and their skills." NATO, these industrialists said, must not take a "narrow view" of the world situation. One of their spokesmen assured the Times correspondent that West Germany was ready to roll up its sleeves and put across a global economic program "with great energy."

When Chancellor Adenauer's Minister for Economic Affairs Erhard visited London in January of this year, he repeated the same line. The Chancellor himself, in a special interview with the German newspaper General Anzeiger (3-2-56), called for "a united front" of the West to meet the Soviet economic challenge. He declared that Article 2 of the NATO Treaty enabled that organization to coordinate economic and political policies of the Western powers. Thus, we find the Germans working very diligently to impress upon the U. S. A. the need for a "grand global economic program."

When we compare Mr. Sulzberger's approach to the program with that of the Germans, we find the following: Mr. Sulzberger insists that the Germans must be given more elbow room for their industry and energy to prevent their forsaking the West for the blandishments of the East. The Germans, on the other hand, posing as the great anti-Red crusaders, emphasize the need to thwart Soviet penetration in Asia and Africa. It goes without saying that the combination of these arguments cannot help but attract many supporters. Yet, trying as hard as they could to maintain a posture of disinterested generosity, without any thought of special advantage, the Germans have let the cat out of the bag. The blundering in this case is the handiwork of Herr Krupp von Bohlen & Co.

Krupp's "Point 4½"

In March the New York Times reported that Krupp's chief lieutenant, the rather dashing, glamorous Berthold Beiz, had a delightful discussion with our Deputy Undersecretary of State Robert D. Murphy. Herr Beiz and his associates briefed Mr. Murphy on a Krupp plan supposedly aimed at thwarting Russian penetration in Asia and Africa. Using all of the tricks of slick advertising and public relations, the Krupp program was dubbed by its sponsors as the "Point 4½ Program," named after the well known American Point Four project to help underdeveloped countries. Krupp proposed that a syndicate of German, British, French and American firms be formed to exploit important areas of Africa and Asia. According to one report (La Tribune des Nations, 3-23-56), Krupp's representative told Mr. Murphy "that the remarkable success recently achieved by my firm in Asia and the Middle East especially qualify it to become the basic center for the preparation of the projects to be realized by the industrial syndicate." Without batting an eyelash, Herr Beiz declared that the choice of Krupp as the director of the syndicate "would eliminate all accusations of a new colonialism . . ." In commenting on Krupp's magnanimous offer, this same French journal noted that his anti-imperialism was fraudulent and was nothing more than a "well chosen perfect pretext to obtain the confidence of Washington." What has bothered Herr Krupp and is tempting his colleagues to dip their hands in the till of the U. S. Treasury, is the fact that interest on credits for German export run as high as 6 to 9 percent. It is these rates of interest which hamper Herr Krupp and impel him to run to Washington. That Herr Krupp and his associates are banking on Uncle Sam to foot the bill was admitted by the Economic Minister of the Bonn Government, Ludwig Erhard: "The master plan is apparently based on the assumption that the Americans will give the credits and the Germans will get the contracts" (London Financial Times, 5-1-56).

Krupp and the Russians

The fact that Krupp, a major war criminal and a devoted Hitler supporter, should now pose as the great benefactor of the colonial peoples should in itself cast suspicions on the motives which guide the Germans. Equally fraudulent are the Krupp interests' efforts to affect the role of a long term foe of Communist imperialism. It was the Krupps who played a leading part in developing Russia's industrial war potential after World War I. With the aid and cooperation of the German General Staff and the Weimar Republic, Krupp established a number of factories in Russia which were lated to armament production. While Krupp was actively collaborating with the Russians via the German General Staff, one of his directors, Dr. Wiedtfeld, was appointed ambassador to the United States. In this important position, Wiedtfeld helped to bring about successive waves of American investments in Germany. Thus, Krupp specifically and German industry in general had the best of both worlds: money from the United States and military cooperation with the Russians. Through these contacts with the East and the West, Krupp and his Ruhr friends were able to revive Germany's power, thereby laying the groundwork for the resurgence of German militarism under Hitler. One might say that Herr Beiz has been appointed to play the same role as Herr Wiedtfeld in the 1920s.

Krupp's love affair with the Russians is by no means dead and buried. On the contrary, the romance appears to have received new life. According to the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (2-10-56), one of Germany's leading newspapers, representatives of Krupp and of the Soviet Embassy have been discussing "the question of delivery of Krupp locomotives to the Soviet Union . . ." This newspaper further states. "business talks had already been carried on previously between representatives of the firm of Krupp and Russian economic authorities by way of the Russian Delegation to the Federal Republic and in Moscow."

It is noteworthy that at the Leipzig Fair, held in the Soviet zone a few months ago, 1589 West German concerns participated, a number far greater than that of any other western country. The New York Times correspondent, reporting on the fair noted: "By way of introduction to Soviet visitors there is a discreet notice next to the Krupp office explaining the company's operations. The notice is written in Russian and is entitled 'From our production program.' It lists the numerous articles produced in the factories of the Krupp empire. Even more discreet is a smaller notice set in what resembles a restaurant menu stand. It contains a handsome photograph of Alfred Krupp, the present owner. There is a brief description of him followed by the names of the board of managers and a list of the principal divisions of the Krupp enterprises." (N. Y. Times, 2-27-56).

Alfred Krupp himself has stated unequivocally that Germany's economic progress and interests are closely bound up with the markets controlled by the Soviets. In an interview with the magazine World (May 1954) he said: "In the long run West Germany cannot continue her economic advancement without being reunited with East Germany, because both parts of Germany must be considered an organic whole. An expansion of trade volume (with East Germany and Soviet-bloc countries) would without doubt contribute considerably to a solution of West Germany's export problems."

"Let the peoples extend the hand of friendship and forgiveness to each other" —Sir Winston Churchill

The Double Game

Just as Herr Krupp has been playing both sides of the street, so have his fellow industrialists. Ordinarily, the German press tries to becloud Germany's trade relations with the East including Communist China. Nevertheless, trade with that area of the world has been growing rapidly. The West will never know the value of such trade because official figures are misleading, to say the least. Yet, it is a fact that this trade is attaining decisive importance to the Germans and they are busily working behind the scenes to undermine present Allied restrictions on this traffic.

On the eve of Adenauer's visit to Moscow, a New York Herald Tribune report (9-4-55) disclosed that important German businessmen were beginning to drum up a campaign for a more active eastern trade policy. One of the chief arguments put forth by these interests, was that the destiny of Germany depended on the eastern markets. "It is their special preserve. There is a great tradition of German-Russian trade. It is the duty of this generation of German businessmen not to allow the preeminent experience of their forefathers in the Slav market to go down the drain."

Following Adenauer's trip to Moscow, the New York Times revealed that important sections of German industry looked hopefully for the revival of trade with the Soviet bloc. The pressure of these interests, the Times reported, "gave rise to the suspicion that there was perhaps more interest in the Soviet market than the Bonn Government, for political reasons, was prepared to admit." In this connection, studies were made which indicated that German exports to the East could go as high as $1 billion annually, and the Times correspondent noted that these ambitious plans have not been discarded. He observed that, since the German Government's experts drew up the plans in the first place, "it would appear to contradict the . . . propaganda line that trade with the Soviet Union does not have a future" (9-18-55).

A few months ago, prominent German industrialists made a highly publicized trip to key areas of Asia and Africa. Among the bigwigs on this German junket was Alfred Krupp. An Associated Press dispatch (2-6-56), describing the venture, declared that it was a drive "designed to counter the Soviet bloc's economic overtures in Asia and Africa." The report which seemed to bear the earmarks of a handout from the public relations machine of the Ruhr industry designed for American consumption, emphasized that "Communist China is being bypassed by the German industrial visitors." However, the German people have been given a far different version of the meaning and objectives of this trip.

While the German industrialists did not visit China proper, they did stop at Hongkong. According to the Stuttgarter Nachrichten (2-11-56), information on trade, etc., with regard to Communist China "can be obtained directly from the German business men located in Hongkong. In the final analysis Hongkong, the direct gate to Red China, is the most important port for transshipment in the Red China trade." The story that the trip was aimed at countering the Soviets does not carry weight with the Germans. The same newspaper declared that "it would be misjudging the purpose of the Asian trip of the German industrial delegation to assume that it was primarily designed to counteract and attack the trade-political offensive of the East bloc." Indeed, this influential paper did not seem to be at all disturbed about the inroads made by the Soviet Union in Asia and Africa. It expressed the belief that there was sufficient room for German expansion in these regions and that the Soviet trade offensive should not be regarded as though it had inexhaustible resources. "Thus, this Asia trip primarily serves the preparation for participation of German industry in the coming business for development in Asia."

It is interesting to note that this German newspaper envisaged not only Soviet competition but also strong competitive activity by the Western powers. In spite of these difficulties the paper is confident that the Germans will grab their share, come what may. The tone of the article is one of optimism. There is no dark picture of the Soviet Union approaching the point of swallowing up all of Asia and Africa. This is good propaganda for America, but the Germans who look upon the Eastern markets as "their special preserve" have other ideas.

"Partnership"

The spurious character of the so-called economic partnership proposed by the Germans, may also be seen by the fact that they are doing everything possible to undermine the position of the United States in other world markets. In the No. 43 issue of Prevent World War III, the Society analyzed the Krupp economic offensive against the West. We noted that Krupp together with other industrial warlords of the Ruhr were undercutting the United States and her Allies in India, the Balkans and in South America. In the No. 46 issue of Prevent World War III we returned to the subject pointing out that Krupp's economic penetration throughout the world was strongly backed by the Bonn Government. It was stated that much of this financial assistance to Krupp and his cronies was made possible through the Marshall Plan aid.

The economic offensive continues. The attack is becoming more formidable by the retrustification and recartelization of German heavy industry. In South America, the Krupps, the

"The Krupp public relations machine rang another strange-sounding bell yesterday when Chancellor Adenauer congratulated Mrs. Bertha Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach on the occasion of her 70th birthday. She's the Krupp matriarch after whom 'Big Bertha,' the German gun that shelled Paris in World War I, was named. Big Bertha's most famous shot landed 38 years ago today, Good Friday, 1918, on the Church of St. Gervais, killing and wounding 156 persons."

(By Theodore Kaghan, N. Y. Post, 3-30-56)

"To the reports from Washington, the firm of Friedrich Krupp states that the talks held by its chief authorized agent Beitz with the State Department were not based on the intention to begin an economic offensive towards the East or to participate in such an action.

". . . The firm of Friedrich Krupp did not entertain any political aims in the talks with the State Department . . ."

(Frankfurter Allgemeine, 3-21-56)

Mannesmanns, the Siemens, and other members of the German monopoly "club" are grabbing one market after another. The New York Herald Tribune (1-30-56) describes the drive as follows: "West Germany has already recaptured a large slice of the Brazilian market. Establishment of Krupp iron, steel and other heavy industrial plants will extend Germany's position in Brazil still more." The same situation holds true for Argentina, Colombia, Venezuela and Mexico. Thus, the U. S. News & World Report (2-17-56) notes: "Trade offensives aren't a monopoly of the Soviet bloc . . . West German businessmen—groups of them—are mounting an offensive of their own. You run into a group drumming up business in Mexico and Central America and heading toward South America."

A heavily trustified industrial Ruhr backed by the full support of the Bonn Government and taking advantage of the extreme low living standards of the German workers, has made the German trade assault a reality in the grimmest sense of the word. No wonder, American businessmen are showing concern and Business Week (5-12-56) admits that the Germans are "becoming a real challenge to American companies in international markets."

The Real Objective

It is against the background of these facts, incomplete as they are, that one must weigh the proposals to enlargen the economic mission of NATO. In principle, this is a praiseworthy objective. It is clear that Soviet tactics are now of such a character that purely military remedies no longer suffice. There is no doubt that the free world could accomplish much in terms of the extension of democracy through a bold program of aid to countries which are less fortunate economically than ourselves. On the other hand, it would be well to bear in mind Germany's "cavalry" tactics. A columnist in the German language newspaper "Aufbau," Joseph L. Oppenheimer, described the maneuver in these words: "Germany, eyeing overseas potential as its industry continues to rebound remarkably, would like nothing better than the backing of a Western Alliance of some type for its foreign business activities. NATO sponsorship, possibly under the guise of need to keep West Germany as a strong anti-Moscow force, would be ideal" (5-11-56).

Does Germany hope to undermine the economic position of her neighbors on the world markets and to achieve a predominating influence in Asia and Africa with the financial help of the United States? This is the key question that must be answered with regard to plans to enlargen NATO's economic role. In this connection we are reminded of an observation made by Sefton Delmer, the noted British journalist, when he was in Moscow during Adenauer's visit there. He wrote that the Chancellor would like to get an agreement with the Russians which "while leaving the Americans confident of his loyalty to them, would nevertheless make it clear that he is more valuable to the Russians and that the U. S. must pay more to keep them loyal" (9-12-55). If Germany's ambitions, as described in this article, are realized, then Adenauer's mission to Moscow will have paid off.

KRUPP'S CONFESSION

"The economy required an undisturbed or rising development. Due to the struggle between the numerous German parties and confusion there was no possibility for constructive activity. We Krupp people are no idealists but realists. My father was a diplomat. We were under the impression that Hitler would present us with such a sound development. As a matter of fact he did so.

". . . There are no ideals. Life is a struggle to stay alive, for bread and power. I speak frankly, for that is necessary in this bitter hour of our defeat. In this hard struggle, we were in need of hard men and strong leadership. Hitler gave us both. During the years of his leadership we all felt better.

"I said, that all Germans gave support to Hitler. The majority of the people were behind the government . . . The entire nation endorsed the main elements of the policy which Hitler pursued. We Krupp people were never much concerned with what went on in life. We only wanted a system which would function well and give us an opportunity for unhindered work. Politics is not our concern . . .

"When I was questioned about the anti-Jewish policies of the Nazis and what I knew about them, I said that I knew nothing about the extermination of the Jews, and added: 'When you buy a good horse you have to put up with a few defects.' "

CONGRESSMAN STERLING COLE

A pro-German lobby in Washington has been working assiduously to have the Trading with the Enemy Act nullified so that German interests, such as I. G. Farben, would be able to regain their former properties in the United States. Because of the importance of this issue, we have reprinted the major part of a statement on that subject by Representative Sterling Cole (R. New York). Congressman Cole's statement was made before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives.

Allow me to forecast to you what will happen if these vested assets are returned to their former owners as is seriously urged upon the Congress by some persons.

A return of these properties would:

1. Require substantial and indefinite appropriations from the Federal treasury.
2. Reverse the present policy of the United States and its World War II allies with respect to reparations, and deprive this country completely of all reparations.
3. Open up a huge pork barrel to the old enemy cartels without whose backing Hitler could not have forced the World to the very brink of disaster.
4. Provide a gift or windfall of some $200,000,000 to individuals and organizations, some of whom are not even of German or Japanese nationality.
5. Enable the recapture, through devious means, of the huge business enterprises by the very persons they were taken from—in some instances in both World Wars.
6. Endanger the security of secret processes essential to the defense of the United States.

These, as I see it, are the principal objections to a return of the properties. But let us look at these objections more closely.

The first point is appropriations, the cost to us as taxpayers, and I don't need to remind you of the widespread demand these days that taxes be reduced.

The value of all of the vested properties under consideration here is better than a half billion dollars. That is the basic cost figure with which we must begin.

Around $225,000,000 of these properties have already been liquidated and the monies transferred to the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission and disbursed to thousands of our citizens (prisoners of war, internees both civilian and military, religious organizations, etc.) who were the victims of suffering or damage, one or another, in the last war. So, over $225,000,000 must be replaced immediately in our Treasury if the policy of property return is adopted.

This is what we might call a "down payment," and that is exactly what it is.

However, all of the property under question here is valued at well over a half billion dollars. This is property now held by the United States Government, and if it is given back, it must be replaced in our Treasury. So with a return we will make the second down payment of around $300,000,000 if our Government makes good on its promise to compensate our own citizens for their war damages. Now we are up to the half billion dollar mark.

And there could be more, much more. For instance, what about enemy property located in the territories of our allies? Under our leadership, all of them seized this enemy property. And they also agreed to retain it. Also, they gave up in return for such retention the right to any other reparations from our former enemies. These are our agreements. We made them.

Now, if we reverse ourselves and return the property we have in our possession, who is going to pay the bill of our allies for the damages which their citizens suffered? Remember, this is our doing. After the United States made these arrangements by international treaties and agreements, our allies certainly had a right to rely on us. So now if we reverse ourselves certainly we will be called upon to pay this additional bill, and maybe we will have to do so.

This will add at least $300,000,000 to our cost—that is, the amount of property our allies reported to the Inter-Allied Reparations Agency they had seized.

Now our total is over $800,000,000—over three-quarters of a billion dollars! That is the price tag attached to the policy of property return. Do you want to buy it? I surely do not!

Now, let us look at the second point, reparations. This is a point that seems to be overlooked generally.

Much has been said in the press and in Congressional hearings about the sanctity of private property—that Governments should not seize it—and that such seizure is a complete reversal of our historic policy, followed in World War I—of retaining custody of enemy private property during hostilities, and then returning it after the war is over.

Yes, that is what we did in World War I, but that turned out to be quite a mistake—one that cost the United States billions of dollars. Any one can be forgiven for making a mistake once, but to make the same mistake twice is both foolish and unpardonable.

After World War I we returned the enemy property we had seized—and received in return Germany's solemn promise that she would pay the war claims of our citizens. Of course, Germany defaulted. We gave up our collateral in return for a scrap of paper. Many of these claims are still unpaid.

Thirty years have passed — another world conflict is history—and in 1953, mind you—just 3 years ago—Germany again solemnly promised to pay these World War I—not World War II—but World War I claims. She says she will do it over a period of 26 years. If she does—I say "if"—some of our citizens will have waited about 56 years for the payment of their claims against Germany

Will Germany default again? You may say we should not speculate on such a question, but the prospects are not bright . . .

World War II is over—the victorious allies met with their defeated enemies—the subject of reparations was under consideration—everyone knew of Germany's default on reparations after World War I—no one wanted that to happen again—so it was agreed that the enemy property that had been seized in the territory of each of the allies, would be retained by them—in lieu of any other reparations payments.

Remember that—"in lieu of any other reparations payments." We lost once—neither we, nor our allies, want that to happen again. Germany has agreed to this plan. In 1952, she signed the Bonn Convention agreeing that this property should be retained by the allies as their only reparations—and agreeing that she would compensate her own nationals for their losses due to property seizures by the allied powers.

Now this made sense. It would appear that we had refused to make the same mistake of World War I all over again . . .

But listen to this! On March 7, 1954, Chancellor Adenauer appealed to the United States to return the vested German property.

So—just two years after another solemn agreement—the Bonn Agreement of 1952—we have the first move to cancel it.

So here we go again—down the same old disastrous and costly road. This German appeal is based on the historic policy of the sanctity of private property. Can't we see that we are talking about reparations—and not private property?

Can't we remember that obtaining reparations after fighting a victorious war is also a historic policy?

Can't we see—are we so blind not to see that the pressure to enact this legislation for return of the properties is coming from a few selfish people—the old notorious cartels that backed the Nazi machine in its attempt at world conquest? How blind and stupid and soft-hearted and fickle do they think we are?

This leads to my next point.

Under point 3, let's look at the cartel angle involved here. The name, "I. G. Farben is notorious the world over.

Here is the world's greatest chemical trust—the one that gave to the murderous Hitler the technical know-how he needed. The one whose branches, spread throughout the world, constituted the greatest network for economic espionage ever seen. The one that was able to keep from us the secrets of synthetic rubber, among other things, when we needed that knowledge for our war effort. And the same one—I. G. Farben—that ordered destroyed—and the orders were carried out—a nitro cellulose plant located at Afton Lake, New York. Nitro cellulose is the basis of high explosives, and the plant was destroyed—on orders from Germany—at the time Hitler started his invasion of Europe. It took us two years to replace that destroyed potential of war production.

These are the type of people a return of the property would aid—these and their fronts—not the little man, the little German, for whom it may be possible to generate some sympathy, but the big business tycoons and international financial brigands.

That brings me to the next point—the windfall, bonus, or gift—call it what you will—that would be involved in a return of the property, and this is the most compelling argument of all against the proposed return.

When these properties were seized, they were much smaller than they are today, both in size and in value.

Their increased values all were brought by American management backed by American labor and American know-how.

Let's look at just a few of them—increase in value since 1942: General Aniline and Film Corporation—from $35,000,000 to $106,000,000. Schering Corporation from $1,300,000 to its sales price of $30,000,000. Spur Distributing Co.—from $1,000,000 to $3,000,000. Karl Lieberknecht, from $365,000 to $6,500,000.

These are just a few. The increased value of all the properties—this windfall—bonus, or what have you—is close to $200,000,000. Of all the "give-aways" this is the most flagrant and unjustified. You may wish to be a party to such an outrage, Mr. Chairman, but I hope you will excuse me.

Let us go to the next point.

It is the plan of the United States and its allies, solemnized by international agreements and treaties to not only keep this enemy property, but to try and make sure that it would never fall into enemy hands.

In World War I, the then Custodian, after he had sold the German Bosch properties to citizens of our country, proudly announced that never again would this company fall into alien hands. Within a very few years, however, Robert Bosch of Germany had regained ownership of

FOOTNOTE TO CONGRESSMAN COLE'S STATEMENT

It appears that the pro-German lobby seeking the release of properties in the United States formerly belonging to the I. G. Farben cartel, has unlimited financial resources at its disposal. Representative Leo W. O'Brien stated that legal expenditures to regain these properties, have run to over $750,000 in only two years. Congressman O'Brien noted that this sum does not give the whole picture since legal action by the Farben interests started about eight years ago. It goes without saying that such huge financial sums can be most effective in artificially whipping up public opinion to further the Farben cause. Yet, we are sure that the overwhelming majority of the American people are outraged over these scandalous activities.

Many Americans wonder why Senator Dircksen has worked so diligently for the return of these properties to the former enemy. It is also a puzzle that Senator Olin Johnston should meet with Chancellor Adenauer in the German Embassy in Washington to discuss this subject when, after all, this matter is a domestic affair. We hope that it won't be long before the American people are in the possession of all of the facts concerning the activities of the pro-German lobby.

the Corporation. The American purchasers had resold the firm to its original owners.

Came World War II, and Bosch property was again vested in our Alien Property Custodian. It was sold again in 1948, but this time in order to forestall a return to alien ownership, the Certificate of Incorporation was amended so as to restrict the ownership of the stock to American nationals.

The same thing was done when Schering Corporation was sold. This technique was applied in other sales.

Our Government believed that these companies should move into the American economy, and stay there.

This is one of the basic purposes of my Bill, H. R. 80, to sell these companies into our economy. And they should be kept there.

All this leads me to my last point. One that involves the security of our nation, and should be of paramount importance in your consideration.

Let us use but one example—General Aniline and Film Corporation.

This is the major holding of our Alien Property Custodian, the largest single reparation we have, and the greatest I. G. Farben property taken from our former enemies by any allied custodian. This company has two of its principal plants in my district, as I have said, and consequently I am greatly interested in it, as well as the entire alien property problem.

This company has many secret processes that today are part of our defense effort. Some of them are so secret that it would be dangerous to even apply for a patent, and thereby risk exposure. It is working closely with our Government and the Department of Defense.

This property was vested from a Swiss Corporation, now loud in its protestations of neutrality and innocence. The Department of Justice says that this Swiss claimant was and is a cloak for I. G. Farben of Germany.

The reluctance of the Swiss to come to issue and trial of this question, and they brought suit in 1947 for return of the property, would indicate there is more here than meets the eye.

Now we know the Germans are expert at cloaking or hiding their external assets. We learned that in two world wars. They want this company with its treasure trove of dollars and know-how—American developed know-how and American dollar earnings.

Representatives of the Swiss cloak deny this, and have even testified they want to "Americanize" the company, that they will sell it to Americans, but only after it is first returned to them.

Now if this were true, all they would have to do is to stipulate with the Department of Justice so as to allow our Government to make the sale. The lawsuit would then continue for the money resulting from such a sale. This is just what my bill would allow.

The Department of Justice conducts these sales in public, to the highest qualified bidder. It has done so for years, and the sales have been successful. In this way, the retention of this great corporation by American owners could be made certain.

But no—the Swiss cloak won't agree to this. They want General Aniline back in their hands and what they will do with it no one can be sure

They, by this stand, obviously want more than money.

Mr. Chairman, this problem has beset the Congress for many years since World War II. It is saturated with cross currents of conflicting interest, pressures, influences, and lobbyists. It is time to have it settled with finality. . . .

PLAIN TALK—BUT WHEN?

Why can't we get from American officials the kind of plain talk about the Soviets Mr. Adenauer gives us?

(From editorial, N. Y. World Telegram & Sun, 6-12-56)

Chancellor Adenauer said today his Moscow talks convinced him the Soviets urgently desire a long period of peace . . .

Speaking of the Soviets' desire for peace, he continued:

"From all our negotiations and private talks in Moscow I was fully convinced that Soviet Russia really wants a security system.

"She has such a vast quantity of internal tasks to fulfill that she wants to devote her whole strength to this. This is not merely a short term proposition, though it is impossible to predict for how long it will be.

"But I think it would be false judgment not to accept this as a reality.

"The Soviets feel a real need for a relaxation of world tension and I think we have helped this by accepting direct diplomatic relations with the Soviets which will enable us also to work with them for a period of peace in the world."

(U. P., 9-16-55)

"But our own experiences have been too bitter and we have seen too clearly the meaning of communism, the methods it uses, and the diabolic skill with which its progaganda operates not to react to the latest events in Moscow with the utmost skepticism . . .

"As far as the Soviets are concerned, 'peaceful co-existence' which they had used advantageously before—is merely another technical phase in their campaign to weaken the cohesion of the free world and to improve their own position.

"The men in the Kremlin are still not prepared to remove the main causes of the tension in the world . . .

"I consider the new tactics of the Soviet Union more dangerous than the former aggressive conduct since it plays upon the longing for peace which lives in all men."

Inside Germany

INTERNATIONAL CONSPIRACY

"There can, indeed, be only one reason for neo-Nazi activity which contradicts the normal German voter's urge toward political quiet and reasonably sane middle-of-the-road parties. This is that right-wing radicalsm is kept alive in Germany mainly by the efforts of the 'Nazi-International.'

"Observers in Bonn have traced the increasing acivity of former Nazis who travel between Germany and the main centers of the international—Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Egypt and Argentina. They often work for import-export firms and agencies and for German motor manufacturers.

"They are able to tap 'buried' Nazi assets abroad, which may be providing the main financial backing for Nationalist activities inside Germany."

FACTS TO CONSIDER

"The Federal Executive Committee and the Area Chairmen of the Metal Workers' Union for the Federal Republic of Germany dealt with the question of the rebirth of right wing radical and neofascist organisations, and the danger they constitute to the young Republic, at their meeting on the 22nd of February 1956. In numerous right wing radicalist publications democratic institutions are reviled and dragged through the dirt in a most disgusting manner. It is the intention of these reactionary and neofascists elements to destroy our democratic way of life.

"The Federal Government has given impetus to these developments, insofar as that they have made it possible for active Nazis to once again hold responsible positions within the political framework of our country.

"There are also developments taking place within the German judiciary which give grave cause for anxiety. The Ansbach judgment, and the verdict of 'not guilty' in favour of the former Colonel Ohm during the Penzburg murder trial are examples that show that our judicial system is not free from nazi tendencies . . ."

HOPES

"Wide hopes of a further strengthening of trade between the USSR and the Federal Republic are being entertained in circles of the West German steel industry; special thought is given to exports of special grades of West-German steel. These expectations are being justified on the ground that the USSR wants to substantially expand its metal-using industries within the scope of its sixth Five-Year Plan and that probably it will not be able to meet the ensuing need for steel from its domestic sources.

"For this reason the steel industry in the Federal Republic has already undertaken suitable preliminary steps to make possible the smoothest exchange of goods within the steel sector . . ."

A FAVORITE ALBUM

Records can be bought in Schleswig-Holstein, and also in Bavaria, of a speech allegedly made by Hitler "in the best of health" during this year, 1956. The fraudulently manufactured record is aimed at ever-existing dupes and is being offered, luxuriously packed, at the high price of 50 marks; sure enough, there are buyers for it. One agent is said to have sold 8,000 marks worth of records in one month. It cannot be ascertained why the police do not take action against this public nuisance.

The speech, as recorded, contains typical Hitlerian impudences and threats of death, and the speaker, evidently no mean imitator, also says: "I am alive and you will soon hear from me." Women especially, just as in the old days, are said to be over-eager to obtain the record.

No End to Broken Pledges

"If there is anything to be gained by being honest, let us be honest; if it is necessary to deceive, let us deceive."
Frederick the Great (1712-1786)

Hitler's seizure of power in 1933 caused much concern in foreign capitals over Germany's willingness and determination to abide by its international obligations. Aware that the Nazis' intentions were suspect, Hitler tried to create the impression that his gangster tactics in domestic affairs would have no effect on Germany's behavior toward other countries. Thus, on May 21, 1935, Hitler told his rubber stamp Reichstag, "the German Government will scrupulously maintain every treaty voluntarily signed, even though it was concluded before its accession to power and office."

Of course, Hitler's real attitude toward pledges and treaties was basically no different from preceding rulers of Germany who regarded treaties as "scraps of paper." Four years after his public promise that the Nazi Government would be faithful to its commitments, Hitler told his military commanders in a secret speech, "agreements are to be kept only as long as they serve a certain purpose." The Fuehrer kept his word on that score. At the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials it was revealed that the Nazis broke at least 69 treaties to which Germany had subscribed between the years 1933-1941.

One of the fond hopes entertained by the Allies in giving all-out support to the present Bonn Government, was that this melancholy record of broken treaties would not be repeated. Indeed, many people accept as fact that the German Federal Republic has scrupulously adhered to its promises since the end of the war. Yet, even a brief survey of how the Federal Republic has comported itself in carrying out its obligations, will show that past practice is very much alive.

In this connection we recall a report appearing in the New York Times (8-3-51) disclosing that the Bonn Government had failed to live up to its commitments on the delivery of steel scrap to the Allied Powers. This particular incident, according to the Times, increased the concern of Allied officials over the fact that the Germans were "welshing on agreements." The Times report mentioned that there were "frequent complaints that the Germans are slow to make any sacrifices themselves for European integration and persistently attempt to whittle down commitments made in the past." One Allied official, speaking about these broken agreements, said: "Are we growing too cynical to remember that one of the reasons we went to war with Germany in 1939 was because we believe such agreements should be kept?" Another Allied official put it this way: "I am pretty tired of seeing the occupation powers make all the compromises. The Germans just never are satisfied." This particular complaint reminds us of Britain's Foreign Minister Austen Chamberlain's reproach to Foreign Minister Stresemann during the 1920s: "Whenever we make a concession to you, instead of acknowledging it, you ask for more."

We have not taken the trouble to tally all of the agreements and pledges which have been vitiated by the Bonn Government, but in any event we can cite some glaring examples of how the Adenauer regime has back-tracked more than once on obligations it has assumed.

Reparations

From the very beginning of the occupation, the Germans vigorously and even violently opposed the Allied policy of reparations and the dismantling of her industrial war potential. In the summer of 1948 the German steel magnates notified Allied officials that they would no longer cooperate in the dismantling of certain plants which had been regarded by the Allies as excessive in terms of Germany's peace-time requirements. The struggle against the reparations policy became even more intense following the establishment of the Bonn Government under Adenauer's leadership. Because the British zone was highly industrialized, the English became the main target of this attack. In October, 1949, the Chancellor himself accused the British Government of "a high degree of stupid stubbornness." One newspaper correspondent observed: "Familiar echoes in this speech of the diplomatic practices of Ribbentrop and Hitler were further enhanced by the fact that the non-official new German news agency D. P. A. carefully omitted mention of Chancellor Adenauer's attack in its report of the speech" (ONA, 10-24-49).

GERMANY WILL REFUSE TO PAY TOWARDS COST OF STATIONING ALLIED TROOPS ON HER SOIL
Dr. Schäffer

(London Daily Mirror)

"REALLY, IT ISN'T FAIR, HERR DOKTOR! AS SOON AS WE GIVE YOU SOVEREIGNTY YOU START BEHAVING AS IF YOU HAVE IT . . ."

That Chancellor Adenauer was using his high position to further the interests of the German steel monopolies was reported in the New York Times (11-21-49). The man who was particularly influential with Dr. Adenauer was Robert Pferdmenges, one of his close advisors and a bigwig in the Vereinigte Stahlwerke (the German steel trust). It was pointed out that Adenauer, in trying to protect the steel interests, sought to tie up the dismantling of plants belonging to the Vereinigte Stahlwerke. The Chancellor's efforts to sabotage the Allied program was partially successful when in the Petersberg Agreement of November 24, 1949, the Allies consented to cut down the dismantling program in favor of the Germans. Commenting on the agreement, the British High Commissioner Sir Brian Robertson declared: "We are clearly not expecting that this agreement should be regarded as a stepping stone for further demands . . . The Chancellor also gave us an assurance that the Federal Government would use its influence and authority to insure that the balance of the dismantling program proceeds expeditiously without obstruction."

The High Commissioner's optimism, however, was unwarranted. Within two months after Adenauer had signed this agreement, he appealed to the Allied Powers to halt the shipment of machine tools from the Krupp steel works which were intended as reparations. In April, 1950, less than five months after he pledged to cooperate with the Allies, Adenauer publicly attacked Allied policy. He not only complained about alleged mistreatment by the Allies, but assailed the dismantling program (N. Y. Times, 4-4-50). Exactly one month after Adenauer aired his latest complaint, sweeping concessions were granted to the Germans as the Allies stopped all work on the dismantling of the Hermann Goering combine. The Goering works had been regarded by the Allies as a key factor in Germany's war potential. Consequently, they were not included among the plants which were to escape dismantling under the Petersberg Agreement. In submitting to the agitation of Adenauer and his fellow politicians, the British High Commissioner, Sir Brian Robertson, said: "I must emphasize that these concessions can be granted only on the understanding that they are regarded as a final settlement." A New York Times reporter noted with irony that the same Allied spokesman "made a similar statement the day following the proclamation of the Petersberg agreement . . ." (N. Y. Times, 5-3-50).

Cartels

As in the case of reparations and dismantling, the Bonn Government showed no enthusiasm for the Allied policy to decartelize and deconcentrate German heavy industry. In view of the notorious record of the German cartels and monopolies, the Allies planned to break them up. This did not deter the Germans from utilizing every means available to emasculate the program. They even employed American lobbyists and lawyers to plead their case. Although the program was crippled by their efforts and by the unsympathetic attitude of certain Allied officials, it managed to survive.

When the Germans began negotiations with the Allies toward the granting of sovereignty, they publicly pledged that they would continue the anti-cartel policy of the Allies even after they had achieved full sovereignty. Chancellor Adenauer made this clear in a letter to James B. Conant, then U. S. High Commissioner for Germany: ". . . the Federal Government will also oppose efforts to repeal or modify Allied legislations which now prohibits restraints of competition and monopolies before the coming into force of a German law containing general provisions against restraints of competition" (10-23-54).

It turned out that there was a yawning gap between promise and fulfillment. The bills presented to the Bundestag on monopolies and cartels have been so full of loopholes and qualifications as to make Bonn's anti-cartel posture a gigantic farce. Thus, the London Financial Times (1-20-56) reported that pending legislation provided for the setting up of German export and import cartels. Other legislation encourages the reestablishment of the German banking monopolies. The New York Times (4-17-56) reported: "Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's government hopes to legalize by 1957 a rebirth of the three great commercial banks that dominated the financial life of Germany during the Hitler era and before."

It is not only the German banks and the export cartels that are given a new lease on life by the Bonn Government. As a matter of fact, Dr. Adenauer has given his blessings to the rebirth of the entire structure of German monopolies and other economic concentrations. The New York Times (3-22-56) noted that the Bonn Government had announced its intention "to open negotiations with the Allies to permit the reconstitution of the great German industrial empires." In point of fact, the reforming of these conglomerations of economic power had been going on even before Germany was granted sovereignty. Today the Bonn regime is merely trying to legalize its violation of a solemn pledge and agreement.

In previous issues of Prevent World War III it was noted that, as the situation is now developing, these monopolies will be even more powerful than they were under Hitler. It is noteworthy too that the principal beneficiary of Adenauer's attempt to make unlawful acts respectable would be Krupp. Chancellor Adenauer himself has gone out of his way to support Krupp's effort to nullify the pledge that he would sell part of his properties.

Rearmament

Following the end of the war there was little public talk among the Germans about reviving the Wehrmacht. Perhaps this was due to the psychological impact experienced by the utter defeat of Hitler's armies. This is not to say that hope did not exist that some day, somehow, the Germans would have a brand new army. As a matter of fact, in January, 1949, before he became Chancellor, Dr. Adenauer told a group of American correspondents that he would not oppose "a forward looking" German army. Of course, he assured his listeners that he objected to the revival of the traditional military caste, but this did not mean that he would be against the formation of a new Wehrmacht "as such." It is not known whether this was a trial balloon or a slip of the tongue but in any event, the Chancellor changed his mind 10 months later. In an interview with a correspondent for a Paris newspaper he said, "I have absolutely no desire for a German army" (11-28-49). Whether this was intended to assuage the feelings of the French is not known. He repeated the same thought in an interview with the Cleveland Plain Dealer (12-4-49): "It must be clear once and for all," he said, "the

I am fundamentally opposed to the rearmament of the German Republic and therefore also against the creation of a new Wehrmacht."

The supposed opposition to the remilitarization of Germany was officially acknowledged by the Bonn Government in the Petersberg Agreement. There it was stated that the Bonn Government pledged "its earnest determination to maintain the demilitarization of the federal territory and to endeavor by all means in its power to prevent the recreation of armed forces of any kind. To this end the Federal Government will cooperate fully with the High Commission in the work of the Military Security Board."

Two months after Adenauer had signed the Petersberg pledge, the New York Times (1-14, 1-15-50) revealed that he had requested a group of German generals to draw up a schedule and a plan for German rearmament! It was noted that these German military officers were organized in the so-called Brüderschaft (Brotherhood) which had chapters in various cities. The Brüderschaft was one of the first para-military organizations to reappear in Germany after the end of the war. Its connections with the Federal Government were not a secret and its policies definitely contemplated the revival of Germany's military might. The militaristic character of the Brüderschaft was analyzed in Prevent World War III (No. 31 issue, September-October, 1949). The New York Times (2-22-50) noted that the "Brotherhood" was sending "plans and mobilization schemes to Dr. Adenauer, Chancellor of the Bonn Government, and other members of his cabinet."

This particular episode was only the beginning. Additional facts continued to leak out of Germany concerning rearmament and militaristic activities. Thus, the New York Staats-Zeitung (9-9-53) reported a speech made by Willy Messerschmidt, the German airplane manufacturer, before the Rhine-Ruhr Club. In this speech Messerschmidt boasted that the Germans could initiate the mass production of airplanes with a minimum of investment. He declared that a great deal was being accomplished for the construction of airplanes, since the beginning of the occupation. He further mentioned that these developments were facilitated by the application of German know-how in foreign countries. It is a fact that Spain was one of the countries which became a laboratory for Germany's rearmament plans.

The New York Times (9-25-53) carried a dispatch from Germany describing "an exhibition of German made military equipment." The Times report observed that "some of these items caused eyebrows to rise for Germany is prevented by the Allied Occupation Statute from manufacturing arms or exclusively military equipment." Among the German firms which displayed military equipment, was none other than Krupp whose leaders today tell the world that they are through making war material.

The Associated Press (9-18-53) reported that the Swiss Government had rejected an application to export hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of military equipment which had been ordered by the Bonn Government. To top it all, the German language newspaper Aufbau (9-25 and 10-2-53) carried an exposé detailing the existence of a powerful German armaments ring operating in Germany, Switzerland, and the State of Liechtenstein. Among the ring leaders were the accused war criminal Hjalmar Schacht, Rudolf Ruschewey, a former German officer who was wanted by the French for war crimes, and an individual by the name of Klein, father-in-law of the late General von Seeckt who helped build up the Red Army.

It should be borne in mind that these activities went on during the same period when Germany had pledged to adhere to the program of demilitarization and disarmament.

German Assets

A major policy pursued by the Allies at the end of the war, was to prevent Germany from regaining assets and loot hidden abroad. The Allies knew that the Germans wanted to keep this wealth under cover and intact until such time as it could be employed again to further Germany's predatory designs. On the other hand, the Allies sought to use these assets to compensate, at least in part, the nations victimized by German aggression.

As in the previous cases mentioned above, the Germans employed every trick imaginable to prevent this program from being implemented. Officially at least, the German Government pretended that it bore no responsibility for this sabotage. Indeed, the Contractual Agreement granting sovereignty to the Germans, contained the following clause: "The Federal Republic shall in the future raise no objections against the measures which have been, or will be, carried out with regard to German external assets or other property, seized for the purpose of reparation or restitution, or as a result of the state of war, or on the basis of agreements concluded, or to be concluded, by the Three Powers with other Allied countries, neutral countries or former allies of Germany."

However, it was not long before Chancellor Adenauer turned his coat again. Directing his request to the United States in the hope that he would receive the necessary support from certain pro-German groups in Washington, he asked President Eisenhower to return these assets alleging that they belonged to Germans who "were always the traditional promoters of friendship between the two nations." While the Chancellor spoke about the need for the return of these assets to foster "good will" and as a token of appreciation for Germany's "brave role" in the struggle against Communism, West German direct exports to Red China were soaring to record heights.

Even before the Chancellor had made pubic his approach to Washington, one of his chief advisors, Herman J. Abs (Hitler's paymaster), had hinted that, unless these former assets were returned, Germany might not be able "to carry out the bargain" with respect to the repayment of Germany's postwar debts. This was in sharp contrast to Adenauer's pledge to fulfill the debt obligations in return for a revision of the Occupation Statute in Germany's favor. That Adenauer suceeded in reducing Germany's postwar debts by $2 billion despite this pledge, did not faze Herr Abs. Now the Germans wanted the United States or, to be more precise, the American taxpayers, to turn over additional hundreds of millions of dollars in the interest of "German-American friendship."

Relations with Soviet Russia

One of the favorite boasts of the Bonn Government is the contention that the Germans have steadfastly rejected Communist blandishments. Time and again, Bonn politicians have assured U. S. policy makers that the Federal Republic could be relied upon to reject any thought of bilateral negotiations at the expense of Allied Powers. Thus, when the Secretary of State for the Bonn Government, Prof. Walter Hallstein, visited the United States in 1953, he categorically declared that Chancellor Adenauer would "never! never!" negotiate with Russia. The Chancellor himself told American audiences during his visits here that the Bonn Government would have nothing to do with the Soviets. In October, 1953, he told a correspondent for the United Press that the Allies must not crawl after the Russians. "There is no point in continuing to chase after them (the Russians). We merely hurt our own objective of reaching an understanding with the Russians." As for the Germans, Dr. Adenauer told his interviewer that "he most certainly would not go to Moscow himself to try to reach a direct agreement with the Russians." Prior to his trip to Moscow in September, 1955, Adenauer repeated this line. What happened in Moscow needs no further comment.

So It Was — So It Is

In other instances the Germans have used surreptitious means to escape from their solemn commitments and obligations. They undermined the Allied program to limit Germany's steel capacity by helping to build up steel production in the Soviet zone; they made enormous profits through the sale of strategic materials to the Soviet bloc; they secretly gave aid and comfort to the neo-Nazi and anti-French elements in the Saar; and even today when they are granted the right to rearm, they find all sorts of excuses to justify their stalling tactics. The fact is that the path of Germany's resurgence to power is strewn with broken pledges and agreements. Of course, when the situation suits their purposes, the Germans demonstrate a marked fidelity to commitments. Thus, they give full support to the clause in the Contractual Agreement whereby the Germans are no longer obligated to give financial support to Allied forces in Germany after May, 1956. On this head they are insistent that the agreement be carried out to the letter—but not the spirit.

The German record of broken pledges would not be complete without some comment on Allied responsibility. It cannot be maintained that the Allies were unaware of Germany's propensity to tear up agreements. Thus, there was no valid reason why the Allies could not have coped with German duplicity. The fact is that from the very beginning of the occupation, certain Allied officials in high places connived with the Germans behind the backs of their own governments. There were other officials in key posts who "looked the other way" while the Germans and their friends in Military Government were sabotaging Allied policies. This "tolerant" attitude was defended on the grounds that Germany was indispensable to Western civilization. Those who provided this rationale, forgot that one of the basic principles of a civilized community is faithful adherence to contract. Nor did these same people bother to explain how respect for international obligations and lawful agreements is strengthened against totalitarian attacks from the outside if aid and comfort is given to lawlessness from within. By permitting the Germans to run roughshod over their obligations, these "practical realists" have encouraged the rebirth of that German spirit which never felt bound by the norms of civilized communities.

"... Whether the Germans will remain democratic through periods of adversity and stress remains to be seen. At present, employment and production are high; the land is busy and prosperous; war damage to plants and buildings is largely repaired. So long as things go well, several persons remarked, the Germans will not again follow a fuehrer. But let things take a bad turn—then, they said, 'comes the question mark.' Many Germans seem far more likely to yield to authoritarian leadership in periods of adversity than do, say, most Britons, Frenchmen, Scandinavians, Canadians or Americans. I met few Germans who denied this. It may not be a matter of German 'temperament,' but it is distinctly a corollary of the Germans' limited experience with democracy ..."

(Ralph C. Epstein, Freedom & Union, Nov., 1955)

"Less than a decade ago, an American War Crimes court at Nuremberg sentenced him to 12 years imprisonment for employment of slave labor and plundering Nazi-occupied territory ...

"... Alfred Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, whose Krupp-Essen combine is today estimated to control almost half a billion dollars worth of assets ranging from coal and steel holdings to his 60 factories producing everything from sausages to false teeth, is touring the 'uncommitted' and 'underdeveloped' areas of the world with his own Point IV program of aid.

"Krupp is merely spearheading for a powerful group of Bonn-blessed German industrialists a new economic 'drang nach osten' . . ."

"PRIVATE BUSINESS"

"West German trade with the Soviet Union is increasing sharply as the Russians push for a Bonn-Moscow commercial agreement.

". . . The business is all private—between German businessmen and Soviet buying agencies. German exporters have been selling the Russians ships, machinery, steel and sheet metal products, among others. The Russians have been selling the Germans pig iron, cotton, furs, phosphates, wood and aluminum."

(St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 5-4-56)

"The (German war) criminals, isolated and separated from the martyrs and heroes, have also come to serve a function in the German people's guilt complex. They become a means of releasing the people's pent-up feelings. Sorge, Schubert and Clauberg have become a species of 'scapegoat,' and the whole indignation of the German people is vented on these three men as if they alone were the guilty ones. On these men are fastened not only their own crimes but the guilt of others, particularly of those who remained passive while the crimes were being committed. Thus, by loading these men with the guilt the German people should bear, the latter achieve absolution. No one as yet has had the courage to state that the German nation, German society as a whole, bears even some responsibility for the crimes which were committed in its name and which were bred and fostered by it."

German Social Democrats: Past and Present

In recent times, the problem of leadership in Western Germany has become the subject of much speculation among political commentators and newspaper correspondents. The knowledge that Chancellor Adenauer's age, no less than his decline in popularity, may remove him from the political stage, has bothered many people. There are some who feel that he is irreplaceable. This view is based on the assumption that it is Adenauer's personality and his authoritarian manner of governing which have been responsible for Germany's post-war successes. It is implied that after Adenauer, "chaos" will follow and that the forces making for totalitarianism and anti-Westernism will emerge stronger than ever.

On the other hand, there are a number of "experts" on Germany who insist that all is not lost even if Adenauer must depart from the scene. They declare that there is a great body of public opinion in Germany influenced by the Social Democrats, that can be depended upon to uphold the democratic way of life, come what may. Indeed, the people who take this position, have charged our State Department with being too one-sided in its support of Chancellor Adenauer.

That Adenauer has been the great favorite of the State Department can hardly be disputed. However, the question at hand is whether the Social Democrats can provide a more reliable as well as more democratic leadership than that which Adenauer has displayed. This is not to say that we believe that the Chancellor has done a good job. On the contrary, as we have shown in other articles in this and in previous issues of Prevent World War III, there has been little house-cleaning under Adenauer as well as too many question marks concerning Germany's trustworthiness.

But to return to the Social Democrats—what can we expect from them? Without trying to apply a psychiatric analysis, we are tempted to describe the Social Democratic leadership as schizophrenic. Judging from the record, it has been suffering from a split personality for decades.

Aside from ideological considerations, there is no doubt that German Social Democrats have contributed much to democracy and culture. Many of their leaders were in the forefront in the fight against militarism and Junkerism. They have courageously opposed assorted brands of totalitarianism, whether of the Red or the Brown variety. Even today there are many among them who give us cause to feel that the future of Germany is not all together black.

Yet, with all this said, past history shows that among the Social Democrats a peculiar predilection existed toward supporting German militarism, albeit under the guise of democratic slogans. This duality of personality may be illustrated by the story of the prominent German Socialist leader, Haase. Three days before the outbreak of World War I, Herr Haase solemnly declared at Brussels that the German workers would oppose war to the utmost. Three days later Herr Haase voted for the war budget proposed by the Imperial Government of Germany. The attitude of the Social Democrats towards the Kaiser and his ambitious generals was described by a leading German Social Democrat, Gustav Noske: "The overwhelming majority of the Social-Democratic Party stood behind Moltke and Hindenburg; the tremendous political and economic organization of the Party and its press with a circulation of over a million copies, undertook to strengthen the morale of the men in the trenches" (The War and the Social Democracy, 1915, page 16).

After the end of World War I we find this same part of the split personality busily at work. In 1918, the leaders of the German Social-Democratic party sought to maintain the authority of the Imperial Government against the growing dissatisfaction and opposition of the German people. When this was no longer possible, the Social Democratic leaders established secret contact with the German General Staff. A deal was worked out whereby the General Staff would support the Social Democratic leaders who then headed the government, while the Social Democrats would carry out the basic policies of the General Staff. Details of this agreement were revealed by General Groener during a sensational trial in 1925. Of course, the world was ignorant of this "quid pro quo" affair and was misled to believe that with the overthrow of the Kaiser, German democracy had triumphed. However, the true state of affairs was described in blunt terms by another leader of the Social Democrats, Otto Braun: "Only incredible political shortsightedness could have assumed that a great, culturally advanced and profoundly warlike people like the Germans would tolerate such a state of imposed defenselessness permanently" (From Weimar to Hitler, page

Adenauer: "And who shall be Commander-in-Chief of our defense army?"

(Aus "Frankenpost," Hof)

207). Thus, the Weimar Republic turned out to be a valuable camouflage for the resurgence of German militarism.

During the Hitler regime the Social Democratic leadership was decimated. Many leaders were bruitally tortured while others courageously fought the tyranny. Nevertheless, even during this period we find certain leaders who tried to make a distinction between the Nazis and the German people. They sought to convey the impression that the overwhelming majority of the German people were violently opposed to the Nazis. When war broke out, these same leaders warned the West in haughty tones that the peace which would follow, must be of a kind that would give Germany a rightful place in world affairs. In the United States a number of Social Democrats aired their views through the so-called Council for a Democratic Germany. When the Council was founded in 1944 at the height of the war, it released a statement to the press (just before D-Day) which declared: ". . . It must not be forgotten that the masses of German opponents of Nazism were the first ones to suffer defeat at the hands of National Socialism; that they did not want war . . . It would be disastrous for the future Europe if Germany were to be torn asunder, politically or economically . . . It is essential for the economic future of Europe that the productive power of Germany be preserved . . . The German people should be given a peace which, in spite of the burdens it may impose, they can regard as Just." As one can see, these are not the thoughts of people who show a sense of humility and contrition for the crimes committed by the Germans. It is rather a brazen declaration announcing Germany's postwar ambitions which must not be challenged by her victims.

During the first years of the Allied occupation in Germany the Social Democratic leadership continued to exhibit its split personality. On the one hand, they showed themselves to be a tireless force in the efforts to build democracy in Germany. They maintained ceaseless vigilance over the machinations of the Communists. So much for the positive side.

Their anti-Nazism did not deter unremitting attacks against the Allied occupation. This continual harassment was led by the outstanding leader of the Social Democrats, Dr. Kurt Schumacher. Schumacher had established an early reputation as a bitter critic of the Allied powers. On the eve of a Big Four Meeting in Moscow, Herr Schumacher warned that he would never sign a peace which would be considered "hard" by the Germans. He publicly declared that the Big Four must recognize their "war guilt" too. On another occasion Herr Schumacher warned that the Allies were responsible "for whatever happens in Germany." He then went on to compare the Germans' plight under Hitler and under the Allies. He said that the Allies "did not do much better than their predecessors (Hitler)." He asserted that a "poverty-stricken Germany means a poverty-stricken Europe." This line has been spouted by every kind of German politician from the extreme right to the extreme left. The reason why it has received such unanimous support is simply because it expresses the Pan-Germanic idea of "Deutschland über Alles."

Herr Schumacher's derisive attacks against the Allies came with increased bitterness. "The Allies," he once said, "have to get over their governess complex." Another time, he heaped scorn upon Adenauer describing him as the "Chancellor of the Allies." In a speech delivered in 1951 he called the United States an "elephant in Europe's china shop."

The Social Democratic leadership attacked Allied policy in deeds as well as words. They helped to cripple the dismantling of Germany's war potential; they blocked the decartelization and deconcentration of German heavy industry; they opposed the establishment of the International Ruhr Authority which was to see to it that the resources of the Ruhr would be shared equitably among the victims of German aggression, as well as Germany; they violently agitated against Allied policy granting France certain rights in the Saar in lieu of reparations. It is interesting to note that Herr Schumacher once hinted that the German Social Democrats would support a second Anschluss with Austria. In 1946 he caused a furor in Austria by his statement that "no one can say that the Austro-German frontier is final." An unnamed spokesman for the British Labor Party once said that Schumacher acted "like a good old-fashioned German—a real Prussian—and he made it clear he was interested in the Internationale (socialist) only insofar as it might be useful to Germany" (ONA, 7-9-51).

Schumacher's super nationalistic tactics were described by a noted writer on German affairs, Leo Lania (United Nations World, May 1952). Lania pointed out that while Schumacher was a courageous fighter against Nazism and all forms of totalitarianism, he had little use for the Western or Eastern Big Powers. Upon hearing Schumacher speak on one occasion, Lania reported: "Suddenly I felt as though I was back again in the late 20s in Berlin at a Nazi meeting. It was not the content of Schumacher's speech that startled me . . . but the way he spoke was simply quite frightening. Unconsciously he seemed to have acquired Hitler's terminology, his screeching mode of speech, his gestures and histrionic intonation." Lania's impressions of Schumacher's ways seem to have been shared by other sensitive reporters. Thus, the well known British correspondent Alistair Horne, writing in his recent book "Return to Power," described Schumacher's harangues as sounding "curiously like an utterance of the Nazis."

What of the Social Democratic leadership today? Is it true that the present leader, Erich Ollenhauer, is a more reserved and less volatile personality than his predecessor. It is also true that he has had a good record as an opponent against the twin pressures of Hitlerism and Communism. Yet, the Social Democrats under his leadership have by no means discarded Schumacher's legacy. For example, the Social Democrats did not hesitate to join hands with the neo-Nazis and other reactionary elements during the recent Saar plebiscite. The Social Democrats did not find it objectionable to cooperate with certain neo-Nazi personalities in North-Rhine Westphalia in order to oust Karl Arnold from office. Indeed, they are supporting the efforts of the war criminal Krupp to regain properties which are supposed to be liquidated under the decartelization laws. As regards the reappearance of German war criminals and top Hitlerites, the Social Democrats have not shown the degree of opposition to this development which one would expect from them.

The Social Democrats have been lukewarm toward Germany's membership in NATO and have emphasized that the reunification of Germany should take priority even if this should necessitate direct negotiations with Moscow. This does not imply that the Social Democrats are pro-Russian. No group has been more uncompromising on the question of Commuism than the Social Democrats. Nevertheless, it does not follow that the Social Democrats are unqualifiedly pro-Western. In the last analysis the Social Democratic position aims at the revival of a strong and powerful Germany even if this should come about at the expense of NATO and through negotiations with the Kremlin.

The Social Democratic position was explained in a recent article by one of their leaders, Fritz Erler, writing in the April issue of "Foreign Affairs." Erler sounded off in a manner which brought back memories of the late Herr Schumacher. The article is replete with threats. He writes that the "Balkanization" of Germany "cannot last forever," and then, without the least display of modesty, he says, "a great people cannot be deprived of its natural right to live under a single roof." Erler's attitude toward the Allies as well as the Soviets may be summed up in these words, "a plague on both your houses." He condemns what he calls the "intelligence services and propaganda organizations of both sides" who are supposed to be operating on German territory. Thus, he makes no distinction between the Communist and the Democratic forces. Repeating a line which is threadbare by now, Erler declares that "no lasting peace is possible in Europe while the heart of Central Europe is cut in two." Of course, he does not tell his readers what happened to the peace of Europe when the so-called heart was united. Unity, according to Herr Erler, is all-decisive and he warns, "the German people will favor the side that does the utmost to restore their unity, not with words—words are cheap—but in action." In these words Herr Erler tells us that democracy versus totalitarianism is not the real issue insofar as the Germans are concerned. German unity, no matter how it is gained, is the central problem.

To strengthen his case, Herr Erler warns the West not to repeat "the bad experiences of the past when the democracies surrendered to Hitler's blackmail what they had denied to the Weimar Republic—and much more." What does he mean by that? Is it his contention that the democracies did not pour billions of dollars into the Weimar Republic? Does he mean that the Allies looked the other way while Germany secretly armed after World War I? Does he mean that the appeasement policy toward Hitler which led to Munich, should have been pursued in the first place toward the Weimar Republic? The fact is that Herr Erler is repeating one of the favorite stories of the Social Democrats, to wit, that the Weimar Republic would have survived had the Allies supported it. This is but another way of absolving the Germans from the guilt of Hitlerism and shifting the blame on to the Allies.

While professing friendship with the West, Herr Erler insists that the West German Government "should take the initiative" in conducting talks with Moscow on reunification. Of course, he qualifies his advice by stating that the Western powers should be in full accord with this initiative. However, what does such an assurance mean in fact? It merely indicates that the Germans will negotiate with the Russians while the Western powers should rest content on the assumption that the West Germans will not double-cross them. Herr Erler is willing to pay the Russians a high price including "the removal of hostile military alliances" from Russia's doorstep and the granting of economic concessions. Towards the end of his article he poses the question of the removal of Allied bases in Germany. All of these propositions are made in the name of loyalty to the West and yet, they all boil down to a plan that would smash NATO on the basis of a German-Russian deal. In this connection the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (5-8-56) reported that secret negotiations were being conducted between an important Social Democratic functionary "from Bonn" and Soviet authorities in East Berlin. These negotiations, we are told, have the support of influential Social Democrats.

That would be a way out: "We could make Germany the 49th State of the Union."

(Cummings in Daily Express)

The views expressed by Herr Erler in Foreign Affairs are now the core of the foreign policy program recently adopted by the Social Democratic Party for the 1957 election. The nationalistic overtones of the program are not difficult to detect. Though the Social Democrats have always professed their attachment to the West, the new program leans heavily on a bilateral understanding with the Soviets. "Only thus can the harm done to Soviet-German relations by Hitler be removed," the program states.

As regards West Germany's commitments to the West, the Social Democratic program demands that they be scrapped and that West Germany withdraw from the Atlantic Pact. The unified Germany envisaged by the program would conserve the so-called basic economic and social reforms introduced in the Soviet zone. Indeed, the program advocates talks between East and West Germany, although the Social Democrats have time and again denounced the East German regime as a Soviet satellite. The new Reich envisaged by the Social Democrats would serve as a "bridge" between the East and the West. The Social Democratic platform does not spell out in detail the function of such a "bridge" but leaves it to the imagination of the voters. Nevertheless, it is well to bear in mind that the idea of a German "bridge" is a favorite concept of Pan-German ideologists who long for a Third Power Bloc in Europe dominated by Germany.

From the foregoing it is clear that the present Social Democratic leadership is far from dependable. We are reminded of a statement by the late Foreign Secretary of Great Britain, Ernest Bevin, "The Hitler revolution did not change the German character very much. It expressed it." Mr. Bevin, in this same talk in the House of Commons, discussed how difficult it was to handle the Germans, "I have to tell my socialist colleagues in Germany very often that they are a little too nationalist for me and that their nationalism breaks through their ideas of social democracy rather too frequently to make me feel comfortable in arriving at decisions in dealing with them." Mr. Bevin's remarks were based on solid ground. Ever since the end of World War II, Social Democratic leadership has tried to outdo German nationalists. Kurt Schumacher once declared that one of the reasons for Social Democracy's defeat was the fact that Hitler was able to puff up the nationalistic feelings of the Germans with far greater effectiveness than his rivals. "Never again will the socialists be caught being less nationalistic than their opponents," he told an American writer (The Reporter Magazine, 7-5-54).

To sum up, the record of the Social Democrats does not lend much hope that their leadership would necessarily be more reliable than that provided by Adenauer. A schizophrenic personality can be dangerously unpredictable and it would be well for the West to bear this fact in mind.

. . ."One clause stated that for the first year after the agreements, Britain, France and America should receive a limited German contribution towards the cost of their armies.

"This year ends on May 5. What contribution Germany should make after that date should be a matter for negotiation.

"Those words, 'a matter for negotiation,' are the legal trap in which Dr. Schaeffer has caught us.

" 'Certainly I am obliged to negotiate,' he argues, 'but I am not obliged to accept what your Foreign Secretary, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, himself told me is only a moral claim.'

"Let us take a look at this moral claim. In their first twelve months as a member of N. A. T. O. the Germans have done almost nothing about their army.

"They have spent exactly £20,000,000 on it compared with our £1,500,000,000 Defence Budget.

"Moreover, while we are forced to keep a two-year period of military service in order to maintain our four divisions in Germany, the Germans still have no conscription.

"Dr. Adenauer, the eighty-year-old German Chancellor, is still considering whether the period should be eighteen months or twelve—or whether he can do without conscription altogether.

"Surely, then, if the Germans are getting their defence so cheaply, we are morally entitled to ask them to shoulder part of our financial burden.

"But talk about moral claims seems laughable to Dr. Schaeffer . . ."

A BRITISH VIEW

"Sir Anthony has scored a remarkable triumph in his handling of the Krushchev-Bulganin visit . . .

"Her Adenauer, who dismisses the talks as a failure and scoffs that 'you could read through the communiqué backwards without finding anything in it.'

"What Dr. Adenauer means of course is that you could read through the communiqué without finding anything for Germany in it.

"But why should there be anything for Germany?

"Let no one feel concern over Dr. Adenauer's disappointment. Rather, let there be fresh consideration of this problem which, more than anything else, still prevents us from reaching a full understanding with the Soviet.

"Why should it be regarded as so intractable? Why should Germany continue to be a source of friction?

"Why not accept the right and obvious answer and let Germany stay divided?"

End of an Illusion

by T. H. TETENS

Mr. T. H. Tetens has devoted more than thirty years to the study of German geopolitics and its world-wide ramifications. He has written extensively on this subject and is the author of "Germany Plots With The Kremlin" published in 1953. The article which we print below, is based on his own studies of current developments and does not necessarily reflect the views of the Society.

The world is stunned by the unprecedented rapid change on the stage of international affairs. Since the new Soviet team, Bulganin and Krushchev, took over the reigns from Malenkov and Molotov in February 1955, the frozen fronts of the cold war have steadily melted away. Topping Stalin's traditional peace offensive with the warm sunshine of "Operation Smile," the Soviet leaders have scored impressive gains with their strategy to end the cold war.

There is general agreement in the capitals of the world that during the last year the East-West tension has been considerably diminished. The eagerness in London and Paris to settle the differences with Moscow and to end the costly armament race, has led to hectic diplomatic counter moves by Bonn aiming at the continuation of the cold war. During his recent visit to Washington, Dr. Adenauer once again asserted that the Soviet Union should prove its peaceful intention by agreeing to the reunification of Germany. President Eisenhower, in a message to German Bundespresident Dr. Heuss, expressed his "very great hope that action could be taken which would promote the liberation of 17 million Germans that are now under Soviet Communist rule."

The Adenauer-Dulles policy statement produced a sour note in Britain. N. Y. Times correspondent Drew Middleton reported (6-16-56) that the British are "aggravated over the results of the United States-West German policy discussions" and that "the references to the liberation of East Germany have an air of singular unreality." The British, Middleton reported, "would like to know who is going to do the liberating." British leaders, says the report, were not moved by Dr. Adenauer's "insistence that Germany's 1937 frontiers must be restored." Then, the Times correspondent summed up Britain's bitter reaction: "The conclusions reached by Britons is that the West Germans expect someone else to do the liberating just as they expect someone else to defend their frontiers . . . Many Britons in positions of influence think the United States, if not Chancellor Adenauer, should realize that 'cold war' theories on German unity must be discarded . . . The blessing given the West German dreams by Washington is what really worries the British. They see them as damaging diplomatic efforts to establish greater economic and later political influence in East Europe and as symbolyzing an outdated approach to the Soviet problem."

There is an irreconcilable difference in the diplomatic evaluation of international affairs between London and Paris on the one hand and Bonn on the other. The British and French statesmen have openly acknowledged far-reaching changes in Soviet foreign policies, whereas Dr. Adenauer and Secretary Dulles have shouted from the housetops in recent weeks that no fundamental changes have taken place. Adenauer maintains that Moscow's diplomatic maneuvers are only a device to lull the West into complacency. It is understandable that Dr. Adenauer has taken such a position because his only hope lies in the continuation of the cold war until a situation arises where he himself can strike a bargain with Moscow at the expense of the other Western powers.

Dr. Adenauer's Difficulties

There is little doubt that the German Chancellor is on the spot. It is of paramount importance to Dr. Adenauer how the political situation will look in the election year of 1957. The public mood in West Germany has undergone a considerable change since his election triumph in 1953. Adenauer's coalition is crumbling and he faces a strong opposition even within his own party. Times correspondent M. S. Handler recently reported (6-10-56) that the Social Democratic leader Ollenhauer "has a good chance to become the next Chancellor."

(Daily Mirror, London)

"Good morning Foster, what foreign policy shall we make today."

The hopes of the German people in the "miracles" of Dr. Adenauer have vanished. There is a widespread apathy toward rearmament and an irrepressible desire to make up with the Soviets. The Germans have become more and more disillusioned with the Chancellor's policies and the press has taken a critical stand against Adenauer's attitude towards the cold war. Times correspondent Handler reported (6-17-56) that during Adenauer's visit in Washington, German newspapers "took a line that Mr. Dulles and Dr. Adenauer were alone in refusing to accept a relaxation of tensions."

In order to regain prestige, Dr. Adenauer must either show a substantial progress in his policy of European integration or he must strive to reach an agreement with Moscow and the East German Government on the issue of reunification. The outlook for better relations with Moscow is not very good at the moment. The Frankfurter Allgemeine (5-25-56) headlined a dispatch from Bonn: "Icy Atmosphere between Bonn-Moscow."

Under these circumstances Dr. Adenauer is desperately engaged in trying to give a new impetus to the cold war and thus to undo the easing of tension which has resulted in the improvement of Anglo-Soviet and Franco-Soviet relations. If the Chancellor succeeds in bringing the present efforts towards better East-West understanding to an abrupt halt, he will have scored a tremendous diplomatic feat. He would gain time for adroit diplomatic maneuvers in order to bring himself back into a promising bargaining position vis-a-vis Moscow. All he has to do is to intensify the cold war and create a situation in which Moscow would lose confidence in the usefulness of further diplomatic talks with London. Therefore, Adenauer's diplomatic strategy is directed to put—via Washington—pressure on London in order to prevent the British from "going it alone." It is for this reason that, according to the Christian Science Monitor (6-14-56) "the stern and venerable German Chancellor was out-Dullesing Mr. Dulles in his suspicion of Soviet intentions." The Chancellor has emphasized again and again that this was not the time for the West to negotiate with Moscow. The Chancellor's urgent demand was for a synchronized foreign policy of all NATO powers whereby he himself would become the leading policy shaper for the West. In that case he could show the Russians that "der Alte" is still the strong leader of the Western coalition to whom they must turn if they wish to settle the cold war.

What if London and Paris failed to go along or if Washington dragged its feet? In such a case, says Time correspondent M. S. Handler, Bonn has given warning to the West that reunification must have absolute priority:

"It is the implied notice to the Western powers not to downgrade reunification. It is an implied warning that if pushed to the wall the Germans have an out. They can negotiate with the Russians as well as any of the Western Powers" (N. Y. Times, 4-29-56).

The Chancellor's Nightmare

The basic concept of the Western cold war strategy was to create a world coalition of free nations, and isolate the Soviet bloc countries as much as possible economically and politically. The chief requirement in the diplomatic strategy was that none of the Western powers should carry substantial trade with the Eastern bloc nor negotiate directly with Moscow. This solid cold war coalition of the West has been broken apart. The British and French decided to negotiate with Moscow on their own.

The Anglo-Soviet talk in London and the Mollet-Pineau visit in Moscow had a rather irritating effect on West Germany. Contrary to American opinion, the German press admitted that the Bulganin-Krushchev visit in London was highly successful. It is the German belief that the Soviet talks with Eden brought essentially an agreement of "peaceful coexistence" with the exclusion of the German question or, as the German press bitterly complains, a Soviet-British friendship at the expense of Western Germany.

In order to understand why Adenauer is pressing so hard to go back into all-out cold war, it is worthwhile to take a second good look at the Anglo-Soviet talks in London.

American newspapers and commentators have almost unanimously interpreted the Bulganin-Krushchev visit as a futile diplomatic venture. The New York Times termed it "Failure of a mission." The New York Herald Tribune spoke of "A Fruitless Journey" and stated that no commitment on any important issue was to be found "among the diplomatic platitudes." Time Magazine called the London talk "one of the great flops in modern diplomacy," and William Randolph Hearst, Jr., editor-in-chief of the Hearst newspapers, cabled from London that the Soviet leaders "fell flat on their faces." In a round-up on the London talks, the New York Times of April 29 quoted an official Washington spokesman as saying: "The British handled this beautifully. The Russsians made no hay."

The plain fact is that the British and Soviet leaders agreed to use common efforts in order to bring the 10 year old postwar crisis to an end. The British and Soviet statesmen charted a diplomatic road map which, as Eden expressed it, might be "the beginning of a beginning" to end the cold war. Looking at their formula for peace, we find that the negotiating parties in London established themselves as a close partnership in the undertaking to prevent war and to secure world wide stability.

The joint communiqué makes it quite clear that the negotiations were determined by one overriding desire: to secure peace and tranquillity even if it would move in sidetracking the German question and to develop an international climate in which different social and political systems can coexist in peaceful competition.

A large part of the joint communication deals with specific plans to improve Anglo-Soviet relations. The new spirit is reflected in the following statement: "The representatives of the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom recognize that the strengthening of the Anglo-Soviet relations in political, trade, scientific, cultural and other fields would be in the interests of the peoples of both countries. They were also convinced that this would help to consolidate general peace and security."

The Soviet offer of extensive long-term trade relations in the amount of $560,000,000 annually "is double valuable now in view of Britain's competitive difficulties in exports" (N. Y. Times, 4-29-56). The British believe that much will develop from further negotiations and from Eden's planned visit to Moscow. There was great relief in London that the Soviet leaders are backing the British peace efforts in the Middle East. William Randolph Hearst reported from London that "supporters of Prime Minister Eden were jubilant that B & K had bailed Great Britain out of its perilously exposed position in the Middle East." Russia's consent to abide by the UN decision was interpreted as a great diplomatic success. At the end of the visit Eden was reported as very optimistic. He stated in his radio address that the talks had ended in "an encouraging measure of agreements, greater than I expected when they began." In his farewell message to the Soviet leaders, Eden said: "I warmly reciprocate your wish that our friendship and work together will develop and further the common cause of peace and good relations throughout the world."

There is little doubt that Eden intended to have his "very exact" words well understood, not only in Britain but also in Bonn and in Washington. When the joint communiqué was published, the Germans immediately sensed the danger. They saw clearly that the London agreement had created an absolutely novel situation in the struggle between East and West.

The Anglo-Soviet agreement must be regarded as an important turning point in the cold war. The nightmare which Dr. Adenauer has suffered for many years, has finally come true. For the first time the British have side-stepped the diplomatic stumbling bloc of the German question in their search for a new solution.

The Old Scheme: A United Europe

Chancellor Adenauer has tried to counter the Anglo-Soviet agreement. He and Mr. Dulles insist that NATO should be firmly anchored around a unified Europe. That means a new try with an idea that once has failed under the hard realities of deep-rooted European traditions.

A united Europe is an old pan-German dream which was widely propagated before World War I, revived during the Weimar Republic, preached as a gospel by the Nazis, and is now again advocated by the industrialists of Rhine and Ruhr. In two world wars, the Kaiser and Hitler tried to conquer Europe as "Lebensraum" for the master race, but failed. After the second world war, Dr. Adenauer, an old-time politician and spokesman for German industry, tried to realize Germany's shattered imperialistic dream by applying the art of diplomatic "finesse." With the help of Mr. Dulles, Adenauer hoped to force France into a shotgun wedding with Germany. It was Mr. Dulles who proposed as early as 1947 a West European union around a strong German economy as the best solution for Europe. The clear objective was to reverse the military decision of World War II. The U. S. has invested billions of dollars in the efforts to realize Mr. Dulles' pet idea.

The German master planners came near their goal with the EDC (European Defense Community) which was finally killed by a vote in the French Assembly in 1954. Since then Chancellor Adenauer and his advisors have blueprinted a new plan and have devised a strategy for the "long pull." The objective is the old scheme: a German dominated Europe as a "Third Power Bloc" exploiting its balance of power position between the East and the West.*

How far has Dr. Adenauer succeeded in his new drive for European unification? In recent years he has held successful negotiations with Greece and Turkey. In Austria there are some pan-German politicians willing to play the game along the line of the old Berlin-Bagdad project. The Chancellor has also negotiated with Italy and Spain, the two former Axis collaborators in the Arab and Africa scheme. The Africa project has the support of certain industrialists and Vichy collaborators in France. Above all, Dr. Adenauer has the all-out backing of Mr. Dulles for his pet project.

The evidence shows that Dr. Adenauer's long range objective is still the old dream of a German dominated Europe, tackled from a new angle. Instead of infusing military strength into a dying NATO, the Chancellor with the support of Mr. Dulles, has embarked on the establishment of a gigantic economic and political combine under the pretext of European "unity." This time it runs under the name of "Euratom" and "Euromarket," two projects for which Mr. Dulles is expected to raise billions of dollars under the heading of "Foreign Aid."

After long and secret planning, the new Europe plan was first publicly launched in the fall of 1955. On November 13, 1955, Dr. Adenauer conferred lengthily with Belgian Foreign Minister Paul-Henri Spaak who is praised as a "dynamic leader" and "a strong advocate of European union." Together with Jean Monnet, the leader of a European "Action Committee," they have formed a group "to push united Europe" (N. Y. Herald Tribune, 10-14-55). New York Times correspondent Sulzberger reported (11-19-55) that the aim is "to reinvigorate the European movement," that Dr. Adenauer has "long saught to breathe life into the European dream" and that he carries the blessings of Secretary Dulles. The Times dispatch adds that in the new European union "Bonn would play a dominant role."

Here are a few recent statements from leading West German newspapers: The Frankfurter Allgemeine (5-15-56) quotes the Vice President of the European Union (a German propaganda outfit), Dr. W. Beutler, as saying that the common European trading area is an "urgent necessity" and "the last chance for the unification of Europe."

Demonstrating the diplomacy of "the carrot and the big stick," the Frankfurter Zeitung (5-26-56) declares, "the United States offers effective financial aid for the atomic energy development in Europe only if the various countries are willing to join in a common project."

The Hamburg weekly "Die Zeit" (6-7-56) says in an article "New Step Toward A United Europe" that the start will be made with a "complete economic integration" which consequently will bring about "political unification as well as the incorporation of territories outside of Europe." This last statement refers to Africa which Dr. Adenauer and his geopolitical advisors have frequently termed the "Hinterland of Europe." Dr. Paul Henri Spaak is described as the "motor" in a new great drive to influence public opinion and to win over leading organizations in Western Europe.

Facts on Integration

The often advanced argument for unification is that the small countries in Europe need larger markets and that Europe needs a strong integrated defense. Both arguments hold no water. The theory that small countries cannot exist as national entities has no basis in fact as was shown by a recent GATT survey published in the New York Times (6-11-56). It was disclosed in this report that the smaller countries, such as Norway, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg and Switzerland had a more satisfactory standard of living and were more vigorous trade competitors than the larger European countries. These small countries specialize in a few export products, they import from the cheapest sources and they all have low tariffs. Switzerland and Sweden, for instance, rather want to keep "their smallness and their freedom of action." The same would hold true with Belgium and Luxembourg.

*Editor's note: The whole background story of Dr. Adenauer's plan for a united Europe can be found in Mr. Tetens' well documented book, "Germany Plots With the Kremlin," published in March 1953.

The alleged necessity of an integrated European defense was from the beginning used as a pretext to push the scheme for a comeback of Germany. Dr. Adenauer's mouthpiece, the "Rheinische Merkur" (7-23-54) admitted bluntly that EDC was "only a means to serve the great end of unification." Evidence shows that even Dulles used the EDC only as a means to help in the establishment of a German-dominated Europe. An article in the well informed U. S. News & World Report (12-25-53) stated the following:

"There are signs that the U. S. will be willing to wait a while for a German Army if France and others will move faster to create a United States of Europe . . . The U. S. has informed French leaders privately that it considers a political reconciliation of France and Germany more important to the defense of Europe through the coming years of tension with Russia than the re-arming of German troops. French leaders have been told that the U. S. is prepared to accept a six-nation United States of Europe first and a European Army later . . . This means that the door now is wide open to the French and other European to postpone German rearmament with the consent of the U. S. if they can speed creation of the political community . . ."

The real purpose of the European scheme was revealed by Dr. Adenauer himself. On December 13, 1950, he stated in a speech: "Our chief reason for wanting to enter the European army is to be able to recover our Eastern territories." In another speech at Essen in July 1951, the Chancellor declared: "The creation of a Europe which is politically and economically strong is the only path leading to the recovery of Germany's Eastern territories which remains one of the essential goals of our activities."

The real reason behind the present unification scheme are exactly the same as those once advanced by Hitler, General Haushofer and the German industrialists. Dr. Adenauer even uses the same terms and concepts. In a recent speech before leading German industrialists in Frankfor, Dr. Adenauer declared: "the more we can increase our economic strength, the stronger. Gentlemen, will we become in our foreign policy." The Chancellor furthermore emphasized the urgency of coordination in NATO, and in this connection he used the well known Nazi term "Gleichschaltung" (Frankfurter Zeitung, 5-30-56).

In a recent article about the relationship of "foreign policy and economic power," Dr. W. Beutler explained in the Frankfurter Allgemeine (5-24-56): "A strong economic potential constitutes a high armament potential and this, in turn, gives increased military strength and a great influence in world power politics." Therefore: "World power today requires in the first place economic potential." To acquire this, Germany needs "a common European market and a common nuclear-based industrialization as precondition for a united Europe." Thus, the German aim is stated with brutal frankness: military power, "Machtpolitik," and "Gleichschaltung" of Europe. Did not the free world fight two wars to defeat this German objective?

Geopolitics of the Middle East

European unification is in German eyes only the necessary first step on the way to a larger goal. The continent of Europe is too small and could by far not satisfy German geopolitical aspirations. The German master planners have set their eyes on Africa and the whole oil-rich Middle East.

The German press is gloating over the difficulties which the French and British encounter in North Africa and the Middle East. There is ample evidence to show how German agents have played a key role during the postwar years in Egypt and other Arab countries and how they have contributed in preparing the present explosive situation.

Whole books could be filled with evidence testifying to Germany's long range plans to bring Africa, the "Hinterland," under direct control of the big industrial combines of Rhine and Ruhr. Behind these aspirations are Dr. Adenauer's closest friends, the leaders of industry and finance, such as Dr. Fritz Berg, Dr. Pohle, Herman Abs, and Dr. Pferdmenges—the men who dream of Europe, Africa and the Arab world as a potential market with more than 700 million people forming a Third Power Bloc in the world. It was Dr. Adenauer himself who pointed out in the Rheinische Merkur (5-20-50) that the Schuman Plan would be "the beginning of a long range economic venture in Africa" which would realize the German dream.

The German scheme for the industrial exploitation of Africa is as old as the Pan-German movement which started 70 years ago. Well remembered are the aspirations of the big Mannesmann concern in Morocco where it wanted to grab the rich iron ore deposits and which nearly led to war both in 1905 and 1911. It was the Kaiser who then provoked the Western world with saber-rattling speeches and suggested that Germany should act as the protector of all Arabs. These aspirations came even sharper into focus when the Germans showed great interest in the oil regions around the Persian Gulf as soon as they were discovered. German imperialism was identified closely with the so-called Berlin-Bagdad project. Since then the Germans have consistently pursued the same line: the penetration of the Middle East.

Global political earthquakes do not erupt suddenly. They are prepared in long years of subtle plotting and subversion. This is especially true with the present condition in the Arab world. The whole Near and Middle East is loaded with political dynamite ready to blow into the faces of the French, the British and the Americans. Only the Germans are regarded as the true friends of the Arabs. The reason for this strange relationship can be found in the history of more than 60 years of intimate German-Arab plotting against the Western powers. Right after World War II some of the Arab countries, especially Egypt, became a haven for Nazis who had escaped the dragnet of the victorious Allies. Most of them have had important positions in the Nazi hierarchy and they were welcomed in Egypt as elsewhere as advisors and experts. These German conspirators employed every trick of infiltration and propaganda, trade rivalries and private contacts in order to stir hatred against the Anglo-Americans who were "responsible for the creation of the State of Israel."

There is a long list of names of former Nazis who, sometimes in close contact with the Bonn Foreign Office, have played important roles in the anti-Western conspiracy. In the early postwar years, Hitler's daring SS Colonel Skorzeny laid the groundwork for new contacts between Germany and the Arabs. He and other Nazis collaborated with the notorious Grand Mufti of Jerusalem in spreading the propaganda against "the terror regimes of the French and British imperialists." Hundreds of German officers and diplomats who were hired in Egypt as key advisors and experts, have worked systematically to create difficulties for Britain in Suez and the Middle East. The news magazine "Der Spiegel" (10-26-55) told the story of Dr. Wilhelm Voss (under Hitler President of the Skoda works) who was the main figure in the armanent's deal between Czechoslovakia and Egypt. Dr. Voss is described as "head of the Central Planning Board in the War Ministry in Egypt" under whose command "were employed more than 50 German military and armament experts."

Among the geopolitical experts pushing the Africa and Middle East project, are such former Nazis as Dr. Klaus Mehnert, Anton Zischka and Werner Otto von Hentig, the last one an old hand in Arab conspiracies who, two years ago, changed his diplomatic post from the Bonn Foreign Office to become top advisor of King Saud of Saudi Arabia.

Dr. Klaus Mehnert negotiated in 1952 with French industrialists for a combined French-German Africa project. His idea was that "the Germans assist with experts, the French furnish the territory and the Americans do the financing" (Der Spiegel, 10-8-52).

In the Middle East the Germans have won a decisive victory, even if the Western world sees only the Russians in the headlines. The Germans do not appear to be disturbed by the present Soviet drive in Egypt which they helped to precipitate. It all works toward the deterioration of the Western position in Egypt and secures that country as an operational base for the Germans. The Germans will continue to undermine the Western position in the Arab world by a combination of skillfully directed intrigues, by Communist armament shipments and by a widespread propaganda on the Israeli issue. The Germans believe that the day is not far off when the French and the British will be pushed out for good. Countless articles in the West German press testify to the interests in the regions of Africa and the Middle East. Behind this interest is solid German Realpolitik. Once the British are out, the American oil companies will also be forced to give up. This will be the day when the Germans move in as "the friends of the Arabs." With 60 percent of the world oil reserves in their control, with the Arabs as allies and with Africa as Hinterland, the German dream of a Third Power Bloc will come true.

Distrust in France and Britain

Dr. Adenauer's thesis that increased economic power gives added strength in world politics has been made painfully clear to France and Britain. Western Europe is alarmed by Germany's economic offensive. Take, for instance, the case of Germany's armament combine, the Krupp works: Once convicted as a war criminal, Mr. Krupp is back in business and has launched tremendous projects in India, Indonesia, Egypt, in South Africa, Brazil, Morocco and many other places. Recently Krupp proposed a gigantic Asia-Africa plan for industrial development in which the U. S. will be allowed to participate with huge loans at low interest rates (N. Y. Times, 3-3-56). Add to this the tremendous expansion by other German firms and we have the picture of a world wide trade offensive similar to that of the Soviets.

The fact that Dr. Adenauer and West Germany are treated as the darling in Washington has stirred bitter feelings among our principal allies. Leading French papers have repeatedly spoken of a "Bonn-Washington axis." They see with apprehension how German blackmail tactics have constantly paid off in Washington. When the second drive for European union was launched in November 1955, Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, president of the Pan-Europe movement, wrote an impudent letter to the N. Y. Herald Tribune (11-13-55) which demanded either "a Franco-German union" and Western support for the "revision of the Oder-Neisse border" or "Germany's temptation to decide against the West will be strong." With amazing bluntness, Coudenhove-

YOU'RE ON ANOTHER BRINK, MR. DULLES

Kalergi hinted that a Germany disappointed by the West "is bound to pay the Russian price for revision: to break with NATO, the Western European Union and the West altogether, thus preparing for a future axis, Berlin-Moscow-Peking."

Ten years of cold war and the constant irritation by German threats have had a deep effect on the British and French peoples. They wonder what they have to expect from a reunified Germany of 70 millions. Insecurity in Europe will grow rapidly as soon as Germany is free to follow its time proven pattern of "geo-political dynamics." France will be forced into a collaborating role similar to the Petain-Vichy regime, and England will feel the full threat of a revived Greater German Reich. It is this feeling of uneasiness that compels the French and the British to negotiate with Moscow by side-stepping the German question. Why could Germany not remain divided if the smaller European states can exist comfortably? Two world wars were fought to make the world safe against future German aggression. Why, then, create conditions which inevitably must lead to another try for German world supremacy?

When Mr. Dulles insisted that Germany must be the number one issue at Geneva, N. Y. Times correspondent Drew Middleton reported (7-10-55) that "France believes that some deal over Germany can be made with the Soviet Union . . . Neither the Government nor the people would weep if Germany were to remain divided."

From the second Geneva Conference the N. Y. Times reported that diplomatic observers wonder why Germany should be reunified at all: "German unity of any kind does not wholly appeal either to the French, who still fear a strong Germany, or to the British, who already feel the effects of German competition in world markets and would feel it far more if Germany were united" (N. Y. Times, 11-3-55).

De Gaulle and the neutralist Le Monde have pointed out for years that the security of an independent France can only be obtained through a firm Franco-Soviet defense pact. The fear that the French and the British might seek a settlement at German expense has disturbed the Adenauer press. The weekly "Die Zeit" (3-12-56) declares that "wide circles in the West, especially in France, have long come to the conclusion that the partition of Germany is not a threat to the peace of the world but to the contrary, a stabilizing factor to guarantee the status quo."

The specter of German reunification also spreads fear in Eastern Europe and Austria. In the April 1956 issue of "Die Oesterreichische Nation" Dr. Karl Winter discusses the impact a reunited Reich will have on Austria's neutrality: "At the moment the existence of two Germanies paralyzes the tendencies of German expansion. A reunited Reich, however, stretching from the Rhine to the Vistula River, would become even without an imperialistic program, a menace of greatest magnitude to Austrian independence and also a threat to the other nations in the Danube basin . . . Therefore, the division of Germany, not its reunification, must be regarded as a real blessing to Central Europe. Austria has no interest at all to see the two Germanies united. If, however, reunification becomes a reality, then Austria, in order to protect her neutrality, would be compelled to take precautionary measures in cooperation with her neighbors along the Danube."

In Britain the feeling also prevails that a reunited Reich might upset European stability. At the end of the Anglo-Soviet talks in London, the conservative Daily Express wrote in an editorial: "The Russians, it seems, maintain their attitude that Germany should remain divided. They would prefer her to stay disarmed as well . . . The Russians may believe that, in time, British opinion will come to accept the position and even rejoice in it. The Daily Express rejoices in it now. For us this is no disappointment."

Here in the United States a few voices, such as Walter Lippman and James Warburg, have warned for a long time that Washington's cold war policy will fail. The Europeans will not buy unification in a package of camouflaged "Gleichschaltung." If, as the British say, the German problem cannot be solved, neither by diplomatic negotiations nor by war, then the only common sense solution is the recogntion of the status quo. Such a solution would be in the best interest of all European peoples.

The . . . most interesting aspect of the decision (to rearm) announced recently, is semi-political. It concerns the spirit of the new East German army, which is to be a blend of Prussian tradition and Communist ideology . . .

It would be very rash to laugh at this attempted blend of Prusso-German patriotic traditions (which also includes a tradition of Russian alliance) with those of twentieth century German Communism. The mixture has worked before; it is potent, and it is explosive. It appeals to something real in the East Germans who, after all, are the descendants of the old Prussians and Saxons and had a proud history at a time when the present West Germany was a mere conglomeration of petty principalities. It may appeal also, one day, to something in the mentality of West Germany's soldiers whose professional pride is inevitably bound up with the Prusso-German military tradition . . .

(Sebastian Haffner, N. Y. Herald Tribune, 2-15-56)

". . . The Germans, as in the 1920's, are refusing to pay the penalty of waging aggressive war—a refusal differing only in terms from that of the years following Versailles. Then it was reparation. Today it is payment for forces protecting Germany against attack from the East.

". . . And today Germany's position is stronger than in the 1920's. Then, with a barrier of new states between her and Russia, the threat posed to the West was economic. Today, with that cordon sanitaire in Russian hands, the threat is military. West Germany could turn toward the Communists and away from Nato in spite of agreements to the contrary. After all, she did violate her 1939 treaty with Russia. And turnabout might yet again be deemed fair play in the language of a people capable of falling under the way of Nazi-ism."

Renazification of the Federal Republic

A Broadcast

by HELMUT HAMMERSCHMIDT

Herr Hammerschmidt is a well known radio commentator in Western Germany. His commentaries on present day Germany have received much attention in the international press. The article printed below is part of a detailed broadcast which he made on the current signs pointing to the manifestation of neo-Nazism.

This analysis touches upon one of the most disagreeable phenomena of our times in the observation of which, I have become somewhat of a specialist. It is neither through whim nor resentment that I continue to call attention to these occurrences which so often in the past have proven so extremely important to our very lives. Rather, it is my feeling that as a chronicler it is my duty to observe closely a development only desired by a minority of our people and, though rejected by the majority, is hardly noticed by them . . .

I have compiled a small list for you. It is a relatively small list, both in scope and in content. I would have to keep on reading to you until tomorrow afternoon to just itemize an index to the 20 most important occurrences of the last three months, such as the hair-raising citations from verdicts in a number of trials, or quoting from approximately 40 periodicals or approximately 80 recently published books. I would have to mention quotes from speeches made at about 200 demonstrations and meetings and excerpts from the records of only the worst fiends in our midst since their release from Soviet imprisonment. Listen instead to an abbreviated compilation having the advantage of illustrating actual happenings—not quotations, but plain facts; then you can judge whom to reproach: those gathering such facts or those creating them.

Let's begin with some harmless events:

The Plain Facts

At Gadeland near Neumünster, the Minister for the Interior of the State of Schleswig-Holstein gave protection to a Bund meeting of the Victims of Denazification against counter demonstrations.

In Luechow, a memorial commemoration took place for the late Labor Service leader Konstantin Hierl.

In Wuerzburg, the Horst Wessel Lied was sung at a meeting of the Airborne Sharpshooters.

In Goslar, medals with the Swastika were worn at the Steel Helmet meeting.

In Munich, Hiag, the organization of former SS men, sent a threatening letter, to the Munich director of the police.

The presiding judge at the Huppenkothen trial in Augsburg also received threatening letters.

In Mannheim, the waiter of the 08/15 restaurant ordered colored students to leave. He said: "Our restaurant is no kraal (hut) for Hottentots, it is a restaurant for former German front soldiers."

In Berlin, the bank accounts of former Nazi bigshots, containing millions, were suddenly discovered, amongst them those of Goering, Kaltenbrunner, Ley, Goebbels, Frick and Ribbentrop.

Professor Carl Clauberg has returned. Proceedings against this man who had participated in sterilization experiments in concentration camps, were only instituted upon protest by the Jewish Council.

The Minister for Social Affairs in Schleswig-Holstein appointed a former Gau deputy of the Nazi Chamber for Literature as the administrative expert on art and culture.

A former co-worker of Himmler in the Reichs Commissariat for the Strengthening of German Ideals was appointed director of the Labor Office in Velbert.

The University of Munich appointed a close co-worker of Ribbentrop to the chair for International Law. For many years he was chief editor of the Nazi monthly Journal for Foreign Politics.

The former Minister President and deputy Gau leader Joel entered the Landtag. Amongst others active in the leadership of the Lower Saxonian Free Democratic Party, there are: a county leader, a chief labor leader, a Hitler Youth area leader, a Goebbels adjutant, an old Nazi of 1924, the Nazi Lord Mayor of Brandenburg and a Nazi group leader.

Sepp Dietrich, convicted to jail for life, was released from Landsberg. A Bonn press agency reports him travelling about the countryside in a luxurious American car.

Sixty-eight year old Dr. Ernst Lautz, former chief prosecutor for the Reich at the People's Court of Freisler, lives in Luebeck and receives a monthly pension of 1342 marks.

Nazi Lord Mayor Budde of Bielefeld was awarded supplementary payment of 21,000 marks.

Nazi Mayor Dr. Pagenkopf, Dortmund, former SA Head Storm Troop Leader received supplementary payment of 42,000 marks.

Walter Schroeder, Nazi Director of Police in Luebeck, later on SS General in Riga, receives a pension of DM 1,000.

Nazi Mayor of Osnabrueck Dr. Hans Wildgassen gets a monthly pension of DM 950.

Karl Buck, former commandant of a concentration camp, was released from Werl. For the time being he has received a repatriate identification pass from the president of the administrative district of Stuttgart.

Former Field Marshal General Schoerner is awarded repatriate indemnification by the Bavarian administrative court even before any criminal or disciplinary proceedings have been begun against him.

In Ansbach, SS General Max Simon, who shortly before the collapse confirmed numerous death sentences, was acquitted. His verdicts included death sentences for members of his own court martials who had refused to participate in this madness.

The disciplinary chamber of the State Administrative Court in Oldenburg confirmed that a former Nazi county leader, accused of having sent a number of people to concentration camps, qualifies as a teacher.

The Restitution Office in Luebeck told a woman who had been interned in concentration camp Stutthof: "If you had not helped the foreigners by supplying them with food, you would not have been sent to concentration camp."

A Munich woman teacher practiced the letter "J" with the children of her class. As an illustration she used the sentence: "The Jews killed Jesus."

In a Bonn student paper, law student Klaus Petri, member of the "Deutsche Burschenschaft"—German students' fraternity—justified the concentration camps.

In 1955 the Federal Defense Ministry officially assigns General Foertsch, retired, author of the "Manual on Duties for Officers Loyal to Hitler," to NATO as collaborator on a multi-lingual book on NATO.

Hanns Johst, former President of the Reich Chamber for Literature, published his new novel "Blessed Fleeting Past" at Pandion Publishers, Frankfurt.

Plesse Publishers have released the Rosenberg Memoirs under the title of "Ideals and Idols of the Nazi Revolution."

Helmut Suendermann, former deputy Chief of Press for the Reich and managing editor, published a new political book.

The entire distribution of this publishing house which amongst other books released the scandalous volume of the Nazi Lord Mayor of Berlin and Editor-in-Chief of the Angriff, Julius Lippert, was taken over by the MUKO (Dr. Karl Hagendubel).

A periodical offers copies of Adolf Hitler's Memorial Essays for "promotional purposes" at 25 pfennings per copy.

Hans Steguweit again appears as a speaker at poetry recitals of the "Deutsche Kulturwerk" ("Action for German Culture").

Plesse Publishers in Goettingen, known through Herr Schlueter, demand legal action against those publishers who removed their exhibitor's stand in Frankfurt where the Memoirs of Messrs. Klagges and Diels were laid out.

SS Generals Gille and Steiner have filed suits against the legality of the implementations of the screening committee of the Blank Office, according to which former members of the Waffen SS Officers Corps are not to be reinstated.

On the Wenzelberg, in Langenfeld near Leverkusen, a monument to 72 prisoners of the prison in Luettringhausen murdered by the Gestapo, was desecrated. Basins were broken and bronze inscriptions were torn down.

Former Reichs stage designer Benno von Arent, 1932 SS Stormtroop leader, Nazi member since 1927, anti-semite and founder of the "Fellowship of German Artists" and member of "Fellow Combatants for German Culture" was commissioned by Bonn to execute a poster for the commemoration of of war prisoners.

As pointed out, thus far the list contains only a very small number of those incidents which have occurred in full view of the public. No mention whatsoever is made of behind the scene activities. . . .

Unmasking the Bonn Foreign Office

Now let me tell you how the Bavarian Radio got to investigate the personnel policies of the Bonn Foreign Office and to regard them as scandalous. Three years ago, a trial began before a German court against a former diplomat. The man's name was Rademacher; he was the Secretary for Jewish Affairs in the Foreign Office. Already during the first week, the proceedings which, incidentally, dragged along lamely and almost tediously, produced a half-forgotten sensation: documentary proof of joint guilt of the old Foreign Office. For instance, it was proven on the basis of unequivocal documents and admitted by reluctant witnesses that the office in the Wilhelmstrasse was always questioned by the particular SS authority concerned when any sort of action was contemplated against foreign Jews. Do not think now of the small number of just 10,000 foreign Jews in Germany but of the Jews in all countries which were occuped by Germany . . .

I mentioned to you that the first week of the court proceedings against this former Secretary for Jewish Affairs from the Wilhelmstrasse were boring. But that changed all of a sudden. Of course, the witnesses were predominantly diplomats, some who had not yet been reinstated and others who were active again.

There was no significant difference on the part of either class in their capacity for remembering, but the defendant was already implicated by documentary evidence to such a degree that in all likelihood he could no longer be saved. The diplomats on the witness stand began to turn away from him. Some of them stated that the Section for Jewish Affairs was a sore on the otherwise clean body of the Foreign Office—as if it had not been proven that the other sections had participated too in numerous misdeeds. Then an incident happened. The defendant was just being questioned on the matter of the liquidation of a group of Hungarian Jews; a document showed the day and hour of execution. The Foreign Office had given the usual answer to the customary request that there was no objection to "Special Treatment." The accused Secretary for Jewish Affairs was confronted with this. He claimed not to have known the meaning of "Special Treatment." Then, suddenly, the prosecutor pulled a document from his mountain of papers and confronted the accused with a receipt for currency exchange in which Rademacher personally had confirmed that he had travelled to Hungary at the time in question. As reason (for the trip) he had made the notation: "Liquidation of Jews." . . .

After that, it became known that an observer of the Bonn Foreign Office had attempted to induce the prosecutor and the court to carry on the trial proceedings with circumspection.

We thereupon compiled the text of our broadcast. Condensing it to a few sentences, we at that time listed some two dozen people we identified by their full names and who were deeply implicated as we proved by documents. One had written the infamous Ribbentrop White Books; another, in his capacity as Legal Secretary, had the job to tie the anti-Comintern nations to the Jewish policy of the Reich. This man, by the way, upon his reinstatement was made a Secretary for Rehabilitation (of victims of the Nazi Regime) in the Foreign Office! There was one man who had to take care of correspondence with the SS leadership on matters of deportation and the shooting of hostages, another one personally prepared a gruesome proposal for deportations . . .

What, then, does this mean for practical purposes? The Foreign Office may serve as an example, a sad example, but we have a Ministry of the Interior, a Ministry of Communications, a Ministry for Displaced Persons in which conditions are not any brighter . . .

Other Cases

It seems evident that today the so-called stigma of the past has lost its meaning. It is rather the attitude and actions which must be judged. Exceptions, perhaps, are the key positions and those cases in which by the mass groupings of former party functionaries, it can be seen that the necessary precautionary measures were knowingly disregarded. An example is the Oberlaender Ministry. A number of people took exception that the Bavarian Radio reproached these former SA, SS and party functionaries by mentioning their past now, ten years later. But that was not the case. Not a word was said against these people although amongst them were a Hitler Youth Group Leader, an SA Stormtroop Leader connected with the top SA administrative office, a Gau (district) office chief, speakers for the Reichs Propaganda Ministry and owners of the Golden Party Insignia. As far as I know they are still holding their jobs. Actually, the attack was directed against Herr Oberlaender himself. It is he who has to make good for a lot of matters, and he should not have been permitted to summon an entire phalanx of former activists into his ministry.

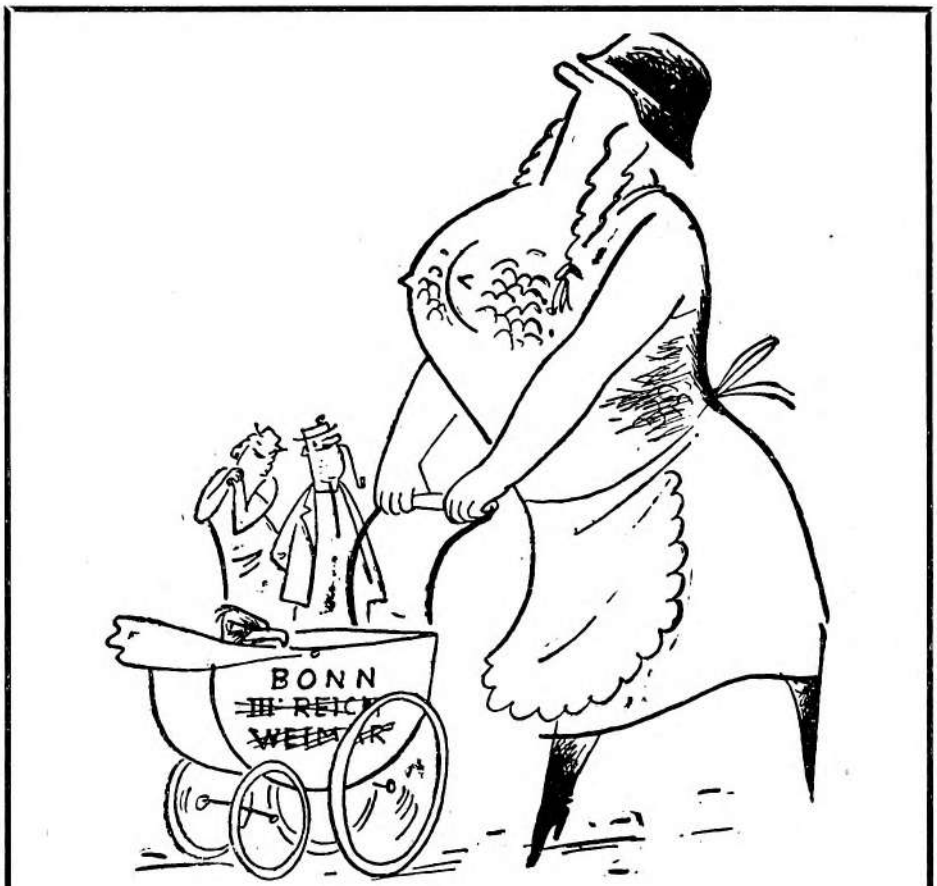
In this connection we have asked again and again: Who will claim that it is impossible in 1955, 1956, to locate a few thousand intelligent, politically clean men and women of steadfast character to fill our top posts? A few thousand from a people of 50 millions? Only a small fraction of our population was organized in the Nazi Party and even of these people the vast majority was not involved in any offense. Why, then, were predominantly such stigmatized co-workers picked for the reestablishment of a new government based on law and order? . . .

That "Certain Attitude"

For reasons of expediency, we have accustomed ourselves to attach certain characteristics to the concept of Nazism. In the first place, that is false and secondly, it is dangerous. Even the politically inexperienced will arrive at the conclusion that something must be wrong here because not even the former Nazis want anything akin to National Socialism again. The inexperienced person thinks of National Socialism only in the abstract. He recognizes its expression only in the already mentioned methods of terror. What is really meant is a certain attitude which existed long before Nazism. In fact, Nazism grew out of it. And it is this ttitude which we encounter once more, just as we did in the past. We all know : the German allegedly is more efficient than the Frenchman, more honest than the Englishman, more cultivated than the American, more civilized than the Russian and the peoples of the East, more broadminded than the Swiss, Dutchman, Dane and the nationals of all the other small countries. He is more hardy than everybody else put together: nevertheless, he senses inwardly that he is not more humane than they. But that is of no concern to us, we leave day-dreaming humanitarianism to the others.

We have to have uniformity. Power and square kilometers are our idols which even in times of dazzling economic upswing can only temporarily be displaced with great difficulty. With us, my listeners, it is always possible to suppress humane aspirations by appealing to the so-called spirit of the front, the spirit of the state of emergency. We are always completely determined, even if we have no idea as to what we are determined upon. And order prevails. Are you acquainted with the five-year results of the Institute for Opinion Research? In this connection I would like to mention just two or three cases of the more than one hundred which have been proven to be accurate by numerous counter checks. What does the German say today about the Weimar Republic and the reasons for the Nazi successes of 1933? He says—a staggering majority says: Weimar was the government of disorder, of political party haggling, of corruption. Hitler brought order. I believe 90 percent of those questioned answered thus—amongst them subsequent opponents of Nazism. This argument is the very top one. For the sake of German yearning for order we became enmeshed in the greatest disorder in our history. And do not forget, these are answers which were given now. Almost no one argued against Weimar and for Hitler on social grounds, such as unemployment; and please note, not even one percent mentioned freedom! . . .

Here we encounter a danger which I have not mentioned at all so far, and which I want to point out very briefly only because its exact description probably would require a doctors thesis. It is the danger that our youth, who soon will replace two generations of our people, will be infected with the spirit of the past and also turn out to be narrow-minded.



BONN
~~III REICH~~
~~WEIMAR~~

LA BONN D'ENFANTS

Infected by the so-called national schooling in the armed forces which we now want to create. Here, too, there emerges already a similar pattern to the one we observed in the establishment of our civil administration. The development began on a blank leaf, that is from scratch, without a clean separation of the offenders or those led astray by them, even without any abstract assertions of guilt.

My listeners, again and again I encounter unbelievably childish surprise even on the part of people who have proven their will to resolve the implications of the past, when I quote from documents, from German documents, which show the participation of high ranking members of the Wehrmacht in unequivocal criminal acts. Participation in deportations, mass liquidations, pillage, murder, all criminal acts which were even forbidden under Nazi military law. It certainly is not asking too much if it is demanded that such things should not be repeated, when it is asked that those guilty must be punished and that under no circumstances use should be made again of their services if the theory of the guilt of just a few should make any sense at all.

What of the Future?

If our youth, perhaps soon, will form the honor guards at the traditional commemorations of several hundred veterans organizations where the iron cross with the Swastika is worn, where men of the type of a Kesselring act to justify themselves, where the Viking call of the Waffen SS is circulated, where collections are conducted for the Breda prisoners because all of a sudden they are condemned prisoners of war, not murderers—tell me, what youth would remain unaffected and still be able to decide whether or not Adolf Hitler really did not go to the devil for the sake of Europe? The Communistic threat—also a potent problem all by itself—and the technical military training hold enough dangers. Thus too, anti-Communism, because it has long ago taken on collective traits and because its experts of yesterday felt sure of an early recognition of respectable legitimization for themselves. Military training is dangerous on account of its adherence to tradition, on account of the insane concept that knee-bends and right-about-facing can be turned into a philosophy of life . . .

Those, however, who want to ban this danger hold three important pawns in their hands: One is the fact that we, in contrast to let's say the Soviet zone, can openly discuss all matters tending to drive the nation on the road to injustice. The second pawn is the fact that the parliament is really striving to avoid old mistakes. This it does, in the third place, because it knows that a vast, imposing majority of our people in no way want a repetition, and that there are a sufficient number of people and institutions who enlighten this majority upon dangerous currents. This, it seems to me to be a duty for all of us so that in the future we will be able to call ourselves, without pride but also without shame, upright Germans in the full knowledge of our accomplishments and shortcomings.

"THE DIARY OF ANNE FRANK" REGARDED AS POLITICALLY "DUBIOUS"

There will be nothing from the United States this summer in the Paris International Theatre Festival.

The American National Theatre and Academy and the State Department had originally proposed to send "The Diary of Anne Frank," generally regarded as the finest new American play of the season.

But this year some people in France have been unhappy about the prospect of being host to an American play based on the Nazi persecution of Jews. They have been afraid that "The Diary of Anne Frank" would tear open old wounds at a time when the French and Germans are trying to establish amicable relations. Since the State Department is also in the business of trying to maintain pleasant international relationships, it decided not to insist on sending "The Diary of Anne Frank" abroad. . . .

"The Diary of Anne Frank" has won the hearts of thousands of theatregoers because it is not propaganda but an evocation of spirit. . . .

Some theatregoers may wonder why the world should be drugged into forgetting the frightful slaughter of the innocents by the Nazis under Hitler. It was not something that can be filed away in a pigeonhole as an unpleasant accident. . . .

Not to be represented in an international theatre festival obviously affects the prestige of the American theatre. . . .

German Infiltration in Lorraine and Belgium

The Threatening Rise of Friedrich Flick

by

KURT KERSTEN

Eleven years have passed since Allied forces, with great sacrifices, drove Hitler's armies from the western countries and with them the profiteers of Hitler's conquests. At that time, the Friedrich Flick combine had to get out of the Rombachwerke in Lorraine which it had exploited on the basis of agreements arranged with Hitler. This was a serious breach of the Hague Convention and the man most responsible in the matter, Friedrich Flick, was sentenced at Nuremberg to a prison term which he served in part in Landsberg jail.

Since then, Flick quickly reemerged as an important and influential man in the Federal Republic. He took up his activities again at the age of 67 and today, at 73, he is one of the powerful men of Germany . . . Now he is back in Lorraine; this is so amazing and disconcerting that it is of utmost importance to talk about it. For it is a more depressing symptom than those neo-Nazi developments about which people get excited, while the return of a powerful German industrialist with all its sinister consequences is overlooked—perhaps purposely overlooked in order not to lose faith in the naive belief of a democratic Western Germany.

Today, eleven years after the war, the Flick interests are ensconced again in Lorraine after having acquired 25 percent of the shares of the "Neuves Maisons" mill which maintains its own ore mine as well. The old German dream, of the fusion of Ruhr coal and Lorraine ore, comes true, the dream for which three bloody wars were fought between 1870 and 1945. The Frankfurter Rundschau, in a detailed article with a wealth of material on the Flick operations, rightly states that for the first time since 1914 a German industrialist has secured ownership of property in Lorraine. Nothing illuminates so glaringly France's current difficult situation, the ascendence of the Federal Republic and the shift of power in Western Europe, as the industrial and financial acquisitions which Flick managed to attain in so short a time.

He has also gained a solid foothold in Belgium, something never yet achieved by a German industrialist. For Flick acquired 20 percent of the shares of the Hainaut-Sambre combine. Flick's connections with French enterprises go even further, for he owns the German license for the French transport plane "Norstatlat," which is to be built for the new German air force, and Flick has already fused his "Siebel ATG, GmbH" with Krupp and Blohm companies into a new firm which will build the plane.

Getting out of the Landsberg jail, Flick lost no time in going to work to rebuild his companies . . . The man who once abetted Hitler's election campaigns with sizable amounts of money and, as stated in the verdict of Nuremberg, "contributed to Hitler's program of plundering," availed himself of the opportunities afforded by the Montan-Union plans at that time; and sold and rebought. Thus, he let "Sidéchar," a combine of ten French mining companies have the Harpener Bergbau A. G. for 180 million marks after negotiations with the German Federal railroads broke off due to price differences. However, half of the sale price Flick credited to himself in France, was not invested in the Federal Republic. Mannesmann acquired the "Essener Steinkohle" from Flick and thus Flick acquired 170 million marks in cash within a short period of time. Flick immediately complied with the Allied request for liquidation of the trusts by turning over to his two sons three additional enterprises in equal parts! And thus he put over the big deal in Belgium and Lorraine with his ready cash about which the waves of excitement are so high in France and Belgium.

As reported by the Frankfurter Rundschau, the news of Flick acquiring sizable shares of French and Belgian companies, has impressed French and Belgian labor like a bombshell. These are many of the very same workers who had once been deported to Germany as forced laborers and were compelled at that time to work for Flick. A delegation of workers protested inquiring if the "war criminal Flick" actually was co-owner of Belgian and French enterprises and a protest strike was prevented only with great difficulty.

Thus, Flick is on top again. This is the same Flick who, in 1931, succeeded in selling to the Reich his Gelsenberg shares at 90 percent of their value after they had gone down to 22 percent. Our older people will well remember this outrageous "Gelsenberg scandal." He is the same Flick who later gave money to Hitler and increased the production of his steel works by 72 percent under the Hitler regime. He was one of the great profiteers of the Hitler regime and was one of the grave diggers of German democracy. Today he is again in the front ranks of the game, this time as a profiteer of the much talked about German "economic miracle," the Montan-Union and also the "United Europe" idea which Flick would like very much to pin to his banner (Courtesy, Aufbau).

"It is no longer a secret to any foreign office that Adenauer set out to conquer the Soviet leaders, but was instead conquered by them. He had privately assured the Western Allies he would not establish diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union unless it gave ground on reunification. He publicly assured his own people on this point. But the question of reunification was never even raised at the Moscow conference. Adenauer settled for the return of 9,626 prisoners of war . . ."

THE THAW

"A West-German deputy, Hermann Schwann, announced that he wants to undertake an unaccompanied trip to Red China to make an attempt at 'breaking the ice' there.

"Schwann is 57 years old, a farmer, and is a member of the opposition group of the Free Democrats. From 1934 until 1945 he belonged to the Nazi party. Schwann said it was his own decision to undertake the trip and that he would bear the travel expenses himself. He will leave Bonn July 24th and will remain in Red China for eight weeks, visiting Moscow upon his return trip."

DULLES' RE-OCCUPATION PLAN!

"As regards NATO, Secretary of State Dulles recently inquired in Paris, how France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg would react to a plan of stationing garrisons of the German Army within their territories. Due to the proximity of the Federal Republic to the borders of these countries, it was considered to station West-German troops in depth. On May 12th, the French representative at NATO answered negatively and pointed to 'domestic political considerations'; even at the anniversary parade of NATO at Fontainebleau in which a few German soldiers participated, wide circles of the French population indicated an 'unexpected and regrettable attitude.' The Luxembourg representative at NATO gave the same answer as the French on May 13th, as did the representatives of Belgium and the Netherlands on May 15th."

SEPP SEEKS ABSOLUTION

"The former head of Hitler's bodyguard, Nazi Gen. Sepp Dietrich, whose parole as a war criminal last October was widely criticized, has applied for a West German certificate attesting to the fact that he is politically 'acceptable.'

"Dietrich at first was sentenced to hang for the massacre of at least 115 American GIs at Malmedy, Belgium, during the Battle of the Bulge.

"Dietrich's present activities were reported by H. Sperber, former chief U. S. Army interpreter at the Nuremberg war crimes trials, on his regular WATV weekend program, 'Foreign Press Report.'

"Dietrich, who now lives at Ludwigsburg, has received 6,000 marks ($1,428) from the Bonn government as 'homecoming pay.' "

(N. Y. Post, 6-11-56)

"PICKING UP THE PIECES"

"German industry seems determined to rebuild its prewar combines:

"Alfred Krupp, the prewar steel magnate, is agitating to keep his steel and coal properties—despite Allied directives designed to break up the Krupp holdings. Krupp has hired Struve Hensel—former general counsel to the U. S. Defense Dept.—to plead his case here.

"The three postwar companies that inherited most of the I. G. Farben empire seem to be putting the combine together again. They are picking up the smaller Farben successor firms by bits and pieces. And they have plans to divide markets and share their research.

"The three banks that are successors to the Nazis' Grossbanken already have operational unity (BW—Sep. 3, '55, p. 120). Now only a tax gimmick is holding up complete fusion—expected before the end of the year. The three banks already are an important source of credit for German exporters.

"Paradoxically, the whole reconcentration process stands to get an added boost when West Germany's anti-cartel law goes through—probably by the year's end. This law, which will replace Allied directives, has so many loopholes that it will, in effect authorize recartelization.

Danger and Opportunity

EASTERN EUROPE AND THE MIDDLE EAST

The spirit of freedom beckons the satellite nations of Eastern Europe. The death-like silence of the past 11 years has been smashed. The historic upheavals in Poland and Hungary show clearly that the peoples of these lands were never reconciled to the ruthless overlordship of the Kremlin. By their dauntless opposition they have unmasked the Soviet despotism and have given new hope to others who have shared their tragic plight.

However, candor compels us to state that we have watched the intrepid struggle of the Poles and the Hungarians with mixed emotion. We have been troubled by the thought that the sacrifices of these peoples may be in vain. Yet, we cannot help but feel that developments in Eastern Europe hold great promise, if only the U. S. and her Allies discard stereotype approaches to the problem of European freedom.

Current Allied propaganda seems to be characterized by an almost conceited belief that the only barrier standing between the Soviet satellites and their desire to seek friendship with the West are the Russian tanks. It has been made to appear as though a gigantic propaganda campaign, developed by our best advertising and public relations experts, is sufficient to "win over" the peoples of Eastern Europe and to relieve them of the intolerable Russian occupation. No matter how well conceived this propaganda may be in terms of techniques, it is at best a palliative and at worst may turn out to be a source of disillusionment which could strangle the cause of freedom.

The peoples of Eastern Europe need less of "moral support" and more of a realistic long-term policy by the Allied powers and in particular the USA. The struggle for freedom in Eastern Europe is not an abstract concept. Those who give their blood for this mighty cause must have a perspective, for in this fight the burning question inevitably arises: After freedom—what? It is to this question that our policy makers must devote their energies. They must be able to answer in terms that make sense to the peoples of Eastern Europe.

Not so long ago these brave nations were languishing under the jackboot heel of German militarism and Nazism. Their lands were laid waste, their farms and factories wrecked, and millions of their kin incinerated in the hells of Auschwitz, Buchenwald, etc. History tells us how the "inferior" nations of the East were enslaved by the Prussian warlords. On other occasions The Russian Czars, operating under the guise of Pan-Slavism, tried to absorb them in their Empire. There were other times when the power of the German eagle and the Russian bear more or less balanced each other. In such instances the Kaiser and the Czar would join hands and carve up neighboring peoples in the name of "mutual interests." The Hitler-Stalin marriage de convenance was but the continuation of this latter policy.

What shall it be this time? Will the bright vista of freedom from Russian hegemony turn out to be the cloak for a new master, the Germans? Or will this "freedom" be "guaranteed" by the combined power and mutual understanding of the Russian bear and the German eagle. Whichever the case, it is obvious that the peoples of Eastern Europe would find themselves in chains again.

These tragic alternatives are by no means inevitable if the West, in the words of Walter Lippmann, discard the "old stale shibboleths about Germany and the satellite countries." The Society has frequently stated that the rebuilding of Germany's war potential and military might "strengthens the Soviet grip over her Eastern satellites whose peoples dread the resurgence of the German power which devastated their lands." ("German Realities," No. 42, Summer Issue 1953 of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, inserted in the Congressional Record by Senator Wayne Morse, 8-3-53.) It is precisely this contradiction—the desire to see freedom in Eastern Europe and rehabilitating the German powerhouse, which threatens to negate the sacrifices of the Hungarians, Poles, and the other peoples oppressed by the Soviet tyranny. The net effect of this dualism in US policy is to obstruct the growth of friendship and understanding between ourselves and the satellite nations. "To believe that the peoples of Europe will move closer to the US when they behold the rhythmic marching of a new Wehrmacht, is to expect a miracle." ("The Failure of Diplomacy," No. 45, Winter Issue 1954-1955 of PREVENT WORLD WAR III.)

Those who are under Russian subjugation today do not want a German master tomorrow. That is why freedom in Eastern Europe is in reality part and parcel of the general problem of European security.

Unfortunately, US policy under Secretary Dulles fails to see this truism. In October 1956 the State Department addressed a note to the Bonn Government which said in part that "a sound system of European security . . . can be achieved only if Germany is reunited." The facts of life do not support this contention. The unity of Germany is but one aspect of the problem of European security. We did not fight World War II for the unification of Germany but rather for the security and peace of Europe and our own country. That security and peace, above all, must first be assured. Secretary Dulles' position is precisely one of the shibboleths about Germany.

There is another shibboleth, namely, that a powerful Germany is the most reliable bulwark against Russian totalitarianism. History proves the reverse. When both, Germany and Russia, were relatively equal in strength, mutual agreements were reached always at the expense of the small nations of Europe.

The peoples of Eastern Europe earnestly want the friendship of the West, but let no one be mistaken that this desire will per se bear fruit. "If the United States appears in Europe as the sponsor of Western Germany, it will never achieve a new relationship with Poland or Hungary or Czechoslovakia. . . ." (Prof. Geoffrey Barraclough, professor of international affairs at the Royal Institute of International Affairs; The Nation,12-1-56.)

Walter Lippmann had this in mind when he wrote: "A European policy is urgently needed to provide a framework of guarantees within which the occupied European countries can be made safe against their neighbors and safe for their neighbors. It is impossible to imagine the end of the military occupation, which remains from the World War, except within a European sytsem of security" (New York Herald Tribune, 12-11-56). Toward the establishment of such a system of European security the Society proposed in the No. 46 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III the following steps to be taken with regard to Germany:

(a) That both East and West Germany be permanently demilitarized under United Nations control.

(b) That the territorial integrity of East and West Germany becomes the responsibility of the United Nations.

(c) That the United Nations shall establish armed force contingents to be located in the states bordering Germany for purposes of implementing that responsibility.

(d) That both East and West Germany shall pay in cash to the United Nations a sum in an amount roughly equivalent to the cost of any occupation forces, or any other forces, which would have to be sited on German territory for the protection of peace and the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe. Such funds shall be employed to support the armed forces established by the United Nations for the protection of Germany's territorial integrity.

It is our considered judgment that an agreement on Germany along these lines would give concrete assurances to the peoples in Eastern Europe that the winning of their freedom would not wind up in the blind alley of a new tyranny. Indeed, it would rally them still further at this time to oppose the Soviet occupation.

The freedom, security and peace of all Europe was a fundamental aim in the fight against the German aggressors during World War II. We are convinced that the magnificent resistance of the Hungarians and the other peoples of Eastern Europe show that this goal can be reached by dynamic policies.

Through the years the Society has devoted much of its attention to European problems and their impact on peace and security. However, we have not for one moment discounted the other burning questions which confront the West. One of these is the Middle East which only a few months ago threatened to convulse the world in a new holocaust. Because of the gravity of the situation there, the Society made known its views to the United Nations, to the Government and to the press (see page 24, "The Middle East Crisis and the United Nations").

The Society's purpose in making this statement were designed primarily to stimulate action through the United Nations for a peaceful solution. In our opinion, the genesis of the Arab-Israeli conflict involves many complicated factors. Efforts to achieve a settlement will be seriously impeded if either side prefers to indulge in recriminations and accusations against the other. The Society's main concern has been to get both sides to sit down at the conference table and work out an agreement based on the civilized principle of "to live and let live." We mean this in the very literal sense of the word because millions of innocent lives are at stake.

The Middle East is an area where great things have happened in the past. It has also been a region where backwardness, disease and poverty have plagued the inhabitants. Friendship and cooperation between the Arab states and Israel would cause "the deserts to bloom again" and bring a measure of prosperity to these populations who are entitled to their God-given right to enjoy life, free from fear and from want.

This is why we have supported the United Nations' efforts toward bringing about a peaceful solution. This objective can be reached more speedily by the renunciation of propaganda which enflames the emotions, maintains prejudices, and creates blind hatred. The atmosphere for negotiations becomes clouded when responsible leaders speak in a warlike vein. For example, the Foreign Minister of Iraq, Burhanuddin Bashayan, recently declared in a broadcast: "Israel as a state was built on aggression and cannot live but on aggression. Therefore, its removal from the Middle East is essential.... The time is ripe for regaining Palestine in a manner outlined in Iraq's note (of Nov. 13 to UN members). The Iraqi government insisted on the uprooting and removal of Israel from the Middle East and forcing the usurpers to return to where they came from" (Reuters, 12-5-56).

Such outbursts cannot contribute toward a solution of the present crisis. A leadership indulging in this type of abuse does not lend dignity or respect to a country which presumably seeks the good will and approbation of the civilized community. Indeed, it displays a deplorable irresponsibility in the conduct of foreign relations that can only lead to further aggravation of the existing dangers.

Those leaders who purvey poisonous propaganda help to create a climate of blind hatred which may prove to be uncontrollable among peoples who are kept ignorant as to the real state of affairs. As a result a change from a policy of hostility to one of peace and mutual accommodation becomes virtually impossible, even when the long term interests of the country concerned require it. When a people are infected by artificially whipped up hatred, those who are responsible for this state of mind become prisoners of it. They are no longer able to act in a statesmenlike manner which is imperative if the country's welfare is to be safeguarded.

World public opinion will never reconcile itself to perpetual hostility between the Arabs and the Israelis. Those who persist in encouraging tension and hatred in the Middle East are working against the spirit and letter of the United Nations Charter. That is why it is of the greatest urgency that responsible Government leaders the world over, as well as leaders of the major religious faiths, join together in the demand that Israel and her Arab neighbors settle their mutual problems by negotiations. We must all bear in mind the wise words of the noted Norwegian staesman, Halvard M. Lange, "Real world peace is inconceivable without peace in the Middle East. Peace in the Middle East is equally inconceivable without peace between Israel and her Arab neighbors."

THE SOVIET GAMBIT

In November 1940 Berlin was the scene of intense negotiations between the Russians and the Germans. The Hitler-Stalin Pact of the previous year had set the stage for these conversations whose main participants were former Foreign Minister Molotov, Hitler and his Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop. Both, Molotov and von Ribbentrop regarded the Hitler-Stalin Pact as "good business" for initiating future cooperation on the basis of agreed spheres of influence.

In this connection von Ribbentrop spoke about Russia's opportunities in the "new order of things." He referred to the advantages Russia could gain "in the direction of the Persian Gulf and the Arabian Sea." Ribbentrop assured Stalin's representative that other "aspirations" of Russia in this part of the world were also recognized by Germany. The delimitation of spheres of influence formed an important part of the conversations between Molotov and Hitler. The Fuehrer told Molotov that Russia's adherence to the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis Treaty would help to define the "special interests" of the powers concerned. Needless to say, Molotov liked the idea but he insisted that in such a pact the Russians be treated as an equal partner. Furthermore, he expressed the need for a more precise delineration of these spheres of influence.

Following his return to Moscow, Molotov outlined to the German Ambassador Russia's "aspirations" in more concrete terms. He said that Russia was prepared to accept the Four Power Pact provided, among other things, that it stipulated "that the area south of Batum and Baku in the general direction of the Persian Gulf is recognized as the center of the aspirations of the Soviet Union."

It turned out, however, that the negotiations on this Pact became stalled in the growing climate of mutual suspicions between Hitler and Stalin. By the spring of 1941, the strains between the erstwhile partners increased and in June Hitler gave his signal for the invasion of Russia.

Recent events in the area of the Middle East show that the abortive partnership between Germany and Russia may come to life. For 200 years the Russians have dreamed of dominating the Middle East. Sixteen years ago they suffered great disappointment when their German partners turned against them. Today, the situation has changed with bewildering speed. The Russians are in the Middle East with both feet, so to speak and their influence is felt from Cairo to Damascus.

Russia's avenue for penetrating the Middle East was Egypt, where the Nasser Government, surrounded by Nazi advisors and well versed in dictatorial rule, welcomed the Soviets with open arms. In September 1955 Egypt announced to the world that it had completed an arms deal with the Soviet satellite state, Czechoslovakia. Nasser later revealed that the deal was, in reality, with Soviet Russia—Egyptian cotton for Soviet arms and tanks. Recent estimates place the figure of this deal in the neighborhood of $250 million.

While the Nasser Government hailed this agreement as a stepping stone toward Egyptian independence, it turned out that the Egyptian economy was virtually mortgaged to the Kremlin. What this has meant in terms of the welfare of the Egyptian people is seen by the fact that her national gold reserves have dropped by one-half billion dollars, while the average per capita income is about $5.60 per month by Nasser's own evaluation.

A report in the New York Times (8-26-56) stated that by reason of her barter arrangements with the Soviet bloc, Egypt has now placed her economy "in a critical state of dislocation." Nevertheles, Nasser continued to tell his people and the world that the deal with the Soviets was a triumph over "imperialism."

While the Egyptian people required economic help, Nasser gave them Soviet guns and spurred them on with anti-Western slogans. This was all to the liking of Soviet agents in Egypt. As far as the Russians were concerned their chance to convert the Middle East into a satrapy of the Communist empire was the main thing regardless of how this would be achieved.

With regard to Soviet policy Senator George H. Bender noted: "The Russians have everything to gain and nothing to lose by dealing with the Arab states. They would like to make Egypt a Russian Mediterranean base. Wars between nations are the Communists' meat. Whatever happens, no matter who wins or loses, communism is always waiting to claim the spoils" (Congressional Record, 6-4-56). The Senator warned that a war between Egypt and Israel would be the greatest calamity in that area of the world and urged that the United States exert its influence to prevent the realization of Russian intrigue.

Communist penetration in the Middle East involving arms investments supplemented by so-called cultural missions and the exchange of political leaders has made alarming headway. Communist China has become Egypt's largest customer. Egypt has concluded trade deals with most of the members of the Communist bloc. Russian economic aid pledged to Egypt includes the building of a nuclear laboratory in Cairo. The Soviet bloc has sent trade missions to various Arab countries, including Syria, Lebanon, and Yemen. Soviet technicians, politicians, trade, art, sport and religious leaders are being exchanged with the Arab countries.

Syria together with Egypt seem to be the major points of Russian concentration. The Syrians, following the example of Egypt, consummated a $80 million barter deal with the Russians for tanks, planes and guns. On March 6, 1956, the first issue of a Communist French-language paper appeared in Damascus. Shortly thereafter a Soviet "cultural" mission arrived in Damascus to present the Stalin Peace Award to the Syrian religious leader Sheikh Mohammed Al-Ashmar.

On July 25, 1956, the Syrian Prime Minister was quoted to the effect that Russian technicians were expected to arrive in Syria to advise on elevators and other installations in connection with the export of cereals.

One of Europe's best-informed correspondents, Sefton Delmer, wrote recently in the London Daily Express: "In my many visits since the war to Syria and to its Arab neighbors in Lebanon, Iraq, and Jordan, I have been forcibly impressed by the progress made by the Soviets in Syria since the war as compared with the other Middle Eastern states." Mr. Delmer described Syria "as the most important secret satellite of Moscow in the Middle East" besides "the advent of Nasser in Egypt." Even the Greek Orthodox Church of Syria, according to Mr. Delmer, is receiving "subsidies from the Church in Moscow."

The intense preoccupation of the Russians with the Middle East is indicated by the fact that the Middle East Department of the Soviet Foreign Office is headed by the former Ambassador to the Nasser Government, Daniel Solod, a specialist in political warfare. The mutual attraction between the Soviet dictatorship and the Pan-Arabic leaders was recently described in an editorial by the well-known French newspaper Figaro: "Birds of a feather flock together—the old proverb is still true—Marxist totalitarianism is attracted, as by a magnet, by the apparently opposite totalitarianism. Nobody in the world can deny that the Egyptian dictator has imperialistic ambitions. He has proclaimed them himself in his Philosophy of Revolution, the Bible of Pan-Arabism.

"Hitler invoked the 'living space' necessary, so he said, to the Great Reich. He saw it, in part, in the most prosperous regions of Soviet Russia. But it does not seem that the projects openly exposed in Mein Kampf disturbed the master of all the Russias.

"Nasser has in his turn intrigued the successors of Stalin, even though he does not hesitate to claim for his own the Moslems living under Soviet law. They think, in fact, that for the moment this is only a side issue, and that the essential thing is to dissociate the Western alliance as much as possible by favoring Pan-Arab and Pan-Islam imperialism. If the poker playing of Farouk's successor succeeds, a wound which will perhaps prove fatal will have been dealt to the free world. . . . Two enormous continents, Asia and Africa, will have become the proteges of Moscow."

The Soviet penetration in the Middle East has had a devastating effect on the economic and political position of our main Western allies, Britain and France. The Russians are striving, according to Joseph and Stuart Alsop (12-5-56) to do "everything in their power to eliminate British interests in the Middle East, thus reducing Britain to a third class power and destroying the Western alliance." They warn that Bulganin and Khrushchev are banking on America's vacillating attitudes to undermine the strength of our allies—and if this is achieved, then the United States will find herself isolated and bereft of strong allies.

It has been said in defense of present policy that we must maintain the friendship of the Arab peoples as if such friendship is in contradiction to our historic bonds with France and England. Nothing could be further from the truth. We hold that peace in the Middle East, friendship between the Arabs and the United States, and the strengthening of our ties with Britain and France are essential to each other. One of the major factors militating against the realization of these objectives is the rapidly growing influence of the Soviets in the Middle East, thanks to those Arab leaders who hope to employ this influence as a leverage in their blackmailing tactics against the West, while not realizing that they themselves may become vicitms of their own game. Only joint Allied policies which are designed to defend the integrity of all of the nations in the Middle East and to uphold the basic principles of international law in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations will protect the national interests of our country.

NAZIS IN WONDERLAND!

On October 1, 1956, a black limousine roared out of the Spandau prison gate, careened left and sped away down a side street. Newsmen who endeavored to cover the event, were surrounded by scores of menacing armed guards. German police threw a road block of trucks across the street to prevent reporters from pursuing.

The elaborate measures to assure the privacy and comfort of Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz were executed with clockwork precision. The entire military-like operation must have impressed the Admiral who had been chosen by Hitler as his successor to lead Nazi Germany. Perhaps Doenitz recalled another day when his movements and those of his Nazi associates were closely guarded by the armed retainers of the Third Reich. Whatever went through his mind as he relaxed in his limousine, this much was reality: he was a free man after having served ten years for war crimes and crimes against the peace.

Doenitz continued to avoid the searching questions of reporters after he had reached his destination in Düsseldorf. "My task," he said, "is to remain silent and to feel my way back to life." In other times Doenitz did not show a reluctance to speak out forcefully and with conviction. Thus, when he directed U-boat warfare resulting in the sinking of 15 million tons of World War II shipping, costing the lives of thousands of Allied personnel, he sharply commanded his officers to "kill and keep killing. Remember, no survivors. Humanity is weakness." At Düsseldorf he preferred silence.

Yet, in other times, Doenitz spoke up with authority and confidence. On the day when he was chosen by Hitler as the new Fuehrer of the Thousand Year Reich, he issued a declaration to the Nazi Wehrmacht: "German armed forces, my comrades. The Fuehrer is dead. Faithful to his great idea to save the people of Europe from Bolshevism, he had devoted his life and has died the death of a hero. With him one of the greatest heroes of German history has gone. With proud respect and sorrow we lower the flags for him."

It was precisely at this time when the Nazi regime was on the verge of collapse, that Doenitz together with General Keitel, hanged as a war criminal, initialed a top secret memorandum entitled "The Overcoming of the Catastrophe." In this document Doenitz calls for a postwar tie-up with Bolshevist Russia. Such a collaboration, the Doenitz memorandum stated, would have the following perspectives: "A colossal bloc of world-dominating greatness, economic power, energy and numbers of population would be created from ocean to ocean. Not only would the danger of future wars for generations be eliminated from Europe but also from the double continent of Eurasia. The two great peoples, the Russians and the Germans, have extraordinary possibilities for development without collision of their interests. The chief emphasis in this bloc will shift more and more to the racially superior, intellectually more active, and more energetic (people), that means to Europe. Thus would be formed an alliance between the young Socialist forces against the old rotten entrenched powers of the West."

Thus, Herr Doenitz who publicly posed as the new savior against Communism, secretly advocated an alliance with Soviet Russia at the expense of the West!

Doenitz' crimes were thoroughly catalogued at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. He was described by the U. S. Prosecutor, the late Justice Robert Jackson, as "Hitler's legatee of defeat. He promoted the success of the Nazi aggressions by instructing his pack of submarine killers to conduct warfare at sea with the illegal ferocity of the jungle."

Though Doenitz prefers the privacy of silence for the time being, his supporters—and there are many—hail him as the legitimate chief of the German nation.*

The Bonn Government has not dealt with this question but it has recognized Doenitz' claim for a pension. This pension will be granted to the Admiral, according to the Ministry of Finance, on the basis of his "rank and length of service." If the Ministry of Finance regards service to Hitler as legitimate grounds for receiving an annual pension that may run as high as $6,000, will the day come when his claim to speak for all of Germany will also be recognized?

One week following Doenitz' release, the German Defense Ministry announced that over 13,000 former officers in Hitler's Waffen SS had applied for posts in the new

The men who are running the anti-Adenauer campaign are sure of several things. The Russians will allow him to make no progress whatever toward reunification. The slowdown in economic expansion will continue and will become more noticeable as young men are drafted into the armed forces. German youth, already averse to military service and indulging in outbreaks of mild hooliganism, will tend ever more to look for political change.

The next year will be remarkable for the fact that there is a campaign to unseat Dr. Adenauer but no clear plan to put anything in his place. There is an unhappy suspicion that there is not a new generation on the march but a new gang on the move.

(The Washington Post, 10-14-56)

Indeed, the Grand Admiral seems to have some enthusiastic adherents in the U. S. A. For instance, H. Keith Thompson and George Sylvester Viereck, whose pro-Nazi activities could fill many pages, sent a wire "to the legitimate President of Germany, Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz." They called his release "the day of the triumph of your steeled will over the plans of your vengeful persecutors . . ." While they hailed Doenitz, they denounced his trial as having been "brought about by the criminal co-guilt of the USA and world jewry . . ."*

German army. The month before, the Defense Ministry announced that all members of this criminal organization would be welcomed back to the fold after "screening." Several months prior to this declaration, the Defense Ministry stated that former Field Marshal Erich von Manstein had been given access to NATO military secrets. Von Manstein has been found guilty and imprisoned for war crimes committed in Italy during World War II. Now he was awarded an office in the German Defense Ministry and was asked by the Parliamentary Defense Committee of the Bundestag to serve as an advisor on the future organization of German armed forces.

The release of Doenitz, the reactivation of the Waffen SS, and the appointment of von Manstein mark a significant stage in the setting up of the "new" Wehrmacht. These events are not disconnected. They are part of the pattern of things to come as the German General Staff develops plans for the future. It is therefore surprising that the German Defense Ministry refused to recommend for use in army libraries the book "The Third Reich and the Jews"? This volume contains official German documents on Nazi war crimes and, apparently, this is regarded as bad for the morale of the "new" German army. On the other hand, German book shops are doing profitable business on the sale of such books as W. V. Assenbach's book, "Adolf Hitler: His Fight Against the Inferior Being."

In the face of these sinister developments the Chancellories of the Western Democracies remained silent. Replying to the Society's protest over the appointment of von Manstein, the State Department declared, "These matters lie within the competence of the German Federal Republic, which has been a sovereign government since May 5, 1955."

But what about the responsibility which our State Department owes to the hundreds of thousands of GIs who gave their lives for the cause of freedom and human dignity? And what of the generations of youth to come? Will they, too, be called upon to make the supreme sacrifice because we allow "these matters" to lie "within the competence" of the West German Government?

MALMEDY KILLER PAROLED

The American Legion today blasted American officials who had anything to do with releasing Nazi Col. Joachim Peiper, triggerman of the 1944 Malmedy massacres.

National Commander W. C. Daniel singled out Spencer Phenix, Chocorua, N .H., the American member of the board. In an open letter to families of the victims, Mr. Daniel said:

"I pledge to you—in what must be a moment of heartsick disgust and despair—that the American Legion will not rest until Spencer Phenix and all other government officials responsible for the release of the Malmedy murderers are removed from office and replaced by Americans who believe that the lives of your loved ones and of every American fighting man cannot be traded for a few years in jail."

Peiper, with his boss, Col. Gen. Sepp Dietrich, first was sentenced to die for machine-gunning 160 disarmed Americans at Malmedy, Belgium, during the Battle of the Bulge. Dietrich's parole last year aroused a storm of protest.

Peiper's release over the holidays apparently caught veterans' groups by surprise.

In his letter, Mr. Daniel called Peiper's release "the most sordid travesty on justice in the history of international law."

One of the few Malmedy survivors, former Lt. Virgil P. Lary, Columbus, Ohio, last year warned that Peiper's release would "dishonor" the nation's war dead.

"The screams of my men . . . still ring in my ears," said Mr. Lary.

The Strategy of Stalling

The maneuverings and motives surrounding West Germany's decision to renege on her NATO commitments shed new light on her value as an ally to Western powers.

Financial Veto

In the beginning of 1956 the Bonn Government declared that it would refuse to continue financial support for U. S. and Allied forces in Germany after May 1956. This decision was made known through the German press before word of it was sent to the Allied authorities. Through this unusual diplomacy the Bonn Government was able to trigger a campaign of slander and incitation against her NATO partners. The Western Allies including the U. S. were accused of looting the German Treasury and employing underhanded tactics at the expense of the well-being of the German people. This press barrage served as a preparatory assault for the official announcement that the Germans would refuse to pay for the support of the Allied forces.

The Bonn Government based its position on the Contractual Agreement which made no provision for German financial support of the Allied forces subsequent to May 1956. Though the Germans stuck to the letter of this agreement, it was patently obvious that they had violated its spirit.

The Contractual Agreement assumed that the Germans would cease financial support when they had sufficient armed forces of their own to take over the responsibilities which the Allies had shouldered for defending German soil. However, the German army was still in the blueprint stages in early 1956 and therefore the Allies were being asked to continue to protect West Germany without any costs to the Germans themselves.

The Society called this crucial issue to the attention of the Congress of the United States. We declared that the German decision threatened to undermine the NATO defense system. We charged that Germany's refusal to make a contribution and the dishonest and insolent attacks levied against the Western Allies was "not indicative of a government professing friendship with the West." We also raised the question as to whether this was a maneuver on West Germany's part "to force U. S. and Allied forces out of Germany with the view towards making a deal with the Russians on that basis."

Unfortunately, the Western Allies beat a retreat before the Bonn Government's brazen challenge. They agreed to a 55 per cent slash in the funds which were originally requested from the Bonn Government to support the Allied forces. As far as we know, the Allied authorities continue to accept the Bonn Government's professions of good faith. We, on the other hand, interpreted this episode as but a prelude to further efforts by West Germany to go back on her pledges.

Watering Down Conscription

Our suspicions were justified for by September 1956 Chancellor Adenauer announced that the period of military service for German conscripts would be fixed at one year instead of eighteen months. This decision, too, was made public in an unusual way. The Information Office of the German Federal Government issued a statement that Chancellor Adenauer had scrapped the eighteen months conscription plan when he had learned from American newspapers that American forces in Europe would be reduced under the so-called Radford Plan. This alibi was so fantastic that even the Social Democrats who opposed the idea of conscription described it as the "most grotesque explanation any federal government ever made to the public" (Christian Science Monitor, 9-28-56).

Diplomatic protocol was ignored by Herr Adenauer since the decision was made public through the German press before the Allies were officialy notified of it. Needless to say, the Western Allies were taken aback by Adenauer's bluntness. The decision was viewed by them as a gross violation of his pledges to supply necessary armed forces, as provided in the agreements between West Germany and NATO. The NATO Council stated flatly that "the NATO military authorities have made clear the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of accomplishing this objective with a service period of only twelve months." In this connection it is noteworthy that all of the members of NATO with the exception of tiny Luxembourg, have a much longer conscription service than that proposed by the Germans for themselves.

The "New" Army

However, this is only one aspect of the issue. It is now freely admitted by Allied military authorities that Bonn's decision will make inevitable the development of a professional army, the kind which always was the bulwark of German militarism. It is also of significance that together with the abolishment of the eighteen months plan for conscription Chancellor Adenauer approved the admission of former members of Hitler's Waffen SS into the new German army. It is a matter of record that the Waffen SS was one of Hitler's most notorious organizations. Its crimes helped to turn Europe into a vast graveyard. For its barbarous deeds it was condemned and outlawed by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. Yet, it is precisely these professional cutthroats who will "be the backbone" of the new German army (Christian Science Monitor, 9-28-56).

As for the so-called Radford Plan, Adenauer admitted that he assumed its existence on the basis of reports in U. S. papers. The U. S. Government has officially denied that there ever was such a plan, but Adenauer, in desperation to justify his unilateral action, endeavored to give the impression that the unauthenticated press reports were tantamount to the official policy of the U. S. Government. In the face of Allied reaction to his alibi, Adenauer was compelled to speak with more candor. Thus, he told his party leaders that his government was determined to make it clear to the NATO Council that West Germany had "overcommitted herself with regard to the number of troops" (New York Times, 10-17-56). No longer was Adenauer able to hide behind the alleged Radford Plan. Now he had to admit that Germany had its own ideas about contributing to NATO. Of course, candor is not one of the characteristics of West German diplomacy, and that is why many of our policy makers seem confused over Germany's attitude. When German rearmament policy is guided by a number of considerations which are masked by the plethora of platitudes which are found in Adenauer's speeches before Western audiences. Among these factors we cite the following:

(1) Profitability: Today Germany is enjoying an unprecedented economic boom. In no small degree this is due to the fact that the Germans are able to apply virtually all of their resources and energies to peacetime production while a substantial portion of the resources of the Western Allies is tied up in armament production. The New York Times (1-18-56) reported that the Ruhr barons find it more advantageous "for West Germany to continue to expand its civilian economy and use its surpluses for the purchases of armaments abroad." The views of this group are shared by top government officials and members of the German Parliament who believe that West Germany should "pay the barest minimum for armament compatible with its commitments to NATO." The Times notes that this position is based on the doctrine that armament "must not interfere with the normal development of the civilian economy and if it does, it is not worth having."

Some months ago the Minister of Finance Fritz Schaeffer delivered a speech in Bavaria in which he said that Germany was not anxious to build an armaments industry. He contended that it would be more profitable to purchase arms from abroad while "the Ruhr remains the workshop of peaceful industries" (London Financial Times, 8-27-56). In a moment of frankness Herr Schaeffer admitted that the Western Allies might not take to the idea that they shall devote money and plant space "for arms production while we (the Germans) utilize ours for export goods" (Time Magazine, 9-10-56).

While recognizing this difficulty Herr Schaeffer and the leaders of the German economy insist that the rearmament policy must be guided by the single standard of profit and loss. At times they will try to rationalize this position by the rather comical argument that Germany's most effective contribution to NATO would be to strengthen her peacetime economy and to widen her export markets.

(2) An up-to-date Wehrmacht: After World War I German rearmament proceeded at a slow pace because of the Versailles Treaty. Yet, Germany was able to turn the prohibitive clauses in the Versailles Treaty to her own advantage. While other countries were still employing relatively obsolete weapons and shaping their strategy accordingly, the German General Staff was able to proceed with deliberation and without overcommitting itself until "all of the returns were in." In short, Germany began to rearm in a big way only when the latest weapons of war were available. Many of these weapons had been created by other countries but Germany was in the position to exploit their possibilities to the fullest without going through the enormous expense of experimenting over a long period of time. This approach to rearmament was of decisive importance in producing the most modern war machine under Hitler.

After the defeat of Germany in World War II the decks were clean again. As in the past Germany had the opportunity to start afresh in developing the most modern weapons of war. This is the way the Germans have reconstructed important branches of their economy. For example, some months ago Franz Josef Strauss, former Federal Minister for Atomic Questions, declared that West Germany was faced with the task of "catching up with the progress made by other nations during the last ten or fifteen years" in the field of atomic energy.

In reply to those in West Germany who voiced concern over West Germany's backwardness in atomic energy,

WHO IS FOOLING WHOM?

Defense Minister Theodor Blank said West Germany would have 96,000 men under arms by the end of this year. He denied there was any lag in the armament program....

"At the risk of being called a liar later, I can assure you that we shall carry out our NATO obligations this year to the fullest extent," Herr Blank told a group of visiting United States editors and commentators.

The West German armament program calls for the creation of a twelve-division, 500,000-man armed force as the Bonn Government's contribution to the Western defense forces.

(U. P., 3-27-56)

A West German spokesman today said the goal of a 96,000-man army by the end of this year will have to be abandoned....

As a result, the new Defense Minister, Franz Josef Strauss, will have to inform the North Atlantic Treaty Organization council in Paris later this fall that "certain delays" have arisen.

Mr. Strauss was named to succeed Theodor Blank yesterday in a move which suggests eventual abandonment of the goal of a 500,000-man "citizen-soldier" army. The former Minister for Atomic Affairs has favored a 300,000-man professional force armed with atomic weapons.... (Gaston Coblentz, N. Y. Her. Trib.)

Herr Strauss stated: "We shall build on the experience of other nations and turn to research and training in the field of the peaceful utilization of atomic energy. We shall not, however, construct large-scale atomic power stations, which by the time they are completed in five or six years will become unprofitable and outmoded because of technical progress. It is not a matter of doing something fast but of doing what is necessary in the right way" (The Bulletin, 6-7-56). A similar line of thought has been expressed by the leaders of the German aircraft industry. The steel industry, too, has boasted that the destruction of plants has enabled the industry to reconstruct on the most modern basis available.

There is no doubt that this is the general position taken by German strategists in mapping Germany's plans for the future. Herr Strauss who has now been appointed Defense Minister, has made this crystal clear. According to the New York Times (9-23-56) Strauss warned "against the hasty building up of an army that might become obsolescent before it was fully formed." He was reported to have said that the army blueprinted five years ago for Germany "might produce only a second rate army today." Consequently, he urged that the Bonn Government "go slow now" so as to make sure that the new German army would be the most modern war machine possible. Time Magazine (9-10-56) in discussing Germany's reluctance to rearm as originally pledged, also referred to this factor: "Weapons are in a transitional state and Germans do not want to commit themselves to large scale production until the weapons of the future have taken clear shape."

The Chairman of the German Bundestag Defense Committee, Richard Jaeger, criticized what he alleged was the Allied attempt to load West Germany with outdated arms. "We do not want to pay for a false investment with the bones of German panzer (tank) troops," he said (New York Herald Tribune, 10-3-56). To repeat, the Germans prefer that the Western Allies devote huge resources to the development of new weapons so that Germany can ultimately reap the rewards.

(3) Concessions from the U. S. A.: The Germans are still hoping that they can extract additional bounties from the U. S. Treasury as their price for rearming. Chancellor Adenauer's Minister for Economic Affairs, Ludwig Erhard, assured the Bonn Parliament that defense expenditures would not exceed $2 billion annually. When he was asked what he would do if costs would be greater than this figure, Herr Erhard retorted, "then let the Americans pay!" (New York Times, 2-27-55). Finance Minister Schaeffer has also expressed the same view.

A New York Times dispatch (2-5-56) reported a statement by Schaeffer to the effect that "West Germany could not meet its commitments to NATO unless the U. S. were to meet the deficit." From time to time Chancellor Adenauer has also expressed this view, namely, that the major cost for German rearmament must be underwritten by the American taxpayers. The New York Times (1-25-56) ported that the views of the German political leaders were shared by all important groups in West Germany.

Besides the notion that Uncle Sam must foot the bill for German rearmament, the Germans are beginning to sound out our Government on a program that would, in effect, subsidize Germany's export drive. Indeed, this is the very heart of the so-called "Point 4½ Program" sponsored by the Krupp interests. While publicizing this plan as a move to help underdeveloped countries, Krupp hopes to be able to secure a dominating position in these markets. The Point 4½ Program is still in the preliminary stages of discussion and it remains to be seen whether the United States will grease the way for the Krupp venture via the U. S. Treasury. Unquestionably the Germans will show more sympathy to "rearmament" when and if they can milk Uncle Sam for additional billions. (See No. 48, p. 19.)

(4) War Guilt and War Criminals: The Society has frequently pointed out that Germany's top leaders including Chancellor Adenauer have resented the implications of the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. They are bitter about the punishment meted out to those who deny that they were war criminals in spite of all of the evidence to the contrary. In the past German leaders and militarists have railed against the United States for keeping in prison those who were "honorable" soldiers and politicians. The Allies have been warned and threatened that so long as one of these "heroes" remains in prison the German people will not show enthusiasm for military cooperation. At the rate that the Allies are freeing these criminals, one would expect that this factor would lose its importance. But one should not underestimate the other side of this question of war criminality, i.e., the role of the Allies in World War II.

There are powerful voices in Germany today who say that the Allies must admit that they were in wrong when they opposed Hitler who, after all, was only trying to save Europe from Bolshevism. If the past is any guide to the future, then we can anticipate that in due time "public opinion" in Germany will demand that the Allies must admit their "guilt" before the Germans will wholeheartedly cooperate with the Allied powers.

(5) A German-Soviet Deal: Of decisive importance in West Germany's calculations with regard to rearmament are her relations with the Soviet Union. There are many important leaders and groups who insist that West Germany go slow on rearmament for the sake of cementing her relations with the Russians. This position is held by two of Germany's most important parties, the Social Democrats and the Free Democratic Party. It is a view that is shared widely in West Germany. This is confirmed by the Christian Science Monitor's well-known correspondent in Germany, J. Emlyn Williams, who reported, "Most West Germans see remilitarization tied too closely to the Western powers as a hindrance (to German unification) because of Soviet objections" (9-21-56).

To the German military no less than to the big industrialists of the Ruhr whose mouths water when they think of the markets in the East, and to the growing number of politicians, the idea of a Russo-German deal is a worthwhile goal. If they could prove to the Russians that their military cooperation with the West is of a pro forma character, then the way could be paved for an understanding. This vision of an embrace with the Russians unquestionably enters into the disarmament picture.

(6) German Assets: From Chancellor Adenauer down, the Germans have been working overtime to regain the assets of I. G. Farben which were vested by the U. S. Government. Adenauer has publicly declared that the return of these assets was of the greatest importance in strengthening friendship between the U. S. and West Germany. On March 8, 1954, he said, "Any just solution of this question will strengthen the confidence of the German people in the principles of the free world, will make fast the friendship between the American and German peoples and will relieve the German Government of a great worry." The Süddeutsche Zeitung (3-6-55) was more to the point about the "great worry" when it asked why German property should not be returned since the Germans and the United States have undertaken "military pledges of alliance to one another . . ."

A more blunt comment on the relationship between the return of the assets and Germany's military cooperation with NATO was made by Der Tag (3-5-55) when it stated, "The situation is more serious here in Germany than people in America realize. If Mr. Abs (Hitler's paymaster and leading German banker) does not win a satisfactory solution (for the return of the Farben interests) on his trip to Washington, General Gruenther loses a battle." To our knowledge, no paper in the United States reported this interesting comment. The voice of Farben, just as under Hitler, has special influence on Bonn policy and Herr Adenauer wil hardly move quickly to fulfill his pledges to NATO so long as Farben is not paid off.

"Anti-Militarism"

In assessing West Germany's attitude toward rearming at the present time one cannot ignore the factors mentioned above. Unfortunately, most commentators have evaluated the general slowdown in German rearmament as an indication of the growing anti-militaristic spirit in Germany. We do not deny the fact that there are many people in West Germany, particularly among the youth, who have no enthusiasm for a new German Wehrmacht. We do not even doubt their sincerity and we are even willing to concede for argument's sake that they are in the majority. However, a similar situation occurred after World War I. Then as now, most Germans were caught in the wave of disillusionment and embitterment toward the futility of war and militarism. This general feeling was symbolized by the great novel "All Quiet on the Western Front" by Erich Maria Remarque. Yet, there was a radical change of feeling at the beginning of the 1930s and those who shouted "nie wieder" in the 1920s began to echo the cries of the Nazis for revenge and for regaining the glories of the Fatherland.

As for today, we say that all encouragement should be given to these anti-militaristic sentiments but let us not confuse the immediate mood with the long-range factors and plans that are operating on the German scene. Even Krupp has publicly declared his disgust with war, but who would dare to say that Krupp has turned pacifist? The confusion on the so-called anti-militaristic spirit in Germany became even more pronounced when Adenauer fired Herr Blank and appointed Franz-Josef Strauss to the defense post. The New York Post writer, Theodore Kaghan, who is thoroughly familiar with the German problem, hailed the Strauss appointment as "a concession to the rising resentment toward rearmament throughout the country . . ." (New York Post (10-18-56). If it were only true!

The New Defense Minister

Who is Herr Strauss? According to published records Strauss is a Bavarian who, in his youth, distributed Nazi propaganda in Munich, the birthplace of Hitlerism (Time Magazine, 10-29-56), and during World War II served in Hitler's Wehrmacht as an artillery lieutenant. According to the Christian Science Monitor Herr Strauss "inclines much more toward the old military tradition" (10-16-56). In our lexicon this can only mean that he is an admirer of "the good old days" when the German General Staff reigned supreme.

Thus, Time Magazine reports that Strauss is determined to reestablish "a military planning group, tantamount to a German Geenral Staff." Strauss has insisted that the German army must be equipped "with the most modern weapons available including atomic arms . . ." (New York Times, 10-18-56). Parenthetically, it should be noted that when Strauss visited the United States in the spring of 1956, he gave public assurances that Germany would strictly adhere to her pledges that the Germans would not employ the atom in her military setup (Washington Post, 5-17-56). Time Magazine (l. c.) reports that Strauss demands "a national German army of professional soldiers." Moreover, he insists that the new German army must "be as independent as possible, because he felt that the NATO strategy was not in Germany's best interests."

In the face of these facts it is difficult to agree with the interpretation that Strauss' appointment represents a victory for anti-militarism. It is true that Strauss' army will not be large quantitatively. However, if it is organized along the lines envisaged by him, equipped with atomic weapons, its quality will make up for the shortage of numbers. The professional character of this army is indicated by the fact that it will be dominated by career soldiers, one out of every three being an officer or a non-commissioned officer.

The Atom

Strauss' insistence on putting atom bombs in the hands of his professional army has been fully endorsed by Adenauer. The story goes that, when Adenauer visited Belgium in September 1956 he asked the Western statesmen to support his request that Germany be equipped with atomic bombs. Adenauer's position "startled Belgium's Paul Henri Spaak" (Time Magazine, 10-8-56).

Certainly these plans of Adenauer and Strauss can hardly be regarded as furthering the cause of anti-militarism. Yet, the German bigwigs are pleased that there is an anti-militaristic feeling in Germany for this sentiment serves a twofold purpose: (1) to delay rearmanent on the basis of the factores outlined above, (2) to carefully plan the new German army so that it will be even mightier than that which fought for Hitler.

Therefore, while we are pleased to see that there is a wave of anti-militarism in Germany and believe it should be supported, we must beware of the fickleness of German sentiment as we must beware of the Krupps, the Kesselrings and the Doenitzes.

Some of our readers have interpreted our strictures against West Germany's failure to abide by her armament commitments as an indication that the Society favors German rearmament. Nothing can be further from the truth. As in the past we remain unalterably opposed to the remilitarization of West Germany and East Germany since we believe that the rearming of the former enemy will turn out to be a long step toward World War III. By exposing Germany's failures in meeting her NATO commitments we have tried to re-emphasize the fact that Germany's pledges to the Allies are not worth the paper they are written on, be it in military or other matters.

On U. S. Foreign Policy

by
SENATOR HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

(Excerpts from an address by Senator Humphrey at the Overseas Press Club in New York City)

We are almost at the end of the most momentous year since World War II. It has been a paradoxical year—one in which both the United States and the Soviet Union have suffered severe diplomatic defeats. The United States saw the North Atlantic alliance shaken to its roots when war broke out in the Middle East. And the Soviet Union lost its grip on the captive countries of Eastern Europe.

It is too soon to attempt to strike a balance as to who lost more. It is not too soon, however—indeed, we have waited too long already—to begin an urgent reappraisal, however agonizing it may be, of the world situation and of our own posture toward it.

Quite obviously, fundamental changes of enormous consequence have taken place. No man can foresee where they will end. The old, static condition has ended; conditions are more fluid than at any time since 1945. The cold war has changed from one of fixed positions to one of maneuver. This increases somewhat the dangers; but it also greatly increases the opportunities for statesmanship that is both wise and bold, imaginative and judicious.

Our first task is to assess the nature and implications of these changes that are taking place.

The first thing we must realize is that in today's world there can be no effective foreign policy without risks. There is no risk-proof insurance policy that will guarantee freedom and security in today's world.

One of the basic facts of our time is the spirit of nationalism which dominates the thinking of most of the underdeveloped areas of the world. We are all familiar with the manifestations of this force—the anti-Westernism throughout much of Asia and Africa and the irresponsible fashion in which the Soviet Union has tried to take advantage of this feeling and use it for its own ends. What we are now seeing is the re-emergence of this same spirit of nationalism in the Soviet countries of Eastern Europe.

Nationalism is challenging international communism on its home grounds, and the end is not yet. This points up, as clearly as anything possibly could, the truth of what many Americans have been saying for years—namely, that international communism is fundamentally inconsistent with nationalism and that it presents the most serious threat of all to the hard-won independence of the new states of Asia and Africa. . . .

One reason we need the U. N. is to provide a constructive focus for this tremendous force of nationalism which otherwise would be running wild. The U. N. does not control nationalism, but it does provide a framework in which nationalism can find its proper and responsible place in a world society that is becoming increasingly interdependent. The U. N. can likewise protect and encourage nationalism.

The problems we now face in Eastern Europe and the Middle East have little in common, but it can be said, I think, that the roots of the problems in both instances are nationalist in origin. The challenge, both before the U. N. and before our own government, is how we deal with these problems in a responsible manner calculated to promote the principles of the United Nations Charter, to advance the national interests of the United States, and to bring some greater measure of peace and freedom to the people of the areas concerned. . . .

The ferment in Eastern Europe obviously presents opportunities; but it also places a great obligation on us to act in a sober, responsible manner.

We should be prepared to discuss sympathetically economic aid with the independent governments of Eastern Europe, as, for example, Poland. . . .

Much can be done through other policies if we but have the wit to think of them. And we had better think of some pretty fast, because the manifestations of nationalism in Eastern Europe increase the urgency of finding some sort of security system that Europe can live with. In some respects, the obvious weaknesses of communism in the captive countries may well give the Soviets pause. But in other respects, this situation could trigger World War III—either as a Soviet tactic to re-establish control or as a consequence of some as yet more violent explosion in one of the satellites. . . .

We should continue, of course, to use every avenue available to put increasing pressure on the Soviets through the United Nations in regard to the Hungarian situation. By their arrogant defiance of the UN, they are increasingly isolating themselves from the rest of humanity.

The UN actions in regard to Hungary have not been as vigorous as I would have liked and the situation has dragged on longer than I would have liked, but by proceeding one step at a time we have been able to resolve some of the doubts that troubled many of the Asian-African states at the beginning.

It is my personal view, however, that the UN should go further in regard to Hungary. In commenting upon the UN action in regard to the Middle East, Vice President Nixon recently said that it upheld the rule of law—"the same law for the powerful and the strong as for the weak and the defenseless." What the UN must now do in regard to Hungary is to apply the same law to the scoundrels and aggressors as to the decent and honorable. . . .

Certainly the UN cannot content itself with condemnatory resolutions, no matter how strongly worded. We should not only take steps to insure against the return of the spurious Hungarian representatives who walked out of the UN last week; we should also give consideration to economic and diplomatic sanctions against the Kadar regime in Hungary and against the Soviet Union itself.

As of now, the Soviet Union and her puppet regime in Budapest have refused to let U. N. observers come into Hungary. We must continue to press hard to demand that these observers be admitted.

Even without observers, the world has learned several things from these recent horrors in Hungary.

First, these uprisings show that there still exists in satellite lands the same love of freedom which is the natural heritage of man everywhere.

Second, we have learned how totally unrealistic it is to assume that the people of the satellite countries will automatically support Moscow. That is a very important lesson.

Third, we have learned that you cannot easily crunch the spirit of liberty. It keeps glowing in spite of years of totalitarian repression and in spite of foreign armies.

Fourth, we have learned that even the youth brought up during such periods of repression still desire liberty and are willing to fight for it. . . .

We have also learned that food is tremendously important as a weapon—both in a cold and in a hot war, and this has become something of a hot war.

Our policy with regard to food assistance has not been clear. It is disgraceful that we should receive dispatches about food shortages, even in Austria, when we have adequate supplies, including supplies of milk, that we could easily have sent. We should dramatize the airlift which we're using to bring in refugees, by sending every plane back on the return trip loaded to capacity with powdered milk and other food supplies, so that our response could be immediately seen and our aid would be dramatic, and inspiring to those who are fighting for freedom.

We should also extend the use of American food to any country that takes refugees and needs such aid, besides Austria. . . .

Revelation of the Soviet oppression in Hungary has had the most damaging effect on the Communist party of anything since the Stalin-Hitler pact of 1939. It has increased the chances of the breakdown of the Soviet empire and has contributed to the unrest of students and intellectuals in Russia itself. Now is the time when America should speak not only in terms of good-will, but in terms of definite actions—actions which may involve risks, but as I said before, there is no risk-proof insurance policy covering such things as freedom and security.

Turning now to the Middle East, we find an area where the problems are so many and so complex that one hardly knows where to start. It is now truly a power vacuum. Although Soviet influence has greatly increased, American prestige is also at a new high. As the Soviet threat makes solutions to the area's problems more urgent, so does the new American position, coupled with the new solidarity which has developed in the UN, offer hope of finding solutions.

The UN has an especially important role to play. It is dangerous for either the United States or the Soviet Union to try to be the dominant power in the Middle East; this is an area ready-made for the kind of international ministrations that the UN is peculiarly equipped to undertake.

As Germany is the key in Europe, so I think the Arab-Israeli conflict is the key in the Middle East. It is idle to expect peace ever to come to that unhappy area until some settlement of this conflict is reached.

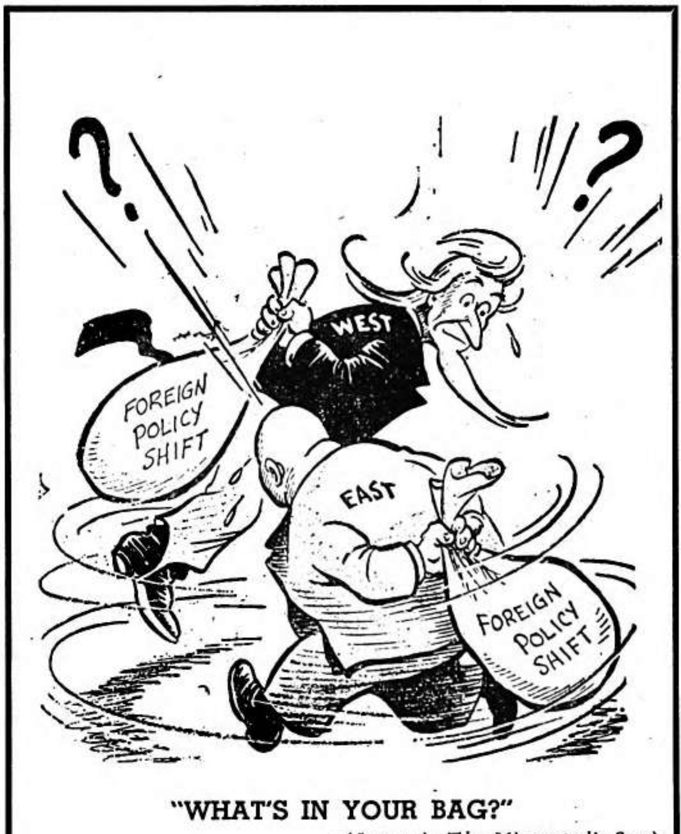
It has been amply demonstrated that the UN will not tolerate aggression in the Middle East. It is also, I think becoming increasingly clear to the states of that area that it is not in their own interests to rely on the Soviet Union. What we must now do is to make it still more clear to the Arabs and Israelis alike that it is in their own interests to reach a settlement, that they hurt themselves more than anyone else by stubbornly insisting that the world has not moved since 1947. In the last analysis, this dispute can be settled only by the parties concerned, and we cannot expect them to do that until they realize that they will be better off with it settled than with it unsettled.

The United States and also the United Nations must be firm and just with both sides. As we acted to halt the invasion of Egypt, so we should now take steps to halt persecutions of Jews in Egypt. We can certainly not stand idly by in the face of increasing reports of anti-Semitism as an official policy of the Nasser government.

In the best of circumstances, it will take at least a generation for the hatreds of the Middle East to entirely abate. The more each side retaliates against the other, the longer it will take.

It is unrealistic to expect an Arab-Israeli settlement to spring fullblown from any single set of negotiations. A settlement in the Middle East must be pursued one step at a time.

The first step is obviously to bring about a complete with-



"WHAT'S IN YOUR BAG?"

drawal of foreign forces from the area, in prompt compliance with U. N. resolutions.

The second step is a settlement of the Suez Canal problem over and above the physical work of clearance. Here the six principles unanimously agreed to by the UN Security Council offer a good starting point for reaching an agreement on the Canal's operation.

With these immediate issues out of the way and with a groundwork of quiet, careful diplomatic preparation, we can approach negotiations for a general settlement. There are other things, however, that we can also be doing in the meantime. What the Middle East desperately needs is economic development—not simply for its own sake but as a constructive endeavor to occupy the minds and energies of the people and their leaders. We have furnished a considerable amount of economic and technical assistance to the area; yet, with a few exceptions, it has not been particularly effective. We have tried very hard, and have failed, to get agreements on regional projects, such as the Jordan River plan.

The time may now be more propitious for such undertakings, and we should vigorously renew our efforts, not only to get the Jordan River and similar projects underway but also to get some action on the refugee problem.

It might be useful, in this connection, to consider establishing, under United Nations auspices, a Middle East Development Authority. Most of the economic, as well as the other, problems of the area are international in their scope. Most of them also require outside assistance, either in the form of capital, of technical aid, or of good offices. Why not, then, have an international agency to deal with them? The kind of Middle East Development Authority that I have in mind would have, on its board of directors, representatives of all the states of the area as well as representatives of the states furnishing capital and technical assistance. Ample provision could be made to protect national sovereignties.

In any event, it appears obvious that we are going to have to extend more aid to the Middle East—and do it more effectively.

Perhaps the most unfortunate aspect of the whole Suez affair is that innocent bystanders, both in Europe and in the Middle East, are getting hurt. All of Western Europe is suffering from oil shortages along with Britain and France, though none of the other countries in Western Europe can be charged with any responsibility for their present troubles. And in the Middle East, the oil-producing states are suffering from lack of markets, though two of the states—Iraq and Iran—had nothing to do with the events which brought this situation about. . . .

To sum up:

In the Middle East we must insist that the Canal be opened and cleared. We must insist upon the use of British and French and any other available equipment in helping achieve a purpose that is vital to all of us.

We must keep U. N. forces in the Middle East large enough to cope with any danger in the area, and as long as is necessary, until a permanent settlement has been worked out.

That settlement must be one which opens the Suez Canal and guarantees that it will remain open, free and unfettered, for the safe conduct of the shipping of all the world, including Israeli ships. The question of national ownership is secondary—but the effectiveness and enforcibility of these guarantees must be absolute.

In the end, an Arab-Israeli settlement must be brought about in Palestine. While the Arabs refuse to recognize the existence of Israel such a settlement is impossible. We must use every device available to American diplomacy, operating through the United Nations and otherwise, to overcome this intransigence, to make it clear that we expect to see a settlement reached, and that we insist upon an ending of the interminable border raids from either direction. Meanwhile we must move forward with a bold regional plan for economic aid, such as I have already outlined.

Political factors must not be allowed to prevent settlement of the refugee problem. Wherever these refugees came from —and there are Jewish refugees from Arab countries as well as Arab refugees from Palestine—they are all of them people, and our first concern must be to get these human beings settled and re-integrated as part of the permanent economy of an area in the world that is easily able to support them, given some sensible economic plan and reasonable assistance.

Now to conclude, the year 1957, which is almost upon us, is likely to be even more crucial than 1956. We have got to be both steadfast in principle and flexible in tactics. Today I have had time only to scratch the surface of some of the problems we face. I have raised more questions than I have answered.

I think we can find the answers, but it will take more imagination and courage, fewer platitudes and less blinking at facts, than we have shown heretofore.

People who have experienced the rise and fall of Hitler and the growth of the Muscovite Empire, know that in President Nasser's Cairo, Soviet and Nazi technicians are once more cooperating with all the intimacy inspired by their dead leaders' 1939 pact. Hence few men and women of the Old World can grasp the Administration's masochistic solicitude for Egypt's ruler. Nor can they understand the heartlessness with which Washington has been trying to use oil-hungry Europe's dire need as a means of diplomatic pressure, and showing not the slightest concern for NATO members who have been hurt at least as hard as the so-called "aggressors" in London and Paris. Mr. Dulles, or his successor, will somehow have to restore an Allied unity that, cordial words notwithstanding, U. S. deeds have denied. If the Secretary of State has succeeded in temporarily buying the friendship of Messrs. Nasser, Nehru, Sokarno and Tito—rulers of nations that lack the rudiments of democracy—his job now is to regain friends who are far more essential to the U. S. and whom he has insulted, humiliated and harmed economically.

The Soviet Menace in the Middle East

by
IRVING MILLER

We have reached a dangerous turning point in the Middle East, and a sweeping reevaluation of United States policy in that area has become essential. The future of the Middle East cannot be left to leisurely diplomatic maneuver in and out of the United Nations. It is now a matter of extreme urgency what that future is to be, because the survival of the free world hinges upon it. What is required at present is an objective reappraisal of the current economic and political forces at work in the Arab world and a determined effort to deal with them courageously.

Although some perennial optimists in the State Department try to gloss over the fact, it is absolutely correct to say that Gamal Abdel Nasser's seizure of the Suez Canal on July 26 marked a crucial turning point, not only in relations between East and West, but also among the partners of the Western Alliance. Perhaps, as Britain's Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd put it with diplomatic tact, the rift between the U. S. and its British and French allies has as yet "developed no irreparable damage."

The tragic fact, however, remains that while the Western alliance is fraying apart, Soviet Russia is becoming the dominant power in Egypt, Syria, Jordon, and other parts of the Arab world. Lenin, Stalin, and their uneasy successors in the Kremlin were never able to achieve this on their own, through revolutionary intrigue, cold war strategy, or the smiling face of "peaceful coexistence." The Egyptian dictator has accomplished it for them through his policy aimed at the destruction of Israel and his seizure of the Canal.

At the most critical juncture in the development of the Middle East in modern times, Washington has found itself with no policy at all, or rather a "policy" based on wishful thinking about and complete ignorance of Soviet intentions in the Middle East. The Washington experts were so used to viewing world events from their own end of the spectrum that they completely failed to grasp the fact that in Nasser's wake Soviet penetration of the Middle East was increasing by leaps and bounds.

Washington hoped as usual to muddle through by ignoring the storm signals and refusing to see the Soviet menace. The State Department still naively believed that economic and technical assistance, increasingly resented by xenophobic Arab governments, accompanied by pious sermons about the virtues of democracy, would win corrupt and reactionary Arab politicians to our side and dispel the lure of demagogic Communism for disgruntled Arab intellectuals in search of a place in the sun.

While the U. S. was offering technical aid and Point Four loans, the Kremlin oligarchs, working through Nasser and his imitators in Syria and Jordan, tightened their stranglehold on the Middle East by lavish supplies of heavy arms. While we were offering them bread, the Soviet Union was presenting them with a sword and inflaming them with dreams of a Pan-Arab empire.

The present situation in the Middle East cannot be realistically appraised without some knowledge of Russia's past and present aims in the Middle East. Russian policy-makers, Tsarist or Communist, have long been convinced that the road to world domination runs through the Middle East into the heart of Asia. Once the Middle East and the rest of Southern Asia had been brought under Russian control, they reasoned, Europe would surely follow. Historical parallels are sometimes misleading, but there is a strikingly similarity between present-day Soviet policy and the aims that shaped Tsarist policy in the Middle East during the 19th and early 20th centuries.

In 1900, Tsarist General Kuropatkin described Russia's long-range plans in the Middle East as follows:

"When we gain control over the Bosporus (Turkey) and the entrance to the Mediterranean, we shall be able to tackle the Egyptian question with energy and make the Suez Canal our thoroughfare. When we have won this entry into the Indian Ocean, we can constantly threaten India. Russian competition on the world market will intimidate the highly developed countries of Europe and America . . . and we shall extend our tentacles towards the Atlantic."

Kuropatkin's ambitions were echoed by the Tsarist politician, Skobelev, who declared: "The stronger Russia is in the Middle East, the weaker England becomes in Asia and the more conciliatory she will be in Europe."

Contemporary Soviet interests match those of the Tsars. Forty years after Kuropatkin's blueprint for world conquest, Stalin and Molotov, in secret negotiations with Hitler in November 1940, made it clear that Soviet "territorial aspirations center in the direction of the Indian Ocean and the Persian Gulf." Moscow's current policy in the Middle East presents an amalgam of "new" revolutionary slogans and tactics combined with century-old aims.

At the beginning of this century, Russian ambitions in the Middle East were held in check by the rivalry of Germany, Austro-Hungary, France, Italy, and Britain. However, at the conclusion of the second World War, Britain remained virtually alone as guardian of Western strategic and economic interests in the area and the sole bulwark of military power against Soviet incroachment. One of the basic assumptions of U. S. foreign policy—insofar as we had a clearcut foreign policy—was the preservation of British power in the Middle East.

We have now, through our cooperation on the Suez Canal question at the United Nations with Moscow and its European and Arab satellites, inflicted possibly irreparable damage on Britain's position, not only in the Middle East but in the world at large. With Britain no longer of military and political significance in the Middle East, and the United States maintaining, at least for the present, a policy of benevolent neutrality, the region has become a vacuum, irresistibly attractive to Soviet power, the influence of which is already felt.

Partisans of current Washington policies contend that the U. S. refusal to support Britain, France and Israel will disarm Communism's ideological weapons and weaken Soviet influence among the hungry and disease-ridden Arab masses. They ignore the fact that it was U. S. indecision and failure to take seriously Nasser's plans to wipe out Israel and the necessity of preserving the international character of the Suez waterway that brought about the rift in the Western alliance, and prompted Britain, France, and Israel to undertake military action against Egypt.

Until the crisis in the Middle East is resolved, one thing remains abundantly clear: the East-West conflict continues, the cold war is renewed, and the threat of Soviet domination of the free world is still a burning issue. This conflict cannot be ended by the temporary palliative of a UN police force, but only through the maintenance of the political unity and military preparedness of the Western alliance and by unstinting support—military, economic, and diplomatic—for the State of Israel.

Moscow is fully aware—even if the State Department is unconvinced—that today Israel is the main bastion of the free world in the Middle East and the sole barrier to Soviet domination of Syria, Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan, and probably of oil-rich Saudi Arabia. It is just because of this that the Soviet Union continues its vicious and unbridled attacks against Israel's right to exist.

BUNDLES FOR GERMANY?

I read with some dismay of the efforts of the Germans, with the apparent sympathy of the United States Administration, to recover some, if not all, of the German property seized in the United States.

By the Paris Act of 1946, the Allies undertook not to return the German property they seized. By the Bonn Convention the validity of the seizure was recognized by the West German Federal Republic, which undertook to compensate its nationals accordingly.

It is hard to understand why the United States should apparently be willing by a unilateral act to disregard such treaty obligations.

Moreover, what will be the effect on our European Allies? . . .

The Germans occupied these countries and subjected them to economic pillage and, as you reported in an earlier issue, the claims of Holland for the restitution of securities looted during the occupation are as yet denied by the Germans. . . .

(Roger W. Sewill, Director-General, Aims of Industry, The London Economist, 9-15-56)

West Germans are rounding out their most prosperous year since the war. . . .

The return of the Saarland on Jan. 1 will open a rich new market for German products. This border area has been controlled by the French since World War II. With its coal and steel production, the Saar will further entrench Germany's position as the leading economic force of West Europe.

The Middle East crisis may actually help Germany by opening markets long dominated by Britain and France. And the West Germans are clearly better off than most other West European nations in the current oil shortage resulting from the blocking of the Suez Canal. . . .

The Great Danger

by

PETER MISKA

Once again we have more than two dozen garrisons, as well as tanks, armored infantry, navy and airforce schools and two officers academies. The great danger is not that recruits are being rigidly trained again. It lies elsewhere: At one of the new airforce training schools an instructor officer delivered a so-called lecture on civics before the future young pilots. The topic of the talk: "The Lost Homeland between Vistula and Memel." An officer of the Bundeswehr with the rank of battalion commander recently remarked to a civilian visitor: "Your apprehensions are all good and well but for me only one fact exists: the Russians have killed my father—I will never forget that."

Approximately 50 percent of the Bundeswehr officer corps originally come from East Germany. Of course, they do not talk all day about what was taken from them; but the concept of the lost homeland has already become part of the official schedule. The slogan "national injustice" is making the rounds amongst the troops. Intentionally or not, officers stir up resentments; knowingly or unknowingly, they do awaken thoughts of revenge. And therein lies the danger.

This danger is especially great because this time it does not apply to Alsace-Lorraine, Danzig and the Polish Corridor; rather, it concerns itself with half of Germany, with the "lost homeland" east of the Elbe and, because not only displaced persons but nearly every one of us is close to someone or something behind the iron curtain, even if it be a mother's grave. Though the attempt to liberate it is senseless, it is a holy cause. He who opposes it, is automatically branded.

The danger is great for, after all, there is a difference if the civilian Karl Schulze from Koenigsberg and his dear little spouse are still raving about beautiful East Prussia or if the Major of the Bundeswehr Karl Schulze indoctrinates his men with the thesis of the "lost homeland" and the "injustice wreaked upon us." The danger here is especially great because the thesis does hold some truth and because the men who are indoctrinated are just learning how and for what purposes arms are to be used.

Hardly do we have soldiers, and already we have again something for which—and against which—they could march. "Start marching to any place? Out of the question. That is technically impossible," say authoritative Bundeswehr strategists.

The objection betrays in which direction the military think. It is correct—that within this limitation for the present it is technically still impossible for us "to march." The Bundeswehr is still in its infancy, American and (a few) British soldiers are still stationed in West Germany and Soviet soldiers in East Germany. Some day, however, the Bundeswehr will stand in force, perhaps even—as per the Chancellor's order—in strength of 500,000 men; some day, the last companies of Americans here and Russians there will have left. It is unlikely that the West German officers who today speak already of the "lost homeland" and the "inability to ever forgetting" will then become more reticent. Whether the politicians will then be able to, or even want to, check the military is a question which, in view of some of our present political personalities, cannot readily be answered in the affirmative.

The people will not exactly rejoice if matters ever become earnest. But, rejoicing or not, as usual they will not be consulted but will just be called to the colors. Not all the regiments are in possession of their flags as yet but already the commandants and instructors are busily engaged in embroidering the battle cries upon them.

These are age-old battle cries, but they retain their appeal and will ever continue to do so. The most telling slogan will again be the "the fight against the injustice done to us and our people." This is enough to touch off warlike impulses even in the most pacifist German.

Of course: it has not come to this yet. But, "the future has started already." To express it in military terms, danger is in the offing.

Egypt's Nazi Propagandist

by

MALKAH RAYMIST

A few months ago a Canadian journalist, William Stevenson of the Toronto Star, and a British journalist, Ann Sharpley of the London Evening Standard, were expelled from Egypt for getting around too much and too fast, but not before they managed to get some glimpse of the truth about the Nasser regime. The official reason given for their expulsion was that they had attempted to interview Egypt's ex-President Naguib who is held incommunicado under house arrest. But, in fact, they were ousted from Egypt for another reason, for having attempted—and succeeded—in interviewing almost as inaccessible, if free and even privileged, a personage, Professor Johann van Leers, a former top Nazi propagandist, who was and is probably still masterminding Egypt's anti-Jewish and anti-Israel propaganda campaign as head of a corps of Nazis reputedly numbering 200 in the service of President Nasser.

Professor von Leers was first smoked out by Ann Sharpley. She walked into his office and addressed him by name and then refused to swallow his attempts to conceal his identity. She confronted him with irrefutable facts and data about his past. When he realized that further denials about his identity were futile, the professor sought to dismiss his importance by asserting that his function was limited to translating for President Nasser articles in the world papers hostile to Egypt or the president himself.

What is the background of this shadowy figure who acts as adviser to Egypt's Minister of National Guidance and who occupies with his staff an entire floor in that ministry? Recently a Dutch newspaper Trouw published an incident in which Professor von Leers figured and which of itself is revelatory.

The story goes back to 1933. In that year, according to the newspaper, an attempt was made to revive the International Students' Organization by bringing together students from Germany, Britain, and France in order to influence them to help maintain peace in the world. The Dutch university city of Leyden was chosen as the meeting place. The Dutch delegation, acting as host, participated in the mainly Anglo-Franco-German students' conference.

Since the efforts of Britain, France and Holland were directed at influencing the German students to help maintain peace, the German delegation was naturally the focal point of attention. Its president became therefore the central figure of the conference. His arrival was deliberately shrouded in mystery by the Germans; his name was not disclosed until he appeared; and he arrived only after all the other members of the conference had already gathered in Holland. He turned out to be a jovial and affable young man with several university degrees attached to his name. The name was: Dr. Johann von Leers.

The conference proceeded fairly smoothly for several days. But then Dr. Huizinga, the Rector of Leyden University, urgently summoned the chairman of the Dutch delegation and requested him to find out whether the Dr. von Leers presiding over the German delegation was the author of a recently published virulent anti-Semitic pamphlet. It was titled Die Juden Sehen Dich An (Jews Are Looking at You). Among the many slanders contained in the pamphlet was the ritual murder libel, presented as an established fact.

Young Dr. von Leers was summoned and questioned by the Dutch hosts. He readily admitted that he was the author of the pamphlet. When asked whether he himself believed in the ritual murder accusation, he fidgeted and laughed nervously, "You see, that was written more than a year ago. It was before the general elections. The National Socialist party wanted something with a catchy slogan, something to get hold of the masses. . . . So they asked me to write a booklet with a strongly anti-Semitic angle. But really, between ourselves, there is no need to take it so seriously."

But the Dutch professors, not easily put off, insisted that he state whether or not he believed in what he had written. After this preliminary interview, von Leers was requested to appear next morning before the University Senate which was obviously determined to inquire into his views and activities. Dr. von Leers tried to avoid the issue, going off on a tangent and attempting to involve his interrogators in a lengthy argu-

HAILING HITLER

Bashir al-Auf, the editor of a leading Syrian daily, Al Manar, wrote recently:

"One should not forget that, in contrast to Europe, Hitler occupied an honored place in the Arab world. His name awakened in Arab hearts feelings of love and enthusiasm. . . .

"The Arab world should be congratulated on producing in its midst this Hitler who has shaken the world from end to end. . . . English and French journalists are mistaken if they think that by calling Nasser Hitler they are hurting us. On the contrary, his name makes us proud. Long live Hitler, the Nazi who struck at the heart of our enemies! Long live the Hitler of the Arab world who has opened the gates of victory and eternity for his people!"

ment. But they pressed him hard for an unequivocal yes or no, and finally he admitted that he did not believe in what he wrote. "No, of course not," he mumbled.

As soon as they heard this admission, the Dutch professors asked him point-blank whether he was prepared to correct his error publicly and in writing. He replied that it would be impossible since this would mean the end of his scientific career, and of his career altogether. On hearing this, Dr. Huizinga pointed to the door and exclaimed: "Out with you! such an individual does not deserve to breathe the air of Leyden!" (This was not forgotten. Dr. Huizinga became one of the first hostages immediately after the establishment of the Nazi regime in Holland.)

Johann von Leers, who is now 54 years old, was in his youth a member of the Freikorps Viking, one of the precursors of the Nazi movement. He grew with the movement and with the party and, as early as 1929, he was an official of the German Foreign Office and a member of the Nazi party. In 1932 he joined the S.A. Brownshirts and in 1936 became a member of the German General Staff with the rank of major. He became an important figure in the racial research department, headed the department of foreign policy in the Nazi Political College, and was the chief editor of the Nazi journal Wille und Weg (The Will and the Way) published by the German propaganda Ministry.

But in 1941 his star dimmed. He fell afoul of his chief, Alfred Rosenberg, the ideologist of the Nazi Party, and was sent in disgrace to Vienna, to fill the place of a professor who had been murdered by the Nazis. There he fell deeper into disgrace and was charged with plagiarism and tried by a court of teachers. But he survived all this and managed to emerge unscathed from the war and even from disgrace within the Nazi party. After World War II he returned to Germany and lived for some time in Bonn, but later emigrated to Argentina. It was there that he was discovered by agents of Nasser.

Von Leers is a prolific writer specializing chiefly in pseudoscientific pamphlets. He tries sedulously to imitate Goebbels but lacks the latter's brittle brilliance and shrewdness. He plods along in heavy fashion, and his pedestrian efforts at propaganda are joined to the bombast and violence that mark the Arab fulminations against Israel and Jews.

EGYPTIAN BEST-SELLER

Israeli forces found stacks of Hitler's "Mein Kampf," in Arabic, in Egyptian army camps in Sinai.

Now They March Again!

"The true Germany must still remain silent, but some day it will act." These words, rendered with screaming pathos, come from the mouth of former SS Gruppen and HJ Bannerfuehrer Kosche. He talked thus at the party convention of the German Reichs Party in Wiesbaden. For the time being the party is still desperately looking for some sort of democratic guise; however, the above quoted sentence is not the only indication that the German Reichs Party is nothing but the heir to the Socialist Reichs Party which, a few years ago, was characterized and prohibited by the Federal Constitutional Court as a subversive organization.

Also, some details in the make-up of the party convention point to the great "spiritual" pattern of the Nazi party of the Third Reich. For example, on the main wall of the largest auditorium in the casino there was a white eagle on a black backdrop. In its claws it held a black, white and red banner, above this the motto: "The Springs Will Flow Forever." Actually, this is the motto of Wiesbaden, the spa city and thus has nothing to do with politics. But the gentlemen of the German Reichs Party are not shareholders of the spa administration. For them other springs are more significant: warmer ones, much more potent and invigorating ones. They are the well-springs of the Third Reich, such as Hitler's "Mein Kampf," or Alfred Rosenberg's "Myth of the Twentieth Century," the theory of "Blood and Soil" by Reichsbannerfuehrer Walter Darré and, finally, the racist theory, a folly which developed into something more than just a plague for mankind. These are the "ever-flowing springs" of the German Reichs Party.

To continue with the outer signs, there was the so-called Saalschutz (bodyguard in the hall), admittedly also known to other parties and employed against "disturbers of the peace" (these are chiefly people of diverging views), but the Saalschutz of the German Reichs Party possesses distinctive earmarks. These are the riding boots, black shirts and field-grey riding breeches. . . .

But now we must introduce the Chairman of the German Reichs Party. He is Wilhelm Meinberg, formerly a Councilor of State under Goering, SS Gruppenfuehrer, Deputy of the Nazi Party to the Reichstag, Chief Reichs official for Food, and owner of the Golden Medal of the Nazi Party. However, the actual manager is the very young former Member of the Bundestag and now Member of the State Diet of Lower Saxony, von Thadden, who looks somewhat like a young gigolo but is possessed of immense shrewdness for, in spite of seeming so naive, he is an apt wirepuller and an effective speaker.

Is this German Reichs Party to be taken seriously? In any event, it proves through its party convention that these political circles are no longer confined to meeting in backrooms (a fact which was proudly pointed out at the convention by von Thadden). In our opinion, the situation is more serious. A seasoned politician of the Christian Democratic Union who recently returned from Lower Saxony, closed his remarks on the political situation in that state as follows: "The appeal of the German Reichs Party in the forthcoming Federal election should not be underestimated. It is very possible that the party will obtain five direct mandates and enter the Bonn Parliament with 10 or more deputies."

No: Neo-Nazism in Germany, as a "spiritual" manifestation, and viewed as a political fact, is definitely not dead.

(Courtesy, Luxemburger Wort)

Germany is the only place in the world where the armed forces of the two main antagonists are in close contact. . . .

In such circumstances, there would be no way on earth to isolate the explosion, as in Hungary. . . . The two Germanies would meld together, and somehow, somewhere—most probably in Berlin—the fatal first shots of the third world war should be exchanged between the American and Soviet forces.

There are responsible officials who believe—or perhaps hope is a better word—that this nightmare prospect is now as vivid to the Kremlin as to the American government, and that the Kremlin may really be searching for a way out. There are other equally responsible officials who contend that the Soviets will never, under any circumstances, withdraw the Red Army from East Germany, just because they know that the Communist Pankow government could not survive without it. . . .

(Joseph and Stuart Alsop, N. Y. Herald Tribune, 12-6-56)

Those with keen memories, especially our GIs who helped liberate Buchenwald and whose nostrils captured the stench of the crematoria, must have recoiled as they read of the Nov. 1 night arrests of Jews in Egypt.

In the meticulous records kept by the Nazis, and especially in the minds of those who were the tortured victims, the nights of early September, 1935, when compared with contemporary events, the memories seem sadly reminiscent.

But what must stir the conscience is the apathy displayed today, just as it was when the world was warned that boxcars of human beings were being shipped from German cities to concentration camps. There were no special sessions called in the League of Nations just as there were no special sessions called in the UN as Israeli outposts were attacked by Arab marauders.

Notes on a German Journey

by

HANS J. MORGENTHAU

In Bonn, contrast strikes the observer: the difference between the prestige Adenauer and his policies enjoy in the United States and the support they command in West Germany. While American editorial opinion greeted Adenauer with paeans of praise during his June visit to Washington, there was nothing but reserve, skepticism and outright opposition in Bonn. This negative attitude is by no means limited to the opposition; it is shared by members of the Cabinet, civil servants and members of the Chancellor's own party. The reasons for these contrasting attitudes are both personal and political.

For Washington, Adenauer is first of all "our boy," the Western statesman who is most completely and reliably identified with United States policies. Other statesmen have recognized Communist China; more still would like to. Others want to trade with the Communist bloc or like to make neutralist noises; Adenauer is virtually the only statesman in the world who has done nothing to embarrass the State Department and who is most anxious not to. Thus we have taken him to our hearts as in the inter-war period we did "little Finland who pays her debts," the only decent, trustworthy fellow among so many doubtful customers.

Bonn sees in Adenauer primarily an old autocrat who is losing his grip and whose political days are numbered. There is something in the political air of Bonn which reminds one of Washington in the last year of a President who does not stand for re-election. There is impatience on all sides. The politicians and civil servants prepare for new alignments and mend their political fences in anticipation of a new distribution of power; they chafe at the reins which have kept them in place so long. The old Chancellor, feeling the pull and seeing the disorder, tries in vain to restore his authority. His public squabbles with the most prominent members of his cabinet, ending typically in an abject public apology on his part, have become notorious. Thus everybody in Bonn who can afford it tries to move toward the outer confines of the old man's orbit lest the new masters might find him too closely identified with the ancien regime. The press is encouraged to treat the old Chancellor with a lack of respect which, in view both of his exalted office and his obvious personal merits and political achievements, comes as a shock to the foreign observer.

But the malaise of Bonn and the disenchantment of West Germany have deeper roots than Adenauer's waning authority. They lie in the fiasco of Adenauer's approach to the overriding issue of German foreign policy: unification. The Adenauer policy has come up against a stone wall which forces it either to stand still without the slightest chance for advance or else to retrace its steps completely without any assurance of advance even then. The professed goal of Adenauer's foreign policy has been to negotiate with the Soviet Union from strength. The element of strength was to be provided by the German military contribution to the Western alliance. In actuality, however, Adenauer, or in any event his principal advisors, intended to use this military contribution in a bargain with the Russians. They figured that the Soviet Union would grant unification in exchange for the elimination, or perhaps the mere limitation, of the German military commitment to the West.

While Adenauer's professed policy was contingent upon the unconditional surrender of the Soviet Union, and hence doomed to failure from the outset, the recent radical changes in the technology of war have doomed the actual policy of bargaining as well. The Soviet Union has made it perfectly obvious that it is not West German rearmament that worries her but the Western orientation of a united Germany.

Adenauer and the main opposition parties are, of course, at one in refusing to have anything to do with the East German Government. Yet this cannot be the last word in the matter. For if it were, it would seal the division of Germany for the foreseeable future after the model of Korea and Indo-China. The Social Democrats try to convince themselves that there must be a loophole somewhere in the Russian insistence upon negotiations between East and West Germany and that only Adenauer's intransigence stands in the way of

"Go Back and Tell 'em You're a Sovereign State" a deal with the Russians. The leaders of other parties want to offer the Soviet Union economic and other concessions in return for unification. Some government officials play with the idea of offering the Soviet Union German renunciation of military ties with the West in order to test their intentions. One party has openly come out in favor of negotiations with the East German regime, provided two of its most notorious members be eliminated from public life.

All these proposals are borne by an undercurrent of fear, bordering on despair, which flows through all parties and groups, notably the Foreign Office. All recognize that Adenauer's policy has failed and unless West Germany takes the initiative for a new approach, Germany may again remain divided for generations to come. Yet what can be done? Is the core of the problem perhaps the elemental fact that the Soviet Union is more afraid of the power of a Germany united in freedom than of a divided Germany, diminished in power and limited in her freedom of action? How is one to reconcile the power of a united Germany with the security of her neighbors and of the world?

To that question the world has sought an answer for almost a century and has not found it. The men of Bonn, with the apparent exception of the Chancellor's office, earnestly grope for it today.

Nowhere in the world is there a more hardworking, conscientious, competent and uninspiring group of men than the parliamentarians and civil servants of West Germany. In their general intellectual and moral attitude to things political they are seemingly quite representative of the German people. But derision for them, either good-humored or spiteful, is well-nigh universal. Private conversations, even with chance acquaintances, the daily and weekly press, the political cabarets are full of it. I have still to find a German not connected with the government who would speak with enthusiasm, affection, or even decent respect of the Bonn regime. The Germans regard it as something to which at present there is no alternative, but which they would not have chosen if they had had a choice. No German knows what he would have chosen instead, nor does anybody worry much about it. For the German scene today is dominated by a fact which is not political but economic: unprecedented prosperity.

All the vital energy, passion and singlemindedness which in former times were absorbed by politics now go into work. To produce, to make money, to own and to travel—such seems to be at present the compass of Germany's national purpose. The main issue between the German unions and management is not shorter hours of work, higher wages or fringe benefits, but the opportunity to work overtime! However, that concern with the production and enjoyment of material things is not likely to be permanent. It is rather like an unexpected and surprisingly ample feast after a long period of scarcity. Furthermore, business curves have a way of going down as well as up. And the direction the German national purpose will take when it can no longer find full satisfaction in the production and enjoyment of material things worries the more thoughtful leaders of German opinion. I shall not soon forget the tone of urgency in the voice of one of the ablest and most genuinely liberal German leaders when he asked me to tell America to come to the aid of German democracy at the first sign of a business downturn. Such a downturn would be the first real test for German democracy, and he doubted that it would pass it.

But this is certainly the opinion of a small and submerged minority. Hardly anybody in Germany is willing to admit the determining fact of recent German history: that Nazism was not a philosophy, political system, and way of life imposed from above upon an unwilling or, at worst, passive German people, but the fulfillment of their intensely held aspirations, a true mandatory of the national will, enthusiastically supported in success and still maintained with stoic faith in the face of disaster. For most Germans, Nazism has become a disembodied thing, an instrument of fate, not to be associated with living human beings. However, that association, not as an historic recollection but as the actual experience of the present, stares one in the face at every turn. Proven anti-Nazis, people who risked their lives for their convictions, suddenly use a phrase or make an observation whose underlying values bear, without their being aware of it, the marks of the intellectual and moral revolution which Nazism has wrought upon Germans, friend and foe alike. An American student who studies Romance Languages at a German uni-

A BRITISH OPINION

Russia believes that her ultimatum decided the issue, and hopes the Arabs will be duly grateful. America thinks her action decided it, and that, afraid of Russia, the Arabs will gratefully lean towards America. We shall see who is right.

Both America and Russia think Anglo-French influence has been destroyed in the Middle East, and, for quite different reasons, both think that to be desirable.

Eisenhower's point of view is that his action was entirely justified because the rule of law has been violated. He also thinks that it is still possible to do business with the Soviets, and that if he is allowed to cultivate the Peace Party, which he is convinced exists and includes Malenkov, Bulganin, and Khrushchev, he can organise a lasting world peace as a result of America's having proved herself to be a disinterested upholder of law—even against old friends.

Britain says that Egypt was the true aggressor and that Israel merely retaliated to a whole series of aggressive acts which U.N.O., and its supervising commission under General Burns, had been incapable of stopping.

Britain says that Egypt, armed by Russia, was soon going to strike still more strongly and in wider spheres. The result would have been the loss of the whole area from Casablanca to Kabul. If France and Britain did nothing it would be too late, unless, after long discussions at U.N.O., America then intervened with all her forces. By that time, however, Russia would be fully committed and the result would be world war. France and Britain were fully convinced that if American wishes had been followed nothing—repeat nothing—would have stopped events from leading to a general war within a short time. They think that if they have been allowed to finish the job without American opposition, if not with support, the danger of a world war over the Middle East would have been greatly reduced.

It seems impossible to reconcile those sharply opposing views. America thinks France and Britain broke the law and were aggressors worthy of punishment. Britain and France think they did not break the law but that America, voting with Russia, and threatening punitive action, has come very near to wrecking all hope of peace.

The Hungarian situation has made Britain still more angry. Russia is clearly an unprovoked aggressor in Hungary and America admits that to be true. Britain asks why America has not threatened Russia with punitive action over Hungary, whereas she did threaten France and Britain over Egypt? Bitterly angry people in London ask whether it is because America is afraid of Russia but was not afraid of Britain and France? If so, is that the rule of law? These angry questions are widely asked.

The overall British reaction is that America will find out that Eden was not either so foolish or so bad as he was painted and that, in consequence of American policy, a far graver situation will shortly arise in the Middle East.

versity told me that his professor distinguishes between Aryan and non-Aryan French writers as a matter of course, the distinction being accepted by the students as a matter of course.

I had myself an experience which illuminated with the sudden impact of a great and lasting shock the presently hidden abysses of the German mind, which are no less real for the reluctance of most to recognize their reality. One evening, I sat in the Cafe Kranzler, the most elegant cafe of Frankfort, when my attention was drawn away from Verdi's music toward an animated conversation, carried on by the two men at the next table. The man who did most of the listening was an elderly, distinguished-looking gentleman who, as the conversation revealed, was a retired businessman from a neighboring town who had just made the acquaintance of the other man by sitting down at his table. This man, who did most of the talking, must have been in his middle forties; he was of striking appearance and impressive bearing, elegantly dressed, obviously intelligent and well educated. This man told a story from his student days. One evening, he and five of his fellow students had gone to a neighboring town to drink wine. When they boarded the train for the return trip, they found one compartment holding six people half occupied while in the next one they found two passengers who happened to be Jews. They decided to ask the Jews to leave. When the latter refused and one of them rose with a threatening gesture, the students opened the two windows of the compartment and threw the Jews out. "We threw them out, luggage and all, mind you, out of a speeding express train, and in a matter of seconds it was all over. Of course, anybody else but Jews would have left without a fuss."

What is remarkable in this story is not only its content and the fact that it was told at all, but also and in particular the way it was told and received. It was told with animation, care for picturesque detail, and unemotional detachment. To call the narrator an anti-Semite is to miss the point completely. For the narrator, a Jew was no more the possible object of hate or, for that matter, any other human emotion than a mosquito. The foreordained destiny of the Jew, as of the mosquito, was to be killed. Only at one point was there a trace of emotion in the narrator's voice: when he pointed with a sense of pride to the speed and technical neatness of the operation. Even the criticism of the Jews' refusal to move was added in a matter-of-fact way as an afterthought, which really had no bearing upon the issue.

It would indeed be most hazardous to draw any general conclusions from such an incident. However, the fact that it occurred at all and the circumstances under which it occurred give one pause. I shall not tell a total stranger whom I just met, say in a parlor car, a story about myself which is likely to evoke his moral indignation. To the contrary, I shall tell him a story which will put me in a good light. Most certainly our narrator would not have told his chance acquaintance that he had cracked safes as a student or run a disorderly house. But he did not expect moral disapproval for his participation in the killing of two Jews, and the listener did not disappoint him.

There are men in all walks of German public life—government, universities, press, and literature—who are aware of the moral chasm which Nazism has opened between Germany and the rest of the world. My two neighbors in Frankfort were not aware of it. How many more like them are there? On which side does the weight of opinion lie? In which direction is opinion likely to move? Answers to these questions, more than to questions more concrete and seemingly more urgent, if we but had them, would tell us much of the story of Germany's future.

A disturbing example of the Eisenhower Administrations' failure, in the field of foreign relations, is revealed in the handling of landing rights awarded to international air carriers. Our State Department awarded the rights to Germany's Lufthansa Airlines in New York, Milwaukee, Chicago, Detroit and Los Angeles. This gives them precious leave to land, sell tickets, and originate flights in those metropolitan areas. The Japanese Airlines, and Iberian (Spanish), have landing rights on both coasts.

In contrast, the Holland air carrier, KLM, world's largest purchasers of American-made aircraft, was turned down when they made a simple request, namely, the privilege of landing and refueling in Los Angeles and Houston.

Holland, a member of NATO, our former ally, and the first and only country to tell the U. S., "thank you for World War II help—but now we wish to finish without charity—and stand on our own feet." This is the nation shut out by the U. S. while we hand $1,000,000 privileges to German, Japanese, and Swedish airlines. I have no wish to see the latter suffer. But I hope the Dutch get their delayed "good conduct" award.

(Barry Gray, The N. Y. Post, 9-24-56)

Twice in our time, America's youth has been killed and mutilated by the instruments of war produced by an extremely knowledgeable and efficient outfit called Krupp Industries of Essen, Germany. Krupp has now come to the United States with an elaborate idea for getting taxpayers' money to finance this huge, rich company in its expansion in underdeveloped countries.

The plan—which has an attractive surface gloss—will be presented to three branches of government, including a Presidential Committee on Foreign Aid headed by Benjamin Fairless, former president of United States Steel, and the Foreign Affairs Committees of both the Senate and the House. . . .

Currently, Krupp is engaged in construction of major installations in Asia and Africa. . . .

This, essentially, is merely a way for Germany to increase its exports, with the United States footing the bill. There are other friends in Europe, also struggling with the export problem, who would get no such help from us.

There is no reason to hit the United States taxpayers with an added bite for a particular company in Germany.

The United Nations and the Middle East Crisis

It is the considered judgment of the Society that the Middle East Crisis constitutes a major threat to world peace. Bearing this in mind, the Society sought to acquaint the United Nations with its views on this crucial problem. For the benefit of our readers we publish below the complete text of the Society's statement.

Introduction

We respectfully call your attention to the enclosed statement on the Middle Eastern crisis issued by the Society for the Prevention of World War III. The Society is a non-governmental organization accredited to the United Nations and unreservedly supports United Nations efforts to achieve a just and lasting settlement.

Among the major purposes for which the Society was founded in 1943, are

(a) "to prevent the occurrence of another world war by creating a permanent body of experts on international politics and economics to search and study the impelling forces and causes which have led to two world wars . . ."

(b) "to observe and examine changing conditions in world politics and economics and possible causes which might lead to a third world war"

(c) "to announce and publish its findings, conclusions and opinions . . ."

In accordance with these aims the Society deems it a duty to make known its views on some aspects of the Middle East crisis. We seek an objective evaluation of the decisive ingredients which have turned the Middle East into a caldron of hatred and strife.

The Society's search for the truth and its endeavor to prevent World War III are the sole standards by which we discuss the critical situation in the Middle East.

The United Nations and the Middle East Crisis

Dedicated to the cause of a just and lasting peace, the Society for the Prevention of World War III supports unreservedly the efforts of the United Nations to master the present world crisis. At this dangerous moment, the United Nations possesses an unmatched opportunity to fix firmly its moral and material authority as the guardian of world peace.

The immediate focal point for United Nations action lies in the Middle East where the flames of war threaten to engulf the world in unprecedented catastrophe. The root cause underlying the ever growing discord in the Middle East is the failure of the states in that area to conduct their external relations on the basis of mutual respect and good will. If the United Nations succeeds in normalizing conditions in the Middle East, it will have a profound effect on lessening tensions and strife throughout the world. On the other hand, if the United Nations cannot prevent further deterioration, the danger of World War III will increase.

In making these observations the Society hopefully assumes that the realities of the Middle Eastern situation will no longer be masked. For years it has been politically expedient for statesmen to pretend that there was peace in this vital area. By maintaining this false front, the forces of war have been encouraged while the United Nations has been inhibited from taking positive and effective action.

The Society does not pass judgment on the relative merits of Israel's case against her Arab neighbors or vice versa. We seek an objective evaluation of the decisive ingredients which have turned the Middle East into a caldron of hatred and strife. The Society's search for the truth and its endeavor to prevent World War III are the sole standards by which we discuss this critical situation.

The State of Israel born under United Nations' aegis found itself in a region turbulent with social discontent and militant nationalism. The populations of this area, however they strove to live in peace with their neighbors, have been caught in the maelstrom of ceaseless warfare. At first they were the victims of a war launched by the Arab governments to destroy Israel. Subsequently, the warfare became more subtle although in many ways deadlier. It was warfare based on terror and attrition. It involved hit-and-run raids, skirmishes, infiltration, sabotage, subversion and blockade. This "new type" of warfare was powerfully stimulated by hate inciting propaganda. Reason and self interest were terrorized into silence by artificially whipped up passions.

The blockade against Israeli shipping in violation of the armistice agreement of February 24th, 1949, and Security Council resolution of September 1st, 1951, signified continuation of the war by other means.

On March 23rd, 1954, eight members of the Security Council voted for a resolution to reaffirm the previous resolution of September 1st, 1951. This was vetoed by the Soviet Union while the Egyptian Government continued the blockade.

The determination to continue the blockade of Israel is seen by the fact that, after Egypt had seized the Suez Canal, it again refused the freedom of passage of Israeli ships and of shipping bound for Israel. The New York Herald Tribune (8-29-56) quoted President Nasser as stating, "since the Suez Canal runs through three Egyptian cities, the vessels of Israel with which Egypt is technically at war, are excluded." Thus, President Nasser publicly admitted that his Government was at war with Israel and that the blockade policy was part of the war strategy.

The war has taken its toll of human lives and property. Thus, incursions, into Israel from July 1949 to October 1955 resulted in the slaying of 1039 unarmed Israeli men, women and children. In addition, a total of 2231 armed attacks by Arab forces upon the Israelis took place (Congressional Record, 6-4-56, Senator George H. Bender). In this connection, the Israeli Government more than a year ago, pointed out that the Mixed Armistice Commission had registered 1006 violations of the Armistice Agreement by Egyptian forces within a 7 months period.

The ceaseless ambushes against the Israeli population are symptomatic of never ending war. Prominent in these raids were forces called "Fedayeen" encouraged and organized by the Egyptian Government. On May 28, 1956, President Nasser publicly declared:

"The Fedayeen, the Palestine army, which started as a small force of 1,000 men last year, is today great in numbers and training and equipment. I believe in the strength, the ability, the loyalty and the courage of this army. Its soldiers will be responsible for taking revenge for their homeland and people."

On August 31, 1955, the official Cairo radio declared:

"Egypt has decided to dispatch her heroes, the disciples of Pharoah and the sons of Islam, and they will cleanse the land of Palestine. Therefore, ready yourselves; shed tears; cry out and weep, O Israel, because near is your day of liquidation. Thus we have decided and thus is our belief. There will be no more complaints and protests, neither to the Security Council, nor to the United Nations, nor to the Armistice Commission. Nor will there be peace on the border because we demand vengeance and the vengeance is Israel's death."

"The Egyptian Fedayeen have begun their activities inside the territory of Israel after repeated clashes on the border during the past week. The Egyptian Fedayeen have penetrated into Jewish settlements spread out in the Negev to Beersheba and Migdal Ashkelon at a distance of 40 kilometres from the Egyptian border, and have taught the aggressive Israelis a lesson they will not forget. The Egyptian Fedayeen sowed fear and consternation among the citizens of Israel."

The character of the propaganda deluging the Middle East is also indicative of the never ending war. It goes beyond the normal practices of exhortation to patriotism as it whips the minds of the people into a state of blind hatred. Through this ceaseless barrage of hate-inciting propaganda the war psychosis is maintained at fever pitch. At that point the enflamed passions of the people merge with the physical assaults perpetrated by such armed forces as the Fedayeen. It is total war.

The Cairo Radio, 9-17-54, broadcasting in Arabic to the Arab world, said:

". . . we repeat Salah Salim's slogan: 'There would be no Egypt, no Egyptian revolution and Egyptian Army if Egypt would make peace with Israel.' Let all of us, O Arabs, repeat it once more: 'There would be no Egypt, no Egyptian revolution, and no Egyptian Army if Egypt would make peace with Israel.' "

On September 21, 1954, the Cairo Radio, broadcasting in Arabic to the Arab world, declared:

"The UN General Assembly opens its new session today. Each time we examine the UN Charter, we read its seemingly plausible effort to free peoples, to bring them happiness through peace, and to protect them from destruction . . . The Voice of the Arabs wishes to tell you today not to believe in the United Nations, not to be deceived by its charter, and not to expect any good from it."

The Cairo Home Service (12-27-55) quoted Col. Anwar Sadat, Egyptian Minister of State:

"Our war against the Jews is an old struggle that began with Mohammed and in which we achieved many great victories. Today, we fight them in Gaza and in Sabha and everywhere. It is our duty to fight the Jews for the sake of God and religion, and it is our duty to end the war which Mohammed began."

On January 12, 1956, the Cairo Home Service stated:

"Peace between us and the Jews is impossible. As far as we are concerned the problem is a matter of life and death and not a dispute over frontiers or interests. Nor is it a difference of viewpoints which require mediation for settlement . . . This part of the world, that is, the Middle East, cannot hold both of us. It is either we or they. There is no other solution . . . Thank God that our leaders . . . know that poems will not achieve our aims. It is steel and bullets which will realize these objectives."

On April 9, 1956, the Cairo Radio broadcast:

"The Arabs are determined to stress one fact, even by bloodshed: Israel must be wiped out."

It would be a disservice to truth were we to ignore the fact that the tone and content of this type of incitement have been continuously employed by the leaders of the various Arab countries. We cite below some examples:

President Gamal Nasser as quoted in "Al Ahram," Cairo, 10-15-55:

"I am not fighting solely against Israel, but also against World Zionism and Jewish capital. My task is to deliver the Arab world from destruction through Zionism intrigues which have their roots in the United States, and which receives aid from Britain and France . . . The hatred of the Arabs against the Zionists is very strong and there is no sense in talking about peace with Israel. There is not even the smallest place for negotiations between the Arabs and Israel."

SEEING THINGS.

President Nasser in a cable to Syrian President Kuwatly:

"Egypt will be glad when both her and the Syrian armies meet on the ruins of this treacherous people, these Zionist gangs, so that our dead may rest in peace with the knowledge that our countries have been liberated of all foreign encroachment" (Near East Arab Broadcasting Station, Cyprus, 12-18-55).

President Nasser:

"The Palestine Army (Fedayeen) raised by Egypt has become a powerfully armed and trained force, and the duty of its soldiers is to take vengeance for their land . . ." (Radio Cairo, 5-20-56).

President Nasser (7-26-56):

"The fight in which we are now engaged is against imperialism and its supporters and against imperialistic methods. It is a fight against Israel, the tool of imperialism created in the heart of the Arab world to obliterate our nationalism. But we will all defend our freedom and Arabism and will struggle to see the Arab Motherland extend from the Atlantic Ocean to the Persian Gulf."

King Hussein of Jordan:

"Jordan will fulfill its mission of vengeance in Palestine to the very end" (Radio Ramallah, 1-23-56).

"We swear before Allah and history to sacrifice our property and everything dear to us for the sake of Palestine, to guard all her holiness and Arabism. We will not lay down our arms until we regain our rights completely" (Radio Ramallah, 3-9-56).

On October 11, 1956, an official Iraqi spokesman stated:

". . . They (the Arabs) must fight Zionism and its ally, the new imperialism, with the same spirit they fought before . . . Iraq and the majority of the Arabs consider that the question of fighting the Zionist cancer should come first, because this constitutes a great danger to the Arabs" (Radio Baghdad, Home Service, 10-11-56).

President Shukeiri El-Kuwatli of Syria:

"The present situation demands the mobilization of all Arab strength to eliminate that state which has arisen in our midst. Israel is like a cancer, not only satisfied to feed on her own manpower but is also assisted by world Zionism." (Address before delegation of Lebanese Moslem youths, 4-2-56.)

President Camille Chamoun of Lebanon:

"The Egyptian revolution was the beginning of the end of Israel. My belief is that Israel will not be eliminated except by military states that are prepared to destroy her. Egypt today is a military state of the first magnitude and I think that she alone can eliminate Israel. I hope in the near future all the Arab states will be organizationally and militarily prepared in a similar manner to Egypt. Then will we be able to say—openly and with certainty—that Israel has arrived at her inevitable end, and not just at the beginning of her end." (Akhir Sa'at, Cairo, 10-12-55.)

King Saud of Saudi Arabia:

"The Arab nations should sacrifice up to 10 million of their 50 million people, if necessary, to wipe out Israel. . . . Israel to the Arab world is like a cancer to the human body and the only remedy is to uproot it just like a cancer. . . . We don't have the patience to see Israel remain occupying Palestine for long." (New York Times, 1-4-54.)

Emir Fahd Saud:

"Israel represents western imperialism and world Zionism. Both are a cancer which has to be cut out of the body of the Arab nation. My opinion is that the Palestine Army will fulfill its task." It will achieve that which Abdul Nasser said about it: "I desire that the Palestine Army will write the most glorious page in the history of Palestine." (Al Ahram, Cairo Daily, 6-27-56.)

The facts mentioned above do not detract from the problems besetting the Arab peoples. Economic backwardness, disease and illiteracy weigh heavily on them. Such conditions breed unrest and do not create a climate conducive to peace. These factors form the backdrop of Arab attitudes towards other vital issues. For example, they strongly resent the plight of Arab refugees, victimized by the Arab war against Israel. They have noted with apprehension some extremist voices in Israel urging expansionist policies. Yet, it is a matter of record that extremist views have been categorically rejected by the overwhelming majority of the Israeli people and by their government.

By grossly exaggerating the importance of these voices, Arab propaganda has tried to depict Israel as an "interloper," a tool of "Western imperialism" whose main purpose is to exploit and humiliate rather than to deal with the Arab peoples on an equal basis.

No matter what shortcomings may be ascribed to Israel's statesmen, they recognize that peace and progress for the whole Middle East depends in the first place on solid understanding with the Arab countries.

The Israelis know that the great economic and social problems including poverty and sickness in the whole Midle East can only be tackled on the basis of friendly cooperation.

On May 14, 1948, the independent state of Israel came into being. Its first proclamation was an offer of peace to the Arabs.

"We extend the hand of peace and good neighborliness to all the neighboring states and their peoples and invite their co-operation and mutual assistance. The state of Israel is ready to make its contribution to the joint effort towards the progress of the Middle East as a whole."

On May 11, 1949, upon Israel's admission to the United Nations, its Foreign Minister told the UN:

"The pursuit of peace is a treasured part of the Jewish heritage . . . That pledge becomes an earnest and urgent appeal when addressed to our closest neighbors, the Arab states, and other nations of the Middle East . . . We are not aware of any serious conflict between us and our neighbors which could not today be resolved by peaceful negotiations."

On May 8, 1950, Israel's Foreign Minister told the Palestine Conciliation Commission:

"I wish to reaffirm categorically that the Government of Israel is willing to negotiate with any state which announces its readiness to conclude a final settlement of all outstanding questions with a view to the establishment of permanent peace."

On September 21, 1951, Israel informed the Paris Conference of the Palestine Conciliation Commission of the United Nations that:

"We are prepared here and now to extend to each and every one of the Arab states the offer of a pact of non-aggression. We should see in acceptance of this offer a real token of the Arab states' willingness to work toward the essential goal of this Conference—the restoration of peace in the Middle East."

On January 2, 1952, Israel's representative at the United Nations told the Ad Hoc Political Committee of the General Assembly:

"My Government instructs me to reiterate that a formal understanding with the neighboring Arab states remains a central objective of its policy . . . We sincerely invite the Arab world at this important juncture in its modern history to reflect carefully upon its decisive choice. If it desires, it can establish with Israel the relations which normally govern the intercourse of civilized states."

On September 28, 1953, Israel's representative told the United Nations General Assembly:

"My Government continues to uphold the vision of the Middle East at peace with itself, uniting all efforts of its two kindred peoples to heal the wounds of aggressive violence and reawaken the rich potentialities of the region for political, economic and cultural progress."

On May 10, 1954, the Foreign Minister of Israel told the Parliament:

"Israel is ready at any time to enter into negotiations with any of the neighboring states concerning either a final and comprehensive peace settlement, or any partial or interim arrangement aiming at paving the way towards peace."

On July 24, 1955, Israel's Prime Minister told a United Press correspondent:

"If there is any Egyptian statesman who is ready to meet me to consider ways and means for the improvement of relations between Israel and the Arab states, I am ready at any time or place . . ."

On January 3, 1956, the Prime Minister of Israel before the Knesset said:

"We believe the maintenance of peace is preferable even to victory in war. We know that any war, even war in which we gain the upper hand, involves ruin and destruction for both parties and intensified hatred between nations."

CONCLUSION

The United Nations must succeed in bringing together both sides to the conference table where they can in dignity agree to a peace based on mutual respect and good neighborly relations. Such a peace must do away with the past relations in the Middle East which were attuned to the exigencies and strategy of incessant warfare.

Peace in the Middle East must establish normal political, economic and cultural relations among all the states and be in complete harmony with the Charter of the United Nations.

The intolerable conditions which have preyed upon the populations of the Middle East should be completely eliminated. The United Nations' efforts must be based on this premise if a just and lasting solution is to be found.

The United Nations cannot afford reversion to the conditions which have obtained up to the present and have blocked the establishment of peace.

If the United Nations fails on this crucial issue, then its effectiveness as a leading institution for world peace and security will have been gravely impaired. The establishment of peace in the Middle East would radiate its beneficent effects upon a tense and troubled world, and greatly contribute to the prevention of World War III.

The notion that the United States could succeed in winning the long-term sympathies of the Arabs may be a short-lived one. Quite apart from the fickleness of the Arabs if tomorrow, for instance, the United States quarrel with Communist China over the Formosa Strait should reopen—and the likelihood is that it will—then Arabs and Asians will very quickly forget the favors the United States has done them. Britain and France may be well advised to let the United States lead if she is willing to do so, and be satisfied with a silent partnership in the Middle East, but in the process the United States must not forget that to sacrifice Britain in the Middle East would have its inevitable repercussions on the European security system. Stalin was not quite right when at Yalta, during the discussions about the veto in the UN Charter, according to Churchill's memoirs, he predicted that Britain and France would want to use the veto to prevent Egypt from bringing the Suez Canal question to the United Nations. Egypt, as it turned out, grabbed it without asking. But he may prove right in his prediction that the capitalist nations will destroy themselves by fighting among themselves—over the Middle East.

The Free Democratic Party's Future

Though the West German federal elections are many months away, the contending political parties are losing no time in the race to gain the favor of the electorate. Even at this early date it is clear that the parties intend to employ the same stratagems and tactics which characterized their behavior during the 1953 election campaign. Depending upon the specific circumstances, the German political parties will be found flirting with each other or sharpening their knives for a sudden thrust at their political rivals.

Needless to say, these flirtations sometimes make for strange bedfellows. Thus, the Christian Democratic Party and the Social Democratic Party, which are ideologically poles apart, have been speculating on the feasibility of a so-called "black and red" coalition. Yet, neither party will allow itself to be committed fully to such a deal. Therefore, we find the leader of the Christian Democratic Party, Chancellor Adenauer, toying with the idea of making a bargain with the Free Democratic Party, the largest of West Germany's constellation of minority political groups.

In this connection the Christian Science Monitor reported that on September 14, 1956, a meeting took place between Dr. Adenauer and Dr. Dehler (leader of the Free Democratic Party) at the house of the former's banker friend, Robert Pferdmenges, to reopen "discussions for the purpose of finding a common platform before the elections." When the public got wind of this secret confab, the faces of the participants turned red with embarrassment and they tried to deflate the significance of this meeting.

Meanwhile the Free Democratic Party and the Social Democrats have also been exchanging "love notes." The jockeying for advantageous positions continues and at this moment it is not altogether certain how the final political lines will shape up. Though there are many imponderables, we can predict with a reasonable degree of certainty that all of the parties will do their best to attract all kinds of elements, irrespective of ideological or economic considerations. This means, of course, that each of the parties will be wooing Democrats, nationalists, Pan-Germans, neo-Nazis, Communists, etc., etc. This is the way the 1953 election was conducted and there is no evidence that the political parties will not repeat this performance.

Facts About the FDP

There is, however, a special factor in the present election picture which ought to command the careful attention of the Western Democracies. We refer to the strategic political position of the Free Democratic Party (FDP) and its future role in the development of German policy. The FDP is supposed to represent the ideas of liberalism in politics and laissez faire in economics. It is, nevertheless, a fact that the FDP is not a homogeneous body. On the contrary, it is plagued by factionalism involving bitter struggles between powerful extreme rightist groups and less influential liberal elements. Indeed, while the FDP poses as a party of liberal tradition, it is in reality controlled by groups that have little in common with democratic principles.

In the spring of 1947, the so-called liberal parties of all the four zones of Germany were loosely organized into a sort of "Working Committee" similar to that of the Christian Democratic Union and the Christian Socialist Union. The two co-chairmen of this "Working Committee" were Theodor Heuss, now President of West Germany, and the late Dr. Wilhelm Kuelz for the East. The liaison broke down toward the beginning of 1948 and by December of that year the members of the Western zones formed the Free Democratic Party.

Following the setting up of the West German Government, the Free Democrats were brought into Chancellor Adenauer's coalition. The appeal that the Free Democratic Party had among Germans in those early postwar years, was described in an analysis prepared by the U. S. Military Government: "There is no doubt that many Germans now vote for the FDP (and for the CDU, too, for that matter), simply because there are no parties further to the Right, for whom they would actually prefer to vote. Consequently, there is a natural tendency for the FDP to yield to the pressure from nationalist elements in order to win votes."

The fortunes of the Free Democratic Party began to fade as Adenauer's popularity grew and his successes mounted both in international as well as in domestic affairs. The Chancellor's triumph in reestablishing Germany's prestige and power reduced the popularity of the FDP and in no small way contributed to the rising resentment and jealousy among FDP politicians.

Times have changed. The Adenauer policy seems to be reaching the point of diminishing returns. Important voices in West Germany are beginning to regard the Adenauer policy as a liability both politically and economically in terms of Germany's long-range requirements. In short, developments in Germany are ripening for change. It is more than just a question of substituting one political party for another to take over the affairs of government. The whole problem of the direction and orientation of German policy is involved and it is precisely here where the FDP may be coming into its own.

The FDP Leadership

To understand the FDP's future role it would be helpful, we believe, to familiarize ourselves with the key leaders of the FDP. Perhaps the most articulate of them all is Dr. Thomas Dehler who was Minister of Justice during the first Adenauer Coalition Government. Herr Dehler is a lawyer by profession. He does not appear to have played any significant role one way or the other during the Hitler regime. However, in 1946 he came into prominence when he founded the FDP Branch in Bavaria. Subsequently, he was a member of the Parliamentary Council in Bonn from 1948-1949. Herr Dehler, according to available information, was not a member of the Nazi party. On the other hand, his ideological affinities and views predate Nazi doctrine, that is to say, he is a German nationalist and has not hesitated to sound off on the glories of the old Reich whenever the opportunity presented itself. It was probably his "bull-in-the-china-shop" approach which finally alienated him from the more subtle Chancellor Adenauer.

On November 22, 1952, the New York Times reported Herr Dehler as denouncing what he called "the decentralized state" of Germany. "The time must come again," he warned, "when Prussia is a reconstituted German Reich, once again fulfilling its duty of maintaining German culture in Central Europe." Dr. Dehler's apologies for Germany's military excesses and war guilt was expressed in a speech in Hamburg in 1950. "Hitler," he cried, "is to a great extent the consequence of the Versailles Treaty," and "Germany is no more guilty than France for World War I." This statement caused a furor among Allied officials and Herr Adenauer was visibly embarrassed although he was careful not to call his Minister of Justice to account.

In view of Herr Dehler's fervent nationalism, it is not surprising that he showed a marked sympathy for German war criminals. Utilizing his strategic post as Minister of Justice, he boasted publicly that the Bonn Government had spent at least $12,000 in the defense of seven Nazi war criminals (JTA, 5-31-52). As a leading spokesman for the Free Democratic Party, Dehler made the cause of absolving Germany's war criminals a special duty of his party. The FDP has publicly asserted trat Germany's "so-called war criminals" committed no more serious misdeeds than American soldiers in Korea (New York Times, 6-5-52). The Times reported that U. S. authorities were convinced that the statements emanating from the FDP press, were part of a deliberate campaign and "a sly attempt to justify the actions of the Germans who were condemned as war criminals." The FDP made it a special point to whitewash all of Germany's war criminals in the effort to obtain their freedom. Dehler's Ministry of Justice told the press that 90 percent of the so-called war criminals were "simple soldiers who happened to be caught while guarding concentration camps."

Herr Dehler has never been an enthusiastic supporter of a pro-Western policy. On one occasion he asserted that West Germany must begin to dicker with the Kremlin because it was there and not in Washington where important decisions are made. His attitude toward the Allied occupation has been one of contempt. The Western Allies, he once said, were totally ignorant of the problems facing Germany today. There could be no democracy in West Germany, he warned, so long as the High Commissioners—the "Three Holy Kings"—grasp power in their hands (ONA, 9-14-50). Four years later he denounced the sovereignty status granted to West Germany. "Every German," he once stated, "must be pained at the thought that changes in our constitution still depend upon the will of the Allies" (Christian Science Monitor, 4-26-54).

More recently he accused Chancellor Adenauer of "bearing the historic guilt for the bad outcome of the German unification problem" (Reuters, 6-23-56). This is a significant charge in view of the fact that the FDP under Dehler's personal guidance has reestablished political liaison with the so-called Liberal Party in the East German satellite state.

"Lesser Lights"

Another influential member of the FDP is the German diplomat Georg Pfleiderer. Herr Pfleiderer was one of the earliest advocates of rapprochement between West Germany and the Soviet Union. His activities in this respect have been analyzed in detail in the No. 48 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III (see page 7, "Scapegoat Tactics"). According to the columnist Marquis Childs, Pfleiderer is reported to have had close

Not even West Germany's unparalleled prosperity is a sure brake against a slide into disaster. The ambition to get ahead financially and socially is the most compelling single force today. But the West German has become so engrossed in his material well-being that he ignores his political and moral responsibilities. So democracy remains fragile and untested. A new demagogue might strangle it. Repeated polls show that a majority of West Germans do not even condemn Hitler.

(E. M. Korry, Look, 10-2-56)

Impetus for the present movement toward European unity has come principally from Chancellor Adenauer of West Germany. . . .

What we are evidently seeing is a revival of the talk, widely current at the end of World War II, that Europe should be reconstituted so as to exist as a "third force" between the United States and communism. The threat to America implicit in any such arrangement is that a revivified Europe would adopt the attitude of "a plague on both your houses," and, whether Mr. Dulles is pleased or not, would stand clear of attachment to the United States as well as to communism.

connections "with powerful Rhineland industrialists who want to expand their sales in both Russia and China." He is regarded as the chief expert on foreign affairs for the Free Democratic Party and has taken on many a secret mission in connection with Russo-German relations, with the blessings of Adenauer himself. In his present post as Ambassador to Yugoslavia, Pfleiderer continues to work for his goal, i.e., an understanding with Moscow. Herr Pfleiderer is a leading exponent of the so-called Third Force idea which envisages a German dominated Europe cooperating with the Soviet Union. According to one of Chancellor Adenauer's trusted associates, Dr. Eugen Gerstenmaier, Pfleiderer's plan is in harmony with the long range objectives of Chancellor Adenauer (Stuttgarter Nachrichten, 10-27-52).

Dr. Erich Mende is also a leading figure in the FDP. Herr Mende has been "the most persistent petitioner in the Bundestag for the release of war criminals . . ." (New York Times, 3-21-53). He seldom neglected an occasion to whitewash these criminals and to discredit the justice of the verdicts handed down at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. In 1952 he wrote a letter to Adenauer (which was more of an ultimatum) declaring that the German war criminals must be freed before the ratification of the EDC Treaty by the Bonn Government. Indeed, it was Mende who was instrumental in stalling West Germany's final ratification until satisfaction was given to his demands.

As a former officer in Hitler's Wehrmacht, Mende told the New York Times (8-25-52) that he would never agree to the ratification of the EDC agreement until the war criminals Field Marshals von Manstein and von Kesselring were freed. They were among the 146 criminals whose freedom Mende demanded. Von Manstein and von Kesselring had been found guilty of inhuman crimes during World War II, but Mende boasted that they were his "favorites." Like all of the FDP literature on whitewashing the war criminals, Mende too parroted the slander that many German war criminals had been imprisoned for acts which he alleged were not different from those committed by UN forces in Korea. It is interesting to note that in more recent times Mende has tried to belittle the military challenge of the Soviet Union. We shall have more to say about this angle.

Another influential personality in the FDP is Hermann Schwann. From 1934 until 1945 he was a member of the Nazi party. Since then he has worked diligently on behalf of close ties with the Soviet bloc. In June 1956 Schwann declared that he would undertake "an unaccompanied trip" to Red China at his own expense "to break the ice." He stated that after his sojourn in China he would visit Moscow (California Staats-Zeitung, 6-18-56). Herr Schwann lived up to his promise with the blessings of the FDP. Parenthetically, he must have had the tacit blessings of Chancellor Adenauer's Government too, because German travellers must obtain the necessary foreign exchange via the government.

The Peiping radio announced Schwann's arrival in the Chinese capital in August 1956 where he was duly received by the Deputy Prime Minister of the Peoples Republic of China, Chen Yi, and the Deputy Chairman of the Permanent Peoples Parliament Committee Huang Yen Pei. During his stay there Schwann discussed "existing possibilities for trade between the Federal Republic and China" (Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 8-28-56).

As Schwann indicated in his earlier announcement he visited Moscow after leaving China. When Schwann returned to the Fatherland, he was far from silent concerning the future. Germany, he declared, must set up proper economic relations with Communist China. He expressed his determination to create a "German-Chinese Association" and said that he intended to return to China in the spring of 1957. Though Schwann originally said that he would go alone to China, he actually had a companion traveller, Wolfgang Schenke. PREVENT WORLD WAR III has already exposed Schenke as a former intelligence agent for the Nazi High Command in China, working in the guise of a German journalist (see No. 48, page 10, Dr. Wilhelm Haas—Ambassador Extraordinary). Herr Schenke was described in flattering terms by the Soviet publication "International Affairs" (February 1956) as "the prominent West German orientalist." His views on neutralism were quoted approvingly by the Soviet publication.

Professor Noack

Recently the FDP welcomed into its ranks Professor Ulrich Noack. Prof. Noack is unfamiliar to most Americans but he is an important personality in West Germany. If Prof. Noack intends to pursue the same line which he so articulately supported following the end of World War II, then his membership in the FDP will undoubtedly add new significance to the future role of that party. He was an active German propagandist when he lived in Norway in 1938. At that time (the year of Munich) he published a book, "The Ethics of European Diplomacy" in which he glorified Hitler's diplomacy and belabored the theme of a "Greater German Lebensraum." When war broke out, he returned to Norway to continue his activities on behalf of the Fatherland. At the trial of Vidkun Quisling, the Norwegian traitor, it was revealed that Noack had participated in organizing Quisling's trip to Germany. Indeed, Norwegian officials charged that it was Noack who introduced Quisling to Hitler in 1939 at which time the invasion of Norway was discussed. These officials have further stated that Noack was chiefly responsible for the course of events in Norway in 1940. As professor of German at the University of Oslo he misused his office to spy for the German Embassy. Reliable sources report that Noack had been a member of the Nazi party since 1939 (Neue Zeitung, 11-7-49).

Following the defeat of Germany in 1945, Prof. Noack became a celebrated public figure when he announced his program for the "salvation" of Germany. The essence of his plan amounted to immediate ending of the Allied occupation of Germany and the establishment of a strong centralized German government. The tone and aim of the program was decidedly anti-Western and sought to salvage Germany's economic and political power by playing up to the Russians. He talked about a so-called neutral Germany, but behind the word neutralism Noack strove to save Germany from the consequences of her crimes and aggressions. There was nothing in his program which showed a sense of contrition. It was purely a device to enable Germany to take a commanding position in Europe which, after all, had been the aim of Hitler himself.

Prof. Noack developed many of his ideas following frequent visits to the Russian military headquarters in Berlin. It was in 1947 that he organized the Nauheim Circle, named after the resort where he had preached his gospel. The Circle was composed of elements representing all colors of the political spectrum. The following year Noack's movement attracted more influential groups throughout West Germany. His slogan "Out With the Occupation Troops" appealed to "Communists, Nazis, pacifists, professors, students and industrials from both East and West" (AP, 11-26-48). In November 1949 Noack convened a congress of his supporters. German politicians from the satellite East zone indicated their enthusiasm for the meeting. Important personalities from the Western zones also supported the movement. In this connection Noack had the ear of many prominent Ruhr industrialists whose mouths watered at the idea of profitable trading with the East.

Generally speaking, Noack attracted politicians, diplomats, intellectuals and industrialists on both sides of the Iron Curtain who maintained their loyalty to the Bismarckian tradition of close understanding with Russia vis-a-vis the West. While his activities were glorified by the Communist controlled press in the East zone, he was described in the West as "the most dangerous man in Germany." One American high official noted that Noack's program "is more effective than the Communists's because it is not clearly identifiable with the Communists." He freely admitted that his movement attracted the extreme right and extreme left. "How do I explain that Communists from the East zone and rightists from the West are all in my camp? It is simple. They all believe in Germany unity and the withdrawal of the troops" (New York Herald Tribune, 11-27-48).

Noack's Mentor

The pro-Russian orientation of Noack's Nauheim Circle was not an isolated case. His movement was part of the overall line pursued by a former German Ambassador to Moscow, Rudolf Nadolny. Count Nadolny was also a disciple of Bismarck and a faithful student of Germany's master geo-politician, Dr. Karl Haushofer. Nadolny pioneered in reestablishing friendly relations with the Kremlin after 1945. In that year Marshal Zukhov appointed him to the post of Special Advisor on German Questions. In this strategic position and with the complete backing of the Russians, Nadolny began to organize small groups of influential personalities to develop long-term plans for a Russo-German understanding.

Unlike the Noack circle, Nadolny's following was smaller in numbers and less noisy but where it lacked quantity it had the power to reach into the highest circles of German society. Among his admirers one could find persons who today are associated on the most intimate political terms with Chancellor Adenauer and his government, including Hermann Abs (Hitler's chief paymaster and financial advisor to Adenauer), Ludwig Erhard, Adenauer's Minister of Economics, Andreas Hermes, one of the founders of the Chritsian Democratic Union. There was a firm relationship between Nadolny's small group and the Nauheim Circle. Ruth Fischer, an expert on German Communist affairs, wrote that the Noack movement was "Nadolny's direct offspring" (This Week, 11-6-49). The French journal Franc Tireur (11-5-49) reported that Nadolny was "in liaison with Noack." Indeed, the New York Times (3-13-49) noted that Nadolny was a member of the Nauheim Circle in Hesse. Thus, the evidence shows that the "circles" created by Nadolny and Noack had close ties with each other and had a common purpose, i.e., the reestablishing of a Greater Germany through an understanding with the Soviet Union at the expense of Western security. That Noack should now regard the FDP as his political home helps to clarify the hopes and ambitions of the FDP leadership.

Nazi Connections

It is true that the FDP is a minority party but where it lacks mass support, it attracts individuals whose voices carry weight in German affairs. In this connection, the FDP is receiving the support of many of Germany's leading publicists. For example, Paul Sethe, a leading journalist and writer for the German newspaper Die Welt, has expressed sympathy for the FDP cause. Gieselher Wirsing, another prominent writer for Die Welt, has also gone over to the FDP. Wirsing was the author of many anti-Semitic books during the Hitler regime. Today he attacks Israel while he lauds the Nasser dictatorship in Egypt.

FDP politicians have been preparing for the coming elections for some time. They are out to round up a big vote even if it takes a good Nazi propagandist to help them. Thus, they have employed Gunther Kaufman, former editor of the Hitlerite periodical "Wille und Macht" (Will and Power), to do a smear job on their political opponents.

Playing ball with former Nazis does not deter the FDP from flirting with the Social Democratic Party. In the State of North Rhine Westphalia the FDP joined hands with the Social Democratic Party to overturn the government of Karl Arnold. In an informative article on the growing influence of the former Hitler Youth in the FDP, Terence Prittie, noted English journalist, reports that they are not even satisfied with Dr. Dehler who may be a bit too cautious to suit them. Mr. Prittie reports that these ex-Nazis "want a direct German approach to Moscow in order to win German reunification, East-West all-German talks and the re-emergence of a 'German role' as arbiter of Europe's fate" (New Republic, 6-2-56). These young Hitlerites, Mr. Prittie writes, have a profound contempt for democratic principles. They are anti-Western and regard Germany's association with the Western powers as a long term liability although they recognize that Western financial and political support helped Germany to regain a position of power. Like their Nazi forebears they hope to exploit the discontent of the various social groupings of Germany and dream of the day when their voice will determine Germany's fate.

Accommodating the Russians

Recognizing that the Social Democrats have gained considerable political advantage due to the declining vigor of Adeneuer's following, the FDP is desperately trying to overtake their rivals. Dr. Mende has publicly declared his support for a military detente along the lines which the Russians have been pushing.

In May 1956 the FDP congress supported Mende's plan which called for a united Germany, a breaking up of NATO and the establishment of an independent German army. Mr. Prittie observes that Mende's plan has provided the Free Democrats with a new line of thought. "Small professional armies on both sides of the iron-curtain frontier which runs through the middle of Germany could be amalgamated after reunification; they could even encourage reunification by the threat implicit in their existence. Behind these professional armies—which will revive the glorious memories of German arms—will be 'national militias' to be used for local defense only. Their role should suggest that no German any longer considers armed aggression as a quick way of settling arguments." As Mr. Prittie points out, the Mende plan is almost an exact counterpart of the ideas put forth more than a year ago by Colonel von Bonin who was a leading military advisor in Adenauer's Defense Ministry. Von Bonin was dismissed because on the surface at least, the Bonn Government disapproved of his ideas which were regarded as playing into the hands of Russian strategy. Now the FDP which has close connections with former members of the German General Staff, has taken over the von Bonin plan as its own. (Ironically, it appears that Adenauer's Government is now working toward the same end.)

Planning for "The Day"

Thus, the FDP today is not merely running an election campaign. From all of its deeds and the statements of its leaders, the evidence points to the fact that the FDP regards itsef as THE party which is destined to deal with the Soviet Union and to bring about the Fourth German Reich.

On more than one occasion the Society has emphasized that the Kremlin was not so much interested in communizing all of Germany, for the present time at least, as it was in helping to create a Germany which would dissociate itself from the West and deal with the Russians "realistically" on all levels.

The Russians find it more profitable to deal with the Krupps than they do in supporting isolated and discredited German Communists in West Germany. The FDP seems to understand this too. The top leaders of the FDP including Dehler, have reestablished their liaison with the so-called Liberal Democratic Party of East Germany. The New York Times (10-9-56) reported that West Germans placed little significance on this get-together because there "was little community of principle" between the two. From other accounts of the meeting it would seem that the West Germans as quoted by the Times are wide of the mark. While the participants in the meeting admitted that there were divergencies of opinion, " a common approach was secured over practical matters for achieving German unity." What these practical matters are has not been spelled out although they agreed in principle to exchange speakers!

Commenting on the results of the meeting the Manchester Guardian (10-11-56) declared that the FDP's action in seeking common ground with the Eastern party must not be regarded as an isolated affair. "It would turn out," the Guardian writes, "to be a turning point in postwar Germany. The guiding thought behind it is the belief that a concerted effort must be made to secure reunification and that all other questions, including close association with the West and a place in a united Europe, are subordinate."

The meeting between the FDP and its Eastern counterpart recalls to mind the views expressed by Herr Dehler two years ago when he advocated Russo-German talks and indicated the willingness to go himself to Moscow. He told the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (10-5-54) that for years the project of a journey to Moscow had stirred him more than a trip to Washington "because what is going on, what is planned and worked out in Moscow is more important than that what goes on in the Western world." He declared his opposition to what he called anti-Soviet politics and said, "Russia is a realistic power, it is necesasry that we dicuss and come together in a peaceful way." A couple of weeks later Herr Dehler returned to this same theme and predicted that it was "simply a matter of course that we Germans will some day enter into conversatons with the Russians on unification" (New York Herald Tribune, 10-19-54). The FDP today is still planning with all its energy for that day.

The problems of the past already have given way to new problems. The shift of Poland from satellite status to independent Titoism, and of Hungary probably much further, raises a very serious question about how Central and Eastern Europe are to be reorganized. There may soon be a power vacuum in Eastern Europe. If the Soviet Union is expelled totally from it, the historical course would be for Germany, in competition with France, to attempt to occupy it. Yet this would rebuild the substance of the old German Empire.

(Joseph C. Harsch, Christian Science Monitor, 10-30-56)

A Western Germany fully capable of defending itself with modern weapons and armies would again offset the balance of power in Europe. That has been the fear of the French in particular. The rest of Europe concurs. . . .

Germany's tremendous economic upsurge came while the rest of Europe fulfilled its NATO commitments. The British are certain that Germany would not have moved so spectacularly if Bonn had the same obligations as the United Kingdom. France joins in with this argument.

German Realpolitik in the Middle East

The fishing season in the Middle East is on with a vengeance. "Soviet and Nazi technicians (in Egypt) are once more cooperating with all of the intimacy inspired by their dead leaders' 1939 pact" (Barron's, 12-3-56). Though Soviet and German "fishermen" eye each other with suspicion, they find it mutually advantageous for the present to exchange hooks and bait. Reports concerning the "catches" of the Russian anglers have been widely publicized, both here and abroad, but, strangely, comparatively little has been told about the big "hauls" of the German fishing enthusiasts. This seems to be all the more inexplicable in view of the fact that the German "fishing" tradition in the Middle East covers two world wars and has produced such "expert anglers" as Kaiser Wilhelm II, the Mannesmann Brothers, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, Field Marshal Erwin Rommel and his Commander-in-Chief, Adolf Hitler.

We do not mean to imply that the Middle East Crisis with its threat to world peace can be readily explained solely in terms of the Russian and German "fishing" expeditions. Yet, if we minimize the importance of their exploits, we shall be ill equipped to deal with this crisis in a realistic way.

German Agents At Work

In the Nos. 41 and 48 issues of PREVENT WORLD WAR III we provided pertinent details regarding the postwar activities of the Germans in the Middle East and their impact on Arab policy toward the West. For example, we brought out the fact that hundreds of neo-Nazis, Pan-Germans, and war criminals found a haven in Egypt shortly after World War II. They were able to infiltrate important positions in Egypt's economy and military setup. They served as key advisors to Nasser's predecessors and, of course, they continue this role under the present Egyptian dictatorship.

It is not without significance, we believe, that key German agents in Egypt are reported to be in close touch with Bonn Government officials including Adenauer's chief diplomatic aids, Dr. Blankenhorn and Prof. Hallstein. Even Der Spiegel, a widely read German magazine, had to take cognizance of these facts (10-26-55): "Adenauer's leading diplomats have laid themselves open to the charge that they must share to a considerable extent in the tactical victory gained by the Bolsheviks in the Near and Middle East."

To this very day the Adenauer Government has remained silent on the nefarious role played by the former partisans of Hitler in Egypt and in other Middle East countries. We have yet to hear Adenauer condemn Nasser's employment in key posts of such faithful servants of Hitler and Goebbels as Wilhelm Voss, Johannes von Leers, etc.

According to the latest count that we have seen, there are approximately four thousand Germans in Egypt alone (New York Times, 10-31-56). We have no doubt that these "visitors" and "tourists" have other interests than just gazing upon the ancient pyramids and the Sphinx. Descriptions of their doings show that they feel very much at home in Egypt. They enjoy the best hotels and have easy access to the elite in Egyptian society including Nasser himself.

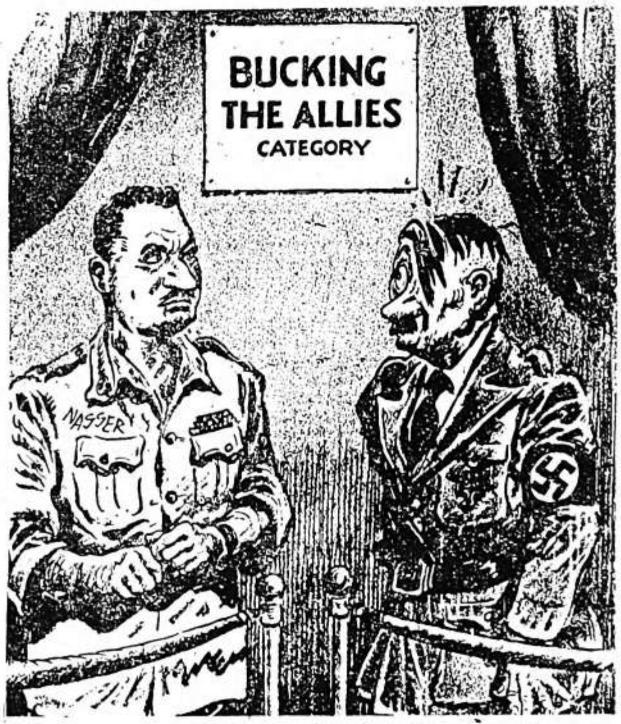
The Egyptian dictator has done much, it seems, to bolster up the "morale" of these Germans since their expulsion from Egypt by the British during World War II. Their arrogance has reached such proportions that, according to one reporter, they are "lording it as if they had won the battle of Alamein" (London Daily Express, 8-31-56).

Parenthetically, it should be borne in mind that Nasser has written boastfully about how he contacted Hitler's agents during World War II for sabotage operations against our British Ally.

"Neutrality"

The delicate situation in the Middle East has demanded the utmost prudence on the part of the Germans to prevent the growth of distrust among the Western Allies with regard to their activities. On the surface West Germany is a sympathetic friend and ally of Britain and France. However, Germany's gestures of sympathy should not blind us as to their real aims.

Even before hostilities broke out in the Middle East, the German press and other channels of information were conditioning public opinion to take a pro-Arab stand. Editorials in leading German newspapers including the "Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung" attacked the British and French position on the Suez as "irresponsible." The Bonn Government adopted an equivocal line when Nasser seized the Canal. This was in the name of "neutrality." (It is interesting to note that Adenauer has opposed the idea of German military neutrality in negotiations between the West and Moscow.)



Russell in the Los Angeles Times

The $64,000 Challenge

Yet, this so-called neutrality did not prevent Bonn from seriously considering the acceptance of Nasser's invitation to a conference that would have created a regime for the Suez Canal in violation of the international agreements covering this major waterway. The New York Times (9-16-15) reported that Bonn was determined "to do all possible to avoid taking sides in a showdown by force between its European treaty partners and the country's Arab-Asian partners in a flourishing commerce." The following day the Times reported that, while West Germany would join discussions on the establishing of the Suez Canal User's Association "Foreign Minister Heinrich von Brentano has told British and French officials that Bonn would make no commitment on joining."

The careful diplomacy and the tricky editorials in the German press were discarded when hostilities broke out in the Middle East. It seems as though the West German press had been "itching" for that moment, so it could blast away at the British and French. "Die Welt," an influential German newspaper, which employs journalists who worked for Hitler, condemned the British move in Egypt as an "imperialistic" aggression. "The victory at Port Said will be a Pyrrhic victory," this newspaper ominously declared.

"Public Opinion" and Politicians

The unanimity of the German press assaults condemning the British and French as "war criminals" made it appear as though instructions had been received from a central source. The German press outburst was the spark to enflame West German public opinion (London Economist, 11-10-56). A reporter of the Christian Science Monitor (11-16-56) described West German reactions toward the British and French as "almost as violent as they are toward events in Hungary." The same reporter noted that the German mood was a kind of "Schadenfreude," i.e., a malicious joy which recalled the Allied condemnation of Germany's crimes under Nazism. The British and French action was compared to Hitler's aggressions. Demonstrators in Berlin manhandled British soldiers, and students in Hamburg carried banners which proclaimed "Send Eden to Nuremberg," obviously to stand his trial as a war criminal.

While the Germans heaped abuse on Prime Minister Eden, they began to tell themselves that Hitler's barbarous actions were not so terrible after all. Indeed, people began to say that "all the fuss about Nuremberg and the branding of Germany as guilty can now be forgotten" (Christian Science Monitor, 11-16-56). Even the Arab Ambassadors to Bonn were given the opportunity to launch slanderous attacks against France, Britain and Israel at a specially prepared press conference.

The whipping up of public opinion made it safer for the Bonn politicians to speak more candidly. Foreign Minister von Brentano stated on December 4, that the Bonn Government's attitude with regard to the Suez conflict has been at all times determined by consideration for the "close and friendly relations" with the Arab States. Chancellor Adenauer himself condemned Britain, France and Israel in a speech before the Bundestag. Posing as a paragon of peace, the Chancellor tried to convey to world public opinion that the Germans were a disinterested party in the struggle and would exercise their "moral" influence to curb the "rash" use of force. While speaking on this high plane, Adenauer's Government was busily at work pressuring Israel through the threat to cut off restitution deliveries which the Germans had solemnly obligated themselves to discharge. Adenauer's saintly pose in this crisis was deliberately built up by German propaganda. Indeed, his spokesmen went so far as to claim that it was the Chancellor who played "an influential role in the discussions that preceded acceptance by Britain and France of a cease fire in Egypt" (New York Times, 11-8-56).

The Germans had played their hand well. The coordination between the newspapers and the government and the shaping of public opinion seemed to work with military precision. So careful were the German bigwigs that nothing must be said that could destroy Germany's posture as a disinterested party in the conflict that they agreed in advance to prohibit debate on the Middle East Crisis in the German parliament. Instead, the Chancellor read his prepared and ambiguous speech and the "opposition" leaders reciprocated in kind. It was a cut and dried affair. The actors played their parts to perfection all under the categorical imperative "Don't rock the boat!"

It is not difficult, by any means, to define the underlying motives which have induced German politicians to avoid any statement or action that would displease Nasser and other Arab leaders. They were succinctly described by the foreign correspondent Seymour Freidin:

"Drang Nach Osten"

"In the general uproar over the future status of the canal, everyone seems to have forgotten that West Germany has moved into the Middle East, economically, on a scale the country never approached before and during two world wars.

"It's a Drang-nach-Osten, present-day Bonn-to-Baghdad road, paved with billions of hard Deutschemarks, contracts and credits for the smoking factories of West Germany. Where a vacuum existed by the liquidation of French or British interests, West Germany promptly moved in, set up shop and thrived briskly.

"Because of their ever-expanding industrial power, the House of Krupp and associated West German competitors foresaw the day that they would install themselves in entrenched, cash-and-carry positions. These are lush prospects, not easily disgorged. They happen also to be compatible with some absorbing, West German national political interests" (New York Post, 9-6-56).

Mr. Freidin's observations have received concurrence from other reliable sources. Thus, the Manchester Guardian (8-9-56) wrote: "With the collapse of old relationships in the Middle East, and with their own growing industrial power, many Germans hope that their country can fill the vacuum if not politically at least economically." The Christian Science Monitor's Bonn correspondent, J. Emlyn Williams, also notes, "The greatest concern of the West Germans now, apart from peace, is the safeguarding of industrial investments in Arab lands and expanding their trade there" (11-16-56).

There is no question but that the Germans believe that the Middle East Crisis has created vast opportunities for the realization of Germany's ambitions. It has given new hope to Adenauer's dream of a United Europe where the political and economic policies of the separate states would be "coordinated." The New York Times (11-19-56) notes that Adenauer's domestic authority and "consequently his capacity to move forcefully on the European stage also has been enhanced by the turn of events in Hungary and Egypt." Now that the British and French are beset with grave problems, Herr Adenauer feels that he can show them how "logical" it would be for the Western European nations to unite in order to protect their "common interests."

The idea of unity like the world peace can have different meanings. For the Germans the unity of Western Europe is synonymous with their domination of that area. To them it means that they would do all of the "coordinating" and act as the agent of Western Europe in dealings with the Arab countries. Aside from their conceit, the Germans believe that they are best suited for the task because their hands are "clean." It goes without saying, of course, that the role of "honest broker" promises enormous windfalls, both politically and economically.

Seeking U. S. Support

Yet, the Germans, under present circumstances, know that their game cannot be won without the sympathetic support of the USA. It is for this reason that German propaganda has all of a sudden placed the United States on a special pedestal. President Eisenhower is now being hailed as the great peace maker. The United States is depicted as the only power that can retrieve the "moral authority" of the West which was so brutally and brazenly undermined by the British and French. Thus, the Germans fawn upon the USA while they engage in scurrilous attacks against our Western Allies. Needless to say, the intent of this tactic is to create further disunity between the British and French on the one hand and the USA on the other. At the same time, Adenauer's Foreign Minister von Brentano offers Germany's "good offices" to restore mutual trust between Washington, London and Paris and "to revive the solidarity of the West" (New York Herald Tribune, 12-2-56).

It is interesting to note that besides their efforts to act as "honest broker" between the USA and its Western Allies and between the Middle East and the West, the Germans seek to act as spokesmen for the West vis-a-vis Moscow. Thus, Adenauer, while opposing a Big Four meeting to discuss outstanding East-West problems, told a press conference that he was willing to open bilateral talks with the Kremlin "at any time" (New York Times, 12-8-56).

As mentioned above, the opportunities in the Middle East are vast and the Germans are losing no time to bring the United States over to its corner. Thus, when the Middle East Crisis was at its height, Adenauer told the press that he was determined to make a major effort "to tighten German-American cooperation." Toward this end he planned to send von Brentano to Washington, "to sound out administration leaders and press for coordination of German and American policy in Europe and the Middle East" (New York World Telegram, 11-16-56).

In economic terms this so-called coordination revolves around Germany's objective of becoming the most influential power in the Middle East and in North Africa. Indicative of German thinking in this respect was Dr. Adenauer's suggestion, made during the crisis, that "the West" help Egypt build the Assuan Dam. Speaking at a meeting of German newspaper editors he said, the best way to bring peace to the Middle East was "to support reconstruction of the crippled Egyptian economy" (New York Times, 11-18-56). Obviously, Adenauer's words could only warm the heart of the Egyptian dictator while they implicitly slapped the British and French.

Adenauer's high sounding phrases turned out to be a trial balloon for more practical considerations. Thus, several weeks after he spoke, reports circulated in Egypt that Krupp had offered to build the Assuan Dam (AP, 12-5-56). When representatives of Krupp were asked to confirm these reports, they told the press that they were "premature." For almost a year the Krupp interests have been working on their so-called Point 4½ Program for the underdeveloped countries. If we tear away all of the fancy trimmings around this project, we find that it is based on two assumptions: (a) that the scheme will be financed by Uncle Sam, and (b) that the major share of profits will go to Krupp. To put it another way: the Point 4½ Program is part and parcel of the German aim to bring to fruition the Berlin-Baghdad axis. Germany tried to realize this dream in two world wars. Having failed by force, they hope they will succeed via the US Treasury. It would be well for our statesmen to bear this in mind before they pick up the check for Germany's honest brokers, the Herren Adenauer and Krupp. Much is at stake in the German gambit in the Middle East. Above all, there is the grand alliance between the United States and France and Great Britain—the foundation stone of their mutual security and prosperity.

Nationalism in Youth Organizations

"German Kultur Association of European Spirit"

Nationalist youth organizations have stepped up their activities though they lack as yet a strong over-all leadership, it is stated in an article in the Bayerische Staatszeitung, 23-6-56, which distinguishes three categories: (a) groups with an undisguised Fascist tendency, e.g., "Viking Youth" and, closely associated with the German Block, "Eagle" Youth Union; (b) groups with a more old-fashioned sort of nationalism, e.g., the German Party's "Union of Young Germans" and an organization of the refugees, "German Youth of the East"; (c) the youth groups attached to the soldiers' associations whose aim is to foster the "soldierly virtues." The Bavarian paper believes that in the event of a deterioration of the political situation, the third category was likely to constitute a much more serious danger than any of the other groups which were numerically inferior and also disunited.

A warning against the "revival of Nazi and nationalist tendencies" in certain youth organizations was issued by the Hesse Government Youth Department (according to the Offenbach Post, 31-7-56). Attention was drawn particularly to the danger of any cooperation with the "German Kultur Association of European Spirit." This Association is stated by the trade union paper Welt der Arbeit, 15-6-56, to be run by "unteachable Nazi diehards" engaged in "subversive activities under the cloak of Kultur" of which three instances were named: the "Türmer" publishing firm, publication of a periodical called Klüter Blätter, and two busy book societies.

President of the Kultur Association is Herbert Böhme, a former SA writer. He has gathered around him a number of Nazi and philo-Nazi authors, e.g., Will Vesper, Wilhelm Pleyer, Theodor Seidenfaden, Hans Grimm, Heinz Steguweit, who meet regularly to read from their works.

In his effort to win influence among German youth (says a report in the Socialist Vorwärts, 29-6-56), Böhme recently founded the "Schiller League of German Youth" which is said to have affiliated to the Hitler Youth successor organization called "Viking Youth." A youth rally was held at Castle Ludwigstein, the Kultur Association's permanent home, where one of Böhme's friends, Josefa Behrens-Totenohl, read from her "Blood and Soil" lyrics.

Hitler-Faust and His Gretchen

A typical example of Böhme's Kultur propaganda is an article of his in Klüter Blätter, July 1956, where he compares Hitler (without naming him) to Faust who had brought about the "creative awakening" of the German people ("Gretchen"). "We were awakened (Böhme writes), we could not do anything about it, such was the power he wielded over us, and by knowledge and ability he increasingly poured enthusiasm into our unspoilt souls," etc.

This article was denounced in the Frankfurter Allgemeine, 2-8-56, as an attempt to minimize "guilt" by representing it as "fate." That sort of "poetry," it was said, is "infested with ulterior motives," and "the intoxication of feeling is corrupted by the perversions of malice."

According to the Welt der Arbeit, 15-6-56, Governmental subsidies already promised to the Kultur Association were withdrawn by the Bavarian Ministries of Finance and Education after strong protests had been lodged in the Munich press. The loss is said to have been made up, however, by substantial grants from industrialists.

"Threat from the Right" was the motto of the 14th congress held by the Federation of West German Youth Associations at Oberursel (according to the Vorwärts, 29-6-56). The principal speaker, Professor Eugen Kogon, stressed the characteristics by which the incorrigible elements today could be recognized: defamation of the Weimar Republic; impugning the integrity of the anti-Nazi resistance, and direct or indirect glorification of the Hitler regime. A plea for legislation to stop the new Nazi literature, was made by the chairman of the Association of Catholic Youth, Dr. Schreeb.

Increasing encroachments of nationalism were also de-

ECHOES OF THE SS

Police have been looking around Bavaria for recordings of Hitler's voice. They don't have to go that far.

In the last month, there has been more done by official sanction and calculated indifference to make respectable men of Nazis than through the entire combined post-war period.

Because of difficulty in recruiting for the new army, the Federal Republic changed its policy about Waffen SS officers. . . .

As the SS demands, and becomes, more equal with the passage of time, an operative auestion much be asked. To whom will the officers be loyal? Many of them swore oaths of allegiance to another German Republic in the past and then proceeded to destroy the state.

Can a glib expression of loyalty from such men mean more to them than the oath they took to their Fuehrer? In logical sequence, their hearts belong to Doenitz, Hitlers' appointed successor.

The SS is getting promoted all the time. Only a short while ago, they were permitted to volunteer for the new army only as privates. Today, it's up to lieutenant colonel. The pressure, as Kurt Meyer's rally clearly implied, will be for the generals next.

It doesn't mean that these unfortunate activities are symptomatic of rampant Nazism on the militant march again. It shows that utter indifference, compounded of political expediency and studied carelessness, is providing a powerful voice to the worst elements in Germany.

(Seymour Freidin, The N. Y. Post, 10-13-56)

nounced in a statement by the German Federal Youth Federation, the roof organization of all democratic youth associations, according to a report in the Süddeutsche Zeitung, 15-6-56. The danger is seen in "the arrogant deportment of former Nazi officials, the infiltration of nationalists into high administrative and Government posts, the launching of youth groups devoted to obsolete ideologies, and the open defamation of the anti-Nazi resistance." A demand was made on all politicians to banish nationalist arguments from their utterances, and on Parliament to outlaw the glorification of Nazism.

Nazi Authors Reinstated

Hans Baumann, author of Nazi youth and soldiers' songs, was awarded the Friedrich Gerstacker Prize by the city of Brunswick. In a report, the Zeit, 26-7-56, recalls that Baumann had composed the song containing the lines "Today ours is Germany, tomorrow all the world." The paper protests against a distinction being conferred on a man "whose fraudulent pathos helped induce German youth to run off to the battle fields and into the graves of a nonsensical war."

Hans Grimm was among a number of Nazi and philo-Nazi authors invited by the Cuxhaven Spa Council to read from their works at Council-organized "Authors' Nights by the Sea," says a report in the West Berlin Telegraf, 18-7-56.

Hermann Wanderscheck, member of the Nazi "Reich Government's Press Department," was appointed editor-in-chief of the new journal of the Copyright Society, Der Author. He had held the same office under the Nazis. In a comment, the trade union paper Welt Der Arbeit, 22-6-56, lists Wanderscheck's propagandist Nazi output and reflects on the "tragedy that people like him, champions of the Nordic-racialist perversion of literature, today claim and actually obtain leading positions among German authors."

Denying the Crimes

The "Organ of the Outlawed Victims of Post-War Discrimination," Die Anklage, which specializes in denigration of the German anti-Nazi resistance (see last Bulletin, p. 7), also concentrates on systematically denying the Nazi crimes, especially the extermination of the Jews. "This is the Truth. Stop the Atrocities Propaganda," runs the headline of a full page article (No. 13-14, July 1-15, 1956) asserting, on the strength of a Jewish source of 1935, that in the whole of what was later German-occupied Europe, there had been no more than 6,190,182 Jews—"all of whom the lying Allied propaganda says were murdered." The Nazi paper leaves out from its account (and quotation) the relevant figures for Russia and the Baltic States (ca. 2,200,000), and adorns its "truth" by adding that the 1935 figures does not include the "scores of thousands" who emigrated to "Israel, oversea, Switzerland, Portugal, Algiers and South Africa."

The "atrocity fairy tale" about the six million murdered Jews had been invented, says Die Anklage, "in order to fan among the Allies hatred of everything German during the war, and after the war to use that figure for dirty business, deriving from it a certain moral claim to the highest possible indemnification."

"Widar" Publishing Company

On instructions from the Bonn Ministry of the Interior, investigations are being made by the Federal Criminal Investigations Bureau into the affairs of the antisemitic "Widar" publishing firm of Guido Roeder, at Oberammergau. This "unusual procedure" is applied, according to the Kolner Stadtanzeiger, 18-7-56, only when the Minister of the Interior has "serious reasons" for doing so.

Among the firm's publications is a book by an American Jew-baiter, Eustace Mullins, entitled "Federal Reserve Conspiracy," which is described, in the Echo der Zeit, 15-7-56, as "insane ravings about a Jewish-Communist domination of the United States, with direct incitement to Jew massacres." Another "Widar" book, "Soviet Agents Everywhere," was confiscated by the Public Prosecutor. So were, according to the Süddeutsche Zeitung, 4-8-56, 9,000 copies of Eustace Mullins's brochure "Die Bankierverschwörung von Jekyl Island" (apparently the German version of the above-mentioned title).

The fact that books like these are published in Germany in the year 1956 is described by Die Zeit, 26-7-56, as "fantastic and humiliating."

Guido Roeder, owner of "Widar," is himself the author of an "anti-Communist" brochure entitled "SOS Rufe aus U.S.A.—Die Kommende Rote Diktatur." Denouncing it, a Frankfurter Allgemeine editorial, 10-7-56, explains that under the camouflage of anti-Communism, the author was "dishing up the very hoariest tales from the arsenal of Messrs. Julius Streicher, Alfred Rosenberg and Adolf Hitler." The editorial concludes: "Products of diseased brains — true enough. But since we have lived to see what catastrophes and crimes can be caused by such a compound of folly, insolence and hate, it is not sufficient to expose it to ridicule . . . People like Röder—and there are several others of his ilk amongst us—must be stopped from carrying on their insalubrious trade. Where incitement to crime begins, tolerance and freedom ends."

Inside Germany

BULL-BOY

The fires of nationalism flared with uncomfortable heat in Bonn . . . when Heinrich Schneider, West Germany's newest and most accomplished demagogue, arrived in the capital to stoke the reunification furnace before a crowd of 70,000 refugees from the East who booed the name of Adenauer and howled for the return of lost territory. Their eyes are on the Oder-Neisse line beyond which is the land taken by Russia and Poland after the war.

Schneider is the bully-boy from the French-occupied Saarland whose Nazi tactics helped win the Saar's vote last year for return to Germany . . . He called the Bonn rally for a joint council of the East and West German governments to prepare a National Assembly for a united, neutral Germany that would join a "peace zone" of states stretching from Finland to the Mediterranean.

Hesse's interior ministry is pressing an investigation of the "Fighting Organization for an Independent Germany," which does its fighting with poison-pen handbills reminiscent of the Hitler era.

The anti-American, anti-Negro and anti-Semitic handbills, carrying the organization's signature, have been sent to many high-ranking U. S. Army officers, practically all the foreign consulates in Germany and even to officers of the new German Army.

The handbills promise that Germany "will throw off the foreign chains of American high finance, English lords, Adenauer and his Marxist friends." . . .

ROLLING ALONG

The recent political unrest in Europe did not slow down the steady progress of West Germany's automobile industry. For expansion and modernization of its present plans, the West German automobile industry contemplates investing $300,000,000 in 1957, against $250,000,000 in 1956.

The new German army is restoring the jackboot and a uniform similar to that of the old Wehrmacht.

Present uniforms, double-breasted with wide lapels, were widely criticized as "un-German" and "Latin-American." The army is introducing a single-breasted blouse with only two breast pockets.

The army's American-style boots, similar to those worn by paratroopers, will be replaced by black jackboots last seen in Adolf Hitler's time.

ACHTUNG!

Meanwhile, former SS Maj. Gen. Kurt Meyer addressed 6,000 veterans of the Waffen SS, elite units of the Nazi army, at a rally in Minden, Westphalia. SS veterans below the rank of colonel are being admitted into the army by a decree of the Bonn government.

Gen. Meyer said SS men never of their own free will would shoot at their "German brothers" in the Communist-run East German Army. He said he is convinced that East German troops, in turn, would not shoot at West Germans.

"German soldiers listen to German orders," he said, "not to the orders of foreigners."

The rally was attended by several hundred wartime SS veterans from Austria, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, the South Tyrol and other parts of Europe.

RECOMMENDED READING:

SS: Alibi of a Nation

By GERALD REITLINGER

Reviewed by TERENCE PRITTIE

Three years ago Mr. Reitlinger performed a valuable service to future generations by writing "The Final Solution," which set out for the first time the full history and true nature of the Nazi plan to exterminate the Jews. "SS: Alibi of a Nation" is not exactly a companion volume to "The Final Solution," yet it is in a sense complementary to it. Here—also for the first time in print—is the story of the state within the State, the mixed military-police-murder squad which came to be accepted by the great mass of the German people as a normal part of the community. It is literally impossible to tell the whole story of the S.S. in 500 pages, for the organisation was a monstrous labyrinth with fresh horrors at every twist and corner of it. Mr. Reitlinger has yet managed to give a graphic and terrifying picture of its intricate organisation, brutal plans and performances, and of the half-mummified presiding figure of Heinrich Himmler. . . .

The outstanding impression which emerges from this book is that the huge majority of the German people tolerated the S.S. and may have even regarded it as indispensable. German civil servants shrugged off what seemed hardly to concern them and their offices. German generals full of righteous anger—generally, indeed, because they felt that their authority had been flouted—prepared powerful protests which died frozen on their lips. The older German nationalists expressed themselves on the iniquities of the S.S. with great force—to their personal friends and in the privacy of their own apartments. A few Germans tried, too late, to resist Hitler and the S.S. State. But the current German version of that resistance—that it failed only because Germany was at war and the Allies had demanded unconditional surrender—is pitifully unconvincing. The S.S. built up its essential power in peace-time, when any surrenders taking place were made by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, M. Daladier, and President Benes of Czechoslovakia. It was in peace-time that the S.S. set up Dachau and other concentration camps. It was in peace-time that they murdered Austria's Chancellor Dollfuss, and kicked small Jewish girls and pregnant Jewish mothers down the streets.

This book is a chronicle of horror, and it is hard to select from it in order to produce an impression in cameo. Not so long ago a German weekly paper declared that the concentration camps were an invention of the victorious Allies and that the gas ovens of Dachau were installed by American pioneers. The map at the end of his book is therefore all the more valuable. It marks only the most important concentration camps, and there are 23 of them. Each single name—Belsen, Buchenwald, Flossenburg, Mauthausen—conjures up its own particular pictures of unbelievable cruelty, which is relived in the nightmares of survivors who are still waiting for some poor material compensation for their sufferings. Of course, many Germans will assure you, practically no one in Germany knew about the concentration camps. Is this quite credible? The mayor of Bergen-Belsen saw the long columns of half-starved Jews being marched to the infamous camp on the heath, and he never saw them being marched back again...

Mr. Reitlinger gives one a choice of horrors—the sadistic tortures and beatings-up, the medical experiments on innocent people, the mass murders in ditches and dungeons, the grisly business of disposing of millions of corpses. He gives one, too, a picture of the mystical lunacy and hero-worship which warped the brains of the perpetrators. Himmler believed in "S.S. runes" and "racial purity," but the small man of the S.S. was often no better. Here, for instance, is the testimony of S.S. Sergeant Jerk when he confronted S.S. Obergruppenfuehrer Steiner: "As he approached me his stern features brightened into a smile. He had recognised me. And yet it was almost a year since I had taken part in the deputation which greeted him at Narva on his birthday. Since then he had seen innumerable faces and yet he recognised mine. I stood no longer on the ground but swam in a rosy cloud of happiness." This type of inspired imbecility enabled Germans to do things which might otherwise have seemed incredible, such as shooting down droves of small children in ditches, driving gipsies in hundreds into the frozen waters of the Dnieper to drown, and knocking skeletonic prisoners into open cess-pits in order to watch them struggle to death in liquid manure.

To-day the new German Army is ready to begin recruiting former members of the Waffen S.S. This is hardly wise, for however efficient a screening system is devised, a percentage of people who either connived or participated in crime will infiltrate into armed forces which are intended to be genuinely democratic. It is not wise to forget too soon. But the Germans are adept at forgetting, as a few examples from Mr. Reitlinger's book will show, Otto Brauetigam, who decided that Jews should be killed in the Eastern territories regardless of "economic consequences," is now a trusted member of the Federal Foreign Office. General Lothar Rendulic, who was stringing up alleged deserters during the final weeks of Germany's collapse, is a regular contributor on "military matters" to a Rhineland weekly paper. General Kurt Meyer, who had Canadian prisoners butchered in the Ardennes, was fêted when he was released from gaol and given a new car by a Düsseldorf firm. Wilhelm Schepmann, Chief of Staff of the S.A., was made a priority candidate for Parliament in Lower Saxony by the B.H.E. Refugee party.

It is these and many other incidents which make Mr. Reitlinger's book invaluable. He himself summed up the real reasons for writing it in his very last paragraph. "The machinery of the S.S. as a state within a state will be forgotten because it never achieved its end. The successes of the S.S. in the field will be forgotten because the S.S. never fought as an army and its leaders never achieved more than tactical control. The idealism of the S.S. will be forgotten because it meant nothing beyond loyalty to one man. But the racial transplantations, the concentration camps, the interrogation cells of the Gestapo, the medical experiments on the living, the mass reprisals, the manhunts for slave labour, and the racial exterminations will be remembered for ever." Substitute "must" for "will" in special consideration that it could all happen again—if not in Germany, then somewhere where the lesson of the S.S. has not been learned or even thought about.

Trade missions in Hungary and Poland may soon be established as the first step towards resumption of full diplomatic relations . . .

German-Polish trade has been rapidly expanding during this year, German exports from January to August amounting to over DM.209 million, or treble the DM.67.3 million total during the corresponding period of 1955, and German imports to DM.147 million, against DM.60 million from January to August last year.

Trade talks with Hungary, recently concluded, provide for a 20 per cent increase in trade volume to DM.144 million per year both ways.

President Eisenhower was marked for assassination by Nazi Germany in the closing months of World War II, it was revealed today.

Mr. Eisenhower, then supreme allied commander in Europe, was to be the target of German parachutists dropped behind allied lines, on London and Paris, during the death throes of Adolf Hitler's Reich in 1944.

In addition, the Nazis hoped to set the stage for an attempt on the life of the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt by a mass-breakout of some 400,000 Axis prisoners-of-war interned in this country. Both plots failed, chiefly through the efforts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

They were encouraged in this confidence not only by the Bonn government's deplorable offer to reinstate them in their previous ranks, but also by the appearance at Minden of Dr. Mende, the opposition Free Democrat party's defence expert. Dr. Mende's party seems confident that after the elections it will either come to power in alliance with the Social Democrats, or be able to name its own terms for realigning itself with the Christian Democrats. GOEBBEL'S TACTICS REBORN

The Suez Canal, one of the most important waterways of the world, has been turned into an internal stream. Orderly procedures have disappeared in the Middle East and will not be readily restored.

For instance we in the United States have concentrated on the quarrel between Egypt and Israel, but we have paid little heed to the violence of the attack upon the Government of Iraq, the most stable of the Arab countries and the closest friend of the West among them. The Egyptian radio issued this statement to the Arab world and it is here quoted as characteristic of the bitterness toward Iraq of the Sovietized Arab countries:

"The Iraqi Government . . . tried to utilize the Iraqi Army as a tool for terrorizing the Iraqi people. It then dared to mass troops on the Syrian border, participated in a conspiracy against Syria's safety, assisted Britain, France and Israel to attack Egypt and bombard its citizens and to invade it in order to violate its freedom and independence.

"The present Government in Iraq is no longer a lawful Government entitled to demand obedience from the Iraqi people. The actions undertaken by this Government have made it a trespasser and usurper Government. No one should obey this Government. Indeed, every Arab and every Iraqi must resist it. . . ."

This is one Government issuing propaganda among the people of another. Egypt and Syria now believe that, with Russian aid, they can get away with anything.

We misinterpreted the phenomenon of the Egyptian dictatorship. We thought it could be beguiled from its course and thought of it merely as a form of new nationalism, while Nasser had avowed his imperialistic ambitions as clearly as Hitler did and proved the efficacy of those ambitions by his propaganda campaign in all Arab, even all Islamic, nations. We insisted on treating him as the innocent victim and Britain, France and Israel as the "aggressors," thus ignoring the years of provocation and Nasser's explicit ambition to wipe out the little State of Israel. Dulles and The Suez Riddle

by T. H. TETENS

We print below a thought-provoking and original article by T. H. Tetens, together with his covering letter. Mr. Tetens is a writer on international affairs and the author of the book "Germany Plots With The Kremlin." His article speaks for itself and does not necessarily represent the views of the Society.

January 2, 1957

To the Society for the Prevention of World War III
Gentlemen:

When the dramatic events in Hungary and Suez occurred, I was in the midst of preparations for a new book about the Adenauer plan to integrate Europe.

Since then I have scanned many reports and articles published here and abroad. The necessity to set the political facts straight is especially urgent at a time when there is a maximum of political confusion and a perversion of moral principles.

I have compiled a wealth of material which proves that the master planners in Bonn, above all, will profit from recent events.

I know that there is little room for extensive documentation. That has to remain for the book. What I have in mind at this time is to provide your readers with a brief survey which indicates that the Suez catastrophe was not primarily the result of "blunders."

Cordially,

T. H. TETENS

The Crushing Blow

The ill-fated British-French Suez action of November 1956 will be recorded by scholars as one of the great turning points in modern history.

When London and Paris acceded—under heavy pressure—to the demand of a cease fire and withdrawal from the Suez Canal, a great chapter of European leadership ended in what the Economist called "a total and unmitigated defeat."

Few people know what really happened behind the diplomatic scenes during those eventful days of November 1956. Yet, the results of the hectic struggle between Washington and London became glaringly visible before the eyes of the whole world. Great Britain and France had been dealt a heavy blow and the position of both countries as great world powers was seriously damaged. This fact was bluntly stated by a leading political magazine, the U. S. News & World Report (12-14-56), which called Britain's retreat from Suez appropriately "the end of an era."

The U. S. News & World Report sized up the situation in these words: "This time the British withdrawal from Suez is for keeps . . . Britain can no longer protect its own interest in the Arab world . . . Britain and France, by their failure in Egypt, have exposed themselves as second-class powers in the world."

How did this catastrophe happen? Why was it necessary to stab the British, French and Israelis in the back? Was not Great Britain America's closest and most dependable ally, if not by treaty, then by tradition? Why did Washington administer this humiliating blow which played into the hands of Dictator Nasser and his Arab allies, and won the eager support of the Soviet bloc?

Britain and France had intervened at Suez with the objective of restoring order and security at this vital international waterway. They saw realistically the necessity to put an end to Nasser's dictatorship. London and Paris decided to act after it had been proven that efforts towards a peaceful settlement through the UN or by concerted action with Washington were of no avail. The record shows that all steps in that direction had been stymied by the U. S. State Department.

Unexplained Mysteries

The millions of words which have been written about the Suez crisis have up to now not answered the one overriding question: Why did Secretary Dulles, over a period of many months, remain passive in spite of all urgent British, French and Israeli appeals to support a move, either by the big powers or through the UN, for a lasting settlement in the strife-ridden region of the Near and Middle East?

There are many other questions. For instance, why did Mr. Dulles initiate, in midsummer, 1956, a pointed campaign against "colonialism" at the moment when the British had just voluntarily withdrawn their last troops from the Suez Canal and had all hands full to find a solution for other difficult situations, such as Cyprus, Jordan and the Arab-Israeli conflict, not to speak of other burning problems in the Far East?

During the last two years London had pointed with increasing alarm to the rapid deterioration of the situation in the Middle East. But all its urgent pleas did not faze Mr. Dulles. Why? Can it be that the Secretary of State had become captivated by a diplomatic scheme which made it necessary to undermine British and French power? A significant statement which appeared in the fall of 1956 in the editorial page of the Hearst newspaper Journal-American, may shed light on Mr. Dulles' intentions. On October 5, the Journal-American published an article pointing out that Secretary Dulles was set to play a "new role" in world affairs. Friends of the Secretary, it was stated, had hinted of a "foxy design" by which Mr. Dulles hoped to defeat the "neutralized-minded nations" which aspire to "act as umpire in the cold war struggle between the major forces of the world—the United States and Russia." Mr. Dulles, the article continued, "aimed at fighting colonialism." He had just declared, on October 2, that the U. S. would take "an independent position on the colonial issue." Having thus described the purpose of Mr. Dulles' "foxy design," the Hearst paper proceeded to state the Secretary's basic objectives: "Dulles may still go down in history as the man who sparked the realization of that old American dream—the coming of Western Europe into a United States of its own. He may have done this by kicking the British and French in the teeth on the colonial issue . . ."

This truly amazing statement was made four weeks before the catastrophic events descended upon our two closest friends and allies. In the light of the above testimony, coming from a paper which is known as a staunch supporter of the Secretary's foreign policy, it seems justified, even imperative, to take a close look with regard to the essence of Dulles' diplomacy.

In spite of thousands of articles, editorials and comments by which the press tried to explain the news behind the Suez Crisis, there is very little knowledge of the forces which first precipitated this crisis and finally determined the catastrophic outcome of the British-French expedition. James Reston, the New York Times diplomatic correspondent in Washington, wrote on December 30, 1956, that the "whole story of the attempts of this government to block the Anglo-French invasion of Egypt, has not yet been told. There are indeed many facts which have not yet been told, facts which are of utmost importance in order to grasp the enormity of the "foxy design" that turned the tables against our friends and allies.

There is also a word to say about the new role of Mr. Dulles as the "only prophet" who, in the early summer of 1956, climbed out on the limb and boldly forecast events which would allow us "to look hopefully forward to a transformation of the international scene." Mr. Dulles was then known in the journalistic and diplomatic fraternities in Washington as the man who, throughout his life, had constantly made wrong guesses. Now, suddenly, the Secretary of State basked in the glory of a great political forecaster. Recalling Mr. Dulles' prophetic statements, the Christian Science Monitor (12-12-56) remarked that Mr. Dulles' earlier "undiplomatic predictions were made to the amazement and shock of quite a few Washington pundits" and it was generally felt at that time that Mr. Dulles "was being over-optimistic and possibly naive."

Could it be that the "prophet" John Foster Dulles had exact knowledge of pending schemes which allowed him "to look hopefully forward to a transformation of the international scene"? It is noteworthy that he is not the only "prophet" and "forecaster" who dabbles in the business of "foxy designs." On the other side of the Atlantic is his close friend and colleague, Dr. Konrad Adenauer, known by friend and foe as the "Old Fox." The Chancellor looks proudly back over a lifelong career in the manufacturing of "foxy designs." The record shows that both men, Dulles and Adenauer, had reached the end of their respective "diplomatic ropes" in the spring of 1956. Yet both dared to turn "prophet" and to predict events which would bring about "a transformation of the international scene."

The Rift Between London and Washington

In order to understand the underlying forces which have caused the catastrophic turn in world affairs in the fall of 1956, we must take a brief glance at the developments in Anglo-American relations during the first postwar decade.

The cold war alliance between Washington and London came officially to life with Churchill's famous "Iron Curtain" speech at Fulton, Mo., in March 1946. The common bond was fear of the Russian bear who had advanced deep into Central Europe and threatened British and American interests in other parts of the world. With the rapid change during the postwar period, especially with the comeback of a revitalized Germany, the strength of the Anglo-American alliance was bound to weaken. Our relations with France were strained from the beginning of the postwar period.

The first differences with Great Britain appeared under the Truman-Acheson Administration in regard to such issues as German re-industrialization, the Berlin blockade, and U. S. direction of the Korean war. Our relations to the British ally became strained even more under the Eisenhower-Dulles administration. There was serious irritation during the Korean truce negotiations, during the formation of the Baghdad Pact, the Indochona crisis, on the Formosa question, on the issue of German remilitarization and European security, and on the burning Near and Middle East problems. The basic differences between London's and Washington's diplomatic conduct centered around the general policy of war, peace, and co-existence.

The British recognized early that under changed conditions in the postwar period they had to pursue world problems with a different diplomatic approach. Under a rapidly advancing arms technique toward absolute weapons, Britain was confronted with the paramount problem of survival. Russia had set off her first A-bomb; in 1949, China was lost to the Communist orbit; in 1952, Moscow came forward with luring offers for a German settlement, for a European security system and for large scale disarmament; in 1953, Russia surprised the West with an H-bomb test; in 1954, with modern intercontinental jet bombers of the Bison type, and with advanced experiments in guided missiles. The result of this development is a nuclear stalemate between the two super powers. The British reacted quietly and fast. They visualized the necessity of an overall world settlement and a speedy ending of the cold war. The logical answer for British statesmen was moderation and co-existence. London recognized that Russia and Red China were realities with whom they had to live—and to trade. At the same time, while the United States clung rigidly to the old policy concept of containment and non-recognition, the British accepted Russia, China and India as new world powers.

No similar policy revision was made by the United States. On the contrary: When the Eisenhower-Dulles Administration took over in Washington in 1953, the Secretary of State proclaimed an accelerated cold war policy of dynamic "liberation" and "rollback," a "massive retaliation" for the Soviets and an "agonizing reappraisal" of policy towards our allies.

"Brink of War" or Co-Existence?

Up to 1953 Russia's "peace offensive" to end the cold war had been unsuccessful. It needed the diplomatic art of John Foster Dulles to bring Moscow over the hurdle. After Eisenhower's election victory in 1952, Churchill came to Washington to hammer out a common Anglo-American policy adequate to meet the realities in a rapidly changing world. Churchill soon discovered the unbridgable gap between the British and American concept of diplomacy. The British found it difficult to follow the erratic "brink of war" policies proposed by Secretary Dulles. Churchill first suggested publicly on May 11, 1953, to have a meeting of the governments of the U. S., Great Britain and the USSR "at the highest possible level." This idea was sharply opposed by Secretary Dulles. Soon after the fruitless Bermuda Conference in the fall of 1953, the British Premier decided to try a new diplomatic approach in order to reach a direct understanding with Russia. After preliminary secret soundings in Moscow, Churchill opened an exchange of letters with Foreign Minister

Molotov on July 4, 1954, which was marked by an unusual cordiality. Recalling "our friendly relations in time of war," Churchill expressed the wish to meet Mr. Malenkov (then Soviet Premier) and other Soviet leaders. Churchill suggested a "simple and unofficial meeting in a friendly fashion without agendas, with the sole purpose of trying to find a sensible way of living side by side in an atmosphere of growing trust, ease and happiness."

The next day, July 5, Molotov responded with no less cordiality saying that the Soviet leaders had "completely understood the meaning of your important message." Referring to "our comradely relations during the war, and the outstanding part you played in it," Molotov posed this significant question:

"Why, if during the war years relations between our countries were of such importance not only for our peoples but also for the fate of the world, can these relations not develop similarly now? As far as we are concerned, we are striving in this direction and we view your letter exactly in this light."

The proposed meeting failed to take place. Churchill, under a pretext, decided four weeks later to "wait . . . and then let us look into my project again." It is no secret that Churchill's proposal had come under pressure from Dulles.

The fact is that there was no meeting of mind between Churchill and the U. S. Secretary of State. When Dulles pressed for "united action" in order to intervene in Indochina (April 1954), he was coldly turned down in London and Paris. At that time Secretary Dulles insisted strongly on his "brink of war" diplomacy and was even willing to risk all-out atomic war with the Soviets. The British Premier, however, recommended a policy of moderation and negotiation in order to live with the existing problems without risking war.

Geneva and "The Big Thaw"

Under Churchill's constant prodding, Eisenhower finally agreed to meet with the Russians at Geneva in 1955. According to the Alsop brothers, Secretary Dulles was "bitterly opposed" to the summit meeting. Geneva and its result, the "Geneva spirit," was called the turning point in the cold war. Yet, long before Geneva, Moscow had initiated the policy of "The Big Thaw"—the liberalization of domestic policies and a more flexible diplomatic offensive in all parts of the world. 1955 saw the signing of the Austrian Treaty, Moscow's apology to Tito, Russia's withdrawal from Finland, the beginning of de-Stalinization in the satellites, a reduction of 640,000 men in Russia's armed forces, and the triumphal Bulganin-Khruschev visit to India and Burma. All these events were interpreted by Secretary Dulles as the result of Russia's "internal weaknesses," signalizing the pending "disintegration of the Soviet empire." Accordingly Dulles took a "tough" attitude at the Second Geneva Conference in October 1955, demanding Moscow's acceptance of American policy on German re-unification and the liberation of the satellite countries.

By the spring of 1956, it had become clear that London and Paris prepared to negotiate directly with Moscow. Bulganin's and Khruschev's visit to London April 1956 was hailed by the British press as a diplomatic event of first magnitude. In ten days of secret talks, the British and Russian statesmen came to an understanding on such vital points as European security, disarmament, close cooperation in the UN in order to pacify the Middle East, expansion of trade and strengthening of cultural relations. Eden was full of praise and called the meeting "the beginning of the beginning" to end the cold war. The British reported that the Russian leaders had given assurance that before the year would end, the satellites would receive more independence and that other significant reforms were in the making.

There is little wonder that Mr. Dulles felt uneasy about the Anglo-Soviet talks. He and Adenauer were highly irritated by the fact that the problem of Germany had been by-passed. On this question London and Moscow had "agreed to disagree' and thus decided to keep Germany divided.

Soon, other sensational events followed. In May 1956, French Premier Mollet and Foreign Minister Pineau had intimate talks in Moscow which convinced them that peaceful co-existence was the only alternative to suicide. On May 14, 1956, the Russians announced a new voluntary cut of 1,200,000 men in the armed forces, the closing of military installations, the mothballing of ships and an immediate withdrawal of 30,000 troops from East Germany. There was a general trend to end the cold war. The West German press reported that secret negotiations between Moscow and the Vatican were going on and that Moscow was willing to grant freedom to the Roman-Catholic Church.

There was considerable irritation in certain quarters here and in Bonn about these developments. Dulles had come under a barrage of criticism at home and abroad. The German press criticized Adenauer for having missed the bus and expressed concern lest Moscow, London and Paris establish a new "entente cordiale."

The Countermove

In the early summer of 1956 the blue sky of peaceful coexistence was suddenly darkened by two ominous events. Late in June riots broke out in Poznan which were quickly suppressed by Polish police with the help of Russian tanks. Three weeks later, on July 19, there was another event of far greater consequence: Secretary Dulles' cancellation of the plan for financial assistance for Egypt's Aswan Dam project was used as a pretext by dictator Nasser to seize the Suez Canal.

The Adenaur-Dulles strategy to foil a Paris-London-Moscow agreement on key problems was powerfully reinforced by the bloody events in Hungary and the arrogant stand of the Egyptian Dictator. In this connection, it has been reported that Bonn's intelligence chief, Reinhard Gehlen, played his part through his secret agents. During the war Gehlen employed his talents for Hitler. After the end of hostilities, he and his vast apparatus worked for U. S. officials and subquently were hired by Adenauer.

There is unanimous agreement among all political observers that John Foster Dulles' action of July 19 precipitated the chain of fatal events in the Middle East. Here is one of the great unsolved riddles in Mr. Dulles' diplomacy. The Secretary certainly did not blunder. Can it be that he played a carefully calculated game to precipitate events under which eventually Great Britain and France would lose their prestige as great world powers? This is exactly what happened in consequence of Dulles' action.

There is mystery upon mystery in the Secretary's handling of the Middle East situation. In London the Soviet leaders had agreed to settle the Middle East problem through the cooperation of all big powers in the UN. Dulles gave no support to this plan, but he continued to maintain his do-nothing position. Dulles, said the US News (-25-56) "has not been willing to go all the way with the British Foreign Office on many issues of policy related to the Middle East." Was that all part and parcel of his "foxy design"?

There is a wealth of material, diplomatic reports from Cairo, London and Washington, which, together with the comments of such foreign policy experts as Walter Lippmann, James Reston, the Alsop brothers, Joseph Harsch, and others, constitute a devastating indictment of Secretary Dulles' handling of the Suez Crisis. This is not the place to enumerate the details of how Mr. Dulles first goaded and bamboozled the British and French. Having forced them into virtual unconditional surrender and "kicked them in the teeth," Mr. Dulles brought joy to Nasser and his Nazi adviser and to the Soviet bloc.

One has only to read the excellent report from Cairo "How the United States Saved Nasser," in The Reporter of December, 13, 1956, in order to fathom the magnitude of the crime by which Western interests were deliberately harmed. Three days after the swift moving Israeli forces had overrun Egypt's military might in the Sinai peninsula, dictator Nasser was on the verge of toppling. Then came the Dulles ultimatum of October 30, the mysterious five-day delay of the Canal occupation, the oil sanctions, the organized run on the pound, and finally the humiliating surrender. By the middle of November, Nasser had regained his prestige as the strong man of the Middle East. The man who had organized and directed the international rescue operation for the would-be Hitler on the Nile was U. S. Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. The American government, said the Alsops, "is bending every effort to restore Nasser—the irredeemable Soviet stooge—to the position of commanding leadership in the Arab world." Mulling over "the strange process of transforming Egypt's smashing military defeat into a smashing political victory," the Alsops wondered where Washington's "new course" may lead.

The New York Times observed (12-23-56) that "no settlement of either Suez or Palestine is now conceivable except on Colonel Nasser's terms." William Henry Chamberlin, usually a staunch supporter of Mr. Dulles' foreign policy, made the following sarcastic remark (New Leader, 12-17-56): "An observer from Mars might have wondered what great services Dictator Nasser had rendered to the free world to warrant the tremendous U. S. effort to restore his power and prestige."

Bonn's Grand Strategy

There is no doubt that Mr. Dulles' diplomacy which trapped the British at Suez helped Dr. Adenauer in his scheme to pull the rug from under the "Entente Cordiale" in the making.

On October 30, Dulles acted in a hurry to stop the British and French at Port Said. Even his antagonists have to admit that this was truly a shrewd move to change the world situation. The British and French, weakened and under economic strangulation, can hardly resist any longer the Adenauer-Dulles pressure for an integrated Europe. Thus, the century-old Pan-German dream, for which the Kaiser and Hitler started both world wars, has drawn closer to its realization.

What would have happened had Dulles remained inactive only four more days in addition to his four years of "non-commitment" in the Middle East? In that case the British and French would have occupied the whole length of the Suez Canal. The Egyptian army in the Sinai peninsula would have been trapped, Nasser would have been swept out of power and Adenauer and his industrialists would have lost their tricky scheme in the Middle East. By siding wtih Egypt's dictator in those critical days, Dulles, as the London papers say, stabbed the British and French in the back and helped Nasser and his German friends into a powerful position in one of the world's most vital areas. From here, it will not be too difficult to set up and consolidate a German dominated Third Power Bloc stretching over the whole area of Europe and the vast African continent.

Who Will Fill the Vacuum?

The debate is on as to who will fill the vacuum in the Middle East. There is nothing to worry about in that respect because the Germans have already entrenched themselves firmly in all Arab countries. With the British and French licked and shoved out, and with their influence reduced in Europe proper, the Germans have regained full freedom of diplomatic action. Everywhere the German chancellor appears in the role of the "honest broker." He can help Moscow to end the cold war; for Washington he is the strong ally; and to London and Paris he offers "help" by creating a united Europe. But everyone has to pay a price. The British and French would lose their markets. Moscow would have to pay with reunification and a German sphere of influence in Eastern Europe. Only on this basis are Adenauer and Dulles willing to settle the cold war. Germany will be the only winner.

In addition there will be billions of dollars and new markets available in the Middle East. Here Dulles is willing to invest in a generous way. A large part of the dollars Washington is ready to spend in the Arab region, will go into the coffers of German industrialists. In Egypt, where British, French and Jews are driven out, the German firms are taking over. Newsweek (12-24-56) reports that the U. S. contemplates to go into the Middle East "with an investment in useful projects of between $6 and $10 billions." In Egypt alone, according to the Wall Street Journal (12-31-56), the "Administration is planning to help pay up to $1 billion for improvement of the Suez Canal . . . and may renew its offer to help pay for Egypt's huge $1.3 billion Aswan Dam."

This is the price Dulles is willing to pay for the realization of his scheme. He rebuked Nasser on a loan of a mere $50 million, now he is willing to spend billions. The overriding question is: In whose interest is Dulles conducting U. S. foreign policy? The next question: When will the U. S. Senate discharge its responsibility and demand a thorough accounting of Dulles' "foxy" and costly designs?

The other Dulles-Adenauer policy—that of "negotiating from strength"—with Russia—has proved an equally abysmal failure. The reunification of Germany which was expected to follow from it now looks less likely than ever. And so the West Germans are beginning to take the matter out of the hands of Dulles and Adenauer and to act independently. Social Democrats and the Free Dmocrats, the party of big business which left Adenauer's sinking ship some time ago, press for relations with East Germany and the satellite countries.

An Eyewitness Report

Nasser's Raiders

by

FRANK GERVASI

Some nights ago, in the town of Tel Mond, up where Israel narrows to a 10-mile strip between the Jordanian armistice line and the Mediterranean, Mrs. Malka Wig was awakened by strange noises. She shook her husband, Shimon, who grabbed his Sten gun and rushed to investigate.

Shimon Wig, 33-year-old tractor driver, never reached the front door. The 40 pounds or so of TNT which Arab fedayeen had planted under the foundations of the sturdy little two-story house exploded just as he reached the foot of the stairs. The house caved in.

Shimon was dead when rescuers reached him. His wife and their six-year-old daughter, Tamara, who was asleep in another upstairs room, were badly hurt. But they will recover. They were lucky.

Moshe Yoshpe and his wife were lucky, too. The night raiders, on their way back to the Jordanian frontier after dynamiting the house in Tel Mond, stopped at Moshe's house in Kfar Hess long enough to toss two hand grenades into it. The bomblets exploded harmlessly in the empty room next to the one in which Moshe and his wife slept.

The first incident was one of the 19 which Premier Ben-Gurion had in mind the other day when he sent a note to the State Dept. soliciting the good offices of the United States to persuade Egypt's Col. Nasser to stop sending fedayeen killer-saboteurs into Israeli soil.

Ben-Gurion listed only the "serious" incidents that have occurred between Nov. 2, when the UN ordered a cease-fire, and Christmas Eve. He did not include numerous other acts of terror and destruction.

Ben-Gurion's diplomatic language to the State Dept. did not tell the whole story. I have seen the day-by-day record. It is a chronology of bloody, systematic violation of the November 2 cease-fire, the Charter of the United Nations and of every written or unwritten law of the international behavior in war, peace or truce.

In the six or seven weeks since the fighting stopped, the incidents—I copied them one by one from the police records—have actually totalled 67. The dead numbered 9 and the wounded 20.

And before that? The other day the Knesset passed a Pension Law for Border Victims. It provided for compensation to residents of border settlements "wounded by infiltrators or the armed forces of neighboring countries." The law was made retroactive to Feb. 24, 1949. That was when the first Armistice Agreement was signed between Israel and the Arab nations which invaded the country in May, 1948, after the UN had created the State.

The law covered 1,376 wounded and 434 killed. Each case had to be authenticated before the victims or their survivors could be eligible for compensation. The figures may be taken as absolute minimums.

The Nov. 2 cease-fire was presumed to cover ALL belligerent activities, those of the fedayeen as well as of the regular forces. Documents captured by the Israeli Army in Gaza prove conclusively the responsibility of the Egyptian General Staff for the fedayeen activities whether based on Egyptian soil or not. Of the 67 recent attacks, 51 originated on Jordanian soil.

Nasser cannot disavow the fedayeen, no matter where they operate from, not unless his officers left behind them magnificent forgeries of orders, staff memorandums, sabotage and murder plans, detailed maps and payrolls.

And to back up the case loads of documents, there is the testimony of captured fedayeen and their commanders. Col. Nasser would be amazed to know how voluble his boys become when they do not have a Browning gun or Karl Gustav automatic in their hands.

The responsibility for the resumption of fedayeen activities is clearly Nasser's, just as the responsibility for his survival as Egypt's dictator . . . is plainly shared by the U. S., the Soviet Union and the United Nations.

Ben-Gurion's note to Washington was both an appeal and a warning. It was an appeal to the State Dept. to use whatever powers of persuasion it might have over Nasser to end a campaign of terror and death at once provocative and cruel. It was a warning that unless the fedayeen attacks were stopped, Israel may be obliged to defend itself with the same vigor it demonstrated in Sinai.

Retaliatory raids are deplorable. Right is not a compound of wrongs. But in a country without a hinterland, a full quarter of it so narrow in places that a good walker can cross it in a matter of hours and only 67 or 70 miles wide at its widest point, attack often becomes the only means of defense.

Besides, Mr. Ben-Gurion might have reminded Washington, in his note, that . . . "The first duty of any Government . . . is . . . the protection of life and property. This is the paramount obligation for which governments are instituted, and governments neglecting or failing to perform it are not worthy of the name . . ."

Ben-Gurion might have written those words, but he didn't. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, wrote them on June 20, 1916, in a note to the Secretary of Foreign Relations of Mexico explaining why the Government of the United States had found it necessary to send American military forces across the Rio Grande.

True, times have changed since the days of Pancho Villa. But not, apparently, for the Arabs or their Soviet masters.

Will the U. N. Solve This Problem?

The situation in the Middle East continues to be fraught with grave dangers to world peace. Unless positive and effective action is taken to thwart those forces which wilfully keep tensions alive and to solve the burning issues in that area, mankind may be faced with the awful spectre of World War III.

In the Society's statement "The U. N. and the Middle East Crisis" (November 1956) the observation was made that "for years it has been politically expedient for statesmen to pretend there was peace in this vital area." The U. N. itself became the main vehicle through which the real situation was concealed. Consequently, the U. N. Charter, as it applied to the Middle East, was a virtual dead letter.

When Britain, France and Israel embarked on military operations against Egypt, the U. N. was quick to condemn them. In retrospect, it is now clear that whatever one may have thought about their moves, they focussed world attention on a festering sore which had been eating away at the prestige and usefulness of the United Nations.

For the first time since the State of Israel was born, fundamental elements making for conflict in the Middle East, are spotlighted. The "pure and simple aggression" which originally described the military action, has lost much of its weight as the history of Nasser's endless provocations and lawless deeds were catalogued before the bar of world public opinion. Viewed in this light, the conflict with Egypt can now be traced directly to the insatiable ambitions of the Cairo "strong man."

It was mainly through the deceit of the Dictator and his agents that the legitimate aspirations of the Arab peoples were turned into an irrational force of hate and enmity. The ceaseless harrassing of Israel marked by cold-blooded physical violence and economic attrition was the microcosm of the larger conflict between Nasser and the West. If Israel could be forced to bend the knee, the whole Middle East would fall into Nasser's lap, leading to economic strangulation of our most reliable allies in Western Europe. This was Nasser's calculation. If it had been realized, U. S. security would have been placed in the greatest jeopardy since Hitler's planned invasion of the British Isles.

Nasser, of course, did not possess the wherewithal to challenge the West without concrete help from outside sources. Though a self-proclaimed anti-Communist, the mutual advantages gained by Hitler and Stalin in their 1939 pact, could hardly be ignored by Nasser and his top German advisors. Thus, the "mariage de convenance" between Nasser and Khruchev was a logical and essential ingredient in the successful development of his plans.

All of the hidden ramifications of Nasser's conspiracy were disclosed by the short-lived military campaign. They constituted nothing less than a major threat to world peace and security. Yet, the initial reaction of U. S. policy makers toward the conflict was essentially the continuation of the old line. This position proved to be decisive during the deliberations of the United Nations in November 1956. As in the past, the U. N. devoted its efforts to the surface manifestations while glossing over the basic issues which had turned the Middle East into a caldron of strife and unrest. However, the force of events and the growing awareness of millions throughout the world who may have been blinded by Nasser's cunning propaganda, began to make their impression. Today, our policy makers are beginning to "understand" that the real issues in the Middle East crisis can no longer be swept under the rug.

What are some of the major problems which block progress toward peace in the Middle East?

Nasser's policy of belligerency toward Israel: The denial of Israel's sovereign rights through unlawful economic blockade and acts of physical terror and attack run counter to the U. N. Charter and violate resolutions adopted by the Security Council. In terms of its own security, the West can no longer sit by and accept as a matter of course Nasser's defiance on this question. In this connection, a hopeful sign is the President's view that "free and innocent passage" in the Gulf of Aqaba is in accordance with international law. As a logical sequence to the President's position, support of all nations' rights of passage through the Suez Canal, including Israel, must be unequivocal.

The problem of the Arab refugees: For a number of years Arab propaganda has endeavored to discredit Israel as responsible for the miserable conditions of hundreds of thousands of refugees. Yet, it is a matter of historical record that the Israeli Government has time and again offered to work out an equitable agreement with the Arab states so as to alleviate the hardships of these unfortunate people. It is also a matter of record that the Arab leadership, egged on particularly by Nasser, has rejected such overtures for negotiations. The reason is not hard to find. The Arab leadership looks upon these refugees as pawns whose plight is to be exploited for ulterior motives.

The refugee problem would have never developed in its present sharp form, had not the Arab leaders made war on Israel in the first place, and having done so, induced the Arabs living in Israeli territory to leave. That the Arabs continue to stall on the question of providing a just solution is indicated by reports of U. N. officials.

Fortunately, public opinion is getting to know these facts and this is reflected in new efforts by the United Nations as well as by our own representatives at the U. N. to solve this problem in a concrete and just manner for all concerned.

The continuation of hate-inciting propaganda: In the No. 49 issue (Winter-Spring 1957) of Prevent World War III the Society noted that Arab propaganda against the West and Israel was a fundamental impediment to the establishment of normal conditions in the Middle East. "Those leaders who purvey poisonous propaganda, help to create a climate of blind hatred which may prove to be uncontrollable among peoples who are kept ignorant as to the real state of affairs. As a result, a change from a policy of hostility to one of peace and mutual accommodation becomes virtually impossible, even when the long term interests of the country concerned require it. When a people are infected by artificially whipped up hatred, those who are responsible for this state of mind become prisoners of it. They are no longer able to act in a statesmanlike manner which is imperative if the country's welfare is to be safeguarded."

In this connection, it is interesting to note that anti-American propaganda emanating from Egypt predates the decision of our Government to withhold financial support for the Aswan Dam project. Many people have been under the impression that the Nasser regime began to talk tough after that episode. The facts show that this is not the case. For example, the Cairo Radio (October 11, 1955) denounced the Mutual Security Program as a weapon by which the United States hoped to "penetrate" the Middle East. On October 14, 1955, the Cairo Radio proclaimed: "Justice and logic require that we now defend Russia and attack America, which has shown falsehood, deceit, and ill-will."

The outpourings of poisonous propaganda against the United States, the West and Israel continues unabated, particularly from Egypt and Syria. We cite below a sampling of this propaganda which dominates the newspapers and airways of these countries:

"It is being said that we peoples of the colonies should support Christianity and fight for the democracy of the Western states, threatened with being uprooted. 'Are not these things the cause of the oppression and servility afflicting us?'

"But which states are detonating atomic and hydrogen bombs? The Christian Western states, which are appealing to us to help them preserve their civilization. Whose civilization is responsible for discrimination among people because of color? The civilization of the Western states. 'These Western states, whose Christian religion eulogizes fraternal love and equality of human beings, are foremost in destroying the lives of their fellowmen in Japan, Kenya, Algeria, Port Said, Malaya, South Africa, and elsewhere. The same states were responsible for the Jews seizing the property and homeland of the people of Palestine.'" (Cairo Radio, 6-9-57.)

" 'The former Jordanian government which was toppled by the American imperialists with the help of the palace and its plotting group was loyal to these agreements.'

"The imperialists and their foster child Israel received these agreements calling for cooperation with hatred and anger. They continued working with their agents in Jordan, as they still work with their agents in Syria, until they were successful in temporarily altering the situation in Jordan. They destroyed the agreements of honor and glory, violated the principles of Arab policy, maltreated the people, and filled the prisons with thousands of detainees including officers, soldiers, and citizens." (Syrian newspaper AN-NASIR quoted by the Cairo Radio, 6-14-57.)

"Only a few million dollars have thrown a national government in Jordan out of office. Only a few million emboldened the Lebanese Premier and Foreign Minister. A few millions convinced Nuri as-Said to relinquish power after he had spread terrorism in every inch of Iraq to prepare the way for his masters for a new alliance.

"But do these leaders, these governments, and their supporters at least know what they are worth in the eyes of America? Did they ever consider how much Israel is receiving compared with what they take themselves, and what Israel is paying? They content themselves with the crumbs while Israel is receiving billions. They sacrifice their interests and the future of their countries. They sacrifice even their very existence and expose themselves to the wrath of their peoples, while Israel pays nothing unless realization of its aims happens to result in a disadvantage to it." (Egyptian newspaper ASH-SHAB, 6-17-57.)

The war-like character of this propaganda is obvious. "It goes beyond the normal practices of exhortation to patriotism as it whips the mind of the people into a state of blind hatred" (The U. N. and the Middle East Crisis). It creates a war psychosis.

Peace in the Middle East cannot be built in the path of this hurricane of hate. Therefore, it should be a cardinal task of western statesmanship to work for the curbing of this propaganda.

Though the Middle East situation is in a state of flux at the present time, there are signs that Nasser's game is beginning to lose its effectiveness. Even those Arab states which have provided an important base for Nasser's operations, are shying away from his domineering and grasping tactics (see p. 24.) It is certain that Nasser will try by all means to prevent the disintegration of his Pan-Arabic scheme and, therefore, one must anticipate that he will resort to desperate measures. The appearance of contingents of the Russian Navy in Middle Eastern waters and the delivery of Russian submarines to Cairo must be viewed in this light. New provocations against the State of Israel which has tirelessly sought a peaceful settlement, may be employed by Nasser so as to bolster his prestige.

Whatever Nasser's plans, however, they will fail if the United States acts with determination. In concert with our western allies, our Government should insist that the United Nations grapples once and for all with the fundamental issues involved in the crisis.

> ". . . Nasser has used his merely nuisance value more skillfully, by far, than Hitler or Mussolini ever did. Hitler possessed the enormous industrial and military power of Germany plus the discipline of the German people. Mussolini used to be called a sawdust Caesar, but at least he had the military power to conquer Ethiopia, Possibly even Ethiopia and demonstrably Israel could conquer Egypt today, and would gladly do so, if the Western powers whom Colonel Nasser thwarts would stand aside and give their permission.
> "The crowning irony of the business is that Colonel Nasser owes his security most to the country whose interests he most injures.
> "And yet it has been the United States which has protected Colonel Nasser in his adventures and which saved him from the logical consequences when Britain and France set out to bring him down. He survives today in his palace in Cairo by grace of Washington, and the UN, the Soviet Union, and Asian-African opinion. It takes real skill to parley such meager assets into such power. . . ."
> (Joseph C. Harsch, Christian Science Monitor, 3-27-57)

The Society is under no illusions with regard to the complexity and difficulties attending the situation in the Middle East. Yet, we are confident that the United Nations with the active support of the United States and all freedom-loving countries can achieve positive results. In this connection we advocate the adoption of a program resting on the following principles:

1. Unity of action in the Middle East with France and England;
2. Protection of the sovereignty of all Middle Eastern states, as envisioned by the Eisenhower Doctrine.
3. A fundamental Israeli-Arab settlement of outstanding differences through peaceful negotiations;
4. Insistence that all hate-inciting propaganda in the Middle East against the West cease and that Arab leaders publicly recognize the rights of the Israeli people to live a normal economic life with all of her neighbors;
5. A U. N. program to help the distressed Arab refugees and to contribute to the development of the resources of all the Middle Eastern countries.

If the actions of the United States are based on these principles of justice, we shall have safeguarded our own interests while, at the same time, given new faith and confidence in the United Nations as man's best hope for world peace.

WHO MAKES POLICY?

At the height of the Middle East crisis, Vice President Nixon hailed the Administration's break with Anglo-French policies as a "declaration of independence that had an electrifying effect throughout the world."

Seven months later, Secretary Dulles announced that "In anything which touched directly or indirectly upon Germany and its prospects for reunification, we would act only in the closest concert with Chancellor Adenauer."

The Nixon-Dulles pronunciamentos are essentially linked to each other and reflect the present basis of U. S. foreign policy.

The Chicago Tribune correspondent spelled out this shift reporting on the Nato Conference in May of this year, "Adenauer's talks today with Dulles added to the impression in some quarters that a Bonn-Washington tie-up had replaced the western big three of Britain, France, and the United States as the prime movers behind the Atlantic pact . . .

"Observers said that there was no sign of reviving consultations among the United States, Britain, and France, a common practice before Britain and France launched their ill-fated attack on Egypt.

"Even the Nato council statement last night reflected the image of a Washington-Bonn axis in the emphasis on German reunification, the observers said . . ." (5-5-57)

Let it not be forgotten that the change in U. S. foreign policy comes less than a dozen years after American GIs shed their blood with our British and French Allies in freedom's defense against German aggression.

The "Washington-Bonn Axis" received further support during Adenauer's latest visit to the U. S. A. As a short-term proposition his talks with the President and Secretary of State were summed up by the London Economist, "The aim of Dr. Adenauer's fifth visit to the U. S. was to give a decisive boost to his election campaign. It has been achieved." (6-1-57)

However, much more was accomplished by way of lasting value to Adenauer and the Germans. The radio commentator, Fulton J. Lewis, after praising Adenauer effusively as one of the "greatest political leaders of the century," declared that the conference in Washington gave West Germany "a guaranty of veto power" over American foreign policy.

That "veto power" culminates a trend that became discernible shortly after the end of World War II. Thus, by 1953 a German newspaper, the Deutsche Zeitung, was able to report a popular quip making the round in Germany, "Who makes Washington's European policy? Konrad Adenauer in Bonn."

The accuracy of this "jest" became painfully clear on the eve of the Summit meeting in Geneva in 1955. Adenauer was not officially present, but his voice in Allied councils was heard above all.

On the eve of the meeting, Business Week, 6-18-55, observed that in the whole question of disarmament and collective security "Adenauer will play a leading part" at Geneva. This authoritative publication further reported that the Chancellor "has been giving Eisenhower and then Dulles, MacMillan and Pinay, a fill-in on the negotiating position he wants the West to take."

The course of the Geneva Conference and the reports emanating therefrom indicated that Adenauer's hand determined many of the major moves of the Allied powers. When Anthony Eden put forth the idea of a demilitarized zone in Europe, Adenauer vigorously protested. Accordingly, the Allies dropped the plan. Adenauer's obstructive tactics contributed in no small part toward the inconclusiveness of the Geneva meeting.

This was precisely the precondition for his own journey to Moscow in September 1955 where he made his deals with the Russians. Though Adenauer had blocked serious consideration of the Eden plan, he welcomed the Russian proposal of November 17th, 1956, which, in principle at least, resembled Eden's idea. (N. Y. Times, 1-11-57)

Indeed, the Chancellor went further and called for the prohibition of the use of thermonuclear weapons which in the words of one U. S. official "is playing into the Russian hands." (N. Y. Times, 1-11-57)

In early May of this year, Adenauer told the press that his government would "gladly agree to (aerial) inspection." On May 21st, 1957, the Bulletin, published by the Bonn Government, elaborated on Adenauer's view, "The Federal Republic would agree to aerial inspection of the Federal territory, provided that the 'open-skies' system would also cover a corresponding area beyond the Iron Curtain; such an aerial inspection would be only the first step towards disarmament; therefore, the reunification of Germany is not considered by the Federal Government a prerequisite for trying out the 'open-skies' plan . . ."

It was only when disarmament negotiations in London showed promise that the Chancellor hurried to Washington. Once again it was the Adenauer of the Geneva days. He insisted that aerial inspection of Germany would have to wait until the Russians showed greater inclination to go forward on the reunification of Germany. As regards future meetings of the Big Four Foreign Ministers, Adenauer told the President that this might be permissible following the "conclusion of an initial disarmament agreement."

By blocking the aerial inspection plan, Adenauer had automatically scuttled the possibilities of Big Four negotiations even though, for the record, he said they were permissible.

As we go to press, Adenauer seems to have reversed himself again, intimating that he might approve aerial inspection for West Germany. Whether the new sommersault is due to electioneering considerations, or serves as a decoy to distract attention while he hamstrings disarmament negotiations by other means, remains to be seen.

In any event, the twists and turns in Adenauer's tactics have but one central objective, i.e., paralyze U. S. policy while leaving the Chancellor free to bargain with the Russians and to prove his usefulness to them.

This is the kind of diplomacy which has strong advocates in Germany today. In this connection, the Christian Science Monitor, 6-4-57, reported "with unanimity indicative of common origin much of the press here, June 4, advocated a more supple foreign policy for West Germany" . . . vis-a-vis the Soviets.

No matter what the rationalizations in defense of the "Washington-Bonn Axis," the Society, for one, cannot reconcile itself to a situation where vital aspects of our foreign policy are subject to the "nods and nays" of an alien politician representing a power which has twice challenged our security and independence within one generation.

Much has been said and written about the Status of Forces Treaties which, according to critics, deprive our servicemen abroad of their constitutional rights. Yet, hardly anyone has raised an eyebrow over the Adenauer-Eisenhower communique which placed an official stamp on Bonn's "veto" on foreign policies bearing upon the very security of our country.

". . . We need have no illusions about the difficulty of coming to an agreement among ourselves and with Russia which would limit and stabilize the competition in armaments. But this is the central and overriding task today as was the recovery of Western Europe ten years ago.

"The task is certainly not to disarm while the world is so divided. Perhaps it is not even to reduce substantially the present scale of armaments. The task is to bring the competition itself under international control before it becomes intolerably costly, and before the tensions of the nuclear testing and of the threat of nuclear war brings us to some breaking point.

(Walter Lippmann, N. Y. Herald Tribune, 6-18-57)

"The French newspaper 'Combat' writes as follows to the appointment of General Dr. Speidel to the command of Nato forces.

" 'Above all let us not be plagued by the childish argument, even more despicable than cynical, that Speidel was not a Nazi. If that were true then the affair Speidel would only be much worse. If, for a cause he did not believe in, he was responsible for having created martyrs, he would be a monster. We want to believe in Speidel's own interest that he was a Nazi.'

"Let it be said that such an 'exoneration' or 'de-nazification' is fairly bitter for a proven anti-Nazi!"

(Deutsche Wochenzeitung, 5-9-57)

"The blunt, inside fact of the disarmament talks is that Russia jumped and took over much of the U. S. disarmament plan while the United States was bickering over two things:

"1. Old Guard Republican prejudice against modern Republican Harold Stassen as the disarmament negotiator.

"2. The traditional Dulles determination to put Germany ahead of peace with Russia.

"The Secretary of State has always bowed from the waist when anything German approaches, dating from the days when, as attorney for New York banks he urged the American public to invest in now worthless German bonds. So when reelection-worried Adenauer demanded that German unification come before disarmament agreement, Dulles got jittery." . . .

DANGEROUS MARRIAGE

End of the Postwar World

By
WALTER LIPPMANN

The noted political analyst, Mr. Walter Lippmann, has achieved an international reputation for his brilliant commentaires on international Affairs. In this connection, the New Republic published a survey by Mr. Lippmann prepared originally as a Gideon D. Seymour Memorial lecture at the University of Minnesota. We have reprinted what we believe to be the highlights of Mr. Lippmann's analysis.

No one, I think, not even at the top of affairs and therefore on the inside of all of the available information, can as yet see clearly, can as yet see as a whole, where we really are and where we ought to go.

Everyone knows, of course, that we are in a time of rapid, radical and complicated change. Now, in itself, change is far from being a new experience for the generation to which I belong. We have lived amidst great events for which we were unprepared. We have become involved in wars which we expected to stay out of. We have hoped great things from victory and we have never seen a good peace. But now, if I may put it that way, the world is changed for Americans, not only in the degree of our involvement with the outer world, but in the very kind of our involvement with the rest of the world.

Throughout the 19th Century, and during the two world wars of this century, we have thought that we were living in one world. We have thought that this world had its political center in the western society, the society which consists of Europe and the Americas, the society to which we belong.

Even the most anti-imperialistic among us has assumed this. We have supposed that all the nations—the old ones who were breaking with the past, the new ones who were emerging from colonial status—that all the nations would have the same fundamental political ideals which we have, not because they are our ideals but because these ideals are universal.

The greatest and most fundamental change of our time is that this picture of ourselves and of our place in the world and of our role in the history of mankind is no longer valid. The culture, the ideology of the western society is no longer recognized as universal. It is challenged as it has not been challenged since Christendom was challenged by the expansion of Islam.

The one world which we always have taken for granted in our thinking has been succeeded by many worlds. We now live amidst these many worlds. They compete with one another, they coexist with one another. They trade with one another and, in varying degrees, they co-operate with one another. This change from one world to several worlds is a deep change. It is a change not only in what we think about our foreign policy but in the very way that we have to think about it. . . .

When the war ended in 1918, we hoped and believed that we had won a victory for the idea that the principles and ideals of the Western society are universal. Woodrow Wilson proclaimed a world order. But it was a world order based on our Western principles and ideals. Moreover, it was to be an order in which the nations of the North Atlantic region would continue to be the political leaders of mankind . . .

We now know that this was a brilliant illusion. Both France and Britain were profoundly weakened by their fearful losses in the First World War. As representatives of the Western philosophy, they were challenged as imperialists over all Asia and Africa. We did not know this in 1918. We took it for granted that with American military and financial help the worldwide predominance of the Atlantic community would continue.

In the Second World War, the role played by the United States was no longer that of an associated power bringing up the reinforcements and the reserves. But before Pearl Harbor, and before we actually entered the Second World War, we still thought of ourselves in terms of World War I. We used to talk, you may remember, about aiding the Allies to defend America. In fact, however, it was soon plain that we must take up the whole burden of the war in the Pacific, including the defense of Australia and of New Zealand. In Europe, the French Army had been defeated and Great Britain was under violent assault and strained to the limit. We had not only to supply the weapons and other economic necessities, but we had to raise a great army ourselves.

The difference between the two world wars is marked by the fact that in the second, as distinguished from the first, the supreme commanders on sea and on land were Americans. Nevertheless, until World War II ended, we could still believe—perhaps I should say that we tried still to believe—that when Britain and France and Western Europe recovered from the damages of the war, the North Atlantic community would still be the political center of the world.

I venture to believe that in the last analysis this was the underlying assumption in the minds of both Churchill and Roosevelt at the close of the war. They believed that with Britain and America acting as partners, they could handle Russia and have the deciding voice in the postwar settlement. They were mistaken. . . .

The greatest powers with which we have to concern ourselves are no longer in the North Atlantic region. They are in eastern Europe and in Asia. While the welfare of the Atlantic community is a close and vital interest of the United States, the Atlantic community is no longer the political center of the world. We are living amidst the decline

Britain as one of the leading powers of the world, and we find ourselves without a powerful ally in the face of the new powers of eastern Europe and of Asia and of Africa. . . .

As a result of the Yalta conference the world was divided into two great spheres of influence. In the one sphere, where the Soviet Union was supreme, Stalin tried to create a new Russian Empire. This empire was founded primarily on the power of the Red Army. In fact, the empire was the territory occupied by the Red army. Stalin's purpose was to make the people of Eastern Europe docile satellites or colonies of the new Russian Empire.

The other sphere comprised the rest of the world. It was an unorganized collection of old and new states. It consisted not only of Western Europe, Latin America, and the United States, but also of the old European empires, which then extended across North Africa, Egypt, and the Middle East through India and Southeast Asia to the Dutch Empire in Indonesia. In this sphere, the United States took the initiative in trying to make sure that the Soviet Union did not extend its empire.

As the principal military arm of the Communist sphere was the Red army, so the principal military arm of the non-Communist sphere was the United States Strategic Air Force equipped with atomic bombs.

This situation lasted until about 1950, as long as only the Soviets had an effective army and only the United States had the atomic bomb. In this uneasy balance of power, the Red army was supreme on the ground in all of Europe and Asia; the United States Strategic Air Force was supreme in the air over Europe and Asia. Each acted as a deterrent on the other. As against an invasion by the Red army, Western Europe was wholly defenseless. Yet the Red army did not and could not overrun Western Europe. It was contained because the Kremlin knew what the United States Air Force could do to Russian cities.

On the other hand, one might say vice versa, the United States was held in check by the Red army. Let me say a word about how we were held in check. The very highest American military authorities knew that if we struck at the Russian cities, the Red army, which was already in Eastern Europe, would overrun Western Europe. It would occupy the countries of Western Europe against which we could not use the atomic bomb, countries such as Western Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and France. When the Red army did that it would destroy the existing governments. It would liquidate the existing leaders in all classes and, before it could be forced to retire, it would probably destroy the big cities and the industrial plants of Western Europe.

This was the postwar stalemate, the Red army as against the atomic bomb. . . .

It was when he realized this, that President Eisenhower made his historic declaration that there is now no alternative to peace. The Russians had also realized what the revolution in military weapons meant. This common realization in Moscow and Washington led to the famous meeting at the summit, which took place in Geneva a year and a half ago, in July of 1955. At that meeting, Russia and the United States acknowledged publicly to each other and before the ". . . Contrary to widespread assumptions in the United Nations and in Washington, the issue is not originally the result of Israel's armed invasion of Egypt. The issue was raised by Egypt's long-standing insistence on maintaining a 'state of war' with Israel and implementing it by both guerrilla raids and a double blockade in the Suez Canal and the Strait of Tiran. It was this Egyptian maintenance of a 'state of war' and the exercise of belligerent rights which Egypt derives therefrom that resulted in Israel's military counter-action. Egypt has made no public move or promise to end the 'state of war' or to renounce the belligerent rights.

"The Egyptian claim to belligerent rights under its self-proclaimed 'state of war' against another United Nations member is both absurd and illegal. It is ruled out not only by the Charter, which bars the use or threat of force in settling international disputes, but also by the armistice agreement of 1949, which Secretary General Hammarskjold interprets as a virtual nonaggression pact. It was specifically rejected by the Security Council in 1951, when it denied Egypt any belligerent blockade rights. . . .

"In these circumstances it would seem that the first duty of the United Nations should be to call on Egypt to end the 'state of war' and renounce its claim to belligerent rights as a first condition of peace in the Middle East. . . ."

world that with the advent of the new weapons they could not, they would not, they dared not contemplate war.

At the time of the Geneva meeting, we were all aware that, beyond these mutual declarations against war, there were no serious agreements reached, or even brought any nearer, on any of the great practical issues of the time—on, for example, the reunification of the two Germanies, on the problem of the status of the satellites in Eastern Europe, on the future of the Middle East.

There is no way of telling whether or not the opportunity existed to go on from Geneva to settlements of some of these problems. If the opportunity existed, it was missed. On our side, the President fell ill and was unable for some time to take the initiative in foreign affairs. On the other side, the Russians stood pat and were unyielding. We do not know what might have been. But what has actually happened is that while we have come no nearer to settlements in Europe, in the Middle East and in the Far East, there has been a rapid disintegration of empires and of alliances.

We can see what has happened to the French in North Africa and the British in the Middle East. We know from what has happened in Poland and in Hungary that the Soviet empire in eastern Europe is undermined, and that the Soviet military system, which is known as the Warsaw Pact, is profoundly affected. We know that if NATO is going to survive, it is going to have a very different future from what we expected.

A few months ago, at the end of October, the course of events, which I have been describing, burst into violence. It is a remarkable fact, which historians will long be studying and trying to explain, that the explosion in Hungary and the explosion in Egypt took place at approximately the same time. The fact that the two explosions came so very close together may not have been a mere accident. It may well be that the Israeli Government decided to strike when it saw that the Soviet Union was deeply entangled by the rebellion in Hungary. But the two explosions would not have happened if both in Eastern Europe and in the Middle East the situation had not become explosive. These two explosions marked the disintegration of the postwar world. . . .

There will remain the fundamental stalemate between the Soviet Union and the United States, the stalemate which was recognized by the President and the Soviet leaders at Geneva in 1955.

In all probability, neither of the superpowers will decide deliberately to make war against the other. On the other hand, both in Europe and in the Middle East, there are very grave issues which, if they cannot be settled by negotiation, may burst into violence. They may become uncontrollable, and they could involve Russia and America in a war they are both trying to avoid. . . .

The supreme question is whether we can, by a great effort of statesmanship, negotiate a settlement which averts these dangers. I am not saying that we can. But at least one can imagine such a settlement. It will have to be a settlement negotiated by the Western Powers with the Soviet Union and ratified by the two Germanies. It will have to provide for the reunification of the two Germanies. It will have to provide for the gradual but nevertheless definite evacuation of the European Continent up to the Soviet frontier by the Red Army in the east, and by the British and American Armies in the west. Only in this way can Poland, Hungary, and the other satellites be liberated.

But that will not be enough. The withdrawal of the armies, the unification of Germany, the liberation of the satellites will be possible, will be conceivable—only if we can construct by negotiation an all-European security system which is underwritten by the Soviet Union and the United States. It will have to be a sytsem which guarantees the European nations among themselves, and particularly against a revived and reunited Germany. It will have to be a system which guarantees all of Europe against Russia, and it will have to be one which guarantees Russia against Europe. Within such a European system there ought to develop an all-European economy, and beyond that—on the far horizons of hope—the prospect of a European political confederation.

In my view the issue of war and peace will be decided primarily in Europe, and, so to speak, along the line of Iron Curtain. The greatest question in the world is whether Europe can cease to be divided and can become united by negotiation and peaceable means.

I would go so far as to say that if we could engage the Russians in a serious negotiation which looked to a general European settlement, the problem of the Middle East would become—I won't say soluble—but manageable. I say this because Russia is not vitally interested in the Middle East. She does not need the oil, and she cannot be invaded from the Middle East. Russia is, however, vitally interested in Europe, particularly in Germany and in Poland, and it is there in Europe that we must make a settlement or live in continual danger of a gigantic war.

When I look into the future I think of this country as having two great missions to perform. The one is to bring about the European settlement I have just been describing. On this, as I have just said, depends the issue of peace or war. From such a settlement would come a new Europe, a Europe which had lost its empires overseas but had found a new strength, security, and prosperity in its own unity. Our other mission is, I firmly believe, to work out a new relationship between the Western nations and the newly emancipated peoples of Africa and Asia. The imperial and colonial age is over. The age which is to follow is only in its dim beginnings, and it is our mission to play a leading part in working out the terms on which the peoples of the East and the peoples of the West can live side by side in confidence, in security, and in mutual respect.

"An historic incident occurs this week. The Nato council gathers in Bonn for its first meeting in Germany.

"The event illustrates the ominous extent to which Germany has penetrated Nato. Already a German officer, General Speidel, commands the Western allies' armies.

"Germany is rearming even faster after Hitler's war than she did after the Kaiser's. German divisions are multiplying. The Luftwaffe is re-forming with jets. In Britain these developments rouse deep misgivings.

"The rearming of Germany is a foolhardy policy. It should never have been sanctioned."

"Mein Kampf" Among Arabs *

Arabic editions of Hitler's book "Mein Kampf"—"Kifari"—were found among the personal possessions of some Egyptian officers captured by the Israelis during the Sinai campaign. These editions described (e.g., in the Kölnische Rundschau, 25-11-56) as "nine-volume kitbag editions," were published over a number of years . . .

The contents are not only extracts from the book but illustrations from Hitler's life and the glamorous Nazi Party Rallies at Nuremberg.

Hitler's book was brought to Arab notice for the first time in 1934 when the Iraqi periodical The Arab World, Bagdad, printed extracts in instalments. Two years later an Arabic version was available there, and towards the end of 1938 another version, translated by Ali Mohammed Mahbub, appeared in Cairo (Commercial Publishing House. 250 pp.), with the author's full length portrait presented on the cover as "the strongest man in the world . . ."

Extolling Nazi "Anti-Communism"

Apart from "Mein Kampf," Nazi ideas were spread among Arabs as early as 1934 in a eulogistic biography of Hitler published in Cairo: "Adolf Hitler, National Socialist Leader. The Jewish Question" (Egyptian Books Publishing Co. 1934. 166 pp.). The author, Ahmad Mahmoud Sadati, made up his 14 chapters almost entirely of German Nazi literature unaided by any first-hand knowledge of his own or other unbiased evidence. His sources which he faithfully listed at the beginning, included, in addition to "Mein Kampf," Goering's "Germany Reborn"; "Wie Adolf Hitler der Führer wurde," by Czech-Jochberg; "Die Juden," by Gottfried Feder; "Bewaffneter Aufstand (Der Kommunismus in Deutschland)," by Adolf Ehrt, also "Nazi Germany Explained," by Vernon Bartlett . . .

"Nasser, the Hitler of the Arab World"

In its regular column of extracts from the international press, Die Welt, Hamburg, 12-10-56, reprints from the not otherwise widely known "organ of the Moslem Brotherhood" at Damascus, Mannar, a passage entitled "Praise for Hitler." Commenting on the fact that Colonel Nasser is sometimes called in Britain and France "the Hitler of the Arab World," Mannar is quoted as having said: "It must not be forgotten that, in contrast to Europe, Hitler occupies a respected place in the Arab world. His name arouses in the hearts of our movement sympathy and enthusiasm. These sentiments are due not to his aggressiveness and greed for power but to the fact that he beat down our traditional enemies, Britain and France. The whole Arab world was pleased at the time when France was routed by the Nazis; it was regarded as retribution for the imperialist crimes which the French still keep committing.

"If this is the way we feel about Hitler, the Nazi who is no blood relation of ours, how much more must we support a Leader who has risen from among the Arabs themselves and is inflicting defeat after defeat on the Western Powers, our eternal enemies? Blessed be the Arab people who succeeded in producing, from its own midst, a 'Hitler' who has shown that the Arab nation is entitled to an honourable place in the family of nations and that its sovereignty and freedom must be recognised. The British and French journalists are mistaken if they think they can hurt our feelings by calling Nasser 'Hitler of the Arab world.' On the contrary, that title fills our heart with pride. Long live Hitler the Nazi who shot his arrows into the heart of our enemies; long live the Hitler of the Arab world who opened to his people the gates to glory and eternity!"

This passage from the journal of the Moslem Brotherhood at Damascus, quoted by Die Welt, was prominently reprinted in the monthly magazine of the former Waffen-SS members, Wiking-Ruf, November 1956.

". . . As the days go by, I wish more and more that the U. S. would make the effort to come to an agreement with the Soviet Union by which neither of these two countries would provide any arms to Near Eastern countries.

"This would remove all question of attempts on either side to control these nations, and we could leave the inspection to the UN forces so that we would be sure no arms were coming in surreptitiously.

"These nations could then proceed to receive economic aid from either the Soviet Union or the U. S. for projects to improve the standard of living of the people of their countries. . . ."

Rosen in The Albany Times-Union

From Dachau to Cairo

The Middle East crisis is an extremely complicated problem made all the more difficult by outside influences including the nefarious activities of Soviet agents. However, it is a fact that German influences have also been operating in this area with considerable effectiveness. Pan-Germans and former Nazis have gained important positions in a number of Middle Eastern states, particularly Egypt. Prevent World War III has published detailed accounts of this development in the Nos. 41 and 47 issues. Additional information on the role of former Nazis in the Nasser Government is contained in an exclusive report published by the National Jewish Monthly (February 1957). These disclosures deserve to be pondered by all liberty-loving Americans and it is with this in mind that we have reprinted the report.

The violent actions taken by Nasser's government against British, French and stateless Jews resident in Egypt, the confiscation of their property, and their deportation on from 9 to 72 hours' notice, have provided the press with a flood of news which overshadowed the ominous fate that looms over the native Egyptian Jewish community of more than 10,000 individuals.

This ancient Jewish community is being systematically pauperized, maltreated, and interned together with common criminals in unspeakable places of detention. Together with the remainder of Egyptian Jews, they are left at the mercy of the State Security Cadre (SSC), which seems to be as precise a copy of the German Nazi Sicherheitsdienst as Egyptian inexactitude permits. This unit is the military junta's forceful arm which is responsible for Egypt's actions and policies to a far greater extent than is generally known.

The Commander-in-Chief of the SSC is Lt. Col. Al Nacher, formerly SS-Grossaktionsleiter Leopold Gleim, who was the Commander-in-Chief of the Nazi government's SD-Geheimgarde.

Addressing a luncheon in Cairo given in his honor by the representatives of the League for (East) German-Arab Brotherhood (Al-akhwah al-Almaniyah l'Arabiyah, i.e., Deutsch-Arabischer Bruderschaftsverband) on December 17, 1956—Gleim frankly pointed out the significance of the SSC as the "backbone of Egypt's protective apparatus against the aggressive elements of Zionism and Imperialism." He thanked the League for its "vast help extended to this young State—a most significant contribution to the mutual efforts in the strengthening and stabilizing of Germano-Arabic friendship and relations."

Later on, during more intimate talks with members of the Bruderschaft—conducted in Hochdeutsch and made gemutlich by cigars, Bourbon, and coffee—Gleim gave an outline of his unit's short history and structure. This outline, when pieced together with additional facts on hand and the already known procedures of the Cadre's activities, sketches a tolerably clear picture of the Egyptian version of Nazism, which found in Egypt ideal conditions for its recrudescence.

The plan for the SSC was drawn up by "several technical advisers of German origin," approved by the Ministry of Interior. The Cadre headquarters were set up in Cairo, and its administration handed over to the 6,249 "arabized" Nazis presently in Egypt (aided by perhaps 70,000 Egyptians). According to Gleim, the unit consists of the following departments:

A: The Public Relations Department. (PR-Dpt.)

The executive positions in this section are entirely manned by Germans who are holding Arab passports. The PR-Dpt. is headed by SS-Gruppenleiter Moser, a Sudeten German who has now assumed the name of Hussa Nalisman. His right-hand man is SA-Gruppenleiter Buble, now arabized into Amman.

The propaganda machine operates with German precision, according to the Goebbels-Stuermer pattern. Its main target for attacks is, of course, the Jews. Egyptian youth has been responding enthusiastically to this propaganda.

The PR-Dpt. has branches in Berlin (East and West), Vienna, Stockholm, Helsinki, Rome, Milan and Bordeaux; it commands special squads of vans with loudspeakers, which cruise throughout Egypt constantly inciting against American, British, French, Imperialistic or Zionist Jews—the adjective changing with the broadcaster's mood; and it also owns an independent broadcasting station which assiduously cultivates the entire Arab world.

A flood of anti-Semitic literature is being published and distributed in the Middle East and Europe. Egypt's recent bestseller, however, was the new, popular edition of "Kefahi," the Arabic translation of Hitler's "Mein Kampf." This is an abridged, illustrated version which contains photo-reproductions beginning with Hitler's picture as a corporal in Hindenburg's army and up to his cock-posing as the Fuehrer.

The complete and unabridged version of "Mein Kampf" was first translated into Arabic in 1951 by the Syrian journalist, author, and owner of the Beirut Printing & Publishing House, Louis al-Haj, formerly Luis Heiden, director of Die Reichsdeutsche Presseagentur, Berlin.

Vulgar, colorful posters featuring the Israeli soldier as a bearded villain who bayonets an Egyptian baby, are blooming in many Egyptian towns. These posters urge the people of Egypt to rise in Jihad—the Holy War—against "the Zionist threat to Islam."

Egyptian youth is being assiduously educated for militarism. One of the outstanding examples of this campaign is the target-tent pitched opposite the SSC-HQ in Cairo's Liberty Square, where schoolboys are given an interest in usage of arms.

The PR-Dpt. also has a very special branch: the Youth Club of the Deutsch-Arabischer Bruderschaftsverband. Twice weekly this Club has a closed session, when many Egyptian youngsters are sworn in by the Club's chairman, Hussa Nalisman. This requires only one more comment: Colonel Abdul Nasser is the Honorary President of the Club, and had been sworn in as member No. 3.

B: The Economic Department. (EC-Dpt.)

The EC-Dpt., now so strongly associated with Jewish affairs, is a close enough translation of the SS-Wirtschaftsamt, and it operates on a similar basis. This Department was founded on February 2, 1954; it controls the SSC treasury, which is independent of the Government's Exchequer. Apart from the annual allowance granted to the SSC from the General Defense Budget, this treasury absorbs a considerable income from products of prison workshops throughout Egypt.

The archives of the EC-Dpt. have a "Jewish Section" with a register of all Jewish property in Egypt. It contains up-to-date information on this vital subject, which has now become a major source of revenue to the SSC treasury. Upon the expulsion of thousands of foreign and stateless Jews from Egypt, the EC-Dpt. cashed in 14 million Egyptian Pounds in currency, policies, and securities, and 27 million Pounds of real property and assets abandoned by the Jewish deportees. It is worthwhile noting that the majority of deported Jews had been very rich; this explains why there was no mass deportation of all foreign and stateless Jews, and why individual expulsion warrants were issued. The poorer stateless Jews have been left over, "to be dealt with later on"—as Colonel Abd-al-Qadir Hatem explained.

Colonel Hatem, of the EC-Dpt., declared that "not a single piaster or brick has been confiscated, as the Zionist lies alleged. We have documentary proof that property and currency abandoned by people who had to leave Egypt were voluntarily assigned to the administration of the EC-Dpt."

Another interesting branch of the EC-Dpt. is the Public Sales Center in Cairo. Whatever remained in the residences which the Jewish deportees "voluntarily" assigned to the administration of the EC-Dpt.—furniture, clothes, paintings, refrigerators, radios, entire libraries, etc.—is being auctioned off. It brings to the SS treasury weekly profits ranging from 500 to 3,000 Egyptian Pounds.

C: Secret State Police

That name rings a bell somewhere. If translated into German it would be Geheime Staats Polizei; and if abbreviated: Ge-Sta-Po. Its duties are now carried out by Army intelligence.

The major section of this Department is the center of the Egyptian Intelligence Service. Next to it is a section headed by Lt. Col. Ben Salem, former SS-Bannfuehrer Bernard Bender, who owing to his knowledge of the Yiddish language, was during the war Chief of the Gestapo Special Branch for detection of Jewish underground movements in Poland and Russia, and who is now playing an important role in Egypt's "economic and political administration." He is also the liaison between the Secret State Police and the EC-Dpt.

Nevertheless Lt. Col. Ben Salem is a very modest man, and while entertaining some of the young East-German visitors he declared "I never wear a uniform because it makes one look more important than he really is." This is a moot matter, because in addition to all his known and unknown tasks, humble Ben Salem is also Chief of the Interrogation Center of the SSC, better known to the Egyptions and to the Egyptian Jews in particular as "The Floating Hell."

The Floating Hell is an old, 12,000-ton cargo vessel, the former Italian "Marinajo Rosso," which has been converted into a floating prison of 80 cells where, according to Ben Salem, "only cases of special interest" are being held. The sole "practical device for bringing out the truth" which he was prepared to exhibit, was the recording center in the vessel's former radio cabin, from which a network of hidden microphones reaches all the cells. Thus, every word uttered during the interrogations or at intervals, while prisoners are together, is recorded.

The recording center is operated by two men only: tight-lipped Sergei Klinikin from Odessa; and his subordinate, Alexei Morganoff, a true Moscovite with an enchanting smile, huge feet, and a Swiss watch. Both have served under Ben Salem ever since General Vlassoff changed flags. Only . . . that was about all one could get out of them.

The Floating Hell performed a great service for Egypt by helping the famous Jewish banker, Mr. Elie Politi, succumb there to the interrogation methods, and sign a document that he had voluntarily assigned 112,000 Pounds—all he possessed. The Floating Hell was also where Lt. Col. Ben Salem had been "most delighted to be able personally to handle the affairs of an Egyptian publisher, a Jew named Mr. Salama."

(Late news dispatches indicated that their confiscated businesses have been restored to a small number of Jews in Egypt—Editor.)

Early in November the first phase of Salem's "Solution of the Jewish-Zionist Problem" began to take shape:

Conducting 3,000 men of the SSC Executive Force (municipal police units, plainclothes men, and army squads), SS-Grossaktionsleiter Gleim personally supervised the combing of the Cairo and Alexandria rural districts, throughout the duration of the curfew. This action resulted in the seizure of 1,711 native Jews—men, women and children—inclusive of the six Jewish fellahin families of Mit Ghammar, who are the last survivors of a Jewish community believed to have lived there since 90 B.C.E.

During this action, looting, rapine, and eight killings were reported and confirmed. The officers in charge "regretted the incident which resulted due to the refusal of the subjects to follow instructions."

These captives have been classified as "Prisoners Category Alif (A)" and concentrated in the southern wing of the famous French-built prison, Des Barrages, in Cairo. No charges were made against them, but on the way to prison, all captives (exclusive of pregnant women and mothers of children below the age of 10) were handcuffed. The northern wing of Des Barrages is packed with "potential deportees" i.e., Jews who have no Egyptian nationality.

The sanitary conditions in which those prisoners are being held should be of speical interest to those members of the UN and of the International Red Cross who, during interviews with foreign correspondents in Cairo, denied any knowledge of such conditions or of the above-mentioned arrests.

Cells intended for 10 persons presently shelter 30; and Cell No. 73 is packed with 38 male Jewish prisoners "because they have their own water-closet," as explained by the Chief Warden, Hadji Mustaffa Ibn-Aziz, who is very friendly but responsive to bakshish only so far as "matters of non-political nature are concerned, because now-a-days politics are dangerous."

The male prisoners are not allowed out of their cells. Their sole opportunity to breathe some fresh air is while they carry out the waterbuckets—a task eagerly done every morning in rotation by a couple of prisoners—and while fetching food and water.

The daily rations consist of 500 grams of Pittah-bread and two litres of soup per head. Water (two litres per head) is being distributed only once daily, in the morning, and the male prisoners must drink it all at once, because they are not permitted to keep any containers in their cells.

Women Are Treated Better

The female prisoners are granted 20 minutes a day to walk in the prison courtyard, and mothers may, in addition to that, spend half an hour daily with their children, who have been accommodated very comfortably in the former recreation hall for prison personnel. Mothers with babies up to the age of three are kept in the prison dispensary and have beds to sleep on. The babies are being provided with adequate and appropriate food and with daily rations of fresh milk.

The 18,000 Alexandria Jews (among them some 6,000 natives) classified as "Category Ba (B)" suffered an attack which completely crushed their economic life. Alexandria's Military Governor, Col. Husseini, imposed under Security Act penalties, a permanent curfew which lasts from 5 p.m. to 9 a.m., and from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. The rest of the time is left for purchase of food which is usually bought with funds obtained through the sale of jewelry or other personal assets, because by order of the SSC. EC-Dpt., 93 percent of every Jewish bank account has been blocked "until the position of Category Ba is clarified."

Colonel Hatem elucidated this hazy statement as follows: "The Alexandria Jews are known to have strong connections with Israel; but since we cannot bring them to justice without concrete proof and simultaneously cannot let them endanger the State Security by letting them carry on with their underground activities, we are forced to take some slight precautions.

These are the "slight" precautions:

All Arab enterprises have dismissed their Jewish employees without any compensation whatsoever—as per government orders.

Most Jewish enterprises, including the Cicurel Stores and down to small shops, were taken over and only those few Jews who have inter-married were permitted to continue, but they closed their shops "voluntarily" because they were picketed by the Moslem Brotherhood and their show-windows were stoned. Any customers who attempted to enter Jewish shops were assaulted.

All Jewish professionals in Alexandria (with the exception of a few dentists) have been forbidden to practice. 710 prominent Jewish personalities, including a relative of Mrs. Mendes-France, Mr. Guy Cicurel, former President of the Maccabi, and Mr. E. Levy, President of Egypt's Stock Exchange Board, as well as most of the Jewish doctors, have been arrested. According to rumors, they will be tried on charges of treason in a closed session of the Supreme Military Court.

The Cairo Jewish community, however, is undergoing an even greater crisis:

All the Jewish schools have been closed, all communal activities paralyzed. The Jewish hospital has been taken over by Arab authorities and all Jewish personnel and patients, regardless of their condition, were ejected on one hour's notice. Relatives of some of the more serious cases applied for their admission to Arab hospitals, but met with refusal.

Five hundred Cairo Jewish men have been indefinitely interned in the English Grammar School, which was closed down and converted into a detention center with the outbreak of the Suez Canal crisis. Their wives and children, totalling 622, are held captive and 456 Jewish men, women and children are confined in the Hadrah Prison. 830 Cairo Jews are being held in the ruins of Qalat al-Qahira, outside the City. Three of these prisoners were "shot while attempting to escape"—the old Nazi gimmick. It was, however, not explained how they happened to be shot inside the dead-end underground passage of the ruins where six mutilated bodies of Jewish girls were also found.

"This Is Only the First Phase"

Being literally under house-arrest, imposed on them by the curfew, the remaining Cairo Jews are subjected to frequent raids of the Moslem Brotherhood. And over all this looms Nasser's State Security Cadre with its iron grip. Its commander, SS-Grossaktionsleiter Gleim, smilingly declared in front of his young German visitors that "this is only the first phase."

It can therefore be easily guessed that the "Second Phase" will be the completion of Ben Salem's "Solution of the Jewish-Zionist problem within territories of Sovereign Egypt"—a work which is now being implemented through five newly-established concentration camps: the Heliopolis Fortress, destined to absorb 2,000 internees; the Gizeb Barracks, which served during World War II as a P. O. W. camp, able to shelter 10,000 prisoners; two former army training centers, the Mustaffa Hanun-Pasha Barracks near Almaza City, originally built for 16,000 men, and the Borg al-Arab Barracks near Alexandria, which once sheltered two divisions of recruits.

A Grim Concentration Camp

The most threatening of all, however, is the fifth concentration camp: the Samarra Baracks in the Suheilla region of the desert, 200 miles west of Cairo. This camp, only recently vacated by the 3rd Regiment of the Egyptian Liberation Army (the unit which, commanded by Col. Nasser in 1948, withstood the Israeli attacks on Faluja) is now being converted at a cost of 17,000 Egyptian Pounds, and patterned on photo-copies of the original plan of the infamous Nazi "Medizinisches Versuchlager Mannerheime bei Dachau," otherwise known as "Block 10," where hundreds of Jewish girls were sterilized. The photo-copies of the original plan of this camp were supplied to the SSC by Karl Clauberg's direct superior, SS-Hauptstabsarzt Heinrich Willermann, presently "arabized" into Lt. Col. Naam Fahum, who is now in charge of converting the Samarra Barracks.

The stateless and foreign Jews still in Egypt are hoping, probably against hope, that the UN will take them under its protective wings. Should, however, the UN decide otherwise, they will respond to Nasser's "encouragement" and leave Egypt—impoverished, destitute, but alive.

But not the native Jews. They have tried to leave Egypt, but Nasser's government refused most of them exit visas, and most of the foreign consulates refused entrance visas as well as racial asylum—thus leaving this ancient and once flourishing community in the sinister grip of Nasser's legislative paradox.

Egyptian law imposes on them all its restrictions but deprives them of any rights or protection "within Sovereign Egypt"—thus preventing any foreign intervention on their behalf, except for . . . the UN, maybe?

Maybe.

Because—in spite of the Cadre's strict censorship on publication of all events in Egypt and on news leaving the country—the UN has ample evidence and information on what is going on there. Why, then, its reticence? Why the passive attitude towards Nasser's ruthless violation of human rights? The UN must release the facts and warn the world of what Nasser is up to, so that appropriate measures can be taken. Because—although economically ruined, interned, maltreated, and humiliated—it is not too late yet. Egyptian Jewry is still alive.

". . . When Egypt, in clear violation of her commitments and in defiance of the United Nations, excluded from the Suez Canal all shipping that served Israel, we did not bring pressure to bear on her. On the contrary, we continued to give her economic and military assistance, which we planned to increase. When Egypt conducted armed raids into Israeli territory and prepared for the day when she might conquer Israel, we refrained from urging enforcement actions that would have set all Asia against us. Here enforcement was not virtually impossible, as in the case of Hungary, but it was inexpedient.

"In the light of these facts is it proper to say that, in forcing the Anglo-French retreat, we were simply applying to our European friends a policy of enforcement which we had theretofore been applying to our opponents and to the nations of Asia? Or would it be more accurate to say that we could afford to enforce the law on our friends and clients, who were at our mercy—that we might even profit in Asia by doing so—while we could not afford to enforce it against the Soviet Union in Hungary, and the price of enforcing it against the uncommitted peoples of Asia would be higher than we found it expedient to pay? . . ."

"Let Adenauer See to Politics..."

While an outraged world focussed attention on the Russian tanks crushing the Hungarian revolt, a group of German industrialists were enjoying the sights in Moscow. Of course, the West German Government had deplored the Soviet action. It is also noteworthy that Chancellor Adenauer's Government "was profoundly disturbed" over U. S. "hesitation" during the crisis (New York Times, 11-2-56). According to the New York Times, a senior official in the Bonn Government (unidentified) declared that the prestige of the U. S. "hangs in balance." He warned that if Washington pursued a do nothing policy in Hungary and permitted the Stalinist tyranny to triumph, the moral capital of the U. S. in Germany "will be worth nothing."

Bonn's "holy anger" and the visit of the industrialists to Moscow may best be understood not as a contradiction but rather as a division of labor. Berthold Beitz, Krupp's General Manager, put it succinctly: "I am a businessman, so what do I care about politics? Let Adenauer see to politics, and let him leave me do my job. All embargo lists (on trade with the Soviet bloc) should be abolished immediately."

The Eastern Contact

The "tourists" in Moscow representing some of the largest industrial aggregates including Krupp, Mannesmann, Siemens, AEG, Demag and Gutehoffnungshütte, were warmly received by the Soviet Minister for Heavy Industry. Their travels were quite extensive ranging from a visit to Moscow's industrial and agricultural exhibition to the factories and industries of the Ukraine and the Urals. Judging from subsequent developments, it appears that their sojourn in Soviet Russia has created promising opportunities for both, the Germans and the Russians. This is not to say that the visit of the German industrialists represented a radical shift in Soviet-German relations. It would be more accurate to say that the visit added a powerful stimulus to contacts which have steadily improved over a number of years.

In August 1952 leading spokesmen for the Ruhr conferred secretly with associates of Soviet Deputy Prime Minister Mikoyan in Copenhagen. The meeting was called at West German initiative with the prior knowledge of the Bonn Government. It took place only 3 months after the Allies had drawn up the Contractual Agreement which gave West Germany a free hand in her foreign relations.

The meeting remained a closely guarded secret until former Foreign Minister Molotov let the cat out of the bag during a Big Four meeting in Berlin in 1954. Commenting on this sensational disclosure the Christian Science Monitor (4-17-54) noted that talks between Moscow and West German industrialists had "been going on for about 3 years."

One year after the secret get-together in Copenhagen, Chancellor Adenauer made a public statement on Soviet-German relations which would be interpreted as a followup of that meeting. As reported in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (7-7-53) the Chancellor urged the strengthening of economic ties between West Germany and the Soviets and expressed confidence that this would facilitate closer political understanding. "Already today the states of the European Schuman plan have formed a market of 157 million people. Thus from the point of view of the Russian economy these countries represent a highly interesting trade partner. Years ago there was a time when the economy of Germany and Russia complemented one another in a magnificent way. The economy of an integrated Europe, including Germany, could do vastly more. The greater the economic integration (between Western Europe and Russia), the greater the political security."

Since then other German political leaders have repeated the Adenauer thesis. As recently as February 10, 1956, Foreign Minister von Brentano told the U. S. News & World Report: "Without doubt the economies of both countries (Russia and Germany) could supplement each other in a most useful manner."

Quite understandably the delicate nature of Soviet-German relations has taxed the ingenuity and finesse of German officialdom. Bonn is inclined to discourage publicity about this side of its diplomacy since it could place the Chancellor, "God's gift to the West," in an embarrassing light. Consequently, the general line passed down to those who write about this touchy subject, may be summed up in these words: "The less said, the better." It was with this dictum in mind that Adenauer and his associates tried to deflate the importance of his trip to Moscow in 1955.

At a press conference in July of that year, Herr von Brentano assured reporters that Adenauer would remain steadfastly loyal to the West regardless of the impending talks with the Kremlin. Indeed, he declared, the Chancellor would not even think of going to Moscow if he felt there was no hope of altering the Russian stand on German unification.

Though Adenauer has shown a marked talent for talking one way to Moscow and another to Washington, this fact does not seem to have registered among our top policy makers. Prior to his trip to Moscow he conferred at length in Washington and told our experts that he would not agree to the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Kremlin. He said he was going to talk tough and would insist that there could be no exchange of ambassadors until substantial progress had been made on the problem of German unity. It was only after his policy of toughness was transformed into a posture of meekness that U. S. policy makers showed the first signs of shock. It has always been surprising to us that Washington should have been taken aback by the results of the Bulganin-Adenauer get-together. After all, as early as May 7, 1954, the Chancellor specifically stated to his own people that diplomatic relations between West Germany and the Soviet Union "might be established in the not too far future." He said by way of explanation. "Our trade with the Soviets has been intensified lately." Thus, Adenauer consistent with his previous statement in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, had given clear indication of what he was up to. However Washington in 1955 preferred to believe in the stories which Adenauer had handed out for American consumption.

Washington's chagrin over the diplomatic rapproachment between the Kremlin and Bonn was heightened still further when the U. S. Ambassador to Moscow Charles E. Bohlen reported that negotiations between Adenauer and Bulganin had been decisively in Moscow's favor. According to Drew Pearson (10-1-55) Bohlen reported to the State Department that Adenauer "had been virtually putty in Russian hands, and warned that the U. S. could not trust the West Germans to stand up against the Kremlin in the future." As if to anticipate criticisms of his dealing with Moscow, Chancellor Adenauer told the press just before departing from Russia, "I swear that I made no secret agreement with the Russians."

Fact and Fiction

In the maze of diplomatic maneuvering and intrigue, it is not easy to separate fact from fiction. The passage of time, however, does help to clear the air. Thus, in October, 1956, the Russians sent a long note to the West German Government on the problem of unification. The Kremlin complained that Bonn was not "endeavoring to solve on the basis of mutual understanding questions that have not been settled and which interest both sides and obviously contradicts the agreements made between our governments during the Moscow negotiations in the year 1955." While the note did not reveal all of the specific agreements which were supposed to have been reached between the two governments, it made reference to "firm agreement on the question of the development of trade . . ." It is significant, we think, that Adenauer has never denied that he reached such an understanding with the Russians. On the contrary, the information which has been published relative to this issue, points to the fact that the Germans no less than their Russian counterparts are very much interested in an agreement.

Shortly after the Russians had sent their note of complaint to Bonn, the new Soviet Ambassador to West Germany, Andrei A. Smirnov, received a cordial welcome from leading German officials. The New York Times (10-26-56) reported: "The West German Government is eager to make use of Mr. Smirnov's presence here . . . The official policy now is to 'activate' Soviet-West German relations in the hope that bit by bit the basis for serious negotiations on German reunification can be established." The Times referred to the first round discussions between the Soviet Ambassador and the Bonn Foreign Office which would include "an improvement of trade relations" and "a cultural and scientific exchange."

"Love Notes" and the Fair

As the new year was ushered in, the eagerness of the Bonn Government to talk about trade with the Soviets grew considerably. The Frankfurter Rundschau (1-5-57) reported that the West German Government "no longer takes a negative attitude to the conclusion of a trade agreement between the Federal Republic and Soviet Russia." A spokesman for the Government, according to the newspaper, declared that Chancellor Adenauer "after his talks with Soviet Ambassador Smirnow shortly before Christmas seemed fully agreeable to take this subject under consideration." The Associated Press of the same date reported that this development resulted partially from the pressure of West German industrialists who hope to profit from it. Several days after these reports appeared in the press, the Chancellor spoke at a news conference. The Times described him as "relaxed and in good humor" and "maintained his new 'flexible' posture while making it clear that he was not rushing out to curry Soviet favor." He emphasized that he wanted to expand trade with the Soviets.

Szewczuk, Die Welt

ment (March 1957) which referred to Bulganin's original complaint, the Chancellor agreed to discuss ways and means of expanding trade relations which would "improve the political atmosphere." Moscow seemed pleased to learn that the Chancellor felt this way and promptly notified Bonn that the Soviets were ready to conduct negotiations "in the very near future." The deal was sealed when the West German Government informed Moscow that it was prepared to negotiate trade and consular agreements (New York Times, 4-18-57). The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung viewed the exchange of these notes as "a sure sign that the Federal Government plans concrete negotiations between the two countries in which diplomatic relations are not merely empty formalities."

Following on the heels of this diplomatic exchange, the Germans opened their Hannover Fair. Judging from descriptions in the press, one is almost tempted to believe that a most important consideration governing the organization of this fair was to impress the Russians with the great possibilities of trade between the two countries. The London Financial Times (4-22-57) said that reports had been circulating that "massive Soviet trade bids may be made" at the fair where four Soviet trade delegations totaling 50 high ranking officials, were expected. A New York Times reporter observed that the Russian technical and trade experts were coming in sufficient strength "to inventory the fair and draw up lists of manufacturers producing goods needed by the Soviet Union" (4-27-57). Commenting on this development the Times correspondent stated that when the German trade negotiations arrive in Moscow, the Soviets will have conveniently prepared for them the lists of specific goods which they desire. On the following day (4-28-57) the Times correspondent reported that the Soviet Ambassador and his colleagues from Moscow "made a bee-line for the Krupp pavilion on their arrival at the fair." He also mentioned that such great concerns as Demag, Kloeckner and Rheinstahl received "the personal attention of the Soviet officials."

The fair made a hit with the Russians. The Soviet Ambassador sent a telegram to the exhibition stating that it had aroused great interest in Russia. He expressed the hope that through this event Soviet officials would "be able to make valuable contacts with German businessmen and thus strengthen economic and scientific relations" (Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 4-27-57).

Wilfried Braun, Chairman of the Board of Hartmann & Braun A. G., Frankfurt, told the Frankfurter Allgemeine that the embargo on Russia was no longer "disturbing" his exports to that country. He informed the press that within a few weeks he would fly to Russia with a private delegation of German industrialists. He saw great possibilities in exports to the eastern bloc and said that payment arrangements were always prompt and never produced any difficulties.

The "Fire Burns Bright"

Obviously the profit lure has kindled a fire among the Ruhr industrialists. Under these circumstances the task of diplomacy became more difficult. In simple terms, the problem is to contain this enthusiasm so as to avoid giving alarm to Washington which has placed so much trust in "der Alte." Thus, we find reports in the press (which seem to be inspired) indicating that the Germans are "reluctant" to deal with the Russians and are "worried" lest the Soviets demand too much. The New York Times (4-21-57) describes how West German officials are allegedly concerned over the Soviet Government's propaganda for large scale trade relations. We are told that Bonn is determined to place a limit on commercial transactions with the Russians. We have also been given to understand that Adenauer will not enter into "a formal trade agreement with Russia" but will only consent to "an informal trade agreement . . ." (New York World Telegram, 4-27-57). Can one think of a better example of hairsplitting?

It is hard to believe that the mores of the German cartellists are so unique that they will go out of their way to avoid making as much profit as they can from trade with the Eastern bloc. Fact is that German trade with the Soviets and the satellites has risen spectacularly. West Germany's trade with the East was 710 million DM in 1950. In 1955 it reached the figure of 1,351 million DM and for the first 10 months of 1956 1,786 million DM. In 1956 trade with the Soviet Union alone was 250% of what it had been in the previous year. These statistics tell the trend. In some respect trade with the Russians is even more significant than the overall statistics indicate. According to an article published in the Soviet publication New Times "West Germany's Stake in Soviet Trade" (March 1957) it is stated that in 1956 "the USSR stood first in Western Germany's imports of pig iron (23 per cent), second in her imports of rye (26 per cent) and third in her imports of asbestos (17 per cent). It was the second biggest buyer of West-German shipping (18 per cent) and copper wire, and third to fifth biggest buyer of certain types of rolled steel."

Studies conducted by West German Government experts show that exports to the Soviets could reach as high as $1 billion annually. These export plans will unquestionably be borne in mind by Bonn diplomats in future negotiations. "The fact that German experts drew up these plans would appear to contradict the internal propaganda line that trade with the Soviet Union does not have a future" (New York Times, 9-18-55). The Times report could have added that these statistics and studies also belie the propaganda which the Germans have been passing out to the West.

Bonn has not only pretended that future trade with the Soviets will be of little value but its top leaders are always careful to assure the West that commercial dealing with the Russians will not assume diplomatic significance. On the other hand, the German people are told a different story. The German newspaper Die Welt (4-15-57) carried a special editorial under the title "Trade with Russia." It noted that a future trade agreement with Moscow would not only step up contacts between the two countries in the economic sphere but in the political as well. "There is," the editorial observed, "the desire to again take up old contacts and connections with which we have had such favorable experiences between the two wars. Politically the creation of trade relations with Russia can become a trump card for us. A genuine trade agreement would really be the biggest trump of all . . ." Because of the importance of future negotiations which would involve vital political considerations, the editorial believes that Bonn should entrust these negotiations "only to the best man who is in a position to maintain relations to the Committee for Eastern Matters of German industrialists."

The above editorial was in sharp contrast to previous positions taken by the Bonn Government. On May 2, 1956, a spokesman for Chancellor Adenauer told the press that the Bonn Government would not negotiate a trade agreement with the Soviet Union until the Soviet Government was ready to consent to the reunification of Germany in "peace and freedom." A few weeks later von Brentano repeated this point at a press conference and dismissed a trade agreement with the Russians as "by no means urgent." As recently as January 11, 1957, Adenauer declared that his government would not negotiate a commercial treaty with Moscow. But this promise may be evaluated in the same light as Adenauer's previous pledge not to establish diplomatic relations with Moscow. Fact is that such negotiations are now under way. Ironically, agreement to negotiate came shortly after Adenauer had succeeded in obtaining a veto power over vital aspects of US policy (see p. 4). As previously noted, Germany went into secret conference with the Russians in Copenhagen after winning the Contractual Agreement. They seem to be repeating!

The Larger Goal

There is no question but that leading circles in West Germany look upon the trade negotiations as a stepping stone toward resolving political issues between Bonn and Moscow. Chancellor Adenauer has stressed this tie-up and the Soviets, too, share the same views. Thus, alongside the preparatory steps for the conclusion of a trade agreement we find Soviet and German sentiment speculating on the wider ramifications. In the January 1957 issue of the Russian publication "International Affairs," several illuminating documents on former Soviet-German economic relations are reproduced allegedly taken from German archives. On February 17, 1920, the top executives of the Allgemeine Elektrizitaets Gesellschaft, Felix Deutsch and Walter Rathenau, wrote a lengthy memorandum dealing with the problem of establishing economic and political ties with the Bolshevik Regime. The German industrialists urged that Germany "with all haste" should establish contacts with the new Russian regime and declared that Germany's future relations with the East "will evidently be brightest if German foreign policy succeeds as soon as possible in establishing relations between Germany and the Eastern states which would make the latter refrain from agreeing to desires of the Entente for a restriction of relations between Germany and Russia." They expressed alarm lest the Entente took the initiative before the Germans. They further warned, that the closer the understanding between the Entente and the Soviets "the greater the danger that Germany will miss the moment for laying the foundations of a successful Germany policy in Eastern Europe." Elaborating on their views the memorandum said, "The decisive point is that Germany will be either a colony of the Entente countries, the object of exploitation by them, and if necessary a purveyor of hired troops who will have to fight for the glory of the Entente anywhere in the world where the criminal working of the Versailles Conference kindles a war; or she will succeed in exploiting the political possibilities which offer themselves in the East of Europe and winning a modicum of independence and freedom which will guard her against the worst privations and oppression. Besides the fact that Central and Eastern Europe are neighbours and economcially complete each other, they also have common needs, and Russia and Germany have the common fate of defeated nations. Cleverly and carefully to make use of the points of contact given here, and by developing them to construct a dependable framework for German foreign policy is a need the importance of which has probably never been felt so strongly as today, when the demands of the Entente for extradition (of criminals—Ed.) are aimed at tainting the name of Germany with indelible disgrace for centuries." Toward the conclusion of this memorandum the industrialists declared: "But the revival of German influence in Russia gives Germany at the same time the possibility of being an intermediary between Russia and other countries, particularly the United States of America. These countries call for German mediation because psychologially the British and Americans do not understand the Russians as well as the Germans who have at least had the rich experience of the pre-war period." The Russian publication also reproduced letters from Stresemann and from Krupp, stressing the importance of the Eastern contact. It does not take a bright mind to figure out why the Russians should have reproduced these documents at this time.

Bulganin's note to the Germans of February 5, 1957 seems to fit in exactly with the Russian propaganda offensive designed to reawaken the "good old times." Bulganin did not equivocate and the letter is particularly warm and friendly. Here are some choice excerpts:

"Whether there will be peace or war in Europe depends above all on the future relations between our peoples. That is why both our Governments must be aware of their responsibility for the destinies of the peoples of their countries and for the destinies of peace in Europe . . .

"After thoroughly analyzing the present situation my colleagues and I have come to the conclusion that the vital interests of the Soviet and the German peoples call for a decisive turn in the relations between the USSR and the Federal Republic of Germany . . .

"Only such a turn in the relations between our countries can guarantee that the two great peoples—the Soviet and the German—will never again be forced to squander their forces and wealth, bleeding each other white . . .

"It is not difficult to understand that those who want to push the Federal Republic of Germany onto the road of war least of all care for its future, or the interests of the German people. They obviously count on evading the retaliatory atomic blow and on placing in jeopardy the Federal Republic of Germany hoping that others will pull their chestnuts out of the fire . . .

"We hope, however, that the national patriotic forces that will not allow their country to be drawn into war gambles will prevail in the Federal Republic of Germany . . .

"It was not without reason that in the past the most far-sighted statesmen of Germany, attaching great importance to the strengthening of German-Russian relations, vigorously denounced the attempts to set Germany at loggerheads with Russia . . .

"It is no exaggeration to say that there are tremendous possibilities for the large-scale development of over-all economic contacts between the Soviet Union and the Federal Republic of Germany to the mutual advantage of both sides. The Federal Republic has a highly developed industry and can count on big and advantageous orders from the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union in its turn also has broad possibilities for selling goods to the Federal Republic of Germany needed by its industry and agriculture.

"We raise the question of expanding trade with the Federal Republic also because the Soviet Union regards the development of such contacts as a firm foundation for improving the political relations between states."

Business Week (2-16-57) reported that the Bulganin message to Adenauer looked "like the first gambit in a different Soviet approach to the German question . . . Bulganin wrote as though he thought a Soviet-German agreement would settle all the problems of Europe."

Mutual Admiration Society

Soviet propaganda latched on to the note with a steady drumbeat on the enormous good that would come from close ties between Moscow and Bonn. One Russian commentator reported an important conference to be held in Düsseldorf by West German business circles. According to him, the meeting evoked great enthusiasm and was filled to capacity—200 people were refused entrance. The same commentator quoted German newspapers and businessmen to the effect that good relations with the Russians was a "must." He referred to an article published by the Rheinische Post, an organ closely associated with Adenauer's party, which said that a trade treaty with the Soviet Union would be of mutual benefit. Another publication associated with German industry, West Post, declared that a trade treaty with Russia "would help to improve the political climate in the relations between the two countries . . ." It also noted that one of Germany's top financiers, Robert Pferdmenges, perhaps Adenauer's closest advisor, had also spoken favorably for the conclusion of an agreement with the Russians.

As the political flirtation grew warmer, Soviet propagandists began to recall the halcyon days of the 1920s and 1930s when close economic and political cooperation existed between Germany and the Soviets. Thus, a special article recently appeared in the government newspaper Izvestia entitled "The Spirit of Rapallo and Our Times." The writer of the article, N. Polyanov, spoke about "the lessons of Rapallo" which marked what he called "sincere friendly cooperation" between the two countries. Surely, he said, this spirit must still be alive. "Is it not time to achieve a decisive change in relations between the Federal Republic of Germany and the USSR, a change towards confidence and friendship? The possibilities in this direction have by no means been exhausted."

The love note excited Adenauer too, and he publicly declared that it was of decisive significance. At the same time, he told reporters that he would not discuss its contents because the time was premature. The Russians, always with an eye towards exploiting the propaganda value of their diplomatic moves, were uninhibited and publicized the contents of the note all over the world. Bonn was extremely annoyed by this publicity. One German newspaper, the Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, published a cartoon of "Auntie Adenauer" watching Marshal Bulganin announcing in a television screen the text of his latest note; Adenauer is incensed and says, "But I thought that was our special secret." Poor Adenauer did not take into account the Russian temperament which can be embarrassingly frank.

The well-known German commentator Reinhard Gerdes, speaking over the radio on February 8, 1957, found great potentialities in Bulganin's note: "They (the Russians) may wish to obtain a disarmament agreement through the mediation of the Federal Government. The Chancellor should see to it that despite all caution the Soviet request will not be turned down." The idea of Germany holding the last word on East-West relations is certainly an attractive one for German diplomacy, especially if Adenauer is able to prove to the Russians that they can obtain advantageous terms through his good offices.

On February 10, Herr Gerdes returned to this theme mentioning that Adenauer's statement on the possibility of halting the test of H bombs "was also designed to increase Soviet readiness for talks with Bonn . . ." As though he was talking to the Soviets, Gerdes once again emphasized Adenauer's "position of trust in the Western world" and the role that he could play as mediator between the United States and Russia. Another German radio commentator, Otto Herr, also waxed enthusiastically over Bulganin's note. Here was a great opportunity which the Federal Republic must not neglect. "Among the Western nations," he told his listeners, "the Federal Republic is the biggest supplier of the Soviet Union anyway."

It has been rightly stated that a well informed public opinion is the surest guaranty for an intelligent and farsighted foreign policy. In our opinion, it is a real tragedy that the American people, as we have stated many times in Prevent World War III, have come to know only one side of the German coin. Responsibility for this state of affairs which can do great harm to the national interest, rests in the first place with those who formulate our policy towards Germany.

"Lebensraum Afrika"

American Pro-Adenauer Paper Predicts the Coming Showdown Between Germany and the U. S. A.

Dear Editor:

Scanning some German language newspapers printed in the United States, I came across an article which amazes even the hard-boiled observer of German geopolitical scheming.

On April 24, 1957, the "America-Herold," a political weekly printed in Winona, Minn., carried an article "The Grab of Africa" which is translated below. The article reveals Germany's true aims in Africa and anticipates in the not too distant future a showdown over the Dark Continent between a United Europe and the "greedy Wall Street imperialists." In essence the "America-Herold's" article could be regarded as Bonn's prematurely issued ultimatum to the United States "to keep hands off in Africa."

The America-Herold has been an outspoken apologist on German war crimes. Among its regular feature writers are such prominent political figures as Prince Hubertus zu Loewenstein and Dr. Hans von Hentig, two Pan-German propagandists whose activities have been disclosed by the Society in the past. The America-Herold also publishes articles by leading Bonn politicians such as Chancellor Adenauer, Foreign Minister von Brentano and the State Secretaries Hallstein and Lenz. In addition, this German paper is often filled with Bonn's official propaganda handouts or with unsigned articles which deal with certain "hot" geopolitical questions. In short, the America-Herold, as so many other German language papers in the U. S., functions as an unrestrained propaganda wheel for the interests of the Bonn Republic.

The record shows that almost all of the German language papers in the U. S. have served the Nazi cause and were subsidized by the Hitler government in one form or another. Today these papers, supposedly American publications, serve Dr. Adenauer's game of "Weltmacht" politics. Let me demonstrate what this means by pointing out the highlights of the article in question.

Interpreting Vice President Nixon's recent state visit to several countries in Africa as a demonstration of "Wall Street's greedy designs," the author expects in the future "very serious tensions between Europe and the United States." Africa, warns the article, is the last underdeveloped continent, a rich storehouse of raw materials that must not fall into American hands. To secure the limitless raw materials of Africa for the industrial plant of the old continent, is for Europe "a question of life or death." Wall Street's present "offensive" to grab the riches of Africa must be stopped. Therefore, Germany must regain her strength and rally the forces of Europe in order to "defend" Africa. The showdown will come when the reunification of Germany will lead to a unified and strong Europe. That, says the article, will change the whole balance of power in the world and a situation will develop in which "the American people will be confronted with the necessity, forced upon them, of paying the bill for Wall Street's greed for money!"

The "America-Herold" article demonstrates two facts very clearly: First, that the ruling circles in the Bonn Republic, the industrialists, the Ribbentrop diplomats in the Bonn Foreign Office and the geopolitical schemers of the Hitler-Haushofer tradition still adhere to the old German blueprint of "Weltmachtpolitik"; secondly, that these planners are convinced that Germany's "third try" again will be a showdown with the Anglo-American world. The political planners in Bonn certainly do not want to fight the Bolsheviks in the Urals. Of this they have had enough! Their hopes today center around the thought of how they can undermine the British and American world position.

The issue is quite clear: The coming German battleground is Africa, the only great raw material storehouse available to the West. Here the Germans are determined to tell us point blank: Stay out or you Americans will have a fight on your hands! This is frank geopolitical language in the best Hitler style.

It is my hope that this article will serve as an eye opener. By now our diplomats and intelligence scouts should know the whole story about Bonn's planning in Africa. Enough of this self-incriminating material has been published by Dr. Adenauer himself and by his whole group of assorted geopolitical masterminds. To refresh our memories we need only mention but a front page article which appeared many years ago under Dr. Adenauer's own signature in his ideological mouthpiece, the "Rheinischer Merkur" (5-20-50). Dr. Adenauer then acclaimed the Schuman Plan as the beginning of "a long-range economic venture in Africa" that would bring fulfillment to the German dream. A few years later the same Rheinischer Merkur (6-24-55) complained bitterly about "America's economic offensive into Africa, the last available raw material storehouse in the western world." The paper then warned that it would be foolish for Europe to continue an ostrich-like head in the sand policy in face of America's dangerous penetration of Africa. In a similar vein the nationalist German magazine "Nation Europa" wrote in its August 1954 issue that Germany and France together must rally their strength, organize Africa and then "convince the Americans that it might be wise for them to scurry on to their ships and get out."

One aftermath of this trip has been a spate of proposals designed to attract Arab and Asian students to German universities and technical schools and applicants for industrial training to German factories. At the present time there are 3,000 or 4,000 Asian students and some 5,000 trainees in factories and it is hoped to multiply these figures. . . .

For many years now the German industrialists and geopoliticians have clamored in secret memoranda, in books and articles, that Europe and Africa must be wielded into a new super-continental bloc far more powerful in population and economic resources than the U. S. S. R. and the United States. This great African venture is pushed quietly and relentlessly by the industrial and financial barons of the Rhine and Ruhr. Up to this time nobody in Washington has dared to intercede against Dr. Adenauer's "tremendously bold plan": First the creation of the new Leberstraum, Eurafrica, followed by rapproachement with Russia. If this comes to pass, the United States will soon be confronted with the showdown "made in Germany."

Every diplomatic move by the U. S. A. which has resulted in undermining the traditional position of Britain and France in the Middle East and Africa is hailed and exploited by the Bonn Republic. Washington's past policies have contributed enormously to a development that has played right into the hands of the German schemers. They know only too well that fruition of their plans would bring them the gift of a rich continent to replace a few more or less important colonies which they lost after World War I. Today the Germans can well afford to be against "colonies" if they are in the process of taking over two continents.

It would be wise if our Germany Firsters in the Pentagon and the State Department would place the following article as a permanent reminder on their desks.

THE GRAB OF AFRICA

(A Translation from the "America-Herold" Winona, Minn.)

The official trip of U. S. Vice President Nixon to Africa, carried out with such great pomp, awakened world public opinion for the first time to what attentive observers have foreseen with great worry: American big business is beginning to take over the "black continent" for its own expansion as a sort of "second South America."

This development should disturb every friend of peace; more so, it should most deeply disquiet all those desirous of good relations between Europe and America, for it contains potentialities of new and really serious friction between Europe and America, which for the present—due to the preponderous power of America and the present division and weakness of Europe—may still seem unimportant, but which in the years to come will put the greatest strain upon the relations between Europe and America.

Let us first look at the facts: big business in America for a long time has recognized in Africa a chance to recover its source of raw materials and its market for its products which it lost to the Red Moscow-Peiping imperium in Asia. Wall Street adroitly understood, and continues to understand to project itself in the foreground as the natural heir to the colonial powers, above all, England and France.

Wall Street is repeating the same game in Africa that it has played so successfully in Burma and India against England, in Indonesia against the Netherlands and in Indo-China against the French. In the role of a champion in the fight for national freedom, Wall Street Dollar imperialism becomes the successor of the economic position held by the former colonial masters. The new nations only discover very gradually, that national independence without economic and financial freedom amounts to only a half-baked thing.

This game, which Wall Street has played so successfully in the Far, Middle and Near East since 1945, is now to be repeated in Africa. In the light of the commercial interests of Wall Street, the economic and financial points of view have priority, but they will be masked through political moral attitudes—a procedure for which England itself for centuries has furnished the pattern!

Any one aware of history will react with a disdainful smile when reading American Vice-President Nixon's remarks: that America only wants to draw Africa within its orbit, to prevent it from falling into the hands of the communists! This is how it looks according to the report of the "Züricher Tat" of March 12, 1957:

"U. S. Vice President declared at a Press Conference on Saturday, Africa with its tremendous resources and 200 million inhabitants constitutes 'object number one for the communist movement'."

It would be wise to consider Wall Street's intention in this situation more seriously, than within the motivations advanced by Nixon! There can be no doubt about world capital, concentrated in Wall Street and controlled from there, being increasingly determined, to exploit Africa's wealth for itself and turn its 200 million inhabitants into cheaply paid industrial proletarians: they would be used as replacements for the "far too costly" white industrial workers and thus increase the profits of financial capital manifold; on the other hand it would open up the possibility of a continuing pressure against the unions for lower wages.

Above all, Africa represents a challenge to world finance because of its immense riches in ores of all kinds, of which until now only the deposits in South Africa, Rhodesia and the Belgian Congo have become known and developed; the vast wealth of Morocco and Ethiopia staggers the imagination. Oil of course, ranks in second place, its existence having been proven by French discoveries in Algeria, Mauretania and the Sahara in large quantities; without doubt it also occurs in other regions of Africa.

In this sequence there follows uranium, important today, absolutely indispensable tomorrow; as is generally known, the Congo is still its greatest world supplier—and the gamut of all known minerals, which Africa offers in sheer inexhaustible volume and which only await development and transportation.

All this is understandable! But all this is also known in Europe—with this difference: that these raw materials represent a question of life and death for factory Europe! Whereas for Wall Street they only are a question of monetary gain!

This leads to serious and compulsively increasing conflicts of interest between American high finance and European economy—the results of which is partly dependent upon the attitude of the American people, partly upon the unity and strengthening of Europe, and, last, not least, upon the attitude of the peoples and nations of Africa.

The American people must know that, due to the greedy grab of Wall Street in Africa, it will find itself in serious and compulsively increasing opposition to all European peoples, for whom this is a question of life or death! American politics, whose dependence upon Wall Street is at least as large as it is upon the American voter, may be indifferent to this for the time being; but when the day of the coming reunification and strengthening of Germany arrives—and with this, the unity and strengthening of Europe—then the weight of this problem will increase; and the American people could be confronted with the necessity, forced upon them, of paying the bill for Wall Street's greed for money!

Decisive will be, what solution the peoples and nations of Africa will choose: for submission to Dollar Imperialism or for co-operation with Europe! For unhealthy industrialization by transformation of its own inhabitants to industrial proletarians—or for an economy complimentary to that of Europe, whereby Africa will develop its agriculture in full freedom and self-determination, while the distribution of its—mutually developed—natural resources to "Factory Europe" will offer a secure basis.

That such a "natural symbiosis" between Europe and Africa simultaneously represents the best, in fact, the only bulwark against the infiltration of Communism in Africa, is just as certain as the fact, that the cultural self-development of the African peoples will be secured through their own development of the economy! Nothing would be more ominous for Africa than the proletarianization of its masses enforced by big finance: the slums of Johannesburg, created by the Rothschilds, Rhodes and Oppenheimers and painfully being illuminated by the Boer government, bear witness to this.

Wall Street's grab of Africa is just as much of a threat to Europe as it is to Africa—and, in the final analysis, against the American people themselves! The exploitation of human beings through Financial Imperialism is more throttling and worse than that experienced through old-style power imperialism—and the solution is solidary cooperation of the free peoples—in this case: the free peoples of Europe and Africa!

"Der Weg"

Dr. Johann von Leers and the Ex-Mufti

All-out support for Egypt is proclaimed in the German Nazi journal still published in Buenos Aires, Der Weg. Whatever may be thought of Colonel Nasser's action in nationalising the Suez Canal, he was right, says an article in the September 1956 issue, and all blame must lie with "the hare-brained policies of some Western Powers." (Pleasure is expressed at the fact that "step by step the imperialist powers are being deprived of what they once grabbed and through generations exploited.") Conveying their "sincere wishes" to the Arabs in their "faithful struggle," the German Nazis in Argentina affirm the "inconquerable hope" that "this new rebellion will catch on among our own people."

It will be remembered that already last year (see this Bulletin, September-December 1955) one of the Weg's most prominent contributors, Dr. Johann von Leers, now in the employ of Colonel Nasser's foreign propaganda services in Cairo welcomed the Arabs' "struggle for independence" on the ground that "anything calculated to destroy the Democratic-Communist world tyranny forced upon us in 1945 is a clarion call of freedom to us Germans." He was pleased to think that "the idea behind the rising of Arab nationalism" was "to prepare for the approaching struggle against the oppressor Powers."

"Jewish Bolshevism"

Presumably he does not now include among the oppressor Powers Soviet Russia. But it is interesting to recall how, true to the doctrine of "Mein Kampf," he used to denounce "Jewish Bolshevism" whenever Hitler prepared for fresh aggression. One wonders what he thinks now of Cairo as he wrote in 1938 about Prague: "That place has really become a branch office of Moscow, just as Moscow is a branch office of World Jewry. It is often by no means easy to distinguish where Czech propaganda ends and Bolshevist propaganda begins. They shade off into one another, working hand in hand." (Hakenkreuz-Banner, Mannheim, 23-9-38).

Leers probably owes his present employment in Cairo to the good offices of the ex-Mufti who keeps in close contact with Der Weg. In the January 1953 issue he had complimented Leers on his "very important work in favour of the traditional friendship between the German and Arab Nation." Now (August 1956) he compliments Der Weg on having "always championed the Arabs' righteous cause against the powers of darkness embodied in World Jewry."

In the course of an interview with him, printed in the same issue, the ex-Mufti is stated to have denounced "the support given to the Zionists by the Christian churches in some European countries, especially Germany." "Are they going to call for a crusade against Islam?", he blandly asked. The interviewer remarks: "The new anti-Islam tendency, especially among Protestant theologians, is well known and being carefully and suspiciously watched. We clearly see the parallels between German nationalism and the Arab struggle for freedom, both nations writhing under the same imperialist oppression," etc.

"The Old Paganism"

Der Weg recently celebrated its tenth anniversary. In a leading article, No. 7-8, August 1956, the editor, Eberhard Fritsch, explains how he had always hoped to keep alive the "fire" of Nazi "truculence." If he were to sum up what it was that caused people to read his journal, he would say, he writes, "it is the old paganism that was aroused in them."

A characteristic representative of that paganism is Dr. J. von Leers. In his anniversary contribution, on "The New World Age," he forecasts the end of the Christian era, as he had already done in a booklet 22 years ago ("Der Kardinal und die Germanen"). He thinks that "it will soon be impossible for people performing miracles with hypnotism, spiritual healing, telepathy and occultism, to be fobbed off with the tribal god Jehovah and to force their new piety into old bottles."

A reference to the "dying faiths" which, through their "neglect," had caused "the reactions of National Socialism and Bolshevism," is also contained in a long Open Letter to the Editor by Hans Grimm, the author, who rehashes most of his sanctimonious tricks of white-washing Nazism. The German people's "will to live and to assert itself," he writes, had "to a terrifying degree been reduced by the much invoked repentance."

In its devout effort to defend the Nazis cause, Der Weg does not mind representing Hitler who had always boasted of his infallibility, as a fool who was deceived by "thieves within the house . . ."

An interview with Léon Degrelle, the Belgian quisling, is printed, on the occasion of his 50th birthday, in the journal of the "Belgian Social Movement," Courrier du Continent, July 1956. . . .

The September 1956 issue of Der Weg, Buenos Aires, which reprints this from the Belgian paper, also carries a leading article by Sir Oswald Mosley, the British Fascist Chief.

Contact in the U. S. A.

The Weg publishing firm, Dürer Verlag, has a "United Nations Correspondent" in New York. He is H. Keith Thompson, describing himself as a "journalist and public relations counsel," who was mentioned as a joint director of "Le Blanc Publications" in the Wiener Library Bulletin, No. 1-2, 1956. On October 1, 1956, he sent a telegram to Admiral Doenitz to mark "the occasion of his release from 11 years of illegal confinement by the 'Allies' for 'war crimes'." In this telegram, Thompson referred to the "despicable Nuremberg proceedings brought about by the criminal co-guilt of the U. S. A. and world Jewry."

An appeal in October to the American News Company to discontinue distribution in the United States of Der Weg remained unanswered. In letters to Mr. Henry Garfinkel, President of the American News Company, the American Jewish Congress described Der Weg as a "mouthpiece of present-day Hitlerism." Two War-Commanders on War and Peace

The following quotations have very exceptional meaning, coming as they do from two national heroes: the French victor of the two decisive Marne battles of World War I, Marshal Foch, a deeply devout Catholic, and Field Marshal Hindenburg, the vanquished general in this campaign, whose insolent words reveal all of the unchanged mentality of Prussianism.

Because the "spirit" of Hindenburg continues as part of the "equipment" of the German officer, his words assume added importance in the face of German rearmament.

Die Oesterreichische Nation.

Marshal Foch (on the centenary of Napoleon's death, 1921):

"Napoleon had to fall, because he forgot that no man is God, that the nation is above the individual, that morals stand above the man, and that peace is enthroned above war."

Hindenburg (in an interview with U. S. Captain MacMahon, May 15, 1923):

"We will take revenge, even if it will take 100 years, for history repeats itself, and what I want more than anything in this world, is, that I myself can take up arms against France."

Foch:

"As if our nation could live on glory instead of by work! As if in a decent world the moral concept would not prevail over power, depending solely upon force, no matter how ingenious!"

Hindenburg:

"War cannot be conducted with sentimentalism. The more bitter a war is conducted, the more humane it is in reality. War agrees with me like a rest cure at a spa.

Foch:

"It is the absolute duty of all, a duty higher than the command of victorious armies: to serve the people for its happiness, just as the people believe in itself; to help justice attain the upper hand. For, above war, there is peace."

Hindenburg (addressing the "Stahlhelm" in Gross-Schwuelper):

"You are young people and you have played the Triumphal Entry of Paris march very well for me. But I hope, that you will play this march at some time in the future, where it belongs, at the right place, where I have already been in 1870."

Foch ("Soldatenworte):

"The wisest man will err, if, in questions of decisions affecting humanity, he depends only upon his own views and insight and distances himself from the moral law of society, which is founded upon respect for the individual and the principles of liberty, equality and fraternity, the basis of our culture, as it was conceived by Christianity."

"A pattern of peril develops in British policy towards Germany.

"First the Government agrees to rearming the Germans. And now Mr. Macmillan assures them that Britain also supports their ambition to reunite with Eastern Germany.

"He tells them: 'We shall do everything we can to help you.'

"Britain should do nothing at all to further this dangerous German ambition.

"It is bad enough that Britain should ever have been led into accepting German rearmament. But this new commitment is even worse.

"For what is the danger? That one day the Germans will use their new guns to fight for their old lands. And then Britain will be dragged in to help rescue these allies of hers from the Russians.

"There is only one safe policy for Britain to adopt towards the Germans. No reunification. No rearmament. No commitments at all."

(Daily Express, London, 5-9-57)

"Of course, there's no such thing as the German Riviera. But with an apt sardonic turn of phrase, the French today call their Cote d'Azur by another name—Cote d'Allemagne, or the German coast.

"For the Germans, who are collectively and individually the richest people in Europe, have this summer almost replaced the Americans as the No. 1 tourists here. . . .

"The recent headlines show the power that Germany commands and which gives their tourists today a special ascendacy—" 'Dulles to Work With Adenauer On Arms Plans. . . . U. S. to Seek Bonn's View Before Making Any Accord With Russia on Europe. . . . Germans to Be Consulted by U. S. . . . Atomic Arms for U. S. Forces in Germany. . . . Krupp to Enter Atom Field. . . ."

"But what one wonders most objectively of all is: Where do all the Germans come from? In the past year, one has seen them in multitudes in Cairo, in Lebanon, Syria, even in Iran and Iraq. Passing through Germany last week, they seemed to be more numerous than ever before in the Fatherland. The roads through France are jammed with them. . . .

(Bill Richardson, N. Y. Post, 6-23-57)

Nasser's "Expendables"

It seems that modern dictatorships, by their very nature, thrive at the expense of their strongest supporters. Both Hitler and Stalin turned their friends and allies—domestic and foreign—into obedient satellites. When this was achieved, they liquidated the leaders who had helped them, and replaced them with their own henchmen. Those who remember the prewar Hitler and Stalin period, will also recall how these dictators cooperated with the various kings of the Balkan countries only to undermine their positions and oust them at the opportune moment.

The "Expendables"

Egypt's "strong man," Gamal Abdul Nasser, is filled with the same "gratitude" toward the Arab Kings. They are pawns —his "expendables." Yet, Nasser would have never reached the position he now enjoys, without the concrete help and financial support of the Arab Kings.

If the Kings ignored the fate which befell a number of European rulers, one would expect them to sit up and take notice when one of "their own," former King Farouk, was sacked by the Egyptian dictator. However, this did not happen. Instead, they heaped praise on the "bright young man." There appeared to be no doubt in their minds that Nasser's sole ambition was to revive the ancient glories of Islam. After all, it was he who outlined the grand design which made such a marked impression on the Kings.

"When I consider the 80 million Muslims in Indonesia, and the 50 million in China, and the millions in Malaya, Siam and Burma, and the nearly 100 million in Pakistan, and the more than 100 million in the Middle East, and the 50 million in the Soviet Union, together with the other millions in far-flung parts of the world—when I consider these hundreds of millions united by a single creed, I emerge with a sense of the tremendous possibilities which we might realize through the cooperation of all these Muslims, a cooperation going not beyond the bounds of their natural loyalty to their own countries, but nonetheless enabling them and their brothers in faith to wield power wisely and without limits." (Egypt's Liberation by Premier Gamal Abdul Nasser, Public Affairs Press, Washington, D. C., page 113.)

Whatever aspirations the Arab Kings may have had with regard to this project, it goes without saying that Nasser had no intentions of taking a back seat. Possessed with the "Fuehrer complex," he wrote: "And now I go back to that wandering mission in search of a hero to play it. Here is the role. Here are the lines, and here is the stage. We alone, by virtue of our place, can perform the role" (ibid., page 114). In Nasser's self-appointed role "supporting actors" are superfluous. This holds especially true for the Kings who are logically regarded by Nasser as a barrier to his insatiable ambitions.

Discussing one of the chief elements with allegedly prevented the Arabs from destroying Israel in 1947-48, Nasser writes, "... then, each in its own internal affairs encountered the same factors, the same ruling forces that had brought about their defeat, and forced them to bow their heads in humiliation and shame" (page 95).

Therefore, it is clear beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the Arab Kings are regarded by Nasser as an intolerable stumbling block. It is they who must submit completely to his will. But submission is only a temporary respite. They will live on his sufferance until the day that he prepares his assassins for the coup de grace.

Former French Premier Mollet referred to Nasser's book as the new "Mein Kampf" wherein an oriental Hitler lays bare his boldest dreams. The French statesman was not playing on words. Nasser's book shows all the earmarks of German geopolitical theory and even terminology. Nasser writes about the allegedly outdated concept of political boundaries and national states (page 84) and stresses the need for "living space" (page 85). In developing his thesis he delineates the three "circles": Arab, Islamic and African. Nasser tells us that they are tangent to each other through the center which is Egypt. To hold the three "circles" firmly and to wield them as a gigantic geopolitical unit which can, if it wills, strangulate the world, is Egypt's holy mission "since no one else is qualified to play it" (page 88.).

King Hussein vs. Nasser

The crisis that shook Jordan in the Spring of this year has its roots in Nasser's dreams. Like Hitler, the Egyptian dictator operates according to plan. When Hitler marched into the Rhineland, some people thought that this was merely the act of a German patriot asserting "the God-given rights" of his people. If those trusting souls had seriously studied "Mein Kampf" they would have recognized that Hitler's move was but a preparatory step toward wider pickings.

Nasser's seizure of Suez was also praised by many people as the expression of a legitimate national aspiration. A careful examination of Nasser's writings shows that the grab was not the work of an Egyptian patriot but the initial thrust of a man who desires nothing less than to be the lord and master of the whole Islamic world and its resources. It was a move to prepare the groundwork for the Jordan "Anschluss" with Syria and Egypt—the nucleus for the Arab "circle."

That Nasser and his strategists were working day and night toward this goal was hardly a secret. Yet, the king of Jordan, entranced by the thought of becoming a "big" king, seemed oblivious to the facts of life.

Nasser had carefully prepared the attack. The governmental apparatus in Jordan was honeycombed with his agents and stooges. However, it seems that the rather crude methods of Nasser began to tell on the king. Toward the beginning of the crisis Hussein found his tongue. He warned his then Prime Minister Suleiman Nabulsi that the Communist danger had grown. There were individuals, he declared, "who feign loyalty to Arab nationalism, indulge in hullabaloo, prevarication, falsehood and heroics, thereby seeking to conceal their evil designs against Arab nationalism and the fact that they cooperate with our enemies in misleading the masses and exploiting the people."

Nabulsi contemptuously ignored Hussein for he knew that the King had become more and more isolated since the British had been ousted in March 1956. At that time Hussein was hailed as a great patriot. Actually, the riots and demonstrations resulting in the removal of the British General Glubb as the Chief of the Arab Legion, had been engineered by Egyptian agents together with an assortment of pro-Communists and Nasserites who had infiltrated Jordan's government. Hussein's difficulties were compounded by the fact that by losing the British subsidy of 30 million pounds annually, he had placed himself at the mercy of Nasser who had solemnly pledged that Egypt, Syria and Saudi Arabia would make up a great part of the deficit.

While the noose around Hussein's neck was drawn more tightly, Prime Minister Nabulsi, an ardent devotee to the Nasser cause, was already speaking of the end of Jordan. On one occasion he proclaimed flatly, "Jordan's destiny is to disappear." Another time he said, "Jordan cannot live alone. Our intentions were from the beginning to work for Arab unity. The first step is a sort of federation and the first phase of federation is to have it between Syria and Jordan . . . Practical negotiations are now making progress . . . There is no longer any doubt that federation is coming."

Nabulsi's words were translated into the demonstrations and riots in April which threatened to overthrow King Hussein. The London Economist (4-27-57) reported how the rioters carried the flags of Jordan, Syria and Egypt. Nasser's picture was most prominent. The main slogan of the mobs was, "Federal Union With Syria and Egypt!" It was these initial demonstrations which broke Nasser's spell over Hussein. By the end of April the King, with great courage smashed the conspiracy and the Nasserites fled or were imprisoned.

Provocation Through Propaganda

At the beginning of the crisis Nasser was confident of success. Although he regarded Hussein as "an emotional, irresponsible playboy" (New York Times, 4-28-57), he was sure that his loyal followers in Jordan would keep the King in line. Egyptian propaganda reflected the carefulness with which Nasser played his cards during those dramatic days. On April 18, 1957, the Cairo radio reported a commentary from the Syrian newspaper Barada: "The battle is now tense in Jordan between the forces of imperialism and reaction and the forces of patriotism, and the Jordanian people who are renowned for their gallantry and strength in defense." The radio also referred to another Syrian newspaper, An-Nasr which said that Hussein should seek the advice of his Arab "friends," i.e., King Saud and Presidents Al-Quwwatli (Syria) and Nasser. The paper declared that they were the true "trustees" of Jordan and that they were dedicated to helping Hussein achieve complete freedom. "We do not believe that King Hussein's opinion is different from that of the three leaders or that his means are different from ours."

Nasser's propagandists were trying to give Hussein the benefit of the doubt. With a condescending air they portrayed him as the innocent victim of an "alien imperialistic conspiracy." The Cairo radio (4-22-57) pretended to weep over Hussein's plight and charged that the ousting of Nabulsi and a couple of pro-Nasser generals was really the work of the "imperialists." Yet, even in this broadcast there was already a faint hint that perhaps Hussein himself was no longer willing to toe the mark: "Is it possible by these torturous means, devoid of honor, sincerety, straightforwardness and respect for the will of the people, to succeed or divert a people from their aims and objectives?" Hussein's name was not mentioned but this ominous warning was made: "Those who planned the plot, who participated in it, and those who supported it, will relent sooner than they imagine . . ."

Thus, Nasser's propagandists shifted to a bolder line as it became apparent that Hussein was "getting out of hand." On April 23, the Egyptian radio denounced what it called the "conspiracy against Jordan." It named the "heroes" of Jordan's independence, i.e., Generals Nuwwar, Huyari and former Prime Minister Nabulsi. Since it was the King who had eliminated this trio from positions of power, the Egyptian propaganda guns were inevitably shifting their sights on the King himself. This was the meaning of the Egyptian radio broadcast on the following day which termed the strife in Jordan "the struggle of Arabdom." The broadcaster affirmed that the "Arab nation" was in the midst of the battle in Jordan and that Jordan "will triumph in the same way the Arab nation has triumphed."

As the plot against Hussein unfolded with all its ramifications, the King finally took to the radio on April 25, 1957. Though he castigated Israel he also leveled a sharp attack against his Egyptian "friends": "I had to believe that the slightest duties of cordiality and gratitude would have required our brethren in Egypt to cease at least inciting the people through the press and radio by attacking my person—I who had sworn my blood for the sake of dear Egypt at the time of its catastrophe—and to cease fabricating statements and falsifying utterances in an attempt to plot out the con-

"I was patient for a long time regarding the mistakes of these Egyptian tongues and pens which attacked and defamed us, which attempted to incite certain of our people against us and destroy the true situation in our country and which released lies, rumors, and propaganda. We were patient and will remains patient, suppressing rage and forgiving (them?) in fulfillment of our promise to Egypt and in maintaining our solidarity, fraternity, Arabdom, and unity. We had hoped that this misleading propaganda would not flare up, spread, and become brutal in a way which has become difficult for our Arab dignity and prestige, and our national heritage to tolerate injustice and wrong."

On April 27, the Egyptian radio toned down—apparently stung by Hussein's accusations. Once again Cairo pretended to shed tears about the dangers to Jordan's independence and security. "O Arabs," an Egyptian radio commentator declared. "Who is Jordan? Jordan is your country and mine. Jordan is our country, my brother. Jordan is the country of all the Arabs. The independence of Jordan is my independence and yours, my brother. The independence of Jordan is our independence; it is the independence of all Arabs. The security of Jordan is your security and mine, my brother. The security of Jordan is the security of all the Arabs."

The "new" approach emphasized that Egypt had not been interfering in Jordan but was only naturally solicitous for her welfare. "We of the Voice of the Arabs," the Cairo radio said, "have no right to speak in the name of Jordan. Jordan has its own nationalism . . ."

In this connection it will be recalled that on April 18, the Egyptian radio had named Nasser as one of the trustees of Jordan's fate, but Hussein's surprising show of defiance obliged the Egyptian propagandists to disclaim any thought of intervention. However, the change was of short duration for on May 4, the Cairo radio once again began to employ threats and innuendoes: "Those who concocted the Jordanian plot did not take into consideration the fact that the day will come when the plotters will be disgraced, when everything will be exposed before the eyes of world public opinion, and when the mask will be taken off the faces of those who plotted and committed crimes without heeding the lessons of history. Truth can never be suppressed, and crime will never pay." The following day (5-5-57) the Cairo radio sought to discredit Hussein's policies: "The Jordanien budget, which the present government will submit, cannot be described as a budget of an Arab state proceeding in the caravan of liberation. It is a novel budget, the main item of which is American aid given to this Arab country as a reward for those who hatched the imperialist plot and for the bold measures they took against the free and struggling people."

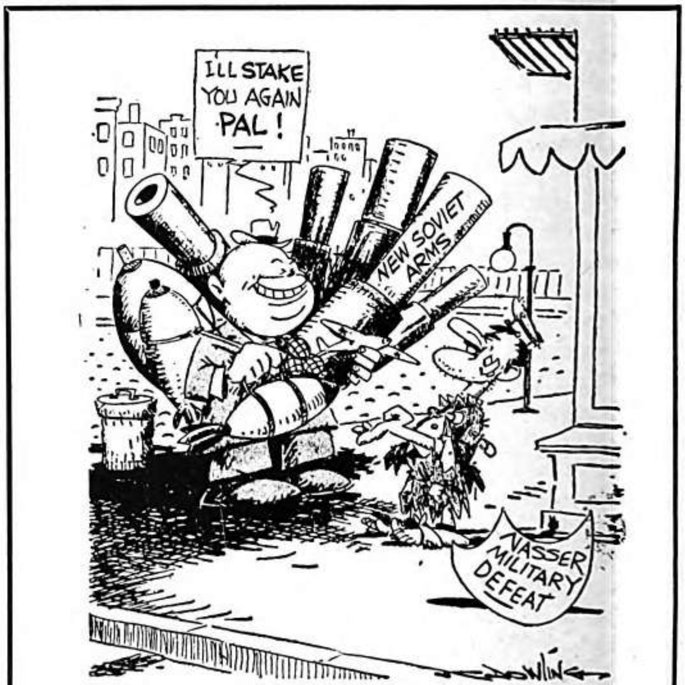
On May 8, it became clear even to Egyptians that the King was winning out. The Cairo radio was incensed and railed against "the imperialists and their stooges." As if it were warning Hussein directly, the radio quoted Nasser: "We shall antagonize those who antagonize us and we shall be peaceful to those who are peaceful to us."

The Egyptian Home Service, broadcasting on May 10, deplored that Jordan "by virtue of the plots of imperialism and its lackeys has been transformed into a state about which the imperialists deem it their right to speak with malice . . ." It charged that Jordan's status had changed "after it permitted the supporters of reaction and imperialism to raise their hands and stand in the way of the people's will." The broadcast concluded with the warning that the "people" would yet emerge victorious "for the sake of the whole liberated Arab world."

Exposing Nasser

However, by this time the Jordanian propaganda machine had largely outgrown its fears and inhibitions and struck back. It noted that at one time the Egyptians would praise Arab leaders when they did the bidding of Cairo and would denounce them when they strayed from Nasser's camp. The broadcast referred to the stand taken by the Egyptian press on the crisis in Jordan. It charged that the Egyptian papers relied on information of traitors to Jordan and accused Egypt of having lied about the true conditions obtaining in the capital of Jordan. The broadcast noted that when General Hyari first accepted the post Chief of Staff under Hussein, the Egyptian press smeared him as an "imperialist stooge." On the other hand, when he fled to Damascus the same paper praised him.

The Jordanian radio commentator, understating the case, noted that this kind of propaganda based on false reports and provocation, "harms relations between Egypt and the other Arab states." In conclusion the commentator said: "We request that the Egyptian Government and the Ministry of Guidance in Egypt reimpose supervision of the Egyptian press and the Voice of the Arabs broadcast so as to avoid in the future any misunderstanding between sister Egypt and any other Arab state." As was to be expected Cairo, by this time, arrogantly ignored Jordan's rather mild protest of interference.



SKID ROW

This forced Hussein's hand and on May 11, the Jordanian newspaper Al-Urdan broke wide open the conspiracy hatched by Nasser and his cohorts. It was a plot, the newspaper declared, which not only involved the overthrow of King Hussein but also the thrones of the kingdoms of Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Libya. The newspaper named names of key Egyptian agents and also revealed the identity of certain representatives from the various Soviet embassies in the Middle East. The people of Jordan were told the pertinent facts concerning the nefarious role of Egyptian representatives in Jordan. King Hussein was their target and one of the leading organizers of the plot against the King was the Egyptian Military Attaché Fuad Hilal. Together with the Egyptian Consul General in Jerusalem he was expelled from Jordan. The expulsion deepened the rift between Jordan and Egypt and showed that the King had become disenchanted with Nasser's Pan-Arabic schemes.

In recounting the "zigs and zags" of the Egyptian propaganda line during the crisis, one thing becomes clear, i.e., Nasser strove with all his might to control the events in that country so that his dream of absorbing Jordan would be fully realized. It was a cat and mouse game—first pretending to be concerned about Hussein's difficulties—pretending that Egypt had no desire to interfere but on the contrary wished Hussein well. When Hussein sought to clean out the nest of Nasserites the Cairo radio began to squeal like a stuck pig, yet even then direct attacks against the King were avoided. However, the logic of events in Jordan could no longer contain the feeling of outrage which grew in the breasts of Nasser and his co-conspirators. They threatened Hussein and even now seek in every possible way to turn his people against him.

The Jordan story has had a profound effect on recent developments in the Middle East. Like a flash of lightning it cleared up the heavy atmosphere of confusion and illusion made impenetrable by the cunning propaganda and bold activities of Nasser and his henchmen.

King Saud vs. Nasser

The crisis in Jordan would have never reached such grave dimensions, had it not been for the fact that Nasser not only received help from the minions of Moscow but also from King Saud of Saudi Arabia. Saud, too, had sat at the feet of the "bright young man" from Cairo. Nasser fascinated him and undoubtedly the King dreamt about the day when the whole Moslem world would lay prostrate before his throne. It was therefore relatively easy for King Saud to provide millions of dollars for the terrorists and propagandists who flooded the Arab world under the direction of Nasser and his Nazi advisers. It was Saud's money received from the royalties paid by American oil companies, that subsidized the activities of Nasser's men in Jordan.

Events in Jordan shocked King Saud and the confidence which he reposed in Nasser, began to wane. Indeed, it has been reported that after Nasser blocked the Suez Canal thereby cutting off much of Saudi Arabia's oil revenues, the King began to wonder where Nasser's program would lead to. King Saud received his answer in relative short order. According to reliable reports, the King discovered that the Egyptian Military Attaché in his capital had organized and financed a terrorist band whose ultimate target was the King himself. Saud's security police arrested the plotters who were armed with guns, grenades and explosives. The men admitted planning the King's assassination and implicated Col. Ali Khashaba, Egypt's Military Attaché. According to Time Magazine (5-13-57), the King was outraged and expelled a number of Egyptians and ex-Palestinians. "He then backed Hussein to the limit."

Nasser was dumbstruck. The idea that he might lose Saud's subsidies made him desperate. According to Joseph Alsop (New York Herald Tribune, 5-6-57), top Nasser representatives sought out King Saud in the very shadow of the sacred Kaaba in Mecca. One Egyptian member of the delegation swore that Nasser was innocent as a newborn babe! Nasser did not deny that the plot existed but disavowed personal responsibility! By this time even Saud seems to have reached the point of understanding that he might suffer the fate of other leaders, including King Michael of Rumania and Jan Mazeryck of Checkoslovakia. Reports in the press now tell us that Saud has definite second thoughts with respect to Nasser's dream world. Saud who financed Nasser in Jordan hoping that he would be richly rewarded for the money; Saud who had helped Nasser in spreading terror throughout the Middle East; Saud who paid for the riots against the King of Iraq, was sobering up at last.

Nasser Reaches for Iraq

The Government of Jordan had accused Nasser of fomenting rebellion against other thrones in the Middle East. These facts have been published in the West last year. The Cartoon by Marcus, Courtesy, N. Y. Times noted British correspondent Sefton Delmer reported to the London Daily Express (1-23-56) that the King of Iraq had proceeded to purge his army, having learned that Nasser had infiltrated "the officer corps with the aim of overthrowing Iraq's anti-Soviet Premier Nuri, forcing the abdication of the King and establishing the same kind of military dictatorship in Iraq as in Egypt."

As in Jordan and Saudi Arabia the Egyptians worked through their military attaché. Col. Mahmoud Gamel Al Hinawi, Cairo's Military Attaché in Baghdad, was responsible for the operation. Only the quick and resolute action of the Iraqui Government uncovered the plot which resulted in the arrest of Col. Hinawi's number one agent, the German trained Egyptian Commando Officer Cpt. Mohamed Ali Issa. Commenting on the plot, Delmer wrote: "Yes, it is a strange world when ultra-rich princes of Saudi-Arabia distribute dollars they have received from American oil companies to Communist agents in order that the Communists may spread chaos and anarchy in the neighbour country."

Undermining Libya

The King of Libya has also found his friend Nasser a bit difficult. Nasser's agents are omnipresent in Libya—as they are in other countries of that area. The London Economist (4-13-57) noted that many of the townspeople in Libya and especially the youth "feel the attraction of the Pan-Arab ideas and methods of which Col. Nasser has made himself the exponent."

Nasser, of course, has fully exploited these Pan-Arab sentiments and his agents have distributed tons of propaganda material throughout the country. The propaganda has been markedly effective to the extent that "humble Cyrenaican parents can be seen urging their children to lisp the name of Gamal Abdul Nasser as they gaze at portraits of the Egyptian leader in the windows." Nevertheless, King Idris has also become uneasy. The Egyptian military attaché in that country, Ishmail Sadek, organized a so-called "Front For The Struggle Of The Libyan People." Ignoring the fact that he was but a guest of Libya, he publicly accused the Government of King Idris of being "the servant of imperialism." He backed up his charge by smuggling in at least 28 cases of automatic arms which were hidden in the Egyptian Embassy for future distribution at the appropriate time. The activities of Sadek impelled King Idris to take a stand. The Government sent him out of the country along with a number of "teachers" supplied by the Egyptian Government to instruct young Libyans.

Nasser Is "Pro-Nasser"

Perhaps some people who like to indulge in historical analogies might want to depict Nasser as Egypt's Thomas Jefferson resolutely opposed to monarchy. However, such comparisons are preposterous and misleading. It is a known fact, for example, that Moscow, too, has disposed of kings but who would want to compare Stalin with Thomas Jefferson? "Pro-republicanism has no part in Nasser's philosophy. The Lebanese Government which is a genuine republic, can testify to that. The Egyptian dictator, under the guise of fighting "imperialism," has been busily at work trying to undermine Lebanon and its republican institutions.

The Lebanese Government has already exposed this conspiracy hatched by the Egyptian Ambassador Abdel Hamid Ghalib. The Ambassador has had large funds at his disposal to interfere in the political life of Lebanon. Joseph Alsop, reporting in the New York Herald Tribune (5-20 and 5-22-57), states that the Egyptian Embassy in Beirut is the chief political headquarter for the pro-Egyptian forces. These elements have tried to create turmoil and civil war during the recent elections, but the Lebanese leaders who apparently have been wise to Nasser's designs for a much longer time than the Arab kings, have successfully smashed the plot.

The "Education" Angle

Nasser's drive to subvert the regimes of the Arab kings not only involves terror, assassination and civil war, it also includes a carefully laid out program to win over Arab youth. The London Economist (4-27-57) devoted an informative article on this subject under the title "Egypt's Empire-Builders." Realizing the growing urge on the part of the Arab youth to gain literacy and taking advantage of the fact that in most Arab countries there are few native born teachers who are equipped to meet the educational needs of the people, Nasser has developed a corps of teachers throughout the Arab world. While the standard and quality of Egyptian pedagogy may be inferior to that of western standards, it is still high by the standards of the Middle East. "In each oil-bearing country, therefore, the protagonist of a 'greater Arab nation' under Egyptian management has an instrument ready to hand—the schoolmaster for the new school, not to mention the inspector for the schools systems as a whole." Even in the tiny sheikdom of Kuwait the number of Egyptian teachers is more than double that of native teachers.

While not all of the Egyptian teachers in the various Arab countries are pro-Nasser, the London Economist notes that everywhere they are interspersed "with members of Egypt's Cultural Mission—men and women glib with patter from

NASSER'S NETWORK

"Nasser is rapidly building up a new spy-network in Arab countries in place of his badly discredited military attaches—expelled from five Arab countries during the last 15 months for espionage and sabotage.

"Most advanced is his reorganization in Libya-area holding best British and U. S. air bases in North Africa.

"Here the new spy chief is Tewfik Shallabi, ostensibly a modest embassy archivist.

"(His predecessor, Colonel Sadek, the military attache, was expelled in November.)

"Shallabi's deputy is an Egyptian brigadier named Muhamad Tabei. But Tabei is in mufti, listed as a consul.

"The Egyptians have at their service a platoon of Libyan agents indoctrinated in Egypt.

"Shallabi and Tabei have ample funds and they are using them lavishly. Three new Egyptian clubs have been opened to replace the one closed by the Libyans.

"Newspapers and journalists are being bought to print anti-Western propaganda.

"A special effort is being made to buy leading trade unionists so that control of Libya's trades unions may pass into Egyptian and Soviet control.

"My information is that they are proving successful."

(Sefton Delmer, Daily Express, London, 6-13-57)

Cairo's Ministry of National Guidance and capable ('like the one rotten mano in a basket,' as an Iraqui put it) of injecting into a whole school the tincture of disloyalty to the local ruler or government." From time to time some of these teachers are dismissed for becoming too enthusiastic over Nasser and for paying little heed to their duties as teachers. As noted in the case of Libya, a number of the 600 Egyptian teachers in that country were deported. The same holds true for Iraq where groups of teachers have been dismissed although there are still about 500 of them in the country.

The Economist observes that even when the more ardent Nasserites among the teachers are removed, there are still jobs in other Middle East countries. "A point that at once strikes anyone who scrutinizes the efficient work they are doing, is their proprietary behavior. 'We are doing this and that. We intend to run a university here.' Who is we? Egypt's greater Arab nation, not the Kuwaitis." Wherever they go, these Egyptian teachers who are subsidized by Cairo, faithfully spread the gospel preached by the "bright young man." Hitler saw the value of this kind of operation and succeeded in establishing powerful fifth columns in many countries abroad as an adjunct to his military plans.

The amazing influence that Nasser's teachers exert throughout the Arabic world, prompts the Economist to ask the "$64,000 question": "How far is a ruler such as King Saud, or the Sheikh of Kuwait, aware of the anomaly whereby he is paying Egyptians to teach the next generation of his subjects that thrones and hereditary rule are out of date, that the western race that has created the wealth that produces superb classrooms and self-wiping blackboards, is fit only to be booed, and that a role of importance for the Arabs hangs on creating a greater Arab nation run in subservience to Cairo?" To what extent the question can be answered, only the future will tell. If the rate of present developments continues, the kings may have to give their answer sooner than they expect.

"To the Bitter End"

Nasser's role in Jordan has helped to dispel many illusions. The kings are no longer as comfortable as they were when Nasser first came to them. His initial failure in Jordan was in no small part due to the support that Hussein received from the Kings of Saudi Arabia and Iraq. This cold fact must have made a profound impression on the Egyptian dictator and may induce him to take more drastic measures.

Will the Kings be prepared for the coming counter attack? Nasser's next move may be camouflaged by the smokescreen of a new drive on Israel. The "bright young man" has been adept in employing the bogey of Israel as a means of whipping recalcitrants back in line. Will the Kings dare to penetrate the anti-Israel fog which has already led them to the brink of self-destruction?

There is no doubt that the struggle between Nasser and the Arab Kings will continue to the bitter end. Nasser will never give up his dream to rule the Arab world and only the Kings stand in his way. If the Egyptian dictator is to succeed, he must eliminate them.

AMONG NASSER'S ELITE

"For the Just-So-We-Know-Where-We-Stand-Dep't.: Back in 1938, when the Hitler hordes putched their way into Austria, a Dr. Herman Neubacher, engineer and high-ranking S.S. official, was named Mayor of Vienna. He was well remembered by the populace for having had a hand in the assassination of the nation's beloved President Dollfuss. In '45 Neubacher was sentenced by the Tito government of Yugoslavia to twenty years as a war criminal—and released after 5 years. What is Neubacher's current assignment? He's one of the most trusted advisers of Dictator Nasser of Egypt..."

WHAT HE WANTS

". . . A few months of Nasser's bluster and plotting have done more to destroy his prestige than years of delicate diplomacy.

Views on the Middle East

"The Arab states don't want the refugees settled, for if they were they would lose their most precious propaganda piece against Israel. As Ralph Galloway, until recently head of United Nations relief in Jordan, has said, 'The Arab states do not want to solve the refugee problem. They want to keep it an open sore, as an affront to the United Nations and as a weapon against Israel. Arab leaders don't give a damn whether the refugees live or die.'

"Recently, Henry Labouisse, director of U. N. R. W. A. declared that the Arab states have placed so many obstacles in the way of U. N. help for their own fellow-Arabs that it may be necessary soon to suspend such relief entirely. The Arab aim is to foster in the refugees the notion that return to their former homes is the only desideratum."

". . . The crack-up of the Arab alliance so proudly proclaimed at Cairo only a few months ago provides convincing evidence that events in the Middle East are not turning out to Nasser's liking. Jordan and Saudi Arabia have rejected his brand of leadership as well as the Soviet influence that lies behind it. They have found that the United States stands ready to offer help and support with no strings attached.

"But even if Nasser's ambitions have been temporarily checked they have by no means been crushed. Indeed, the setbacks administered to them may well have the effect of pushing the Egyptians and Syrians into further dangerous adventures . . ."

". . . It must be clear, especially from the recent disclosures on the Aswan Dam, that Dulles regards Nasser not as a friend but as someone to be overcome and brought to terms. Dulles' defect is that he dare not will the direct means to achieve the end he desires. Caught between his religious heritage, his legal training, and his Machiavellian self-image, he must always seek the means that will square all three.

"As a result he is always seeking policies that will enable him to be a legal expert, to pose as a great moral champion, and at the same time use the most cynical duplicity in the history of American foreign relations. If the results prove disastrous, as they have on the canal, he falls back on the belief that the judgment of history will prove him right . . .

"My own theory about Dulles is that he is a vain man who has a glory-image of himself as a great adventurous diplomat, even when the truth is that most of his moves are confused and often contradictory ones, taken without any real pattern or any basic philosophy . . .

"To be sure, some of his gambits—including the one on Nasser have proved disastrous blunders. The double-take on the Aswan Dam led by a fateful inevitability to the Suez war, which Dulles then tried to retrieve by betraying our allies and stripping both them and ourselves of bargaining power—which is where we are now . . ."

"When United States aid was being pumped into Egypt Nasser planted the idea that Egypt might be anxious to join a western defense alliance if only the British would give up Suez first. And so, under pressure from the United States, the British got out of Suez and Nasser immediately nationalized the canal. Now we are witnessing the results of a new mistake in foreign policy.

"For a long time Nasser was a darling to many of our diplomats and State Department officials even after he made his arms deal with the Soviet Union. And he still continues to get aid from us . . ."

"It is time that we stopped being frightened by false stereotypes and propaganda clichés about the Arabs and the Middle East. The illusion of a united, all-powerful Arab world ready to act as one force in a holy war against the outsider has been shattered by the events since October 29. Words like colonialism, imperialism, and Arab nationalism have taken on an unwarranted power to frighten and intimidate . . .

"The policy of arming the Arab rulers which was begun by this administration is one of the major factors in the Middle East crisis and a contributory reason for the state in which we now find ourselves. This policy was responsible for stirring up the rivalry between Iraq and Egypt to a new high pitch and tempted Colonel Nasser to open the gates of the Middle East to the Soviet Union, thus giving the Kremlin the opportunity she had been seeking in vain for more than a century. The extent of Communist penetration of Egypt, the large numbers of so-called technicians, and the vast stores of Soviet-bloc arms that were built up in Egypt shocked the free world when they were exposed by the Israeli sweep across the Sinai . . ."

"Secretary Dulles has a painful propensity for toying with brinkmanship, but in our opinion he has reached the brink of another lower depth when he exposed himself as an apologist for King Saud's discrimination against American citizens of the Jewish faith.

"Mr. Dulles has gained for himself the reputation of being not only a semantic contortionist, but an historic distortionist. Some months ago he tried to explain away Saudi Arabian discrimination against Jews with the wholly false rationalization that the Arab animosity against Jews derived from the fact that Jews had killed their Prophet Mohammed. Now he has come to Arab defense with the preposterous thesis that King Saud's continued discrimination against American Jews was partly motivated by the fact that he was discriminated against by New York City when it refused to give him an official reception on his recent visit to the United States.

"Since Mr. Dulles did not quote the King as having said that, it must be assumed that the effort to equate New York City with Jews was the exclusive brainchild of our Secretary of State. Secondly, even a Secretary of State is expected to know that Saudi Arabia's discriminatory policies against Americans of the Jewish faith antedate his visit to this country . . ."

When this correspondent was in Cairo last summer, another reporter was thrown out of the country for writing that he had met Dr. Johann von Leers, a notorious Nazi propagandist during World War II, and identified him as the head of the Egyptian Government's anti-Israel propaganda work. The report persists, however, that von Leers is in Cairo as a propaganda consultant to the regime.

"It is no secret that the regime has called upon Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, one of Hitler's economic brains, for advice in that field. What is perhaps ironic, however, is that the method which the Communist bloc is using to penetrate Egypt—gaining the country's economic dependence by becoming almost the one and only market for its principal export commodities—strikingly similar to the methods employed by Dr. Schacht to bring Rumania into Hitler's camp . . ."

Washington, almost single-handedly, rescued Nasser from total military debacle. Short of sacrificing every shred of honor and prestige, it cannot accept a slap in the face as reward for that service . . .

To accept that idea must say, in effect, that it is a respectable act to fight and die in self-defense but unpardonable to disarm one's assailant. ". . . Like all movements that live by the appeal to hatred, this nationalism, which attracts so many young people and idealists, is none the less an inwardly ugly movement. It is capable of such dark treachery as the bomb plot against King Saud of Saudi Arabia, organized by the Egyptian Military Attache. In propaganda and in organization, it employs every device in the Fascist book. It has now even produced a Middle Eastern 'La Prensa' case, in the form of Nasser's recent seizure of 'El Ahram' which used to be the most respected independent newspaper printed in Arabic.

"By hatred, this nationalism wins support. But it is also a betrayal of the masses to whom it beckons. For every practical Arab interest now calls for equal friendship with the West. ". . . Britain's decision to permit its ships to use the Suez Canal was inevitable. Thanks to the United Nations the canal is open; thanks largely to the United States it is under Egyptian control. With Middle Eastern oil so vital London had little choice but to accept use of the canal on whatever terms it could get . . .

"Beyond all these factors lie the basic discontent of the West over a situation which leaves the canal's future involved in inter-Arab rivalry and the Soviet effort to expand its influence into the Middle East. What it all boils down to is that Nasser has won a big victory. The West has suffered another painful demonstration of the impossibility of reasoning with an arrogant, power-thirsty dictator. Only force makes an impression on such people. And if power is lacking, or if the exercise thereof is impractical, then there is no use of continued prattling that the U. ". . . Meanwhile, there is one problem which cannot await a general settlement—the Arab refugees. This ever-growing Communist infection must be tackled in Jordan, where they number 500,000, if nowhere else. Four governments hold the key—America, Britain, Jordan and Israel. If Israel would take back 100,000 or so—and Ben-Gurion gave me good grounds for hoping she would if Jordan would play her part—America and Britain should spare neither money nor effort to get Jordan to resettle the residue by promoting largescale irrigation schemes."

Secretary Dulles and the Arab Plot Against Israel

By

G. F. HUDSON

In a public statement issued on March 15, after the arrival of Major-General Abdel Hassan Latif as Egyptian Governor in Gaza, the Israeli Foreign Ministry declared:

"For the Egyptian dictator there is apparently reserved a unique code of international law and conduct whereby, while waging a one-sided warfare against Israel, he is to be given the shelter of the United Nations."

This sentence does not exaggerate the state of affairs which has arisen as a result of the application in the United Nations of a double standard of law for judging the actions of Israel and Egypt respectively. It is now a fact of history that the United Nations under the leadership of the United States and the Soviet Union, and with the active connivance of the Secretary-General, has shown extreme partiality and injustice in dealing with the Israeli-Egyptian conflict. It remains to seek an adequate explanation for this extraordinary episode and to consider what it implies for the future.

There has never been an international crisis in which the facts have been so little in dispute. Nobody denies—least of all the Egyptians themselves—that Egypt claims to be in a state of war with Israel and therefore to exercise belligerent rights. Nobody denies that Egypt has for six years kept the Suez Canal closed to Israeli shipping in defiance of a resolution of the Security Council, has forcibly kept Israeli shipping out of the Gulf of Aqaba, and has organized systematic raiding of Israeli territory by fedayeen bands. Nobody, in other words, denies that Egypt has been committing acts of war against Israel ever since the conclusion of the 1949 armistice, which was supposed to lead to a negotiated peace settlement.

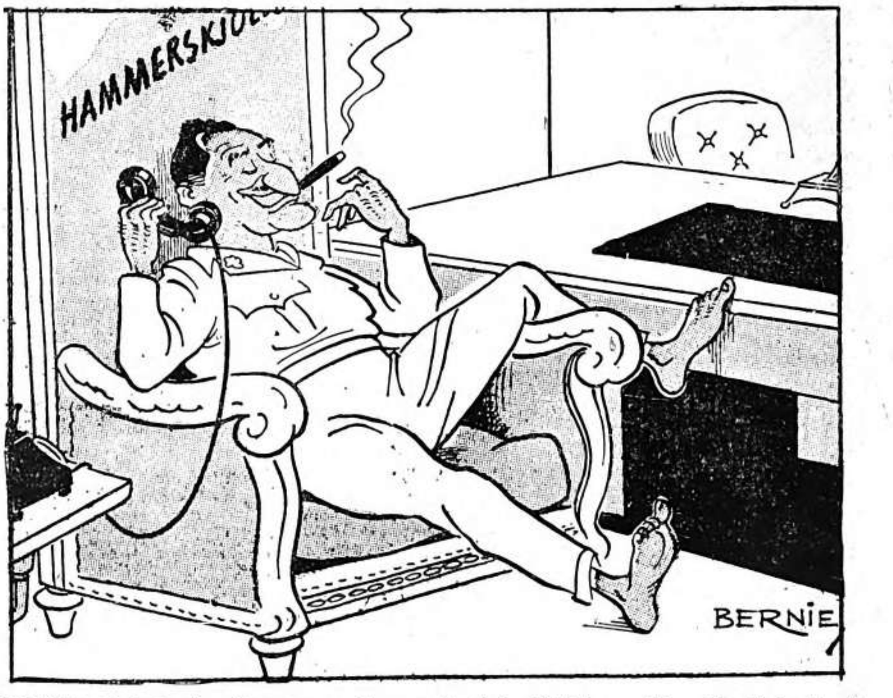
Yet, as soon as Israel also exercises belligerent rights and commits acts of war against Egypt, virtually the whole world as organized in the United Nations (including not only the Arab and Moslem states, which were predisposed to side with Egypt, but also governments which might have been expected to approach the issue impartially) agrees to treat Egypt as an innocent victim of aggression and order the Israeli forces to withdraw without exacting from a defeated Egypt any renunciation of belligerency.

It can, of course, be argued that military occupation of another country's territory is so different from blockade and guerrilla raids that the one must formally be reckoned as war and the other not. But it is clear that governments which invoke this distinction in regard to the Israeli-Egyptian conflict would not be willing themselves to accept the logical implications of the principle.

If, for example, the Russians were to start firing on American ships in the Baltic or shooting rockets into California from submarines in the Pacific, one cannot imagine John Foster Dulles explaining to the American people that nothing had been done to justify armed retaliation because no Russian troops were in occupation of any part of American territory. It is only Egypt which is deemed to possess, uniquely among the nations of the world, the right to wage war without interference and yet to be protected by the world's security organization from the normal risks of belligerency.

It was also argued during last month's crisis that no Israeli conditions for withdrawal could be accepted because it was not for the aggressor to lay down terms for the cessation of his offense. Any pledges given to Israel, it was held, would mean that a nation was profiting by an act of aggression, and this was something the UN could not tolerate.

But it should never have been necessary for Israel to demand guarantees and be put in the position of bargaining with the UN over terms for evacuation. The UN of its own accord should have required a renunciation of belligerency by both sides as part of an Assembly resolution for putting an end to the state of war between Israel and Egypt.



NASSER: This is the Secretary General of the U. N. . . . Yes, I'm listening!

Aux Ecoutes, Paris

In view of the fact that Egypt openly claimed belligerent rights, it was the plain duty of the Assembly to call on Egypt to renounce these rights at the same time that it required Israel to evacuate Egyptian territory—especially as Egypt was manifestly incapable of bringing about an Israeli withdrawal by her own strength.

If the Assembly failed to perform this duty, it was in no way due to any moral scruples about "rewarding aggression," but solely due to the formation of a log-rolling bloc of interests which made it possible to obtain a two-thirds vote for sanctions against Israel, but not for any restriction on Egypt . . .

The Arab world is up for auction to the highest bidder, and the bids are required not only in economic aid or concessions but also, and above all, in toleration or support for the pan-Arab designs against Israel.

Nobody acquainted with pan-Arab propaganda and the sentiments of Arab politicians can honestly doubt that these designs, unless checked and restrained from outside, must sooner or later lead to an all-out Arab-Israeli war. The majority of Arab leaders frankly declare that Israel must be eliminated as a state; the few moderates who are willing to accept the existence of an Israeli nation insist on such a reduction of its territory that it would cease to be viable. Not only does the anti-Israeli cause arouse the strongest emotions among Arabs, but it is also the only issue on which the separate Arab states can effectively be combined. And this means that it is a political necessity for politicians aiming at increased influence in the Arab world to dwell on it and exacerbate it as much as possible.

Since the Israelis have no intention of submitting to national extinction (or even to deprivation of territory which they now hold) without a desperate fight, the present policies of Israel's Arab neighbors must inevitably result in war —whenever the Arab leaders feel that they have attained military superiority over Israel and are reasonably sure there will be no great-power intervention against them.

The military superiority they require is a matter of modern arms, of training in their use, and of close coordination between the forces of the Arab states directly concerned. Manpower is not a problem, for the odds in terms of population are overwhelmingly on the side of the Arabs. But time is needed to bring the Arab armed forces to the point where they will be qualitatively a match for the Israelis. The arms deliveries from the Soviet bloc, by nullifying the Western attempt to keep peace in the Middle East through a balance in military supplies, have made the project of a serious attack on Israel one of practical politics.

Last October, when the Israelis struck against Egypt, the confederates were still unprepared. The Egyptians had not yet had enough training to handle the heavy weapons with which they had been provided, their staff work proved quite inadequate, and neither Syria nor Jordan took any military action in support of Egypt. The result was a setback in the Arab timetable.

But this cannot be more than a postponement of the day of wrath, and the former buildup has now been resumed: Soviet arms are again coming into the Middle East, and the United States, under its agreement with Saudi Arabia and the provisions of the Eisenhower Doctrine, is also engaged in arming Arab states, even if supplies are not at the moment going directly to Egypt. The recent proceedings in the United Nations and the course of American diplomacy as conducted by Secretary Dulles have given the Arab leaders more reason than ever before to hope that they can achieve the destruction of Israel without serious interference from outside. They have, therefore, only to wait until their military strength matures and meanwhile keep the pot boiling by agitation, propaganda, threats, incidents and the partial exercise of belligerent rights.

There is only one thing that can stop this rake's progress toward another war in the Middle East, and that is a firm declaration by the Western great powers that they will not allow what the Arab leaders intend to do.

If the United States, with or without Britain and France, were to give Israel within her existing frontiers a definite guarantee against armed attack (as unambiguous as that which has been given to Formosa) and at the same time to recognize Israel's right to retaliation for as long as Egypt claims to exercise rights of belligerency, then the propagandists of the destruction of Israel would have to desist from their perpetual rabble-rousing. They would then know that they could never make war on Israel without making war on America, and that they could never, therefore, deliver the goods which they teach their mob-audiences to expect from them.

The long-term effect of such a declaration would be to pacify the Middle East by removing the hope of destroying Israel from the realm of practical politics. But the immediate result might well be an outburst of fury and resentment among the Arabs which might be damaging to American oil interests and lead the Arab rulers to make dramatic gestures of appealing to Russia. There would, in fact, be little danger in this, for if the Soviet Government were convinced that America would protect Israel against an Arab attack it would be very unlikely to support such an attack, unless it intended to go to war with America in any case.

But clearly the short-term tension would involve a period of unpleasantness for the Secretary of State, and Dulles is not willing to face such a prospect. His idea of a Middle East policy is to win the friendship of the Arab states, particularly Saudi Arabia, and to avoid offending them in any way—a policy which is obviously incompatible with any sort of guarantee to Israel.

It is charitable to suppose that Dulles believes that he will be able to use the influence he expects to gain in the Arab world to restrain its leaders, when the time comes, from an all-out attack on Israel. If so, he has fatally overestimated the restraint which can be exerted by counsels of moderation on an inflamed nationalist fanaticism when there is no deterrent of military commitment to support them.

But it is really not fair to Dulles to assume that he is the victim of such illusions. He is a diplomat of great knowledge and experience; his defects are not of intellect, but of character. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from his recent behavior is that he understands very well the price that has to be paid ultimately for the ends he pursues and that he is prepared to pay it.

The man who goes to an auction determined to get what he wants must be ready to bid as high as is necessary. The Arabs require payment primarily in the form of material and diplomatic support for their design of destroying Israel. Arab friendship as between America and Russia is to go to the power which will make the better offers to this end. And if Dulles is to beat Russia in this game, he must in the long run do everything to help the Arabs short of using American bombers to wipe out Tel Aviv. But why should he not? Israel is not his country, and he thinks it important to conciliate the Arabs.

In such a policy, Dulles can expect to find a good second in Selwyn Lloyd, a worthy representative of the pro-Arab "camel corps" school of British Middle Eastern diplomacy. Britain was trying to buy Arab friendship by an anti-Israeli policy long before the Eisenhower Administration entered the market. Nothing during the last two years has whetted Arab appetites more than Sir Anthony Eden's Mansion House (Guildhall) speech in the autumn of 1955. Eden indicated then that the condition of a Palestine peace settlement must be an Israeli willingness to make territorial cessions.

Britain's subsequent quarrel with Nasser over Suez superficially brought her into an alignment with Israel against Egypt, but British-Israeli relations in fact remained as bad as ever. Eden appears to have imagined that by proclaiming the Anglo-French intervention in Egypt to be a move to separate the Egyptian and Israeli forces he could dissociate Britain from the Israeli action. As it turned out, nobody took the Eden version seriously; in the eyes of the Arabs, the British were acting in collusion with Israel, and the universal Arab sympathy for Egypt was far greater than it would have been had Britain used force against Egypt immediately after Nasser's rejection of the London Conference proposals for international administration of the Suez Canal.

Since the fiasco of the Suez intervention, however, the British Government has been making tentative attempts to regain Arab favor by showing hostility toward Israel. Selwyn Lloyd has publicly returned to the Eden thesis that Israel can have peace only if she is willing to cede territory. Since Israel's present territory is the bare minimum needed for strategic and economic viability, and since there is no juridical or moral ground for requiring territorial cessions from Israel any more than from the Arab states, this attitude is nothing but an encouragement to the Arab leaders to intensify pressure and threats against Israel. It is a way of giving notice that Britain is not committed to any protection of Israel.

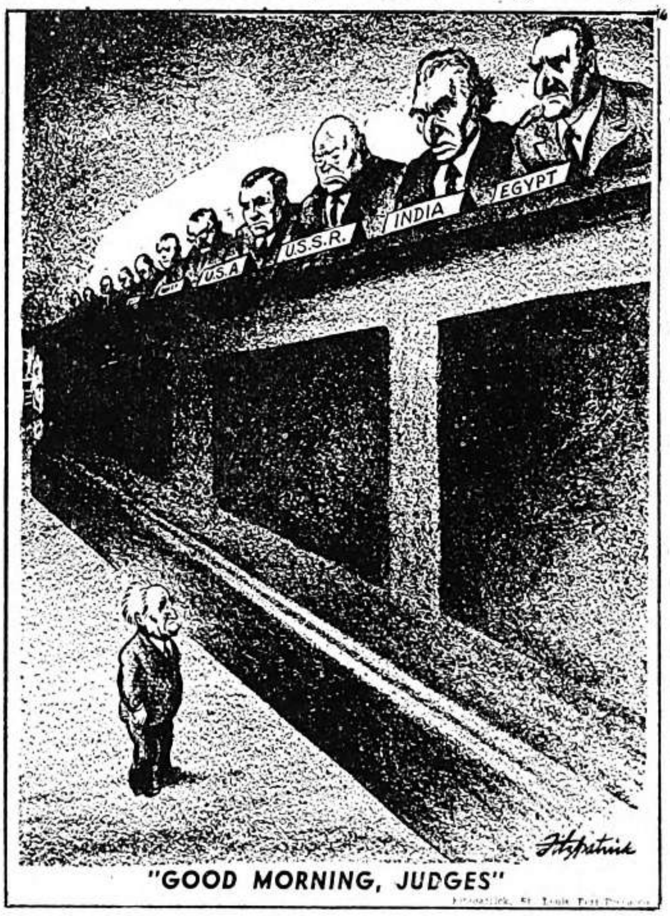
The American and British policies toward Israel are also in harmony with the attitude of the Soviet Union. The Communists have always been hostile to Zionism—in the early days because it was a rival to Marxism for the ideological allegiance of the younger generation of East European Jewry, and later because the state of Israel, allegedly an outpost of American imperialism, was feared as a source of influence over Jews in Russia and the satellite countries.

Since the Eisenhower Administration took over in Washington, it must have been obvious to the Kremlin that Israel no longer enjoyed American favor or support, but Russia has found a new motive for hostility to Israel in the desire to obtain predominant influence in the Arab world. Recent Russian policy has been to suggest to the Arabs that if only they will dissociate themselves sufficiently from all ties with the West, they can count on Russian help to achieve the aim of eliminating Israel.

It is this Russian championship of the Arab cause which has created the market in Arab friendship open to bids by the Western powers. In the Middle East, competitive coexistence between Russia and the West has become competitive anti-Zionism. It may be a source of satisfaction to those who feel nostalgia for the good old days of Big Three unity that America, Britain and Russia have found in a common partiality for the enemies of Israel at least one subject in world affairs on which they can agree. Their concord in conspiracy for the obliteration of a small people is all the more impressive in that it would certainly have had the unreserved approbation of Hitler.

But a rivalry for the more effective fulfilment of Arab desires is not, of course, the same thing as a real agreement about the future of the Middle East. The Russian purpose is to become sole patron of an Arab confederacy and to exclude the influence of the West. Thus, Moscow has no interest in cooperation with the West for a settlement, even at Israel's expense.

With America, Britain and Russia all competitively aligned against Israel, France is the only power which definitely takes Israel's side in the conflict. This is not, it must be admitted, because the French have a greater regard for abstract



"GOOD MORNING, JUDGES"

Fitzpatrick, St. Louis Post-Dispatch

justice, but because their view of their national self-interest happens to coincide with the aim of preserving the Israeli state instead of aiding and abetting Arab plans to destroy it. The French have no oil holdings in Arabia or Iraq, or pipelines through Syria, and therefore less susceptible to blackmail from that quarter. Their attention is concentrated on North Africa, where they regard Egypt as their principal enemy, and they are therefore ready to support Israel as a check on Egypt.

But it is not primarily on French support that Israel, apart from reliance on her own right arm, bases her hopes for future survival. It is on the general attitude of public opinion throughout the Western world, and not least in America and Britain. This public opinion holds that Israel is entitled to national independence and security, that the same principles of law should be applied impartially to Israel and the Arabs, and that a "solution" of the conflict which compels withdrawal of victorious Israeli forces while leaving Egypt with belligerent rights is unjust and absurd.

The feeling of the American people on the matter was shown clearly enough, both in the press and in Congress, when it was a question of the United States voting for sanctions against Israel. Not even President Eisenhower's broadcast availed to persuade the nation that black was white when it was so obviously black. Nor was the verdict of public opinion any different in Europe . . .

It is this strong current of public opinion which will in the end frustrate the schemes of the American and British Foreign Ministers for buying the Arabs by complicity in the murder of Israel. The American people are too decent for Dulles and the British nation is not bad enough for Selwyn Lloyd. A series of episodes in recent history has shown that the foreign policies of democratic nations cannot in the long run be conducted along lines which are repugnant to the consciences of the great bulk of their citizens.

The policy which has recently been pursued by Secretary of State Dulles must lead inexorably, if it is continued, to the perpetration of a great international crime. But it can be foreseen with a high degree of certainty that, before that point is reached, the American people will rebel against the policy. The danger is that the turn will come too late to avert war in the Middle East, and that catastrophe will overtake the Western democracies while they are trying to extricate themselves from commitments to the Arabs. A world war can start in Palestine if there is doubt about America's position—as there was over Korea in 1950. Today there is still time to reconsider policy and relate it to the fundamental principles for which the Western democracies stand. But the time is short.

WILL WE LEARN THE LESSON?

"... Here is where the lessons of history should trouble our awareness. What happened in 1933 and 1934 and 1935 and 1936 under the Nazis? Oh, they weren't killing any Jews then. There weren't any concentration camps or gas chambers or crematoria then. The Nazis were only making things unpleasant for the Jews ...

"And now we are confronted with a new totalitarianism, a new dictatorship on the banks of the Nile. And to what lengths this dictatorship program of persecution may go, the thinking mind fears to contemplate. In the 1930's there were those who said that the Nazi treatment of the German Jews is an internal matter. Why worry about some 600,000 German Jews when world peace is on our agenda? The massacre of 6 million was in part a result of the world's indifference. Today, in 1957, we cannot say, 'Why worry about the Jews in Egypt? It's an internal Egyptian matter; after all, there is the Arab-Israel conflict.'

"It is not without significance that much of this anti-Jewish program in Egypt is being directed by former Nazis, and that there is today an axis between Dictator Nasser and the Soviet Union with its history of Stalin's and Khrushchev's antisemitism ..."

DANGEROUS CRITICISM!

"We learn from an absolutely reliable source that Mr. Bohlen was recalled from Moscow and sent to the golden retreat of Manila for having violently criticized Mr. Dulles' policies in the Near East.

"In a series of reports Mr. Bohlen attempted to put Mr. Dulles on guard against his tentative folly of appeasing Nasser. It was necessary, according to him, to support France and Great Britain in their endeavors to put an end to the dictatorial adventure which imperiled the most important strategic crossroad of the world, or convoke a four-power conference with the Russians on all the pending problems. In one case or the other, Nasser would have had to go and the Suez Canal would have returned to its international status.

What About the German General Staff?

It is reasonable to assume that most persons conversant with the history of German militarism must think, above all, of the German General Staff. The character of this "Institution" is unique and in fundamental respects differs from the role of the general staffs of other major countries.

John W. Wheeler-Bennett, in his exhaustive study of this subject (The Nemesis Of Power), notes that the forces controlled by the German General Staff "dominated the Weimar Republic from the moment of its birth . . . first supported, and then condoned the overthrow of the Republic and . . . made a major contribution to Hitler's coming to power." The basic reason why the German General Staff (hereafter initialed GGS) bears these responsibilities lies in the fact that its functions encompass far more than the military phases of planning and waging wars.

The GGS was the clearing house and ultimate arbiter of the political and economic policies pertaining to the domestic and foreign affairs of Germany. It coordinated the activities of powerful interests and groups ranging from the ardent Pan-Germans to the traveling salesmen of Krupp and IG Farben. It served as the final censor of ideas and, at the same time, was the fountainhead of the German dream to rule the world.

The power and the influence of the GGS was recognized by the Aliles after World War I, and the Versailles Treaty called for its suppression. However, the proscription was to no avail as the GGS, under various guises, succeeded in maintaining its grip on Germany's destiny.

The Danger to Peace

The demand for the abolishment of the GGS and the German Officer Corps which replenished its ranks, rose again after World War II. The US Foreign Economic Administration which made a thorough analysis of the German war potential at the end of the war, declared that peace could not be won without the elimination of the GGS and its reestablishment prohibited under any circumstances.

At the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials the Allied prosecution charged that the GGS was a criminal organization and should be so judged by the Tribunal. In his summation of the Prosecution's case against the GGS Brig. General Telford Taylor referred to a passage in Sumner Welles' book, Time For Decision: "The authority to which the German people have so often and so disastrously responded, was not in reality the German emperor of yesterday, or the Hitler of today, but the German General Staff. It will be said that this insistence that the German General Staff has been the driving force in German policy, is a dangerous oversimplification. I am not disposed to minimize the importance of other factors in Germany history. They all have their place but I am convinced that each of them has played its part only in so far as it was permitted to do so by the real matser of the German race, namely, German militarism, personified in, and channeled through, the German General Staff . . .

"Whether their ostensible ruler is the Kaiser, or Hindenburg, or Adolf Hitler, the continuing loyalty of the bulk of the population is given to that military force controlled and guided by the German General Staff. To the German people, the Army today, as in the past, is the instrument by which German domination will be brought about. Generations of Germans may pass. The nation may undergo defeat after defeat. But if the rest of the world permits it, the German General Staff will continue making its plans for the future."

Similar warnings were raised by other prominent Americans. General Julius Ochs Adler, the late treasurer of the New York Times, urged that the GGS should be "imprisoned for life if not shot" because it represented a continual danger to world peace (New York Times, 7-6-45). President Eisenhower minced no words on this subject. He declared: "The German General Staff itself must be utterly destroyed. These wars of Germany's have been, from the standpoint of the general staff, merely campaigns—merely incidents. They started back in 1806 under Scharnhorst, and they have determined to rule Europe, and, in my opinion, they have used these political leaders that have come along in order to implement their own ideas and planning. If they found a Hitler-like leader with his tremendous ability of mob psychology, who could get the whole German nation behind him, he was useful. It happened he got so powerful he dominated them.

"Now, how are you going to destroy that German general staff is something else again, because many of them have the excuse they did their duty as honorable soldiers. But my opinion is that it should be made utterly impossible for them to function again" (New York Herald Tribune, 6-19-45).

The numerous voices of Allied leaders calling for destruction of this dangerous "institution" reflected the deepest wishes of the peoples who had been victimized by German militarism. Have their hopes been realized or are we going through the same make believe world as after World War I? This question inevitably arises as both, East and West, race to rearm the former enemy.

Does the rearmament of Germany preclude the resurgence of the GGS—or are we closer to the truth when we say that German rearmament without the GGS is as inconceivable as a flame without oxygen? Toward the end of World War II Life Magazine carried an article on German militarism wherein it was stated that the GGS "is reborn as soon as two trained German officers meet in a ratskeller and talk war or simply sit and think about how to win the next war." Even if we should regard Life's description as an oversimplification, it is none the less essential to know what is happening today and what may be anticipated. Admittedly this is a difficult assignment and we do not pretend at this juncture to be able to draw hard and fast conclusions. The difficulties are compounded by the fact that by tradition and practice the GGS is a highly secretive organization. Moreover, news about military affairs in Germany is scant and superficial. For example, we are told that military uniforms will no longer be styled along the old Wehrmacht lines, nor will there be any more goose-stepping. This may make good news but it hardly tells us anything about the inner developments relative to the new German armies.

Recognizing these handicaps it is possible to gather tidbits of information which come to the surface now and then. Though they do not form a complete picture, they are straws which we dare not ignore. The remainder of this article is devoted to an examination of these bits of evidence.

Post-War Signs

In the January 29, 1950 issue of the New York Times, Drew Middleton wrote a lengthy article under the title Ghosts Of The Old Wehrmacht. He discussed the dangers inherent in the revival of Germany's military power. "What insurance," he wrote, "has the West that the re-establishment of the German army will not produce some new von Seeckt or Scharnhorst?" Answering his own question, Mr. Middleton said: "It may be argued that the German officer corps was decimated in World War II, which is true, and that the General Staff is scattered and impotent in Germany today, which is also true. But, given the basic condition of a German army, would not these elements reunited, especially in a period when Western eyes are fixed on Moscow rather than on Bonn?"

On March 6, 1950, the Associated Press reported from Bonn that German generals "of the old GGS have started a campaign to restore the German Officer Corps to its former glory." One of the members of this group, Gen. Fritz Koch, boasted that contact was maintained between some 4000 generals, members of the GGS, the Supreme Command and others who held key positions under Hitler. While former High Commissioner McCloy minimized this development other Allied officials, according to the A. P., said that this movement "might serve as the nucleus for a new GGS."

Gen. Koch was not bashful when he was questioned by western newsmen with respect to the activities and possibilities of his group. "Money is only a secondary problem," he said. "We want our honor restored," he declared. "We want an apology for the post-war defamation of the German Officer Corps." In defiant tones he declared that the Allies could not prevent the German Military from recovering its strength and unity, "we top flight officers have known each other for decades and nobody can keep us from keeping in touch with each other."

The year 1950 also marked the appearance of the so-called Brüderschaft. As far back as the No. 35 issue of Prevent World War III, the Society exposed this organization as consisting of former German army officers under the leadership of General von Manteuffel, former commander of the Greater Germany Division. It was ascertained that the Brüderschaft membership consisted of a number of high ranking former officers of the GGS who receive the support of powerful financial circles in Germany, including Chancellor Adenauer's close friend and advisor, the bank-

The first meeting of this militaristic organization took place on December 11, 1950. Its deliberations were secret but nevertheless there were sufficient leaks to indicate that the Brüderschaft's main aim was to uphold the traditions of German militarism and to rally those forces that were associated with the various enterprises undertaken by the GGS.

he Brüderschaft paid particular attention to Russo-German relations and veered toward the Bismarckian policy of close union between Germany and Russia. We shall refer to the Brüderschaft again when we deal with German militarism and Russo-German relations at the present time.

The activities of German militarists proceeded apace without any particular hindrance by the occupying powers. Indeed, developments reached the point where the London Daily Express felt it justified to report to its readers that "the GGS, the mercilessly effective machine which for 100 years drew the plans for European wars is here again" (7-16-51). The early signs pointing to the resurgence of German military activities drew little atteniton in the western press. However, two years ago the New York Post ran two sensational articles by its correspondent William Richardson who wrote that "the West German Defense Ministry is planning to revive the GGS."

Mr. Richardson noted that in spite of Bonn's plans to put the GGS in new clothes "it will remain basically the GGS concept of Gneisenau and Scharnhorst." Mr. Richardson brought out the fact that many experts believed that the most dangerous angle about the revived concept of the GGS was precisely that it had been conceived in Bonn by the men who rebelled in 1944 against Hitler. "Their actions in 1944 made them the darlings of the west. They were feted and honored by Allied Occupation officers and Konrad Adenauer as the good, the democratic elements in Germany, but in a hard-headed sense they had built their entire post-war careers on this foundation of disaffection against authority, the revolutionary approach. It paid off" (3-17-55).

Richardson referred to the fact that it was not until 1944 that powerful members of the GGS decided to rebel against Hitler; that is, when they knew that Hitler's game was up and that it was essential to plan for the future. Thus, by irony, as Mr. Richardson brings out, the Allies have applauded the so-called rebels against Hitler who—in reality—rebelled because their main concern was the preservation of Germany's military potential above anything else.

In a subsequent report on this subjest (3-22-55) Mr. Richardson observed that the detailed planning which the West German Defense Ministry had undertaken for the new army, ostensibly on a democratic basis, could be used "to conceal and distort the true German defense picture from our own and NATO authority." He noted that the GGS had succeeded in fooling the Allies after World War I and that, therefore, it was certainly not beyond the realm of possibility that they would repeat. To those who find comfort that many of the German generals were not Nazi party members and did not actively participate in some of the more horrifying crimes perpetrated by Hitler's Wehrmacht, Mr. Richardson wrote, "These observations are quite beyond the point. Some of the finest men in western Europe may serve on the GGS, but they are still men who regard Koenigsberg as their mecca, and Marburg home of the Teutonic Knights as their spiritual capital. They are dedicated to a tenth century concept of chivalry, a Bismarckian approach of realpolitik, a 1925 concept of camaraderie and concealment and a 1944 belief that flouting authority does pay."

About the same time that Mr. Richardson made his disclosures, the French newspaper France Soir (2-22-55) carried a report from its correspondent in Bonn entitled "A Vest Pocket General Staff." The correspondent noted that the Bonn Defense Ministry consisted of former members of the GGS who made special efforts to hide their true identity. They are an aristocratic group, he wrote, "the former officers of the GGS coming from that 'General Staff' which was the nursery of the big German military leaders." He estimated that there were about 900 of these high officers but that about 890 remained secluded and are unknown to the outside world while the remaining 10 act as their spokesmen on all matters. They are the specialists on "public relations." They are the ones who tell all that needs to be known about what the German military is doing and planning.

The "New" Structure

Reports concerning the internal organization and structure of the German military leadership are pertinent to this survey. In 1949 Hitler's foremost expert on tank warfare, General Heinz Guderian, prepared a memorandum on military organization for American military officials. The essentials of this memorandum take on particular significance when they are compared to the setup which the West German Federal Republic has devised for its own military organization.

Guderian advocated that the three branches of the armed forces—Army, Navy and Airforce—be directly subordinate to the commander-in-chief of all of the armed forces. He proposed that the commander-in-chief of the armed forces should be directly responsible to the Chief of State. This concept of a tightly knit military organization whose sole civilian control would be in the person of the Chief of State was denounced by Cognressman Thomas H. Werdel: "The German plan outlines a military high command which is the ultimate, the millennium in the complete Prussian GGS concept. It holds that the military should control the destiny of the nation at time of war and have decisive voice on everything which affects the military in time of peace."

The Bonn Government boasts that its military structure is a radical departure from the past. However, in essential respects there is a startling similarity between the Guderian plan and Bonn's setup. In time of peace the West German Defense Minister possesses the supreme authority of command. It is admitted in the "Bulletin" of the German Government (5-17-56) that "the Defense Minister in his capacity of 'civilian' commander-in-chief enjoys a standing which from a political point of view puts him in a strong position." Thus, the defense minister has approximately the same function in times of peace as Guderian's Chief-of-State.

Directly subordinate to the minister of defense is the so-called Inspector General of all of the armed forces. Just as Guderian sought the abolishment of the independent high commands of the various branches of the armed forces, so does the new setup in West Germany enable the Inspector General of the armed forces to dominate all of the branches. The Inspector General in turn is directly accountable to the all powerful Minister of Defense. The centralization of the armed forces is the very heart of the plans advocated by West Germany's Defense Minister Franz Josef Strauss. Time Magazine (10-29-56) discussed the Strauss plan and noted that it was "tantamount to a German General Staff." The New York Times (1-17-57) reported that Herr Strauss wanted to streamline the command structure in which authority was broadly dispersed. "His idea is to centralize the military leadership in the person of a dynamic officer." In this connection the New York Times reported (2-12-57) Strauss as stating that under his plan "the top military officer (Inspector General) would have some of the duties assigned to the chief of the old German General Staffs . . . It appeared that the Inspector General's role would be determined in a large measure by the personalities of the officer and the defense minister." In other words, ultimate control over the German military leadership will depend upon personalities and not law. Certainly this is not a departure from the past.

At the end of May, Herr Strauss announced that final reorganization of the military leadership had been achieved. General Heusinger becomes the Inspector General and all military branches which heretofore had a certain amount of independence, will be subordinated to his command. General Heusinger's powers are enhanced by the fact that he will not only rule over the armed forces but also over the civilian sections of the Defense Ministry. If General Heinz Guderian were alive today, he would be the first to congratulate Herr Strauss. It is significant that in all of the defense planning including organizational problems, Chancellor Adenauer's Government has employed the services of some of the highest officers of Hitler's GGS including Field Marshal von Manstein, General Franz Halder, and General Walter Wenck.

"Ideology"

Ideological questions are also important as regards the new German Army. German officers are becoming more and more articulate in expounding theories as to what kind of army the Germans should have. The New York Herald Tribune (12-9-53) reported that there were strong cliques among former German officers who show no enthusiasm for democratizing the German army and "would like to see the return of the more Spartan disciplinary notions of the past." The Tribune story disclosed that the German Soldier Calendar for 1954, distributed annually by the German veterans paper Soldaten Zeitung, carried as its frontispiece a flattering full page portrait of former Grand Admiral Raeder, a convicted war criminal and one of Hitler's closest military associates. At the same time this calendar published an article by the West German Defense Ministry on the problem of "democratizing" the new German army. One former Major General Wilhelm Soeth, a holder of the Knights Cross of the Iron Cross and a commander of one of Hitler's panzer divisions, expressed his idea of democratization as follows: "The officer should be exactly like the prewar officer who stood the test superbly while on the front in World War II . . ."

The re-establishment of Germany's military glory and the "honor" of her soldiers is a favorite theme among the German brass. In July 1952, the two leading figures of the present German military setup, Generals Heusinger and Speidel, declared that it would be impossible to recruit desirable officers for West German military contingents "unless a substantial number of war criminals are released from Allied jails" (New York Times, 7-24-52). The position taken by Heusinger and Speidel has received the full support of leading German politicians including Chancellor Adenauer.

The granting of sovereignty to West Germany and the statements of Allied authorities repeated over and over again to the effect that the security of the west-

". . . The Soviet price has been neutrality for Germany. The three major Western powers have rejected it.

"Reports reaching this capital indicate that the Soviet price may be more attractive in the future to smaller members of the Atlantic alliance than it has been in the past.

"This is because Dr. Konrad Abenauer, Chancellor of West Germany, a member of the alliance, has been talking about atomic weapons for the new West German forces. The Continental powers do not like the idea of a nuclear power in the center of Europe.

"This is not solely because confidence in West Germany's good intentions is less in the capitals of smaller nations than it is in Washington or London. A more important reason is that West Germany's emergence as a nuclear power would insure that any war fought in Europe would be a nuclear war."

ern world depended upon Germany's fighting power, has increased the arrogance of the German military. No longer do they stress democratization; instead they deride the "fandangled ideas" of the Allies. An effective fighting machine, they say, cannot be built on the "anarchic liberalism" preached by the West. The "traditionalists" have become more prominent in the councils of the German Defense Ministry and publications representing the old German Officer Corps denounce what they call "alien influences" at work. Demands have been put forth to put an end at once to the so-called defamation of the German military, to grant full equality to all of the former members of the Waffen SS and to free all German war criminals. The Deutsche Soldaten Zeitung demanded greater awareness of the fact that "the Bonn Government is living off the dividends of the moral capital that the German armies have built up in the world in the last 200 years" (New York Herald Tribune, 1-16-56).

The speed with which the traditionalists have come to the forefront has alarmed some sections of the German people. This is reflected in the demand made by the Sociel Democratic Party for parliamentary investigation of militaristic and nationalistic indoctrination of the officer corps of the new army. The immediate cause for this demand stems from the activities of the so-called Democratic Workers Association, founded in 1951 under the patronage of high officials in the Federal Chancellory. The activities of this organization include lectures and briefings for German army officers. According to the New York Times (3-7-57), the Association has attained a "preëminent position in the education of the Officer Corps."

The "New" Leadership

Intimately connected with the ideological battles of the traditionalists is the question of leadership responsible for the West German armed forces. Here again the data on hand concerning the top brass is scanty. The Germans just do not like the kind of publicity and are extremely sensitive to inquiries. We do know this, however, that nearly half of the members of Hitler's German General Staff and High Command were alive at the end of the war and had escaped charges of war crimes. Even in the majority of cases where members of the GGS were put on trial, they were given comparatively light sentences and subsequently freed. Germany will have no difficulty in finding the personnel to lead the armed forces, especially since there are about 1700 former generals available.

What has been the attitude of the Bonn Government toward the staffing of "new" personnel for the army? According to former Defense Minister Blank, "we will make no blanket discrimination among the applicants. We will judge every applicant on an individual basis according to his military ability and his human qualities. That will be the solution of the problem of the reenlistment of members of the Waffen SS" (New York Herald Tribune, 12-29-53).

The Waffen SS was adjudged as a notorious criminal organization at Nuremberg but now those who belonged to it are being welcomed into the ranks of the armed forces. It is true that there is a screening board that is supposed to weed out individuals who are regarded as objectionable. But it remains to be seen how effective this board will be, especially as Germany's militaristic traditions are revived.

At the end of 1954 it was estimated that the personnel section of the Defense Ministry had already recruited 40 generals, 250 colonels and 21,500 other officers. In 1956, according to the German newspaper Die Welt, 31 out of the 38 generals that now head up the new German army, were members of the former GGS. As of October 1, 1956, 100 of 237 colonels and 84 of 225 Lt. Colonels were likewise GGS officers. Six of the generals, 64 colonels and 75 Lt. Colonels led combat units in World War II for a period of more than 3 years. This would clearly indicate that these particular officers were heart and soul with the German war effort at least while the going was good.

While it is not possible to deal in detail with all of the key members associated with the GGS we think it would be instructive to examine briefly the backgrounds of some of them.

The "Big Brass"

General Adolf Heusinger. Heusinger who has been described as the typical Prussian officer, is now the head of the German armed forces. He sparked the campaign for the freedom of German officers who had been charged and imprisoned for war crimes. Heusinger was chief of the operations branch of the Nazi armies under Hitler. He worked out the plans for German aggression against Belgium, Holland, and France. Afterwards, he wrote a book wherein he attacked Hitler for failing to wipe out the British army at Dunkirk.

Gen. Heusinger was a close pal of one of Hitler's top generals, Jodl, who was hanged at Nuremberg for war crimes. Heusinger once characterized Jodl as "a thoroughly decent man."

General Hans Speidel. Recently the central land forces of NATO were placed under the command of Gen. Hans Speidel. The appointment created a furor in Western Europe. The peoples victimized by German aggression were at loss to understand how the principles underlying NATO could be squared with the appointment of this man.

The "public relations experts" have tried to build up Speidel as a scholarly Ph.D. who hated Hitler and loves the French. But facts cannot be whitewashed. Speidel was a member of the old Reichswehr that had been organized by Gen. von Seeckt which, in turn, became the nucleus of Hitler's Wehrmacht. His military qualities were recognized by the GGS in the early 1930s and he was appointed first as an aide to the military attaché of the Reich Embassy in Paris. Subsequently, he was named head of the Western Division of Counter Espionage in the GGS.

During his stay in Paris he directed German espionage activities in all of Western Europe with particular emphasis on the armies of the Western European countries. He advised Hitler of the poor state of preparations of the French army before 1938. It was he who drew up the armistice terms in June, 1940, which turned out to be oppressive and demoralizing for the French people. In addition to these activities, Speidel was responsible for the deportation of thousands of non-Aryans from France and for the brutal murder of many others who resisted the German occupation. The London Daily Express (5-20-57) carried a lengthy article on Speidel's criminal record which was exposed by a series of secret documents made available to that newspaper by Lord Russell of Liverpool.

The Speidel appointment evoked protests from important sections of the press in Western Europe. Political leaders also questioned the propriety and morality of the appointment. Emanuel Shinwell, former British War Minister and Minister of Defense observed in the House of Commons that his appointment was deplorable. "There is no doubt," he declared, "that at least until 1944 he (Speidel) was an ardent supporter of the Nazi creed." This is the man who is now entrusted with the fate of hundreds of thousands of European soldiers.

General Hans Roetiger. Roetiger is the former Panzer General who worked closely with Heinz Guderian. He held various posts during the war. Among his assignments was that of chief of staff under Field Marshal von Kleist and subsequently under Marshal von Kesselring who commanded Hitler's forces in Italy. Kesselring had been sentenced and tried as a war criminal for his brutalities against the Italian people. We are not aware of Roitiger's connections with the outrages perpetrated by von Kesselring. Roetiger is an old military hand having served the GGS in two world wars. He fought both on the Russian and French fronts during World War II. In 1954 he took over the management of the Hamburg branch of the so-called German Society for Military Science. Unquestionably this organization was one of the camouflaged setups that the GGS employed in order to maintain the continuity of the GSS' planning after the défeat. It was at a meeting of this Society that a leading officer of the Defense Ministry, Col. Fett, expressed confidence that the Paris Agreement would enable Germany to achieve Bismarck's plan of assuring the Fatherland "a predominant position in western Europe." One of Roetiger's favorite slogans: "We should take care not to be drowned in tradition, but, rather, to be borne along by it."

General Joseph Kammhuber. Gen. Kammhuber, one of Goering's closets associates, has now been appointed Chief of the German Air Force. During the war he led formations of Goering's Luftwaffe which "distinguished" themselves in the bombing of many European cities. Like his associates mentioned, he served the GGS in two world wars.

In 1940 when the Nazis launched their barbarous air assaults against western Europe, Kammhuber directed a squadron to bomb the German city of Freiburg. It is said that this fake attack was then used by Nazi propaganda as an alibi for the bombing of open cities in western Europe.

Admiral Oskar Ruge. Adm. Ruge took over the German Navy after the former head, Capt. Adolf Zenker, delivered a speech in which he urged the German Navy to remain true to the traditions of Hitler's Grand Admiral Doenitz. Admiral Doenitz was found guilty of war crimes and served a 10 year sentence.

Ruge was a U-boat specialist and responsible for the sinking of many allied ships during the war. Again, as in the case of his associates, he served the GGS in both wars. For his services to Hitler's cause he was promoted to the rank of Vice Admiral. Incidentally, Captain Zenker has now been appointed Commander of Naval Forces in the North Sea.

General Walter Wenck. Gen. Wenck had the distinction of commanding Hitler's "last stand army" outside Berlin. Though he is not yet an official member of the German armed forces, he is a great favorite of Chancellor Adenauer and there has been much talk that he would ultimately become the commander-in-chief of all of the armed forces. In March, 1945, after most people recognized that Hitler's game was up, Wenck took over the job of protecting Hitler's last stand in Berlin with the aid of an army made up predominantly of 16 and 17 year olds. One of Wenck's orders of the day called upon these youngsters to save the Fuehrer: "Soldiers of the Army, Group Wenck, you are ordained to liberate the Fuehrer who is battling in Berlin." While the Speidels and the Heusingers speak about their so-called opposition to Hitler during the last days of the war, General Wenck cannot even make that claim. The backgrounds of other leading figures in the new German armed forces were examined in the No. 46 issue of Prevent World War III.

From the foregoing it is clear that the top personnel of the German armed forces consists of individuals who had close ties with German militarism as far back as World War I. In 1952, when the plans for reviving the German army were unfolded, the noted news correspondent Spencer D. Irwin made an observation which deserves to be pondered by all security minded Americans: "The impression that they (the new leaders of the German armed forces) love the West but despise the East is skillfully planned for Western — especially American, gullibility. But, as we said, a general staff made up of Germans may be called European but it can never be anything but German. For this blindness we may pay a horrible price in the future" (Cleveland Plain Dealer, 10-12-52).

The Von Bonin Plan

A survey of present trends in the German armed forces would be incomplete without reference to the so-called "affair von Bonin." In 1955, Col. Bogislav von Bonin, working in the West German Defense Ministry, proposed a new strategy for the German armed forces which created a great stir in Germany and among Allied military officials. Von Bonin declared that the NATO concept of mobile strategy was ill suited for Germany. He stated that Western planning concentrated on the defense of other countries in Western Europe at the expense of Western Germany. NATO plans, he alleged, made it inevitable that West Germany would be turned into a major battlefield while NATO forces would, if necessary, withdraw behind the Rhine and regroup there. Von Bonin also declared that the plans for twelve German divisions would represent "an offensive force." By this he did not want to imply that it intended to take the initiative by attacking the Soviet bloc, but rather that it was offensive minded. In other words, von Bonin was stating that from a military point of view the NATO strategy would sacrifice the substance of Western Germany and invite attack from the East.

On the basis of these criticisms and on the allegation that Western Germany was not capable for the time being to produce and support twelve divisions, he recommended a "purely defensive strategy." This would entail the stationing of anti-tank combat groups along the 500 mile long interzonal frontiers. These groups would be aligned in depth with a national militia to repel mass infantry attacks and six armored divisions to mop up any enemy armored break through.

The force required would consist of roughly 150,000 men. It would be purely a German force and would operate separately from NATO units beyond the Rhine. Moreover, it would be exclusively composed of professional volunteer soldiers. The von Bonin plan does not merely constitute a military concept directly opposed to the ideas of NATO but also involves considerations of high politics. In other words, it is a political-military proposition so characteristic of much of the planning of the old GGS.

The political aspect of the von Bonin plan is probably more significant than his military proposals. Basically the political goal is to develop the kind of military force which could perpetuate and consolidate the rebirth of the German military while, at the same time, to open up possibilities for negotiations with the Russians. As the Manchester Guardian (4-14-55) noted: "Von Bonin's plans could be held to assist a political development in which the West German army would gradually overhaul, balance, and then become superior to the existing cadre army of the People's Police in Eastern Germany. This three-year process would give the Russians plenty of opportunities of making a firm and fair offer to end the cold war in Central Europe and so allow the reunification—'in peace and freedom,' as Dr. Adenauer would have it—of the whole of Germany."

The Political Objective

Von Bonin believed that the NATO strategy would destroy the possibilities of a reunified Germany with its own national army. He envisaged instead the kind of military setup which would not appear to be offensive to the Russians on the one hand but would also form the nucleus of a larger army if and when this would be required. The British writer Dennis Healey, writing in the New Leader (5-9-55) observed that von Bonin's plan had, in reality, little to do with the defense of West Germany in NATO. "It is to produce the sort of West German army which can at any moment be taken out of NATO and merged with East German forces to serve for the defense of a neutral united Germany." In analyzing von Bonin's plan and objectives, Mr. Healey made reference to the work of General von Seeckt who was responsibel for the revival of the German army in spite of the limitations imposed upon it by the Versailles Treaty. Von Seeckt, a typical member of the GGS devoted entirely to its cause, left no stone unturned in the effort to build up Germany's military might. He engineered secret agreements with the new Bolshevik regime in Moscow which enabled the German army to train personnel in Russia. Von Seeckt strongly believed in close understanding and cooperation with the Russians as a means of reviving Germany's power and as a counterweight against the West.

Speaking about von Bonin's plans, Mr. Healey says, if they come true "It is possible to see von Bonin playing the role of a von Seeckt as commander of the forces of a united Germany and seeking Soviet help to evade any provisions for keeping Germany weak and neutral."

Like von Seeckt, von Bonin has been strongly attached to the traditions of the GGS. He was the son of a Potsdam officer and belonged to the elite of the officer corps. According to the memoirs of the German General Faber du Faur, von Bonin typifies the spirit of Potsdam in its highest form.

Describing a meeting with von Bonin, General du Faur writes: "He (von Bonin) told me and his comrades at our officers mess in Potsdam while his blue eyes had a far off look so that they were only seemingly held in place by his own eyelashes, that only Hitler could save us . . ." von Bonin joined the Nazi party after Hitler came to power. Prof. Gordon Craig, in his study of NATO and the new German army (Princeton University) notes that von Bonin "had been a fervid supporter of Hitler during most of the war."

Von Bonin's plan was not the product of a disgruntled officer who was out for personal publicity. On the contrary, it reflected a very strong undercurrent of dissatisfaction among German military leaders who resented any thought that Germany's own interest might be subordinated to the general plans for the defense of Western Europe. A number of German generals had no use for the original EDC setup which would have integrated German armed forces contingents within an overall western defense pattern. They preferred a national German army and General Hans Speidel who now holds a key post in NATO, shared these views.

It is also a fact that the von Bonin plan which was presented to the German Defense Ministry in July, 1954, was not immediately rejected. More than four months elapsed before von Bonin found himself at "odds" with his military superiors. His plan was rejected on technical grounds and he was obliged to resign from his office. That his plan received favorable support in the German military setup is shown by the fact that leading generals and military writers came to his defense. Field Marshal von Manstein, one of Hitler's military strategists in World War II, expressed his sympathy and support. This same gentleman now advises the German Defense Ministry in matters pertaining to German war plans.

Von Bonin "Out" — — His Plan "In"

Leading officials in NATO sighed with relief when von Bonin was dismissed but it seems to us that their optimism was unwarranted. All indications now seem to point to the fact that the von Bonin plan has not been junked. Indeed, from what has been said and done by Defense Minister Strauss it would appear that the von Bonin plan is the essence of the new German strategy. The similarity between von Bonin's and Herr Strauss' attitudes toward key military questions is striking. Just as von Bonin tried to discredit the EDC, so did Herr Strauss describe it as "a device for recruiting a German suicide squad to cover the retreat of the NATO forces in the event of a Soviet attack." At noted above, von Bonin protested the NATO strategy alleging that it would sacrifice Germany. Strauss, too, has bitterly criticized NATO planning. Time Magazine (10-29-56) reported Strauss insisting that the new German army must "be as independent as possible, because he felt that the NATO strategy was not in Germany's best interests." A subsequent criticism of NATO made by Herr Strauss, was reported in the London Daily Express (1-7-57): "It is intolerable that we Germans should be the bow-and-arrow footsloggers for the American atomic knights on horseback.

According to latest reports, Strauss intends to build up anti-tank units that will stand guard over West Germany's eastern frontier. As though he were talking to the Russians, he said that these units were "purely defensive. It couldn't be considered a threat by anyone" (Reporter Magazine, 4-18-57). This was precisely von Bonin's idea and, as advocated by von Bonin, West Germany's Defense Minister also envisaged the creation of a larger German force that would take care of the interior zone of West Germany. This would not require the twelve divisions which had been originally planned and promised by Chancellor Adenauer. It is now common knowledge that Strauss has cast aside these promises (New York Times, 4-15-57). Strauss now conceives of a small professional army consisting of approximately 150,000 men. This is the kind of force which, according to the Christian Science Monitor (3-21-57), might be "acceptable" to the Russians and could be a factor in helping to bring about the reunification of Germany. While the army will be predominantly professional and comparatively small in numbers, just as the old Wehrmacht under von Seeckt, its possibilities for expansion are beyond question. By the same token it is a setup which offers great opportunities to do business with the Russians in the old von Seeckt tradition.

Defense Minister Strauss Speaks

The political character of the "new thinking" with regard to the German army was outlined by Strauss in a rather sensational article which appeared in a German weekly review that is closely associated with the Bonn Government. As noted by the New York Times correspondent (2-19-57), Herr Strauss' article outlines "the basic prerequisites for a return to the Bismarckian policy of strength and the use of this policy to force the western and eastern powers to reunify Germany."

Strauss emphasises, as did von Bonin, that the West German army should be used as a bargaining counter. A united and rearmed Germany, Strauss writes, must decide its own future and if the Germans desire to break away from the western alliance nothing can be done to prevent it. He insists that the Bonn Government must conduct its diplomacy in such a way as to make Germany "so indispensable to its western friends and so responsible for the potential enemy that both sides would find it worthwhile to talk with Germany." The potential power of the new German army, according to Strauss, would give the Germans a real opportunity to be heard. Thus, it is clear that the grand strategy of the Defense Minister points toward the establishment of a powerful, rearmed, reunited Germany which could be realized through the old game of playing off East and West against each other.

The "Eastern" Set-Up

We have devoted much of this article to military developments in West Germany primarily because there is more information available as compared with the Eastern Zone. However, it would be wrong, in our opinion, to underrate what is occurring in the eastern zone and the connecting links between military developments there and in West Germany. Speaking in the House of Commons in 1951, the noted British MP R. H. Crossman said, "There is no doubt about it that there is a great knowledge of what is going on in both parts of Germany owing to the fact that German generals on both sides exchange information." In this connection we would remind our readers of the "pioneering" work done by the so-called Brüderschaft organized in early 1950. In the No. 37 issue of Prevent World War III we described the Brüderschaft organization and noted that it was establishing contacts with the military authorities in the eastern zone. In July, 1950, one of the leaders of the Brüderschaft, Franke-Greiksch, declared in Frankfurt, "I have succeeded in entering into good relations with the Soviets." The French newspaper L'Aube reported that conversations had taken place between Franke-Greiksch and the chief of the peoples police of East Germany under which all former German officers who were not placed in the West German army, would be accepted in the East German army.

The ties between the GGS and the Soviets have a long history which we need not go into here. However, it should be noted that towards the collapse of Germany in World War II a memorandum issued by the GGC advocated a close cooperation between the Soviets and the Germans. We can also point out to the fact that the late Field Marshal von Paulus, a favorite of the Soviet General Staff after his capture at Stalingrad, worked diligently to cement relations between German officers in the East and in the West. In February, 1955, von Paulus organized a get-together of East and West German officers, including a number of generals who pledged to work for the "glory of the Fatherland."

As in the case of the West German army, the eastern setup is also heavily dominated by former members of the GGS. More than one half of all of the German generals in the Soviet zone come from the old Wehrmacht. It is estimated that of 1500 staff officers 30 per cent were members of Hitler's Wehrmacht. At least 7 of the 30 generals were former members of the GGS.

At this point we would not want to make a final judgment with regard to the nature and direction of German military developments. Yet, the trends are not at all assuring. We say this bearing in mind the tens of millions of people who have suffered by the ruthless wars conceived of and directed by Germany's General Staff.

Inside Germany

PLANNING FOR THE DAY

"Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's followers deliberately sabotaged a Government atomic-powered bill because they feared it would stop the West German armed forces from having nuclear weapons.

". . . They killed a constitutional amendment providing for the development of nuclear power for 'peaceful purposes' . . .

"Parliamentary sources said the rebels (Adenauer's followers) . . . had in mind the possibility that some day West Germany would want to make its own atomic weapons, which would be impossible if the Constitution provided only for peaceful use of nuclear power." (A. P., 7-2-57)

PFERDMENGES' "THOROUGHBRED"

". . . To most, his name, Dr. Robert Pferdmenges, means nothing. And in seven years in the German Parliament, he has yet to make a speech.

"Yet Pferdmenges' office in Room 102 H is one of the most important in the capital. For Pferdmenges is Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's closest friend and most trusted adviser . . .

"Pferdmenges is that rarest of rarities—a successful amateur politician. Professionally he is one of Germany's most powerful, and wealthiest, bankers—part owner and manager of the famous Salomon Oppenheim banking house which financed Ruhr industry between wars . . .

"Asked his views of Adenauer's prospects, Pferdmenges replied positively: 'He's still the best horse in our stable. And he will be elected Chancellor again next September.'" (Newsweek, 4-1-57)

THOSE "HELPFUL" GERMANS

"The future of the tiny sun-baked port of Elath and a six-mile strip of Israeli coastline are at stake in the current United Nations debate on Israel.

"Elath and the coastal strip lie at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba, a narrow 100-mile long body of water that extends north from the Red Sea between Egypt's Sinai Peninsula to the West and the Arabian Peninsula to the East . . .

"With the help of German advisers, the Egyptians established at Ras Nusrani a coastal battery that completely commands the narrow strait . . ."

"SOLIDARITY FOREVER"

"The 'Sudenten German Association' which is the representative body of 2,000,000 ethnic Germans from Czechoslovakia who were expelled to West Germany after the war, has publicly declared its solidarity with Hermann Krumey, the ex SS leader arrested here for having been instrumental in the deportation of several 100,000 Hungarian Jews to the Nazi death camps.

"A statement in which the politically influential organization refuses to disavow Krumey was adopted by the presidium of the Waldeck 'Sudeten German Association' of which Krumey has been chairman for several years. In the town of Korbach, a dozen miles from the huge concentration camp he obtained a governmental refugee loan and therewith built up a prospering business as druggist and merchant, without changing his name or concealing his record.

"For a time Krumey was the agent in Vienna of the notorious SS Colonel Karl Adolf Eichmann, chief exterminator of European Jewry. In March, 1944, he was assigned to Budapest, where he selected the Budapest 'Jewish Council,' arranged the mass deportations to Auschwitz and signed the notices ordering Jews to appear for 'resettlement'" . . . NAZIS AT WORK

"The German police announced that eighty grave stones marking Jewish graves were overturned last night in the foreign cemetery here. A straw figure was hung from a second Jewish memorial. Across its breast was the inscription 'Germany awake, Israel perish.' The police suspected that radical-rightist political groups were responsible." (A. P., 4-20-57)

RESURGENCE

"Church and civic leaders are expressing alarm at the outburst of anti-Semitic feeling and Nazi flag-waving recently displayed in various parts of Germany. Bishop Otto Dibelius, head of the German Evangelical Church, warned that recent desecration of Jewish cemeteries in West Germany indicated a 're-growth of anti-Semitic tendencies.'" AUSTRIA?—NOT YET . . .

"Nationalist agitators have taken to the hustings in the hope of rekindling enthusiasm for the idea of a 'greater Germany.'

"This 'Grossdeutschland' would include all the eastern territories annexed or conquered by Hitler as of September, 1939. These territories are the Sudetenland, the Lithuanian coastline, and the Polish Corridor.

TELL IT TO ADENAUER

CARING FOR THE GESTAPO

"Even though Gestapo service was hitherto excluded from the scope of a general pension law passed some years ago, the Hesse Administrative Court has, in effect, removed the 'discrimination' against Gestapo officials and put them on almost the same footing as other public officials with respect to pension benefits." "WE FORGET AT OUR PERIL"

"There have been far too many post-war books, films, and plays written to expound the thesis that the Germans, though misguided and misled, were in the main honest manly types who fought the good fight like any Christian soldier; I do not want to run the risk of seeming to belong to this gang . . .

"You will recall a remarkable discovery we made when we conquered Germany—that there were actually no Nazis there at all, just millions of 'decent Germans' suffering terribly because of the awful things they'd been made to do by other people . . .

"Why the Western world should be avid to swallow this particular brand of eye-wash, no man can say. For Nazi Germany was not a nation of honest dupes and simple soldiers: they knew, all of them, exactly what they wanted, and they were prepared to go to any lengths to get it. Until they were beaten (when all colours change overnight) they were total enthusiasts for world-domination, whole-hearted agents of a hideous tyranny which, if not finally checked, would have brought the curtain down on human freedom for generations to come.

"They sing sweetly now (and others sing for them): everything now is love, and hands-across-the-trenches. It was, in fact, all a frightful mistake. But twice in this century it has been a mistake: twice these people, and no other, have engulfed the world in misery and bloodshed, in pursuit of their dream of power. The mistake, of course, then as now, was in losing. We forget this at our peril."

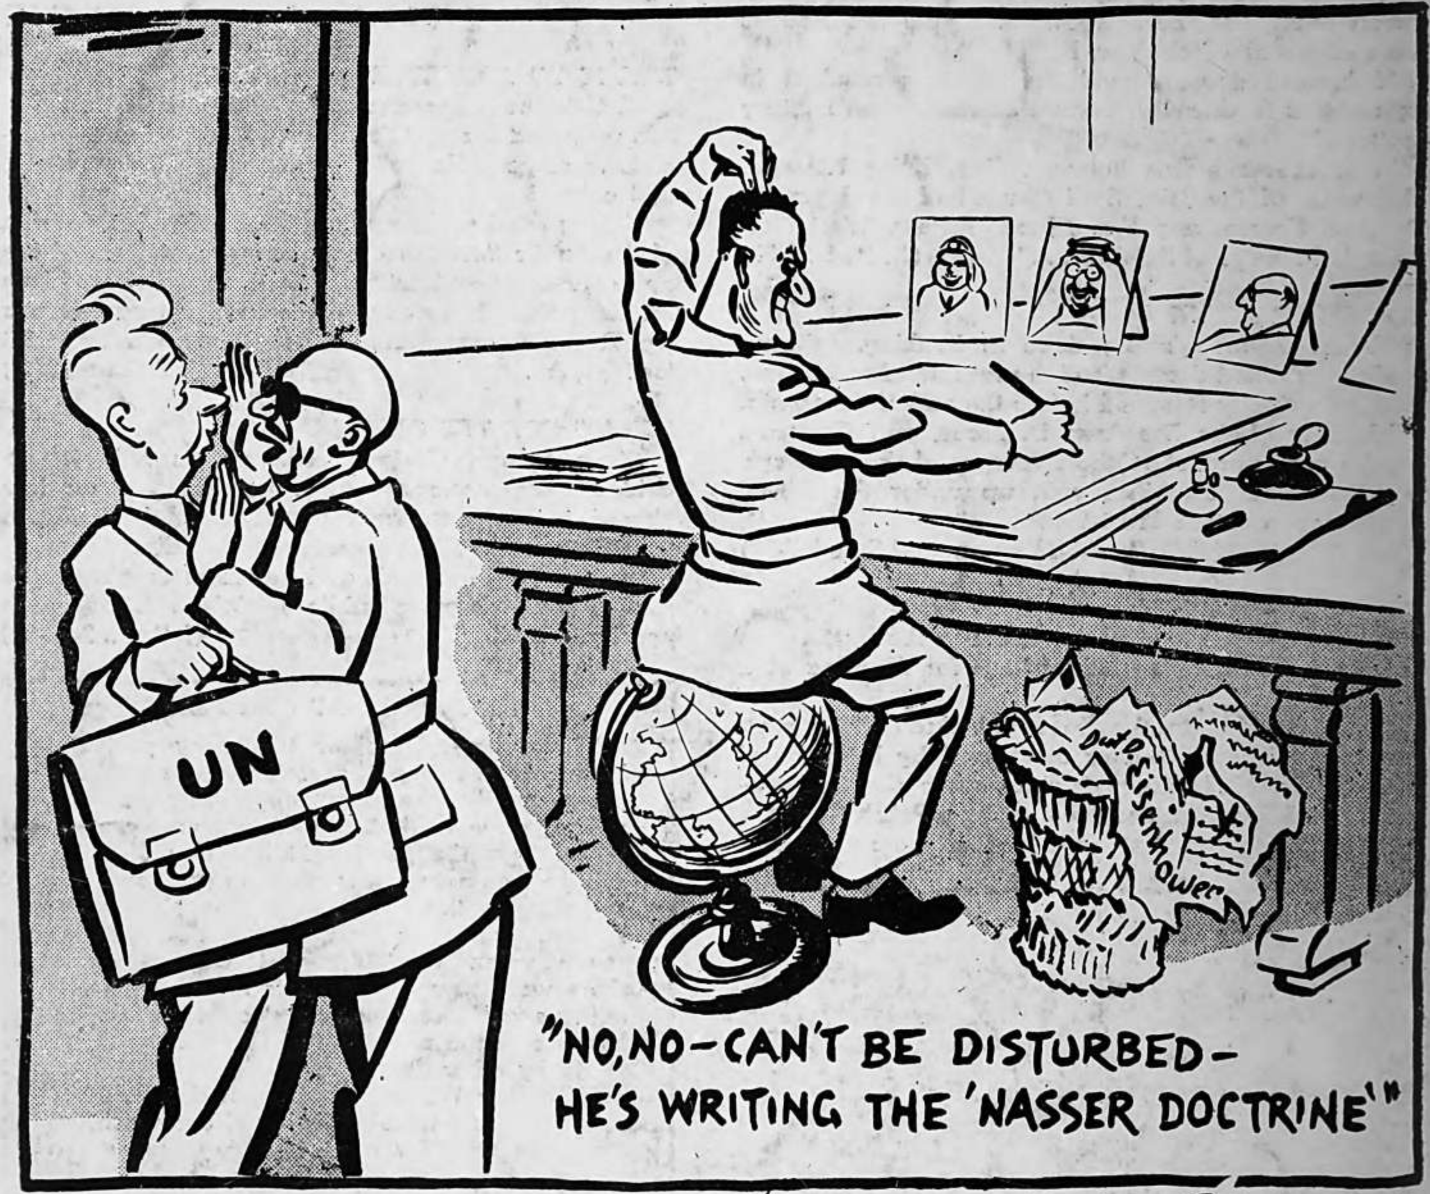
LOW'S COMMENT ON EGYPT'S ATTITUDE



UN
Dwt D. Eisenhower
"NO, NO—CAN'T BE DISTURBED—
HE'S WRITING THE 'NASSER DOCTRINE'"

Cartoon by Low, The Manchester Guardian

"... At Munich, Chamberlain saw only the risks associated with participating in little wars and forgot that as England abandoned strong points it was more and more exposed to the danger of a world war. America must not make the same error. America must support the outposts of the West such as Israel, whose security and integrity are essential to American strategic interests and to American strategic needs. Traditionally, the United States has been on the side of the underdog. Israel is a small, democratic nation which has hoped for freedom and needs American support for survival. The United States cannot afford to abandon Israel and the values and achievements which it represents."

(Hon. James Roosevelt, Congressional Record, 5-6-57)

"... We have fallen into what may prove to have been an irreparable error in the way we took our stand on the Anglo-French-Israeli intervention. Instead of insisting from the outset that their attack was provoked by Nasser, and that the intervention and the provocations must be cured together, we have insisted that the intervention must be liquidated first before the causes which provoked it are dealt with. We put all our pressure on Britain, France and Israel. We put no pressure on Nasser, and we have cleared Egypt without obtaining any serious assurances from anybody—from Nasser, from Krishna Menon, or from the Soviets—that this would not bring about a return to the status quo ante from which the explosion erupted. ..."

(Walter Lippmann, N. Y. Herald Tribune, March, 1957)
